Chapter 1

A/N- I can explain.

I know what you're thinking. "Writer's Domino, what're ya doing? Ya went from writing anime to Sonic? How could you go so low?" Just let me explain.

So I was never really a Sonic buff. I played, like, one of his games as a kid and saw a few episodes of a cartoon when I had the TV on for white noise in the background. Otherwise anything I knew was just general osmosis due to the fact he's so prevalent in internet and video game culture. So overall I had a pretty good gist of who he was.

Fast forwards, and the live-action Sonic movie trailer comes out. Me, being pessimistic due to the low success rate of video game films, ragged on the trailer like everybody else. "The Sonic model looks like a nightmare, movie'll sink, ha ha Gangster's Paradise," and that was that. Fast forward a bit more and the model goes from being a Lovecraftian abomination to something reasonable, and that spark of hope that the movie'll be good gets lit.

Movie comes out. A couple of weeks go by, I see the reviews, and I see that they're positive for the most part. So I decide to go see the movie despite not really knowing a lot about Sonic. Was pleasantly surprised to learn that the movie was decent, to the point I'd go as far as to say that it was good. Left feeling better than I thought I did.

More time passes afterwards, and as I'm watching more reviews on the movie the Unseen YouTube Algorithm Gods decide to pop a video in my feed that talked about the Archie Sonic comic series. Now, I'd heard whispers about the comic, but I didn't know jack about it. I watch the video, and thirty seconds in I begin to mentally tune it out and go to the comment section to look for funny comments, as is to be expected, when I notice one of the top comments talking about a character in the comic that died to a LCD-laced chili-dog.

"That can't be real," I think, "there's no way they'd put something like that in a kid's comic about Sonic the Hedgehog."

I do some research. By that, I mean I look up some stuff on Google Images. I'm scrolling through a bunch of Archie comic covers when one catches my eye: one of the covers for the Knuckles side series that went on for thirty-ish issues, and, due to me not having any context for what I was seeing, I immediately saw the cover as "Knuckles the Echidna and a ripped version of Bonzi Buddy fighting Kraven the Hunter from Spider-Man." It wasn't really that, but if you read it you know what I'm talking about.

"Okay," I say, "I gotta go deeper."

Now, it's around the same time quarantine due to the pandemic hits, so I'm stuck at home without much to do. That in conjunction to all this solidifies my decision to go ahead and read the whole comic series based on no other reason than I had literally nothing better to do, especially since I was close to finishing Monochromatic Ideals at the time.

So I read it. I go to a legally-dubious comic website and read it. The full 290 issues, all the side comics and series that are related to it, the whole shebang. And then I wiki-read the plot of a lot of the games so I had context to a lot of things.

Overall, it was... decent, I guess. Characters were kinda all over the place, plot was out there and really wild, and the first, like, whole quarter has that weird comic-humor thing that eventually gets completely dropped in favor of being a bit too serious for what the comic is, but for a comic series about Sonic it was decent enough.

But then 252 happens.

But then that damn Mega Man crossover happens and Eggman pulls a Pucci and resets the Archie Sonic universe.

You really get to feel what Emporio felt, too, because that's how bad the reset was. Whole characters are straight-up deleted from the story, whole plot threads, plot points, and story arcs are erased, issues upon issues of characterization are undone, whole new alternate histories that are almost never touched on replace the old, invalidating any time learning that, and some characters that did survive are replaced by alternate versions. It's to the point that I felt like Emporio at the end of Jojo Part 6, like I'm really in the back of the car along with these weird alternate versions of Sonic characters and as we're driving away I look up at the sky and ghostly apparitions of the previous characters are looking down at me from the clouds and are giving me thumbs-ups. This was done because the fine people at Archie wanted to incorporate the plot of the Sonic games in the story, so they decided to rehash the whole thing. This made it so that half of the whole story gets snapped out of existence, and the other half gets turned inside-out into an unrecognizable mess just to fit the plot of video games into the continuity.

(Edit: I was informed by a couple reviewers that the real reason for the reset was due to some legal issues Archie had, which I confirmed with some light research after the fact. It's way more understandable what happened with context, but my point remains the same.)

As a reader, I felt affronted. I felt like the extremely large time investment I just spent on this story was thrown out the window because the whole thing was reset and therefore completely invalidated. As a amateur writer I felt outraged, because it was such a nonsensical writing decision that was a single step away from destroying the story as a whole that I had to wonder what the hell the story writers were thinking.

But I mean, hey, I'm a fanfic writer, so what do I know?

Anyways, in response to my outrage, I decided that my next project was gonna be this. I'm writing this story more out of spite than anything else (a terrible decision, really, but I already planned the whole thing out and everything, so hey), but also to fix the story that I spent so much time on that got butchered while also writing something with an overarching theme of actions and consequences, 'cause, y'know, the meme (thanks Sammy), using the one method I do best: make a OC and write a story around him.

So this is that. OC-man and a theme, because themes are something I didn't really do that well with Monochromatic Ideals and am experimenting with, and OCs because they're my specialty. All together in a journey that'll span hundreds of thousands of words because I'm salty over a comic.

... Can't believe this is what it's come to. Sonic fanfiction. That thing everyone on the internet makes jokes over. I really am scraping the bottom of the barrel here.

P.S. There's never gonna be a A/N as long as this one. This is more or less me trying to make justifications to myself for writing this, because I'm still in disbelief that I'm going through with this. But a lot of books have that one page in the beginning that's basically just a author's note, so just treat this as that.

Episode 1- Prologue

The Special Zone. A whole universe whose composition was in constant flux at the will of its one, singular ruler. There was no ground, sea, or sky, as in place of all that was an infinite abyss spanning in all directions that glowed a spectrum of colors beyond imagination. What structures did exist all existed at the whim of its sole inhabitant. A completely shapeless place beyond imagination, where the ruler was all but omnipotent. A true god.

That same individual, whose size rivaled mountains, was leaning against a structure of purple shapes piled onto each other as a mountain, his body littered in large, bleeding gashes. His body was completely still and lacked breath, was bled to the point that his wounds no longer bled, and his gargantuan left arm was missing entirely.

"God, huh? Didn't feel like it to me."

On a small, grass-filled floating platform below the god's body was a single individual that was looking up at the large body. His body was entirely covered by a red cloak, and a red hood over his head obscured any visible features. Over his shoulder he held a small duffel bad, which he threw on the ground under him. The top of the bag opened upon landing, and inside was a large, gray, diamond-shaped gem that glowed brightly inside the darkness of the bag.

The light it gave off illuminated the obvious bloodstains splashed on the gem, and the cloaked figure gave a sigh at the sight.

"I didn't wanna do this, Feist. Really. But you just wouldn't give me the damn rocks." The man looked to his side, where six similar gems, each glowing a different color, were piled next to him. Pale, human hands, the only visible feature on the figure, reached over to grab the gems and toss them all inside the duffel bag. "We just met, but... yeah, you didn't really seem like that great a guy. And I heard stories. But I didn't wanna kill you, damn it."

As if in response, Feist's body slipped off the makeshift mountain and fell into the endless abyss below. The cloaked man walked to the edge of the platform he stood on, duffel bag slung over his shoulder, and watched the giant panda's body fall far enough that it soon disappeared out of sight.

The second the body disappeared, everything shook. The platform, the rapidly-collapsing mountain, the ever-shifting structures dotting the distance, and even the space that comprised the world itself began to waver and shake. "Looks like the zone's disappearing due to his death. Sounds about right," the man muttered before turning around. "Well, whatever. Just gotta drop these things off. Then after that..." He paused, and began to walk forwards. "Yeah, and after that I still got a million things to do."

The shaking increased, and objects began falling all around. A particularly large piece of debris fell towards the grass-filled platform, but by the time it crashed into and destroyed the platform, the man had disappeared entirely.

And soon after, the Special Zone disappeared forever.

Shorty after the destruction of the zone, the man found himself sitting on a pipe with his legs dangling off the edge. In his left hand was the duffel bag containing the gems. In his right hand was a large claymore with a blade as long as he was tall, which he continually bounced off his shoulder in an almost anxious manner as he looked below him.

The room he found himself in was vast and dark, with metal walls found no matter where one looked. Metal pipes, large wires, and other loose electronics hung from every surface, and the ground below was so far down that it almost couldn't be seen. In the middle of this room was a large, raised platform with a walkway in its back that lead to a door at the back end of the room. This platform housed dozens of computer monitors, each of which were connected to cables and wires that hung from the walls and ceilings, and in front of those computers sitting in a large, round chair, was a man.

A creaking sound was heard as the cloaked man tightened his grip on his sword's hilt.

In front of those computers, in that chair, was a human man with wildly disproportionate appendages. His body was large and round, but his arms and legs long and spindly. His head was also rounded, with a pointed nose, a bald head that cleanly reflected the light of his computers, and a ginger mustache that was almost as wild as the manic grin on the man's face as he tapped away at his computers.

"Hey. Eggman. Up here."

The calling of his name caused the round man to sit up straight in his chair and look around wildly. His chair eventually swiveled around, and after some more looking Eggman looked up at the pipe that the cloaked man sat on. Though his eyes were hidden behind a pair of blue-tinted spectacles, Eggman's expression was easily readable as his mustache bristled and a pointed a gloved hand up at him in an overly dramatic manner.

"What the- hey! Just who are you!?" he demanded. His almost high voice that was roughened with age was enough to make the cloaked man twitch. "And just who do you think you are, sneaking into my perfectly-reputable secret lair without so much as a heads-up!? Do you realize just how discourteous-"

"You don't know how much I hate you, Eggman," the cloaked man interrupted, which quieted Eggman. "You couldn't comprehend it even with all your intelligence. I didn't even know it was possible to hate somebody this much until I started hating you. I can barely even think straight when I look at your face. Your voice makes me want to tear my ears off. You're the worst person that's ever existed, Robotnik, and I'll never forgive you for anything you've ever done.

"... Anyways, here, have all seven of the Chaos Emeralds."

And just like that, the duffel bag the cloaked man held was tossed down to Eggman's level. The bag bounced off the ground once before touching down and sliding to a stop near his feet. Surprise flashed through Eggman's features before his mouth pursed in suspicion, and his head bobbed up and down from the man with the red cloak to the bag a total of four times. Slowly, be bent down while maintaining his gaze on the hooded man while pulling the bag near him. It was only when he had both hands on the bag did Eggman look down and open the bag.

Surprise once again spread over his face as bright colors flooded out from the bag, all originating from seven gems piled right into the bag.

Eggman looked back up at the hooded man, who continued to silently observe him, and then scrambled back to his chair. He grabbed the handle of a small, rectangular device off his chair and brought it back to the bag, and then proceeded to wave the device over gems. The device soon let out a loud, whirring sound, and when Eggman turned it over to examine the glass screen on its front, he began to madly cackle as he carelessly tossed the device over his shoulder.

"I didn't believe you for a single second there, but these readings don't lie!" he gleefully exclaimed as he opened the bag further to examine the gems within it. "How in the world did you even manage to acquire these!? Last I checked six of these puppies were sequestered away in that infernal Special Zone, and one was locked away in Castle Acorn!" He paused, and then grimaced when he came to the gray, bloodstained gem. "Oh, what is this?" he asked, voice annoyed. "You couldn't have bothered to clean this one before delivering-"

There was a flash of metal, and the edge of the cloaked man's sword was pressed up against Eggman's neck. Eggman, who hadn't even seen the man move from the pipe to right in front of him, froze up and slowly rose up to his feet while raising his hands. Though the man was significantly shorter than him, the sword more than made up for it, and even as he rose to his full height Eggman found that the sword's tip was still pressed against his throat.

"It kills me that I could end it all right now, but can't. It kills me even more I have to give you these things," the cloaked man told him. "It'd be so easy, too. One cut and your head comes right off. How many people on this planet would praise me if I did it? How many problems would I solve at this very moment? It's the most tempting thing in the world, killing you right here and now."

As he talked, the hooded man pressed the tip of the sword harder and harder into Eggman's throat. The doctor, for his part, actually began to sweat but otherwise remained stoic at the sight of the blade pointed at him. He held his breath when the sword dug deeper, and then exhaled the breath when it was lowered away from him.

"Ah, well. It's all in accordance with His will, and it'll all work out in the end anyways. So I guess I can let it slide." The cloaked man's posture became more relaxed as he rested the large sword on his shoulders, and he went as far as to roll back and forth on his feet. "Congratulations," he said in a light tone of voice, "you get to get off scot-free. Enjoy."

"... Right," Eggman mumbled as he took a step backwards away from the other male. "I've eternally subjugated people for doing far less, you know," he threatened, one hand rubbing at the spot on his neck the sword had pressed into.

The cloaked man shrugged. "You could try," he agreed, and then bounced the claymore up and down off his shoulder. "Be a waste of robots, though."

"Hmph." The doctor looked down, and an interested hum escaped him. "Your hands," he noted. "They're human. Or are you an Overlander? So hard to differentiate the two, I tell you."

A bemused chuckle left the hooded man. "I'll be real. I don't even know anymore," he admitted.

"Huh. That's rather vague," Eggman commented. "Just what is it you're trying to accomplish here? I would say you giving me the seven most powerful items in the known universe is a sign you wish to join me all-powerful and illustrious empire, but that just isn't your intention, now, is it?"

"Pfft. Hell no," the cloaked man said. "I wouldn't be caught dead joining you. The fact we're both wearing red right now is purely coincidental." He gestured to his red cloak and the black and red outfit Eggman wore, and then spun on his feet and turned his back to the doctor. "Look, I just handed you over literally unlimited power with no strings attached," he told him as he began walking away. "Don't worry too much about the details. They're yours now, seriously. Now go build up your war machines so you can carry out your evil plans for world conquest or whatever. I don't care."

The distance between them began to grow, with Eggman clutching the bag of emeralds to his chest while the hooded man continued to walk away. It was when the cloaked figure was halfway down the walkway did the doctor choose to open his mouth and shout "Who are you, anyways!?" to the man, but he didn't so much as slow down when the question reached his ears.

Right as he neared the door leading out of the room, the door opened and a human even shorter in him scrambled through, with his long nose pointed downwards as he squinted at a small, digital screen he held in his hands. "Doctor, I really think we oughta discuss our production quotas at site C," he called out. "I've done a little resource inventory and after crunching some numbers-" He looked up, and then did a double-take when he saw the cloaked man right in front of him before coming to a stop. "W-who are you?"

Thwack!

Instead of answering him, the cloaked man punched the small man in the face. He cried out in pain and fell onto his backside on the platform, and the cloaked man released a satisfied sigh as he shook his left hand. "Never gets old," he said in a wistful tone before walking past the short man and disappearing through the open door.

All of this was largely ignored by Eggman, who continued to examine the bag of gems in his hands. He'd eventually glanced up at the bag to see if he could catch one last glimpse of the man, but by then he had already left. The shorter, long-nosed man on the ground and rubbing at the growing bruise on his face was still ignored.

"I'm not one to question a gift, but even I have to admit that this is too good to be true." He shrugged, and then turned around to his chair and began to climb in. "Well, doesn't matter now!" he claimed as his chair spun towards his computer monitors. "Pick yourself up off the ground, Snively! All the power in the world just fell into my lap and I aim to use it!"

A groan followed by approaching footsteps reached his ears as Snively stepped next to his chair, still rubbing at the bruise on his face. "So we're scrapping that plan, then?" he asked. "The big plan involving the whole fleet and the mechs and all the bombshells we just produced?"

"Small potatoes in the grand scheme of things now that all seven Emeralds are in my possession!" Eggman claimed with a wave of his hand. "Let that rodent continue his resistance in his cozy little kingdom. My ultimate victory against him will be all the sweeter if I conquer the whole of the world utterly and completely before ending him! It would be definitive proof of my victory against him, and it's only after I see the light of hope leave his eyes will I finally end him. And with these Emeralds, I can make it all possible." He smiled, and his fingers began to fly over the keyboard. "Time to draw up the battle plans, Snively. We have a lot of work ahead of us."

A/N- This is technically Episode 0, but if I do that then the episode numbers don't line up with the chapter numbers and it would drive me crazy. You know how it be.

Episode 2- Orange juice ruined my life

"You're out? What do you mean you're out?"

"We're, uh... we're out. I don't know what else to tell you." The man wasn't anybody overly special. He had on the same store uniform the rest of the employees did, and just like the rest of the employees he had that vapid look in his eyes as he addressed the teenager right in front of him who was currently and angrily gesturing towards an isle of juices. "Most days we have orange juice. This isn't one of those days. You know how it is."

The teenager, mouth open wide in disbelief, shook his head and fully turned to the refrigerated isle. "You're telling me you're carrying all this milk, all this lemonade and all this iced tea... but orange juice? Possibly one of the most common commodities to ever exist? You're out of that?" He turned back to the store employee, shoulders slumped and eyes full of desperation. "C'mon, man, I'll even take that gross extra-pulp stuff. I'm desperate here."

"Kid, I'm telling you, we're out." The aged store employee, who had a large, sweeping mop in his hand, scratched the side of his head as he looked around. "Look, what was your name again?"

"My name is Sorun," the teen answered. "It's for my mom, man. You can't at least check the back or something?"

The store employee's eyes narrowed in a scrutinizing manner as he stared down the teen in front of him. "Is it?"

Sorun fidgeted under the sweeping man's eyes, and after a few moments sighed and turned his head away. "Alright, no, it isn't. She's fine and doesn't touch the stuff. I just really want some orange juice." He nodded his head to the store shelves behind him. "But you're out."

"Ah." The employee nodded his head, and then glanced down at the watch on his wrist. "You came all the way to the store this late at night for orange juice?"

"I didn't have anything better to do," Sorun grumbled in an indignant tone. "You're seriously judging me for biking all the way here for orange juice?"

"... How old are you again, son?"

Sorun quirked an eyebrow at the older man, but decided to indulge him and answer. "Sixteen. Why?"

"You're sixteen and you're still using a pedal bike? Don't most kids your age have a car by now?"

At this, the teen threw his hands up in frustration. "Are you seri- are you gonna help me or not?" He pointed to the white, tiled flooring around them. "You really so bored sweeping the floor that you'd rather mess with me than do your job?"

"Eh. Pretty much," the employee answered with a shrug. "Spend five years in my shoes and you'd be doing the same." He placed the head of the wet mop on the floor and began to sweep away from Sorun. "Now I'd be glad to help you, but I don't want to. Because I have to get to these floors. Thank you and have a good night, sir."

Eyes wide in disbelief, it was all Sorun could do to not let his jaw drop as he waved the sweeping man away. "Yeah man, yeah, sure, thanks... dick," he whispered under his breath before turning back to the shelves.

It was a depressing sight, really. Seeing a shelf that spanned from one end of the store to the other, fully lit and refrigerated and stack from bottom to top in every single refrigerated store-bought drink one could ever want for. All except for orange juice, accentuated by the fact that there was a section in the middle of the shelves that was completely bare.

For Sorun, it defied belief. Doubly so considering it looked as if every single other item on the shelf was fully stocked to the point they were practically brimming off the shelves. He didn't even think there was ever a time he'd walked into a grocery store and they were out of anything , let alone orange juice.

"Maaaan," he moaned, "you gotta be kidding me." He went as far as to close his blue eyes, as if trying to will away a bad dream. But when he opened his eyes, the shelves were still empty. "Yeah, you're not kidding," he mumbled. "What time is it, anyways?"

He dug into his pocket, found his phone, and brought it up to his face so he could read the screen. He couldn't suppress his groan when he saw the time.

Out so late and he didn't even have so much as a carton of orange juice to show for it.

It was at this moment that Sorun's phone decided to ring, and Sorun, who hadn't expected it, flinched from the phone vibrating and nearly dropped the rectangular device. He managed to catch it right after it slipped out of his fingers, and as he brought it up once more to read the caller ID he could feel his heart beating heavily in his chest. But after reading the screen and realizing that it wasn't his mother calling him, he breathed a sigh of relief and answered the call.

"Ugh, David?" he greeted as he held the phone to his ear. "Whaddya want, man?"

"Yo, Sorun," a male voice answered from the other end of the phone. "Dude, we doing Bloody Palace tonight or not?"

Sighing, Sorun rubbed at the bridge of his nose with his free hand. "You seriously called just to ask me that?"

"I'm super bored," David explained. "C'mon, they finally fixed the LAN connection issues so the co-op mode actually runs smoothly now." The voice on the other end grew teasing. "I'll let you main Vergil. I know he's your favorite."

"David, I'm not even home right now, and I don't have my Switch on me," Sorun said. "Plus I deleted 'Devil May Cry 3' from the Switch."

"You did WHAT!?" the phone yelled, and the volume was so great that Sorun winced and held the phone away from his ear. "One of the best, nay, THE BEST game you can get on the Switch and you decide to delete it!? What were you thinking!?"

"I was thinking that DMC was taking up too much space on my Switch and I had other stuff I wanted to install," Sorun answered, bringing the phone back next to his ear. "Give me a break, man. We already cleared all the floors of co-op Bloody Palace. Twice. We played the damn game to death and back. You really trying to tell me you don't wanna play anything else?"

David's voice on the other side of the phone paused, and then gave a non-committal grunt that barely carried through over the speakers. "Not really," he said.

"Of course." Sorun rolled his eyes, but then froze when he heard something coming from the phone's speakers. A musical melody that he swore he could faintly recognize. "Wait, is that...?" He listened closer, and after a few seconds he finally managed to realize what he was listening to. And as a result, he rolled his eyes again. "What are you doing right now?" he asked David.

"Hm? Studyin'," he said. "We got that biology test tomorrow."

"Studying, huh?" Sorun dryly remarked. "I hear that opening song in the background, David. Watching 'Cells at Work' doesn't count as studying."

There was a scoff from the phone. "Says you," David replied. "It uses the same exact science we've been learning in biology class. I can either read a book on it or I can watch it in a beautifully animated format. What was I supposed to pick?"

"I'm not even surprised," Sorun muttered.

"I'd be disappointed if you were." There was a pause. "Wait, what are you doing if you're not at your house right now?"

"It was the weirdest thing, man." The teen turned back to the shelves that had given him so much ire, and couldn't help but glare at the empty space before returning his attention to the phone. "I just got a craving for orange juice and I went to the grocery store to buy some." He tilted his head up to the ceiling. "Except, guess what, they're out!" he shouted.

"... How does a grocery store run out of orange juice?"

"I know, it's outrageous." The teen found himself lowering to the ground until he was sitting down and pressing his back against the shelves. "Dunno what I'm gonna do," he admitted. "Any ideas? ... David?"

There was nothing from silence from the phone, and when Sorun called David's name again, there was no reply. He stared down at the phone in confusion, and was about to call his name a third time before he heard rustling from the other end followed by David's hushed voice.

"- Get off! Uh, sorry about that, dude. Cat jumped on my laptop. What were you saying?"

"I was saying how I don't know what I'm supposed to do," Sorun repeated.

"Ah. Hm... hey, isn't there that one organic store across the way? They'd have orange juice, right? Or at the very least some oranges. Just go there."

"You mean that one store clear across the other side of town?" Sorun asked in an incredulous tone. "Dude, c'mon, it's a school night and my mom's already gonna kill me for being out so late. I don't wanna bike all over town for orange juice."

The sound of air being blown into the phone's speakers sounded from the phone. "Then dude, I got nothin' for ya," David said. "Listen, I gotta go. Seeya tomorrow, shorty."

"Yeah, sure, see you- hey." He tore the phone away from his ear and stared angrily at the screen, and his eyes widened when he heard mocking laughter from the phone before the call disconnected. "... Three-and-a-half feet isn't even that short, asshole... eh, who am I kidding?" he muttered as he put the phone back in his pocket. "'Kay, what am I doing?"

He picked himself up off the ground and turned once again to the shelves. An annoyed whine escaped his throat when his eyes wandered to the empty space, but otherwise he managed to keep himself calm as he scratched at his cheek in thought.

"I really don't wanna go and spend practically half the night running around town. I got school tomorrow. On the other hand, I really want that orange juice. I'm seriously gonna go all that way just to get some juice, though?" He focused on the empty spot on the shelves one more time, and then sighed. "Alright, screw it," he thought, "I really want that orange juice."

It wasn't the wisest choice he had ever made, and he was sure that he was going to be paying for it later, one way or another. But that peculiar craving he'd all of a sudden gotten just wouldn't go away, and he honestly didn't know if he could bear to go through it a whole night. But his mother would understand.

He hoped, at least.

Shoom!

Sorun went straight upon hearing that sound. It was a strange sound- the high-pitched whirring of thrumming energy- and a sound that was completely foreign to Sorun's ears. He slowly turned around from the shelves to the space behind him, and he nearly lost his footing when he saw what was making the noise.

For lack of a better term, it was a hole. Between the shelves he stood next to and the back wall of the store, there was a large, green hole floating just off of the floor. The hole was constantly thrumming with energy, and the inside was a constant, swirling mass of green tendrils of energy that occasionally stretched out of the circular aperture of the hole.

A strange sight, to be sure, and one that left Sorun completely baffled.

"What the...?" he muttered. He tilted his head in confusion at the sight of the strange, green thing he was staring at, and blinked heavily a few times just to make sure he wasn't seeing things. But no matter what he tried, the green energy vortex remained hovering above the floor. "Uh... sweeper guy?" Sorun called as he turned his head to the side. "You, uh, you there? Guy? Anyone?"

He looked to the left and then right side of the area he was in, but there was nobody else around him. Not a single shopper or employee, and not even that man with the mop. An uneasy hum escaped his throat, and he took a cautious step towards the green, swirling hole while maintaining eye contact with it.

"The hell is this thing?" Sorun asked himself. Each slow, steady step was filled with more trepidation than the last, and it was only when he was a few inches away from the portal did he crouch down and waved his hand over it. "Some kind of weird... thing, or... wh-what is this?"

He decided not to touch, for fear of what would happen if he touched it. The little arcs of green electricity that would occasionally spark out from the vortex-like hole didn't look all too inviting, either, and when a particularly big electricity spark hit the ground near him he decided to back up a step. And by then he wanted to walk away entirely.

But then a voice came out of the hole.

"H-hello?" The voice that came out of the portal sounded broken and warbled, but even through the distortion Sorun could make out that it was a rather high voice. "Is anyone there? Hello?"

"... I really gonna do this?" Sorun thought to himself, but when he looked around once more and saw that nobody was still around, he sighed. "Yeah, guess I am," he decided and stepped next to the portal. "Umm... hey," he greeted, voice unsure.

"Oh, there's someone there!" the voice cried out, sounding much more excited. "You're the one, right? The person that the tablet was talking about?"

Sorun looked to the sides once again. Still nobody. "Uh... no?" he answered.

"Huh? Y... you're not?"

"I'm pretty sure? I don't- what's going on here?" Sorun asked, and then gestured to the area around him. "Is this, like, some kind of weird store promotion or something? Seriously, what is this?"

"... No, you have to be," the voice declared. "The coordinates pointed to... no, this has to be right! Please, I need you to come with me!"

Sorun frowned, and he pointed his index finger at the green hole. "You want me to go in there?"

"Yes! Please! I can't keep this open for much longer and, and we really need your help! Please!"

"Uh..." The voice certainly sounded sincere, or at least as sincere as a strange, distorted voice coming out of a random green vortex could sound. On the other hand, Sorun was so off-put by what was happening in front of him that he'd unconsciously taken a step backwards when the voice had asked him to go into the hole. And the more he thought on it, the more he realized that he didn't want to be there. "Yeah, no, I'm not gonna do that," he told the voice. "So... yeah. Gonna just... go away. Bye."

"W-wait, no, just hold on a second!"

"This is too weird. I'm not dealing with this," Sorun thought as he turned his back to the vortex and began to move away. "I don't know, I don't care. Just gonna leave, get my orange juice, go home-"

Any further thoughts were cut off when he felt something grab his left ankle and pull. He lost his balance and fell onto his back with a grunt, and as he leaned upwards he saw what had grabbed him: an arm. It was an incredibly thin arm, and for some reason it was yellow, but there was no mistaking the gloved hand attached at the end that was gripping his ankle.

And then he began to panic when the arm began to drag him towards the vortex.

"What the- hey!" he screamed. "Let me go!"

If the voice on the other side of the portal heard him, they didn't make any indication, and instead continued to drag Sorun towards the hole. Sorun, feeling the fear increase exponentially the closer he was brought to the vortex, was trying and failing to grab onto something to halt his progression. But all his hands could do was slip off the linoleum tiles that made up the floor, and he couldn't so much as gain enough traction to try and drag himself away. In a move of desperation, he went as far as to try and kick at the arm that was dragging him, but he only got as many as two kicks in before his feet were dragged into the hole.

Sorun's scream began shrill when his feet disappeared entirely in the green vortex, followed by his legs as he was dragged in further and further.

"Hey, come on, stop!" He'd been dragged all the way up to his torso, and by this point the teen was grabbing around wildly in an attempt to grab at something to try and drag himself out. "Stop!" he screamed out as his left arm vanished into the vortex. By the time it reached his shoulders, he'd turned onto his stomach and reached a hand out in a final attempt to save himself. "Stop, stop, STO-AAAAH!"

His fear-ridden screams cut out right as the last of his body was pulled through the vortex, upon which the green portal disappeared entirely to leave a clean, untouched floor in a quiet store. It was five minutes later that the store employee had walked by and had mopped the exact same spot on the floor the portal had been on.

"Oh... oh, man, what the hell..."

Everything was sore. Sorun didn't even know why; the last thing he remembered was being dragged through that green hole, and now he was here. Where "here" was he had no idea, because he was so nauseous that he couldn't even go as far as to open his eyes. And even if he wasn't he was so riddled with fear he couldn't even move.

What he did know was that he was lying flat on his back. Somewhere. And that there was an almost earthen smell going into his nose that he was barely able to register because his own thoughts were so sluggish and confused right now.

"There was... weird, green thing, then that hand..." The teen rolled his head to the side to side, and then froze again when a wave of nausea hit him. "Oh, I'm gonna throw up. I feel awful."

It was after he was lying down for what felt like minutes did he notice that there were sounds going into his ears. The more he tried to focus in on these sounds, the more he realized there was a loud ringing in his ears that was slowly beginning to fade away. So, without much else to do, he strained his ears as best he could to try and make out some of the sounds he was hearing. He grew even more still when he recognized them as voices.

"Sure... right... this one?"

"Looks... alright... you guys?"

"Isn't... a human...?"

He could only make out bits and pieces, and even then he couldn't make sense of what little bits and pieces of conversation he could pick up. On the upside, feeling started to come back to his limbs, along with the relief that, yes, he still had his limbs. He flexed his fingers, flexed his toes, and when he found a satisfying amount of articulation in his appendages, began to move.

"Oh, man. It all feels awful," he groaned as he slowly began to move, his eyes still screwed shut. "I need... I need a second here."

"Um... sir?" A voice he was actually fully able to understand reached his ears, and he felt a pair of hands grab onto his shoulder and back to help him sit up. "Sir, are you okay?"

"Ugh, man, uh... wait." Once he reached a seated position, the hands left his body, and Sorun froze as a spark of recognition went through his mind when he heard that voice. "Wait-wait-wait... that voice..." His eyes were still closed, but he turned his head towards where he heard the voice and did his best to create an accusing expression on his face. "You're that guy-slash-girl that pulled me through that weird green thing!"

"Er, I'm a guy," the voice corrected, "and I'm really sorry-"

The second Sorun registered the word "sorry" being said to him, a lance of anger shot through him and caused him to instinctively open his eyes at the voice. "If you're sorry then why did you-!?"

Any voice that was left in his throat died right there the second his brain registered the images his eyes were receiving. His vision was slightly blurred, and at least was gradually clearing, but he had just enough vision to be able to perceive the thing kneeling on a single knee right in front of him.

The problem was that he didn't know what he was looking at.

It was bipedal. He could tell that much at a first glance. It was also yellow and white, and, indeed, had the same kind of limbs as the one that had pulled him through the portal. But his greatest confusion came when he reached the head, and found a large, fur-covered head staring at him with large, blue eyes.

"... Eh?" It was the only response Sorun could think to make as he stared at the thing in front of him. He stared intently at its eyes, and then at the white gloves, and then the red shoes it wore, and then he looked back up to the eyes. "Is this like... some kind of hyper-realistic plush doll somebody left lying around?"

He could have sworn he felt his heart stop when the plush thing blinked and changed its facial structure to look offended. "Hey, I'm not-"

"JESUS, IT'S REAL!"

The panic was back. The same panic he felt when he was being pulled through that portal, magnified tenfold the second a little monster began talking in front of him. Any feelings of nausea instantly washed out of him as he scrambled back away from the yellow thing, screaming all the while. The yellow monster went as far as to try and reach out to Sorun, but all that did was make him scream louder, bolt up to his feet, and turn around to try and run away.

But there were more. A lot more monsters, right behind him, and all of them colored with so many colors that Sorun wasn't even able to so much as count them before physical pain assaulted his eyes from all the color. This caused the tenfold panic he was experiencing to transition into hundredfold panic, and the fact he was blinded from his eyes hurting only increased his terror.

So he turned away in a third direction, and was relieved to find when he opened his eyes that there weren't any other monsters. What he did see was a door. It was a door he could barely see since the fear coursing through him was blurring his vision, but at the very least he could make out the outline of a door. So he sprinted to the door, opened the door, and slammed it right behind him.

"Oh my god, oh my god what the hell...!" As soon as he'd closed the door Sorun had pressed his back up against it and spread his limbs out across the frame. "The hell were those things back there!? Where am I!?"

His heart was throbbing so hard in his chest that it was beginning to physically pain him, and the fear going through him was making him exhausted to the point that he was panting heavier than he ought to have, but the fear of the room full of things being on the other side of the door he was keeping closed was keeping him glued right to the frame. He shook his head in an attempt to clear his mind, or at the very least to try and calm himself down to think comprehensive thoughts, and after doing this and taking a few deep breaths his breathing began to even out and his vision began to straighten.

"Okay... okay, okay what are we doing?" he thought to himself as his eyes darted around the room he found himself in. "I'm... somewhere, dunno where. There's a bunch of monsters behind this door. Don't know how many, but they're really colorful." He shook his head. "Alright, focus! Gotta get out. Gotta get away from here. Where am I... wait, where even am I?"

After becoming collected enough for rational thought, Sorun took a look around the room to see that, to his surprise, he was in a bedroom. It was modestly furnished, but it was definitely a bedroom if the bed on the side said anything. There was a desk, too, and a closet that, for whatever reason, only had pairs of socks and gloves spilling out of it.

What the room didn't have, to Sorun's mounting horror, was a window. Or even another door that lead somewhere. Not even an air vent, now that he looked. There was no other exit aside from the door he was leaning on.

"Aw, shit, I boxed myself in."

And then someone knocked on the other side of the door he was pressed against, and Sorun went rigid as fear began to creep back into him.

"Hey, buddy?" It was a different voice from the yellow monster that dragged him into this nightmare. Deeper, but still boyish. Slightly nasally if Sorun really focused on it. "Er, that's just a bedroom, and we're underground, so... there's not really anywhere to go. Think you could come out so we can talk?"

"Just talk?" Sorun asked through the door. "We're just gonna talk? No biting or anything? Just words?"

"Yeah, totally! Nobody wants to hurt anybody here. Alright? But we really need to talk, so could you please come out?" When no response was given, the voice continued. "Look, I promise that nobody is gonna hurt you. We just wanna talk. Honest."

It sounded like a legitimate offer, but Sorun was sorely tempted to take it due to him not trusting the colorful creatures on the other side of the door. This was mostly based on the basis that he didn't trust anything they said. That, and he was too scared to actually open the door.

But then the rational side of his mind told him that he had to leave this room eventually, and they likely weren't going to go away before he did. And that there were so many of them out there they could probably force the door open if they wanted to. Or at the very least wait until he dropped from exhaustion and dragged him out.

"Ugh, man... I gotta," he realized. "Okay. Okay, I'm opening the door, and I'm coming out."

He backed up off the door and looked down at the doorknob. He didn't want to- he really, really didn't-, but there wasn't much choice all things considered. "Okay, play it cool," he thought as he reached for the door knob. "Just... open the door and find out what happened. And if they eat you, well, there wasn't a lot you could have done. If I'm screwed, I'm screwed." He gripped the door knob with sweaty palms and slowly began to turn it. "Oh man, please let them be honest when they said they aren't gonna hurt me..."

Slowly, the door swung open, and Sorun, with his eyes closed, stepped out. He took a few steps out, squared his shoulders, and took in a deep breath. And then, right after he slowly exhaled, he opened his eyes to look at the crowd in front of him.

He immediately groaned and had to close his eyes again.

"Agh, I'm seein' every color of the rainbow and then some," he groaned as he rubbed at his eyes. He still wasn't able to make out any details on any of the things there, or even how many there were. "Okay, could you all just, like, spread out a bit? I can't- there's too much color. I can't see."

"Oh!" the boyish voice realized. "Er, um, you wanna sit down? Help get your bearings?"

"Sit down? Uh, sure. Sure, yeah." He felt a tap on his arm, and he relaxed as a pair of hands grabbed at his arm and guided him away from where he was. Eventually he heard the sound of a chair scraping against the ground and was guided towards it, to which point Sorun sat down and felt a circular table in front of him. He leaned forwards on the table, rubbed at his head, and ventured to open his eyes once again to get his bearings.

After looking around a bit, he saw that he was, indeed, sat down at a circular table. Inside of what seemed like an open kitchen, outside of which seemed to, in fact, be a large room that looked like it was underground if the dirt walls said anything.

And standing right next to him and between the colorful crowd in the back was one of the monsters themselves. A blue one- a really blue one with the same lean limbs and beige coloring on his stomach, arms, and mouth. But the only thing Sorun was able to focus on was the blue spikes it had on the back of its head that he could swear were actually sharp enough to cut.

He was suddenly more nervous.

"Er... hi!" He smiled at Sorun and blinked his green eyes- eyes so large that they practically took up half his face now that Sorun looked- in a friendly manner. "So what's your name? I'm Sonic. Sonic the Hedgehog."

"... Sorun," the teen mumbled as he looked Sonic up and down. "The Hedgehog?" he repeated. "I'm not seein' it."

"Huh?" Sonic tilted his head to the side, and Sorun could vaguely make out the two, triangular ears on top of his head twitch. "Whaddya mean? 'Course I'm a hedgehog."

"Nooo. The hedgehogs I know are, like, this big-" Sorun spread his hands a couple inches out from each other, "- aren't colored blue, and they sure don't talk. Where I come from, at least." He turned away and leaned on his arms which he rested on the table. "I got a feeling I'm not where I'm from, though. So yeah."

"Ah," he heard from the side. "So, do they not have Mobians where you come from, or-"

"No, man, they don't," Sorun snapped as he turned back to Sonic. "I don't even know what that is. The only thing that walked and talked where I came from were people like me, so you'll have to excuse me for panicking when I get pulled through your stupid green hole of mystery and end up in an underground grotto of animal people!"

The hedgehog flinched back from Sorun's wording, and then looked away as he rubbed at his arm. "Yeah, I guess it... kinda makes sense you'd freak out if you've never seen or heard of a Mobian, huh? You want to meet the others?"

Sorun groaned, brushed a few locks of black hair away from his face, and then pressed his face against his arms. "No. I don't. My eyes are still adjusting to the messed up colors here."

"Messed up colors? What do you mean?"

"I dunno, man." Sorun lifted his head up and looked around. "All the colors are all... sharper than I'm used to and- look, it's getting better, so don't worry about it." He turned his head to Sonic. "What am I doing here?"

Sonic's eyes continued to avert his gaze from Sorun. "Well... we brought you here."

"Yeah. I figured. I'm asking why you people decided to go pull me..." Sorun trailed off, and then shook his head when he remembered he had no idea where he was. "Where even am I?"

"Right. About that." A nervous chuckle left Sonic as he rubbed at the spines on the back of his head. "If I told you we opened a portal to a different universe, your universe, and pulled you from that world to this one, what would you say?"

"I'd ask when I wake up from the fever dream, but I'm not that lucky." The teen looked closer at the hedgehog's eyes, but his awkward smile seemed sincere and his eyes honest. This caused Sorun to groan out loud and plant his face back into his arms. "Jesus, you're serious," he realized. "Dude. Why ?"

"Got time to let me explain?"

Sorun exhaled an exasperated breath. "Sure, go for it."

"Great!" He felt the table vibrate, and Sorun looked up to see Sonic sitting on the edge near him as he looked down at him with a big grin on his face. "So generally speaking, things on our planet Mobius are pretty awesome. All except for one guy who decided to go and ruin things for literally everybody on the planet by trying to take it over with an army of robots he built." He raised up a single finger. "Dr. Eggman."

"Jesus, you people got subjugated by an anthropomorphic egg?" Sorun gasped out. "You're an even bigger loser than I am."

"He's not an actual egg, Sorun. 'Eggman' is a nickname. His real name's Robotnik," Sonic explained in a flat tone. "He's a human. Like you. Sort of- long story- but... yeah, he's a pretty bad dude," he admitted. "We've always been fighting him for years, but no matter how many times we kick his butt and break his toys he comes up madder and better than before!"

"'Kay, yeah, sure, but what does this have to do with me?"

"I'm getting there," Sonic said. "Things usually go back and forth between Eggman and everybody that fights him, us included, but..." His expression saddened. "Things, got really bad a couple months back when he somehow got his hands on all seven of the Chaos Emeralds."

A beat passed as Sonic stared at Sorun in an expectant manner, to which Sorun blinked and tilted his head in confusion. "Sonic, I don't have any context on what Chaos Emeralds are."

"Really? You didn't have those in your world?" he asked in a surprised tone. "Okay, uh, wow. So Chaos Emeralds are, well, these gems. Seven in total. And each and every one has limitless energy inside of it. You following me so far?"

Sorun waved a hand to the side. "No, this is all complete nonsense to me, but keep going."

"Aw, great! So," he continued, "nobody really knows how he got all seven Emeralds, because we had one, and the other six were locked away in the Special Zone- er, 'zone' being another word for a universe," he clarified. "Somehow, Eggman managed to get all the Emeralds from the Special Zone while the one we had was stolen by somebody. And he used them to seriously juice up his forces and take over almost the whole world in weeks!" He balled up one of his hands and slammed it into his open palm. "But, after a ton of fighting from us, we managed to steal the Emeralds back from Eggman. But even after taking the Emeralds, we haven't been able to shake his hold." He turned his head and awkwardly coughed. "We decided we needed help. So we used the Emeralds and got you."

The human teen almost fell out of his chair entirely at that. It was such a shocking statement he sat up ramrod-straight in his seat, and looked Sonic dead in the eyes with disbelief written in his own. He even opened his mouth, but nothing but a gasping breath came out in lieu of words.

"Are you... completely serious?" he finally managed to ask after he cleared his throat to compose himself. "Lemme get this straight, lemme process this," Sorun muttered as he rubbed two fingers at each side of his head. "So, you get these seven rocks. Seven rocks of unlimited power , 'cause I guess that's a thing here. You get the Emeralds, and you decide that the best way to use the infinite energy gems is to summon... me. Me, a random teenager from Earth." A loud slap resounded across the room as Sorun smacked his own forehead. "What was actually going on in your head that gave you such a 'genius' plan?"

"Hey, we didn't mean to get you specifically," Sonic defended. "We just... so, there was this tablet we had. This wooden tablet. And it had a kind of prophecy thing etched in it-"

"Jesus, here we go..." Sorun sighed as he leaned back in his seat.

"- And this tablet, it's been in the Acorn family- oh, that's the, uh, royal family, basically. Sally over there is part of it. Sally, say hi to Sorun!"

Sonic pointed to the group behind Sorun, and he turned around in his chair towards the person he was pointing too. He was thankful that his eyes had finally adjusted to the colors, but he still found it difficult to look at the group of sixteen-odd animal people- Mobians Sorun had to remind himself- of various shapes and colors that all were staring at him. One in the group, a red-haired Mobian, awkwardly waved to Sorun. Wordlessly, Sorun ignored her and turned back to Sonic.

"So. Wood tablet," Sorun said.

"Yeah, wood tablet," Sonic confirmed. "It had some specific stuff written in it. Like, really specific stuff written in it that matched up with things that happened to us while we were gathering all the Emeralds while fighting Eggman. And there were these, er, numbers in there, too, that I didn't really understand but Tails managed to figure out. They pointed to your zone, and it was a zone so far away that we needed the power of all seven Emeralds just to open a portal there. It said that we'd be able to find someone that would help us and would have the power to finally help topple Robotnik's stranglehold on the world. So that's what we did. We used all the Emeralds to get you here on Mobius." The hedgehog clapped his hands together, and the sudden noise made Sorun jump up in his seat. "So! What do you say, Sorun?"

"I say you're a complete fool."

His statement caused the whole room to go quiet, which was only broken momentarily when someone in the crowd near the back coughed. Sonic, who was stunned by Sorun's words, blinked at him in confusion. Sorun, for his part, was staring up at Sonic with wide eyes as he began to run a tired hand down his face.

"Erm... what do you mean?" Sonic asked.

Sorun, who was mentally exhausted at Sonic's explanation, rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "Oh, man, Sonic, where do I even begin? You used seven all-powerful gems to summon some random dude from another world to help out with, with what, the robot occupation here? Are you serious!?"

"It seemed like a good bet!" he argued as he hopped off the table and stepped up to Sorun, who turned his chair to face the hedgehog. "Look, I know you're... justifiably a little mad at what we've done, but we seriously need help here, Sorun. We're not making any progress at the rate we're going!"

"And what do you want me to do about it? Look at me," Sorun said as he frantically gestured to himself. "I can't do anything. I-I-I'm a high school student, Sonic. I'm a normal dude!" he shouted, his voice beginning to become shrill. "I don't know how to fight! Jesus, Sonic, I've never even been in a fight! I don't have any special skills, or-or special powers or anything like that! I'm not even that strong! I'm below-average if anything!" Sonic opened his mouth to argue the point, but Sorun leaned forwards in his chair and held a finger out to stop him. "No, shut up and listen. I can't help you. There is not a thing I can do to help you and your friends, Sonic. I'm the kind of guy that'll die twenty seconds in if you throw me into a live combat situation! I'm useless!"

"Aw, don't say that." Sonic flashed the human teen a warm smile, reached over, and gave his shoulder a reassuring squeeze. "You're plenty special as you are right now! And just 'cause you're not super-strong doesn't make you a useless person. I'm sure there's something-"

"No, no-no-no, dude, you're not listening to me." Sorun brushed the hand off his shoulder, and then rose up off the chair so that he could grab Sonic's shoulders and shake him slightly. "I don't want to help you. I don't wanna do any of this nonsense you're asking me to do! I don't wanna go out there and put my life on the line for a world I've never even heard of until ten minutes ago! I don't want to go to literal war ! I just want to go home! The home you literally stole me from!"

Sonic, who looked utterly shocked from Sorun's claims, opened his mouth to say something, but his jaw just hung open limply. A quiet breath escaped him after, and the shoulders Sorun was holding went slump and he looked down at the floor.

"We... w-we can't, Sorun. I'm sorry."

In response, the teen shook Sonic again. "'Can't' isn't a very positive word given the context to the current situation, Sonic," he hissed at the hedgehog.

"I'm serious, we can't!" Sonic pushed Sorun's arms off his shoulders, which caused the teen to angrily scoff and hop back into his chair. "We need all seven Chaos Emeralds in order to open the portal back to your zone up, and we don't have them. They got scattered all over the world after the portal we opened closed. It's what happens when you use them."

"Then go get them back!" Sorun shouted. "You got them once! What's stopping you from running around and getting them again!?"

"We got them the first time around when we took them all from Eggman while we were dismantling his operations!" Sonic said in a loud, heated tone. "We can't afford to go running around the whole planet looking for Chaos Emeralds while dealing with Eggman at the same time!" He paused, closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and then opened his green eyes again to look Sorun in his blue. "Look, I-I get it. You don't want to be here. I understand, but... ah." His foot began to nervously tap on the ground as he rubbed the back of his head. "Sorun, I really want you to join and help us. I know we're coming off as a bit selfish here-"

"OH, oh, you think!?"

"- I'm practically begging you here, Sorun, and that's not something I do for a lot of people. And it's not just for my sake. It's not just for my friends' sake. I'm talking about the sake of the whole world here." He took a step forwards, clasped his hands together, and sent Sorun a pleading look. "You can be helpful. I promise. I can help you. We can all help you. I'm just asking you to trust us and help us see this through." He gave the teen another smile and held a hand out to him. "Come on, Sorun. Join the Freedom Fighters."

It was amazing to Sorun just how much sincerity he saw in Sonic's face and his eyes. It was an offer given with such genuine warmness that he had paused while staring down at the offered hand, and he felt his breath stop as the hedgehog's words repeated in his head.

And then he roughly slapped the offered hand away, and the look of hurt became very apparent in Sonic's eyes.

"'The Freedom Fighters.' Is that supposed to be some kind of sick joke?" Sorun demanded as he rose off his chair again. "You take me from my world- against my will, I might add- and drag me across the whole multiverse that apparently exists only to drop me in this nightmare-bizarro world, and then you tell me you're literally going to hold me hostage here unless I help you fight a guerrilla war against some megalomaniac robot dictator or whatever! And you want me to join a group called the Freedom Fighters? Are you for real? You want me to risk my life and fight for the freedom of some random planet when you're taking away my own freedom, you psychopath!?"

"We didn't know somebody like you would come through the portal!" Sonic shouted back. "We thought... the tablet made it sound like the one we brought through would be willing to help! We didn't mean to-"

"Oh, you and your mystical, magical, prophetic tablet!" Sorun yelled. "It's not happening, Sonic! I'm not joining your resistance group, I'm not joining anything, and I'm not gonna go out there and get killed fighting robots! It's not happening!"

An explosive sigh rang out from Sorun's throat, and once more he collapsed in the chair, turned around, and folded over the kitchen table. Sonic attempted to approach him once more, but when he got close Sorun turned around and gave him a glare that gave Sonic pause and caused him to step back. It was only after Sonic widened the distance between them did Sorun go back to burying his face in his arms, causing the hedgehog to turn away from him and towards the group of Mobians across the room. "I'll... leave you with your thoughts," he told Sorun. "We'll talk again in a bit, okay?"

Even as he began to walk away, Sorun didn't stir from his spot.

When he arrived at the group in the back, most everybody had split off to talk about the situation among themselves. One of the only ones left alone was a red-haired, chipmunk whose attention was divided between looking at the human sitting at a table across the way in concern and looking at the gloomy-faced hedgehog in front of her in concern.

"He's not very thrilled about all this," Sonic mumbled to her. "Actually, to be honest with you, Sal, the only other person I've ever seen blow a fuse that bad is Egghead. I don't know what I'm supposed to do with that."

"Well, you heard him, Sonic. He thinks we've stolen him from his world," she responded to him. "And to be honest, he's not very far off the mark. I think we've made a mistake."

"But it seemed like such a sure thing!" The blue Mobian began to pace back and forth in front of her as his eyes focused in intense thought. "I mean, we studied that thing up, down, and sideways! The wording was the most clear thing in the world! The tablet really made it sound like some kind of hero would come through! Instead we got Sorun, and... well, you know." He stopped and glanced at the human. "He really doesn't wanna help," he said. "Which is bad, 'cause, well, we were really banking on this."

"This is precisely why I voted against wasting all of the Emeralds at the behest of a piece of wood."

Both Mobians paused and looked towards the space next to them, where a black-furred hedgehog was leaning his back the wall while crossing his arms over his chest. Sally held a hand to her mouth in a contemplative gesture while Sonic rolled his eyes.

"I don't wanna hear it from you, Shadow," Sonic said as he turned away.

"Yes, you didn't want to hear anything from me when we were deciding on what to do back then, either. Look where that got us."

"... You're not gonna let this go, are you?" the blue hedgehog sighed out.

"Of course I'm not," Shadow snapped. "We had the Emeralds, all seven of them. After all this time we finally had a definitive edge against Dr. Robotnik, and instead of choosing to use them for something practical you all madly decided to go along with the whimsical writings of an ancient piece of driftwood held in the Acorn family for generations." He cast an accusing glare at Sally. "A piece of driftwood you didn't even know existed until your father brought it to your attention a week ago." He sighed and looked away from them both. "I just can't help but question the wisdom in such a choice, especially considering that -" he nodded his head to Sorun, "- is the end result."

There was a hum from the sole female in the group as Sally rubbed at her forehead and glanced at Shadow. "Maybe, but even you have to admit the writings on the tablet were too specific to be marked off as coincidence," she pointed out. "There were literal illustrations of a battle we had last month of all things etched in the tablet. We couldn't just write such a thing off. And aside from you, everybody voted for using the Emeralds to make that portal." She lowered her hand to her side. "What's done is done. No point arguing about it now."

"That may be so," Shadow agreed, "but that still leaves us with a worthless human that can't even so much as attempt to put up a fight." His crimson eyes scrutinized the human sitting on the other side of the room, and he couldn't help but scoff and shake his head at him. "And based on my observations, he wasn't exaggerating when he said he'd die twenty seconds into a combat scenario." He turned to Sonic. "You'll end up killing him if you let him into the Freedom Fighters, hedgehog."

"Hey, you don't know that," Sonic argued. "He could be great and we just don't know it. Maybe it's a self-esteem issue or something. We're not gonna know if we don't try!" He gestured towards Sorun. "Even if he can't fight there's gotta be something he can do! I mean, the poor guy's stranded here away from his home, and I wanna help him, but with Eggman-"

"We wouldn't even have to deal with this issue if you hadn't wasted the Emeralds."

"We were almost all in agreement-!"

The argument would have continued if Sally hadn't intervened by stepping between the both of them, which quieted them both immediately. "Boys, quit it. Both of you," she said in a commanding tone. Sonic's response was to chuckle nervously and shut his mouth, whereas Shadow grumbled under his breath and turned his head away. "Whatever we're gonna do with Sorun, there's a slight problem we have to deal with. Where is he gonna sleep?"

Sonic's paused when the question reached his ears, and then he slapped his forehead when he thought it over in his head. "Oh, right, we totally didn't think of that, did we?" he asked himself. "Yeah, all the spare rooms in Freedom HQ here are kinda full up since Knuckles and his whole team, Shadow, and Rouge are bunking here, huh? Hm... hey, Shadow-"

"I will blast you through the ceiling if you even consider asking me to bunk with the human, Faker."

"Shadow's right, Sonic," Sally said, which caused Sonic to turn to her in surprise. "The rooms here are only big enough to accommodate a single person, and as it stands they're all spoken for at the moment. He can't stay here."

"Hm... yeah, guess that is kind of a problem," Sonic agreed. He began tapping his foot on the ground rapidly as he rubbed his chin, and as an idea came into being he let out a soft hum. "You know, I still have that spare bed in my room ever since Tails moved in with his parents," he realized. "Sorun could-"

"Oh, I don't even wanna talk to you!"

The sudden raised voice caused everybody in the vicinity to flinch, and all turned towards the source that was the table Sorun sat at. Sonic's eyes were immediately drawn to the human, but they were soon diverted when he noticed to the yellow form standing right in front of him. And then he began to grow concerned when he saw the fuming look of anger spread out over Sorun's face.

"Uh-oh. Tails..."

There were so many emotions going through Sorun at the moment that he couldn't sort through them all if he tried. So much information that he couldn't even begin to process it all, and though he had a basic understanding of the situation his mind was in such a muddled mess that he could barely even think straight, let alone process all the emotions running through him.

The disbelief that he was in a whole universe. The fear that had begun to subside when he discovered the Mobians weren't going to eat him, but then resurfaced when he discovered he was trapped here. The despair at knowing he was apparently in some war-torn world under siege by a madman who used robots. Worry at what would happen to his personal life at home if he was gone too long, and at those who would wonder where he disappeared to. The sheer confusion at the absurdity of the situation. The everything . It was all too much.

But then the yellow Mobian with the fox-like features approached him. And all those emotions and thoughts were, in that moment, overridden with anger. Anger at the unfairness of it all. Anger that he, out of the billions of people on Earth, had been dragged away. Anger at the Mobian in front of him who had personally done the deed and dragged him here.

He was honestly so mad he couldn't see straight, let alone think.

"Oh, I don't even wanna talk to you!" he yelled at the fox, which immediately made the smaller male step backwards. But, even after being yelled at, the fox took a deep breath and looked up at Sorun's eyes before he began speaking.

"I just wanted to apologize to you," the fox told him. "We really didn't-

"I was walking away! I didn't want to get involved!" Sorun continued, interrupting the yellow fox's apology and causing him to freeze in place. "I try to leave, and what do you do!? You drag me! You physically drag me through the portal!"

"I... I'm really sorry, Sorun," he mumbled as the corner of his eyes began to grow wet. "It's just... the last month alone has been really horrible, so when the coordinates on the tablet-" he sniffed, "- when I decoded the coordinates and made the machine that produced the portal I just, I just really hoped that the words the tablet said were true and that somebody would come and help us, and everybody agreed and-"

But Sorun couldn't let him get any more words in, because the frustration had built up to a feverish level. "Kicking and screaming! I was literally kicking and screaming and trying to get away from you, but you wouldn't let go!" Sorun continued, and by now tears were beginning to freely fall from the fox's face. "What kind of person-!?"

There was a blur of blue, and before Sorun knew it Sonic was standing between him and the fox. And there was anger in Sonic's eyes, too- a certain anger that immediately made Sorun wary and had him step away from the hedgehog.

"Sorun. He gets it. You made your point." He turned towards the openly-crying fox, and his features softened instantly when the top of his head to get his attention. "Hey, li'l buddy. I'll finish up here, okay? I'll finish up here. Don't you worry about a thing."

The fox looked up at Sonic with a thankful look in his eyes, and after sniffling a few times he gave him a jerky nod, cast one more sorrowful look at Sorun, and then turned around to walk away from them. It was only once he was a fair distance away did Sonic turn back to Sorun with an expression of anger mixed with pity in his features.

"Hey. Don't do that to him again," he warned Sorun. "He feels awful enough as it is. I don't need you screaming at him and making things worse."

"Oh, yeah, you're right. What was I thinking? It's not like he stole me away from literally everything I've ever known and loved or anything," Sorun bitterly mumbled, which caused Sonic to breath out a sigh. "What do you want, man? I already told you I'm not joining your freedom clubhouse."

"We'll get to that later," Sonic said to him. "First we gotta talk about where you'll be sleeping."

"Sleeping? Oh." That was a problem now that he thought about it. His bed was a whole universe away from him. "So what were you thinking?"

"Well, that's the thing." Sonic rubbed at the back of his head while giving Sorun a side-gaze as he turned his side to him. "Space is kind of at a premium right now, so... it looks like you're going to have to stay with me."

It was already growing too awkward for Sorun's liking, and it made itself evident on his face when he blanched.

"That said," Sonic continued, "it's getting late, and I think we all need a breather. So how about this? We'll go to my house, you can see the sights, and we can talk more about the Freedom Fighter thing later, alright? The fresh air and time will do you good."

He wanted to object- mostly just to spite Sonic- but the problem was that he legitimately was tired. And hungry. And the nausea from earlier hadn't gone away entirely. And the more he thought on it, the more he just wanted to collapse somewhere, close his eyes, and just stop thinking for a few hours.

So it looked like he didn't have much of a choice.

"Alright, fine. Sure. Yeah. Fresh air sounds good." Sorun nodded at the hedgehog, and relief made its way onto the Mobian's features. "Let's go. I don't really wanna be down here any longer."

A/N- I didn't want to make Sorun so short, but at the same time I didn't want him to be this super-tall weirdo walking around with a bunch of short people. He was originally taller, too, but a day before I began writing I actually bothered to look up Sonic characters' heights and, wow, these things are literal munchkins. You don't see it in the comics and games since everything is to their scale but they're all super short.

Recursion Error

Episode 3- Sonic the Hustler

Sorun was almost blinded once again when sunlight finally hit his eyes. He just couldn't place his finger on what the problem was; it was almost like this world itself had more vibrant colors than the one he was from. Like every image he saw was sharper with colors that contrasted each other more heavily than things in real life ought to have. And while his eyes were still adjusting, it wasn't until he and Sonic had walked a long distance did he finally stop squinting.

"Maybe colors are just different in alternate universes," Sorun reasoned to himself. "I sure as hell don't know how this shit works. I didn't even know multiverse was a thing until today. How do colors work, anyways? Wavelengths or something like that? Shoulda paid more attention in science class."

The underground room they had left had, indeed, been an underground room, and upon exiting it Sorun had glanced behind him to see that, on the outside, it was little more than a small hill with a metal door on its side. He chose not to question it, and then decided to walk alongside Sonic in what proved to be minutes upon minutes of awkward silence.

Awkward silence that continued on as they seemingly walked whole miles until they finally reached civilization.

"Well, here we are," Sonic announced as they neared civilization's edge, stopping on a hill that overlooked the city below. "Knothole City. Our own little slice of heaven."

"It's... very wooden," Sorun commented.

"We live in a forest. What else are we supposed to use?"

It was a point that Sorun had wordlessly conceded to.

The place was certainly large enough to be a small city, or at the very least a large village. Wooden houses and buildings lined everywhere, with a giant castle right in the middle of it all. And on the outside of the village, and almost all sides, were trees upon trees that marked the dense forest the city was in. The only exception was the side near the back, in which dense forests gave way to large, rolling plains of grass that ran all the way out to the horizon where Sorun could see the sun beginning to set.

And down below Sorun could see that the place was packed with more Mobians. Mobians of so many colors and species that he gave up on trying to classify them all at a first glance. All of them milling about, playing around, and getting on with their lives with happy grins and smiles.

It looked so happy that, to Sorun, it was downright unsettling.

"Isn't there supposed to be a global war going on right now against that egg guy?" Sorun wondered as the two walked towards the city. "Everybody here seems... really happy, given the current state of the world."

"Eh. Fighting Eggman's a Tuesday around here," Sonic answered with a shrug. "'Sides, the Freedom Fighters keep most of that war away from here, and we do what we can for any other villages or settlements around that are under threat by him." The light grin on his face became slightly downcast. "But that's still a lot of people for us to help, and there's only so many of us. That's why we need help."

"I still don't think a random sixteen-year-old will be any help," Sorun said, but this only caused Sonic to look at him with a confused look in his eyes.

"What does age have to do with it?" he asked. "I'm sixteen, too, and me and my friends have been fighting Eggbreath since I was five. You get used to it."

It took a few seconds for Sonic's words to finally register in Sorun's mind, but when they did he actually stumbled in his footsteps. Sonic looked to him in concern, but stopped when Sorun held a hand up, straightened his composure, and then looked to Sonic with shocked eyes.

"Are you... you're serious?" Sorun gasped out in disbelief. "W-wait, so you're, like, some kind of child soldier? And this Eggman guy has seriously been a problem for over a decade?"

"Ehh... I wouldn't go as far as child soldier," Sonic corrected. "Me and my friends just fight for the people. That's all there is to it." His face grew serious. "And, yeah, we've been fighting him for that long. Technically. At some point down the line our old Eggman got swapped out for a new Eggman, but the threat's been there all the same. He's... really crafty. And while he sure doesn't sound like it, he really is an evil genius."

Sorun quirked an eyebrow in confusion. "Swapped out? What does-eh, don't answer, I don't care." By now the pair had finally crossed the edge of the city, and began walking past wooden houses and Mobians that, to Sorun's discomfort, began to stare at them as they walked through the city. "Don't you people have a government or an army or something to take care of the problem?" he asked the hedgehog. "Why in the world do a bunch of teenagers have to go and save the world?"

"Yeah, well, we used to have something like that, but Egghead's first act of ultimate evil was overthrowing the kingdom and dismantling it entirely over a decade ago," Sonic answered him. "And the thing is, the Kingdom of Acorn is pretty much the only real, official Mobian kingdom on the whole planet. Anywhere else is self-contained Mobian villages and cities with their own rules and pockets of Freedom Fighters."

"Oh, so you guys're pretty much all there is," Sorun said in a dejected tone. "This is making me even less confident, and I was already starting out at zero here."

Sonic just chuckled and elbowed Sorun's side softly. "Hey, no negativity here. Won't get anywhere with that attitude."

The human teen brushed the hedgehog off of him, but otherwise said nothing as the two of them continued to walk through the city.

"... Could be worse. At least everybody in this world is short like I am," Sorun thought as he looked around at the Mobians they passed. He went as far as to look at Sonic, and was pleasantly surprised to see that even the hedgehog was a few inches shorter than he was. "So this is what it's like being tall. Wonder what David would say if he saw me now. Probably something-"

Crack!

Naturally, a rock being thrown at Sorun's face interrupted his thoughts and caused him to crumple to the ground.

Groaning, Sorun held a hand to his forehead as pain spike through his whole head. He felt something warm and wet in the palm of his hand, and when he pulled his hand backed he saw a patch of blood right on his palm. Outraged, he looked up at the direction the rock had come from, and almost sputtered out in outrage when he saw what was- what he assumed due to their height- a group of Mobian children.

"Get out of here!" one of the children shouted.

"Yeah, get out you stupid human!"

"We don't want you here!"

"What the- Sorun! You ok-!?" Sonic had crouched down to Sorun's side to see if he was alright, but when the human teen looked up at him with wide, angered eyes, the hedgehog flinched back and nervously glanced between him and the children. "I'll go and deal with them," he said, "just stay here."

Sorun didn't even bother to see Sonic off before he looked down to nurse the throbbing head wound he had. "Hasn't even been a full day and people are already throwing rocks at me." He dabbed at the wound on his head again, and he felt more anger spike in him when he saw even more blood than last time. "Goddamn fucking kids, what the hell..."

The vast frustration he'd been feeling ever since he'd been thrown in this terrible situation had just begun to dull, too. He still felt it to an uncomfortable degree, but it was manageable at least, and he was able to keep it under control. But now there were people throwing rocks at him, screaming at him to leave, and he wanted to but nobody would let him leave -

"Sorun? You okay?" He felt a hand try and help him up, but Sorun, in his anger, growled out and shook the arm off him. "Hey, Sorun, come on, let me help."

"I've only been here an hour and I already hate this world and everything it stands for," Sorun angrily hissed as he rose to his feet. "I do absolutely nothing and the first thing that happens when I walk in your city is I get stoned? Are you for real?"

"They were just a bunch of kids," Sonic said, reaching out to help Sorun steady himself when his feet wobbled under him. "They're... Eggman doesn't really do your kind's image any good, you know? They're just frustrated."

"Yeah, you know who else is frustrated!?" Sorun yelled at him, but stopped himself from going further when he saw Sonic's eyes widen in concern. He took a deep breath to calm himself, and then faced his head forwards. "Whatever. Let's just go."

"Do you-"

"Let's go , Sonic."

He didn't bother to even turn around and look at whatever expression Sonic was making, and he made it a point not to look at him the entire rest of the walk to his house.

"Aaaand, there it is. Home sweet-"

"Don't finish that sentence."

The words died out on Sonic's tongue, while Sorun examined the domicile right in front of them. It was made of wood, like everything else, but what really intrigued him was the architecture of the structure. It resembled more of a wooden hut than a house, but was still house-sized and had modern implements like windows, a door, and even a chimney up on the roof.

It wasn't like anything he'd ever seen, and yet, he almost liked the niche aesthetic.

"It's not the worst-looking place in the world," Sorun admitted after a few seconds of silence.

His statement must have surprised Sonic, as he saw the hedgehog give him a surprised look from the corner of his eyes. This was followed by him forming a wide grin as a sauntered up to the front door, opened it, and then did a little wave with his arm before gesturing for him to go in. "Then by all means, come on in."

"So courteous," Sorun remarked while walking past Sonic and going into the home.

"Wow, it's... yeah, it's a house," Sorun thought as he heard the door shut behind him. "I mean, I don't know what I was expecting, but yeah. House."

The interior looked even more homier than his real home in his own universe, which admittedly wasn't saying much as his mother was never one for decoration, but this was genuinely impressive to Sorun.

He'd heard Sonic call out to his parents and heard the sound of his feet disappear deeper inside the house, but this was mainly ignored by Sorun as he wandered to the other side of the house and ended up in what he was fairly certain was a living room, as it was loaded with the works: rugs, chairs and sofas, bookcases, a fireplace, wallpaper of all things. It was such a different world on the inside compared to how humble the outside looked that it almost took Sorun's breath away.

"Okay, so maybe mom was crazy for being this weird minimalist-furniture person. I feel like I've been missing out now that I've seen all this." He lightly bumped into a table after doing some more walking, and he looked down to see a small drawer with a framed photo on top of it. "Family photo, huh?" he thought. "Let's see what we got here."

He brought the photo up to his face and flipped it around, wincing slightly when a bit of sunlight glinted off the frame and into his eyes. There were a total of four individuals in the photo, all blue hedgehogs that were smiling directly at the camera. And a dog, too. A completely normal-looking tan dog.

"Wait, so normal animals are a thing here? Huh." Strange, but good knowledge to have. "So we got Sonic, Sonic but he's old and has a mustache, Sonic but with hair and breasts, and Sonic but he's- what the fuck?"

Now, he wasn't an expert on Mobians. It was a word he'd learned about an hour ago, and a term that related to a species he had just now learned about. And based on his observation, "Mobian" seemed to be a large umbrella term that referred to any of the talking animal people here, because he was fairly certain most of the Mobians he saw outside weren't hedgehogs.

He was also pretty damn certain there weren't any animals in nature made of metal, which was why Sorun was struggling to understand why the fourth blue hedgehog in the photo he was looking at looked like a robot shaped like a hedgehog.

"... Yeah, no, I don't get it," Sorun decided. At the same time he thought this, he heard multiple pairs of footsteps begin to approach, so he decided to set the family photo down and turn towards the sound of footsteps.

"Sorun?" he heard as a blue, spiked head appeared around the corner. "Sorun, where'd you- oh, there you are. So how are you finding the place?"

"It's fine," Sorun answered, and he could help his eyes momentarily flicking down to the family photo before going back up to Sonic. "So why did we come all the way to your house?" Sorun asked him. "I get you wanna pick the 'join the Freedom Fighters' thing back up after I calmed down, but you seriously brought me all the way to your house for that?"

Sonic nodded, and then pursed his lips as he clasped his hands together. "So here's the thing," he said as he extended both of his index fingers at Sorun. "Like I said, you need somewhere to stay for the time being, and we don't really have a lot of space lying around."

"You were serious about that? The 'sleeping at your place' thing you said?"

"Yeah, space isn't really a thing we have right now," Sonic explained. "But I just so happen to have a spare bed in my room."

"Oh, don't tell me-"

"So I thought you could get to stay with me!" Sonic finished while spreading his arms out to gesture to the whole house. "You know. Until we get you home. So I brought you here so you could get to know the place and meet my parents so they'd be okay with it, too."

Sorun sighed in response, and then rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "... Fair argument," he admitted. "Yeah, I don't really have anywhere else to go, so sure. Guess I'll stay. Your parents?"

"Oh!" Sonic snapped his fingers as realization hit him, and he ducked back around the corner before coming back a few seconds later. "Yeah, he's in the living room," he called out. "Come meet him!"

There were some shuffling sounds as three figures stepped into view, and Sorun recognized them as the same people as the ones he'd seen in the photo. The female hedgehog, the old hedgehog, and the robot.

It was the robot that Sorun focused on in particular, half because he didn't know what it was, and half from being genuinely curious at seeing a robot for the first time in his life, though his staring must have been noticeable as the others began to grow uncomfortable. It was the same size and proportion as the other hedgehogs, and even the same blue color, but metal. He had a spherical head, and his eyes were replaced with black sensors with red lights and a mouth that was more of a movable grill than a mouth.

But then Sorun's eyes wandered to the top of his head, and just barely managed to contain the chuckle that threatened to leave him when he saw metallic toupee bolted to his scalp. He masked his slip-up by clearing his throat, however, and then pointed to the robotic hedgehog with a questioning look in his eyes.

"I feel like I'm missing something here," he said. "Sonic, uh, what's... what's up with the robot?"

"Huh? Oh." Sonic turned to the metallic hedgehog, with continued to give Sorun a gormless stare, and then turned back to the human. "That's my dad."

"Ah." Sorun nodded, and then looked to Sonic. "So... you're half-robot, then? Wild."

A beat of silence went through the whole group, with the hedgehogs all looking nervous while Sorun continued to look between them all with increasingly-mounting confusion. He eventually opened his mouth to say something, but was beat to the punch when sound left the robot's mouth.

"He isn't half-robot." The smooth, metallic voice coming from he robot's mouth nearly made Sorun jump up in surprise, but other than his eyes widening, he managed to stay calm. "I was a full flesh-and-blood hedgehog when I conceived my son. I was turned into a robot afterwards." His metallic legs carried him forwards in front of Sorun, and he extended a hand tipped with sharpened, metal fingers to him. "I am Sonic's father, Jules."

Sorun was still lost, but managed to raise his hand to the offered one. "So you're, like, a cyborg? Or something or other?"

A long, distorted sigh rang out of Jules' speakers as his arm jerked up, down, and then lowered back to his side. "No. I'm not a cyborg. I was fully turned into robot when I was subjected to a robotocizer," he explained.

"... Mh-hm." Sorun blinked, slowly nodded his head, and then looked to Sonic for help. "Sonic, what's a roboti... whatever?"

"Oh, yeah, I probably should have warned you beforehand. Sorry about that," the hedgehog apologized as he stepped between the human and the robot. "So my dad," he began while gesturing to his father, "got put in one of these things called a roboticizer. It turns people into robots."

Sorun clicked his tongue in mild understanding. "You're skipping a few steps here. S-so it put his brain into a robot body?" he guessed. "Nah, man, that's still technically a cyborg."

"No, Sorun, it..." Sonic sighed, and then rubbed at his forehead as he took in a breath to try again. "The roboticizer turns you into a robot. Completely. You go from being a normal person to a robot person in a second." He snapped. "Like that."

"... I need to sit down for that one."

The teen found himself collapsing into the nearest couch before holding a hand to his head to steady himself. He mentally took note of the unsure looks the others in the house were giving him, but they were largely ignored as Sorun mentally processed Sonic's explanation in his head.

"So the whole body? So just, the brain and all the neurons and blood and organs and... all that, into robot stuff? Man, that's just... man." Insanely impressive was what it was. He wasn't an expert on biology. Boy was he not an expert in biology. But he knew enough to know that an organic body was a host to a nightmarish amount of chemical releases and bio-mechanics and neurological functions to know that successfully converting all of that to an artificial state and having it still work was mind-boggling.

And that was even considering the chemical aspect of it! Turning the organic elements of the body to whatever elements Jules was made of right now seemed almost miraculous. Or the computing power needed to compute what was sure to be an absurd amount of data, or the energy required for that kind of conversion. It all seemed magical.

Just how technologically advanced was this world, anyways? There had to be some, considering they made the inter-dimensional portal that brought him here and he was staring at a real-life robot, but if there actually was amazing technology like that the literal wooden city he found himself in sure wasn't showing it.

"I'm sorry if I'm freaking out, it's just, I, I don't think my world's technology curve ever made it the same distance this one did," Sorun explained as he continued to rub at his head. "I mean, this is all just... I've been getting hit by stuff all day, so I'm kind of slow at thinking right now, but I... it seriously turns you into a robot?" he muttered to himself. "That's crazy. This world is nuts."

"If my appearance is making you uncomfortable..." Jules started, but then paused when Sorun looked up at him. "I can step out for a bit," he offered, "at least until you-"

"No, no it's not- geez, I'm looking super insensitive now, aren't I?" Sorun asked himself to his growing embarrassment. "I've never seen a real robot, you know? My place didn't really have anything like that, so it's this on top of everything else I mean it really- ow!"

In his vigorous rubbing of his forehead, he'd accidentally aggravated the head wound he'd received when a rock had been thrown at his head. Now blood was beginning to flow down his forehead again, and the throbbing pain from having a wound on his forehead was beginning to return.

"Oh, my goodness!" The next thing he knew the female hedgehog of the bunch, the one he assumed to be Sonic's mother, was right in front of him and turning his head with her hands as she examined the wound on his head. "What happened to you!?" she asked in a shrill voice.

Sorun, who was too bewildered by the sudden action to even attempt to pry her off, only managed to respond in a dulled voice, "Some kid threw a rock at me."

"And you've been walking around with an open wound ever since!?" she screeched at him. "Ahh, we can't have that! What if it gets infected!?" She began to turn his head with more fervor. "Ugh, boys, I swear you're all the same. We're taking care of this right now."

"H-hey, wait a sec-" Sorun protested.

"I have a medical kit in the bathroom, so just stay here and we'll get this sorted in a jiffy."

"Hey-!"

While Sorun was being medically attended to in the other room, the other three hedgehogs had decided to migrate towards the kitchen in the next room to talk among themselves about the human guest in the house. Sonic had seated himself in a chair at the dining table, while the older hedgehog chose to sit down in the seat across from him. Jules chose to lean on the nearby counter while occasionally sneaking glances into the next room at the human sitting on his couch and his wife who was fussing over his head wound.

"So what do you guys think?" Sonic asked, which drew back Jules' focus. "About Sorun?"

There was a heavy sigh from the mustached hedgehog across from him. "Sonny, I'll admit that when you and the Freedom Fighters pitched this 'pull a mystery hero from another zone using the Chaos Emeralds' when you all needed my help with the portal, I was a bit... wary of the idea. And I'll admit that I certainly didn't think a young man like that would come through."

"What my brother is trying to say," Jules voiced, "is that he's a bit underwhelming. And a human to boot."

"Okay, yeah, fine, so he wasn't at all what we were all expecting," Sonic agreed. "I'll admit that much." He turned to the older hedgehog. "But come on, Chuck. I know he's looks really rough around the edges, and he hasn't been, well, the nicest guy ever, but I'm telling you it's just all the culture shock! We pulled him into a completely new world and he's just freaking out over everything, so it's making him all weird!" He pointed to his metallic father. "I mean, you heard him! He's never even seen a robot before! He's trying really hard to adjust to all this, and you two aren't giving him enough credit!"

A sound much like a contemplative hum came from Jules' speakers. "I'm trying to be objective here and not let personal bias get in the way," he told his son. "That being said, we haven't had the best luck when it comes to trusting humans. Or Overlanders for that matter."

"We just don't want to see the same thing happen to you," Chuck supplied.

But Sonic just shook his head and held a hand to both of them. "I can understand why you'd have a hard time trusting anybody after everything Robotnik did, but Sorun's not like that!" he argued. "Plus I've met tons of cool humans and Overlanders in my time! Station Square was full of friendly humans. Hope made friends with everybody during the time she was staying in Knothole. Nate, you forget Nate?"

"We're not saying completely honest and nice humans and Overlanders don't exist," Jules said, "we're asking if you think Sorun is one of them."

Sonic made the motion to respond, but stopped himself halfway as an unsettled feeling overtook him. He made an unsure hum, and then leaned over on the table as his father and uncle patiently awaiting his response.

"He's... really not taking his situation well," he began. "He wants nothing to do with any of this and just wants to go home. And he's... he's angry , you guys, and this is coming from a guy who's friends with Knuckles." He let out a chuckle at the little joke, but it quickly tapered off into a sigh before he continued. "He screamed at me and Tails and wouldn't even look at anybody else. Those kids threw that rock at him and he had this look in his eyes that made me really worried."

"Did he do something to aggravate the children?" Jules asked. "If he starts attacking children-"

"He didn't do anything, dad. We were just walking when the rock hit him," Sonic answered. " But , he calmed himself down before he did anything bad. And he hasn't gotten physical with anybody yet, even though I'm pretty sure he wants to. I know it doesn't look like it, but so far he's been really patient. He's been really temperamental and short with everybody, sure, but I think he's really trying. And at the very least he's not calling us all 'filthy animals' like most Overlanders would, so he's already got that going for him, especially since this is his first time meeting Mobians." He crossed his arms with a huff and turned his nose up. "That's good enough for me," he declared. "You'll see. I'm sure he's a really great guy. He's just a bit lost right now." He opened his eyes, and his head tilted down slightly. "And I want to help him," he added, "because it's our fault he's in this mess in the first place."

A beat passed between the three of them, and the two older males looked at one another before a collective sigh rang out from the both of them. "Do you think he would at least make a good Freedom Fighter?" Chuck questioned.

"Huh? Oh. Uh... eh-heh, 'bout that..." Nervously, Sonic began to tap the ends of his index finger together while looking back and forth between his father and uncle. "Sorun says he can't really fight. At all."

Chuck's limbs went limb and his head lolled back in disbelief. "Oh, Sonic...!"

"But-but-but! But! We don't know what he's capable of yet!" Sonic defended. "Maybe he's super smart like you or Tails or Rotor, or he's really good at doing... something, but just doesn't know it! And even if he isn't, we can, I dunno, train him up!"

"'Train him up'," Jules repeated. "Are you going to have time to do that in between all your missions battling Dr. Robotnik?"

Sonic's smile fell. "Well, not really," he said, "But he can... we'll... we'll think of something," he claimed. "Just give him a chance. It's the least he deserves."

The other two hedgehogs didn't look nearly as convinced as Sonic was, and it showed when Chuck sent a withered looks towards his mechanical brother. Jules' response was to give a shrug, which made Chuck roll his eyes and focus back on Sonic. "You've always tried so hard to see the good in people, Sonic, and it hasn't steered you wrong yet. So I suppose we can trust your judgement on this," he told him. The teenage hedgehog looked excited enough to jump up out of his seat, but Chuck held a hand out to stop him. "Just keep an eye on him for us?" he asked. "I don't want something bad to happen just because he lost his temper."

"Aw, Sorun isn't like that. It'll be fine!" This time Sonic did jump out of his eat, and his feet began to carry him toward the living room as he looked behind him and flashed his uncle a grin. "I'm gonna go see how he's doing. Guy's probably losing his mind hanging around mom for so long."

This wasn't how he pictured his day going.

Admittedly, none of what had happened in the last hour or so was what he pictured happening to him today, or ever in his life. He would have laughed off the very idea if he ever thought of it. But it happened, and while he thought he was coping well enough with it, it was also taking all the mental fortitude he could muster to not fall apart at the seams.

Even then he wasn't entirely confident he'd be able to avoid that.

But having a blue woman dote on Sorun while he fidgeted nervously on said woman's couch was a new one for him. Mostly because nobody had ever been this... attentive to him before. Not even his own mother. He loved the woman, but that didn't help the fact that she was as emotionally stinted as her own son. The most she'd ever done when he got hurt was throw band-aids at his face or drive him to the hospital.

Maybe there was something to genetics after all.

"I hope my son has been treating you well so far," Sonic mother asked as she continued to tend to his forehead. "He means well, really, but sometimes his enthusiasm can prove to be a bit much."

Treating him well. Was one of the people directly responsible for bringing him to this world treating him well? Sorun would have laughed if he didn't feel so flustered right now. On the other hand, even Sorun could see that he was trying really hard to make things easier for the human, so he couldn't blame him entirely. It didn't change the fact that Sorun blamed him a lot, though.

"That's a hard question to answer," he settled on.

"I see." She reached up to stick a bandage above his left eye where the cut was, and then stepped back with a satisfied sigh. "Well, you should be fine now. And Sorun?"

"Mm?"

"I know that you may be a bit frustrated at your current circumstances. I can't begin to imagine what you're going through, but try to give Sonic and his friends a chance? They mean well and are just trying to do the right thing. I just don't want what they did and what the children who threw that rock at you did to paint a bad light on us all."

"Don't worry, lady, it already has." Sorun's response caused her to grow a worried look in her eyes. Sorun, seeing the change in her expression, averted his gaze and sunk further into the couch while crossing his arms. "But you're not so bad," he added. "Thanks. For the... y'know, forehead," he mumbled under his breath.

He had looked away so much that he wasn't able to see how she reacted to what he said, but by the time he chose to look the female hedgehog had already walked away to a different section of the house. Sorun took it as a sign that he could finally be alone with his thoughts, but not even five seconds passed after receiving this idea before he felt something touch his angle.

Sorun breathed out a sound of surprise, and then looked down at his feet. His shoulders relaxed immediately when he saw that it was a small dog, the one he'd seen in the family photo, nudging his leg with its nose before looking up and panting happily at him. The teen leaned back into the sofa, and the dog took that as a sign to leap up onto his lap and bark lightly at him.

"You're the most normal thing I've seen since coming here," Sorun muttered to the dog as he scratched it behind the ears with one hand. "You're not gonna throw any rocks at me, are ya, buddy?"

The dog barked at him again.

"Good dog." He gave it one final pat on the head, and the dog yipped at him happily before turning around and leaping off the couch. At the same time Sorun felt the space on the couch next to him decompress as a blue hedgehog hopped next to him while giving Sorun another grin.

"I see you met Muttski," he commented, and Sorun scoffed out a single laugh at the name. "He says he likes you. Also says you smell kind of weird, too, but eh," he shrugged, "you're from another zone, so what are you gonna do?"

Sorun nodded in agreement, but paused halfway and slowly turned to Sonic. "Wait, he actually said that? You understood him?"

Sonic rose a blue eye ridge. "Yeah?" A beat passed, and he opened his mouth in an "oh" of understanding. "Yeah, no, talking to animals isn't something normal Mobians can do," he explained. "It's, heh, it's kind of a long story, actually." He pointed at one of his triangular ears. "You see, there was this one time I got lost in space, and these nice aliens I met installed this universal translator in me so I could talk to other aliens into helping me get back to Mobius. It doesn't really come out."

The black-haired teen's response was to give Sonic a deadpan stare as his mind tried and failed to catch up with the explanation. "I'm just gonna pretend that made sense," he muttered. "There's aliens too, now? Seriously? I mean, I guess this is all technically alien, but still... space aliens? Goddamn."

It seemed like every five minutes now this universe was trying to break him mentally. And it was working.

"Sorun?" Sonic waved a hand in front of his face, and the sudden motion startled him out of his frozen stupor. "You okay?"

"... Not really," he mumbled. "Still coping with this all."

"Ah, right, right. Cool." Some moments of silence passed between the two of them. "Hey, Sorun?"

"Mh?"

"Could you, uh..." Sonic's hand went to the spines at the back of his head, and he began to nervously run his hand through them as he looked to Sorun's direction. "Could you at some point talk with Tails? And maybe, you know, apologize to him?"

Sorun's eyes met Sonic's gaze with a questioning look. "Tails? Which one was-" His expression soured. "Oh, you mean the guy that pulled me in?"

Sonic nodded. "I know out of everybody you're the most upset at him, and I can totally get that, but Tails was really hopeful in that tablet, you know?" He looked down as his pet dog hopped on the couch between them, and then began to absentmindedly rub at its back. "I think it's 'cause I was the one hyping everybody up about it," he elaborated, "and Tails really looks up to me, so he was really hopeful, too. He feels terrible about what happened with you, and as strong as he is, he's just eleven, so... could you just talk to him? Say sorry for yelling at him and forgive him over the whole dragging thing?"

"So you want me to lie to him?"

Sonic's face fell. "You're really that upset at him over it?"

"A little bit , yeah," Sorun replied in a sarcastic tone, though he sighed when Sonic's mouth downturned even lower. "... He's seriously only eleven?" he asked.

Sonic nodded. "Yeah. Eleven."

And suddenly, Sonic looking so mad when he went off on Tails made sense to Sorun. He screeched at a child. The knowledge alone made Sorun cringe on the inside. "Okay, I admit that screaming at an eleven-year-old wasn't my... smoothest move." By far probably one of the worst moves in his life now that he really thought on it. "I guess I should go talk to the guy. Eventually. When I feel like it."

He'd would never feel like it, but Sonic didn't know that.

That caused the hedgehog's face to brighten up considerably. "Aw, that's great! Thanks!"

"Don't mention it. Seriously, don't." With a slight groan, Sorun rose up off the couch and stretched his arms above his head. "Could you, uh... show me that bed? I'm super tired from the everything."

"Oh! Oh, yeah, of course." Sonic jumped off the couch and waved for Sorun to follow him. "Yeah, it's just down the way over here. Come on."

He didn't really know what to expect after going into Sonic's room. Half of him expected for tentacles or something to come out of the door and grab Sorun, because really, that would just be par for the course with how today was going.

But no, Sonic's room was, by all means, a normal room. So normal that it looked even more normal than his own room on Earth, which to Sorun felt like the first breath of fresh air since he got pulled into a new universe.

It was certainly messy like his own room, that was for sure. Random comics, sports balls, and other odds and ends were randomly scattered all around the floor, and there was a study desk int the corner with so much dust on it that Sorun had to wonder if it was ever even used. And a closet that was full of disorganized clothes, even if those clothes were just pairs of gloves and socks.

"I really gotta ask about the whole 'they only wear shoes and gloves' thing eventually," Sorun thought to himself as he looked around the room. "I get they have fur that covers everything, but damn, it feels super awkward hanging around with a bunch of naked people. And I swear I saw a couple people out there with a shirt or something. I KNOW clothes exist here."

But those were questions for later. Because right now he was too tired to deal with anything else.

"Yeah, it ain't much, but it's mine," Sonic said as he flopped onto- Sorun barked out a laugh- a blue race car-shaped bed, and then pointed to a normal bed on the other side of the room. "That one's yours," he said.

"Race car bed, huh?" Sorun asked as he trudged towards the bed. "You didn't strike me as the type."

"I like anything fast," Sonic answered. "And race cars are cool."

Sorun hummed, and then flopped down on the spare bed. He laid still for a moment as his body sunk into the mattress below him, and then he turned his head to Sonic's direction.

"It's great all the furniture is my size," he commented. "I was kind of worried about that."

The hedgehog looked at him, and then made a sound of understanding. "Yeah, I was kind of wondering about that. You're kind of short for a human, huh?" he asked. "I've seen a ton of humans, and they're usually way taller than Mobians."

"... Oh, they aren't short here, huh?" Sorun mumbled, a disappointed lilt to his voice. "The short thing's, uh, just locked in for Mobians. Great."

"Yeah, they're-" Sonic stopped, and a wry grin began to grow on his face. "Wait. I thought all humans from your zone were our size. Are they not?"

"Shouldn't have opened my mouth..." Sorun groaned, but it was too late as Sonic had already sat up in his bed.

"Are you just a short human?" he teased.

An indignant groan left Sorun, and he turned his back to Sonic while placing his pillow over his head. "You can't talk. I still have a few inches over you. I'm going to sleep."

He could close his eyes, but he could close his ears to the teasing laughter that resounded off the walls of the room.

Sleep never came to Sorun that night.

It wasn't like he didn't make an effort of it. He'd been as still as possible, he'd kept his eyes closed, and he tried to clear his mind to calm himself down so he could go to sleep.

But he couldn't become calm. He couldn't go to sleep when he was already living in this nightmarish situation he found himself in. So when hours had passed and he couldn't find himself being able to sleep, he'd turned to staring up at the ceiling he could barely see because it was so dark.

Thoughts of home and Earth hit him. Those were followed by him replaying the events that had brought him to this bed over and over again, and his mind kept going to the Freedom Fighters who decided to drag him to this world. To Tails, who had been the one who actually physically dragged him to this world against his will. To Sonic, who kept trying to convince him to join the Freedom Fighters when he didn't want to.

He really, really didn't want to. He didn't want to fight. He didn't want to risk his life. He didn't even like these people. In fact, it may have been more accurate to say he disliked them, and that said a lot considering he only knew a few of their names.

"'Ah, it's fine, Sorun. Fight the robot army. It'll be fun!' Pfft. Right." His head rolled in Sonic's direction. He'd fallen asleep shortly after Sorun attempted to fall asleep, and was resting motionless in his race car bed. "Hah... yeah, I'm not doing this," he decided. "I'm getting out of crazy town."

Sorun's feet swung out from the bed and slowly pressed against the floor. He tensed up in preparation for the floorboards underneath him squeaking, but let out a silent sigh when no squeak ever came. He tiptoed his way towards the door of Sonic's room, looking back at the sleeping hedgehog every five seconds to make sure the hedgehog was still sleeping before making it to the door. The door knob was turned, the door was opened just far enough for Sorun to slip through the crack, and once he was on the other side the door was left as it was for fear of making too much noise.

The rest of the house, just like Sonic's room, was completely dark. Across the hall he exited into, Sorun could see another door that was completely closed, and automatically assumed it was the room Sonic's parents were sleeping in. He didn't see where the other, older hedgehog was, but seeing as the entire house was dark he figured it was safe to assume the entire household was asleep.

Perfect for him. Nobody being awake meant that there was nobody to stop him from leaving. He just had to get out of here.

Fortunately, he had a solid memory of the house's layout, and, being a small, one-story house without a attic or basement, it was fairly easy to navigate past the small halls in order to sneak his way towards the house's main entrance, all while making slow, methodical steps and keeping his stance wide and crouched to make as little noise as possible.

The problem came when he passed a corner that lead into the living room, when the exit he sought was right in front of him. The problem was he caught Sonic's dog, Muttski, sitting on the dog bed in the living room. And the dog was staring right at him.

"Aw, that ain't good," Sorun thought as concern began to well up in him. "If he barks, it's over. Is he gonna bark? I don't know! Maybe he'll just ignore me if I leave and- hold up. Is that...?"

There was a small shelf nailed to the wall near the ceiling above him that Sorun's eyes just so happened to wander to. There were a few photos and other knick knacks on the shelf, but what drew his eyes was a small, purple cardboard box with an illustration of a happy dog and and a small, artificial bone.

"Jackpot..." he whispered, and then reached towards the box. His suspicions were confirmed when Muttski's ears rose up and he tilted his head to the side. Sorun grabbed the box, rattled it to the satisfying sound of hearing objects bounce around inside, opened he box, and reached in to grab the first thing he felt before pulling it out.

Upon closer examination once he put the box back where he found it, he concluded that, yes, it was a dog treat. A small, bone-shaped treat made out of something he couldn't care less about as long as it would distract the dog long enough for him to get out of this mad house. Just what he needed.

"Tactical treat toss," Sorun hissed silently as he lightly tossed the dog biscuit. It hit the ground right in front of Muttski, who began to wag his tail as he got up off of his bed to assault the treat that had been offered to him. The dog let out a little yip as it began to eat the treat, and while this happened Sorun sneakily walked his way to the door, opened it as quietly as humanly possible, and then closed it behind him while making sure to keep the knob turned to make sure it didn't click upon the door closing.

After releasing the doorknob so it silently closed the door, Sorun took a shaky step backwards from the house's front porch and into the lawn, looking at the windows to make sure no lights would come on to signify somebody knew he left. When the house remained dark, he looked to his left to make sure there was nobody there to see him, and then to his right. Nothing but silent houses all around where he looked and empty streets.

"Huh. I'm home free," he thought to himself. "Neat." A small laugh left him, and his head tilted up to the sky. "Now I just gotta get out of- wait wHAT HAPPENED TO THE MOON!?"

He hadn't seen it before, as the sole window in Sonic's room hadn't had an adequate angle, but now that he was outside and looking up Sorun got a full view of the moon hovering up in the sky. He also got a great view of the fact that a large chunk was missing out of its side, like something had punched a piece right off of it.

"... Yeah, I'm making the right choice here. This world's insane. I'm getting out."

It was without any fanfare or celebration whatsoever did he turn around and stark to speed-walk out of the neighborhood of houses that Sonic and his family lived in while absolutely refusing to look back up at the sky. He walked in a straight line past homes, market stalls, and other wooden structures. He kept his eyes straight and forwards as he made his way out from Knothole and to the edge of the city.

And to the edge of the city he made it, with all the wooden structures behind him and grassy fields and trees ahead of him. Freedom away from all the craziness behind him, and a threshold that Sorun was more than happy to cross.

"Nice night for a stroll, huh?"

Unfortunately he only got two steps in before that voice stopped him cold.

The human teen had froze mid-step when he heard that voice, and then hissed through his teeth as he turned his head towards the sound of the voice. His fears were confirmed when he saw the familiar blue form of Sonic a few feet away from him, leaning on a tree with his arms crossed. The hedgehog was smiling, but something about the way he large, green eyes were slightly narrowed told Sorun that he wasn't exactly happy at the moment.

"... Yeah man, totally," Sorun said as he fully turned to the hedgehog. "I couldn't get any sleep, so I just stepped out for a bit and..." He trailed off when Sonic's eyes narrowed further, causing him to sigh and slump his shoulders. "Okay, I was running away," he finally admitted.

"Sorun..." Sonic sighed as he pushed off the tree. "I heard you leave the house. You're not as sneaky as you think."

The human teen felt his eyes twitch on the insult. "How'd you even get ahead of me?"

"Don't sweat it. What I want to know is what your plan was. What were you gonna do once you left Knothole City?"

The teen shrugged. "I don't know. You... you said that those gems that brought me here, the Chaos Emeralds, got scattered all over the world, right?" He limply gestured to the field in front of them. "I figured, I dunno, I'd go and find them. So I can go back." He sighed and looked down at his feet. "Sonic I really wanna leave. I can't- I can't deal with this. It's too much."

"You're still...? After all this time, you still don't want to help us out?" Disappointment- actual disappointment to Sorun's growing frustration- flashed in his eyes, and Sonic took a step closer to Sorun. "Why don't you want to help the Freedom Fighters?" he questioned.

"I don't know, Sonic!" Sorun shouted as he spread his arms out. "What would you do if a bunch of furry aliens kidnapped you and told you that you can't go home until you help out with the robot war, huh!?"

"I would help them," Sonic began as he continued to stomp towards Sorun, "because I'm not one to sit around and let good people get pushed around when there's something I can do to help!"

"Well greeaat for you, Sonic! I'm not you, though! I'm not that good a person!"

"You're not even trying!" The hedgehog stopped right in front of the human, and a slight amount of anger began to mar his features as he pointed a whole hand at Sorun. "You haven't once stopped and even thought about helping ever since you came here!"

He couldn't even find the words the retort. He grew so upset by Sonic's word that he scoffed harshly and turned his back to the hedgehog. This only served to make the blue Mobian more frustrated.

"You know, almost nobody in the Freedom Fighters, in any group of Freedom Fighters anywhere on Mobius, actually wants to fight," he said. "Nobody wants to go to war with Dr. Robotnik. But nobody wants to see their friends and family hurt by him, either. So they fight anyways." He stepped to Sorun's side and tugged roughly on his arm. "And you know what, Sorun? I know people just like you who can't do much but still chose to become a Freedom Fighter just so they could protect the people they love. Why can't you do the same?"

"Because this isn't my home, Sonic," Sorun shot back as he pulled his arm back. "I don't have anything I want to protect here because I don't love anything here! Everything I do love is a whole universe away! Or, what, you want me to go and risk my life to defend a bunch of animal people that would rather glare at me and throw rocks at me than say 'hi'?"

There was something in Sorun's words that caused Sonic to violently flinch, and he had to take a look down and take a deep breath before looking back up at Sorun. "Okay, fine. So you leave to go find the Emeralds. Let's humor your plan," Sonic offered. "We're talking about you walking around and searching the planet. The whole planet , Sorun. That's just not reasonable, and chances are Eggman is looking for the Emeralds and would find them before you ever could." Sorun remained silent, and Sonic took that as a sign to continue talking. "And even if you somehow managed to gather up all seven Emeralds, Tails is the only one that knows how to use them to bring you back to your zone."

"Well, that's just super, now, ain't it?" Wasn't that painfully ironic? The only person that could send him back home was the same person that brought him here in the first place. This world really was trying to kill him through sheer stress alone. "But why do I have to fight?" he asked Sonic. "I can't just hang around until you all manage to find the Emeralds and send me back?"

"I told you, we need help," Sonic answered. "We traded all seven Chaos Emeralds for that help. You're the help."

"It's not my fault you made a god-awful trade," Sorun retorted.

"Hrng..." The blue hedgehog held both the sides of his head in exasperation at Sorun's words, but then suddenly stood straight up and opened his eyes wide. He froze for two seconds, and then a grin game to his face as he walked to the side a bit. "You know what your problem is, Sorun?" he asked as he dug the tip of his left shoe into the ground. "You don't have any self-confidence."

Instead of responding, Sorun chose to watch as Sonic began to drag a line in the dirt with his foot as he continued talking to the human. "How about we have a little bet?" he offered. "A race."

"... A race?" Sorun repeated as he warily eyed the hedgehog. "Like... a foot race?"

"Yeah, that." He finished drawing the line and stood at one end while pointing to a tree in the distance. "How far would you say that tree is? Twenty, twenty-five meters? We'll race to it. If you win, I'll let you crash at my family's house until me and the Freedom Fighters happen upon all seven Emeralds while fighting Eggman, and once we get them I'll have Tails send ya back home." He winked and Sorun and pointed a finger at him. "But if I win, you gotta join the Freedom Fighters and at least try to put in an effort to help. How about it?"

Certainly an intriguing offer, that one, and one that actually made Sorun think. It was tempting- and also dangerous, but that was considering the possibility he would lose. He did like the idea of being free of any obligations to helping the Freedom Fighters. On the other hand, being forced in because he made a bad bet would practically be a death sentence. And who knows what Sonic would do if he kept dodging the Freedom Fighters, or anybody else? But if he won, he could pin all the blame on him not doing anything on Sonic.

But could he win in a foot race against Sonic the Hedgehog?

"Based on what I've seen, all Mobians have these really noodle-y limbs. I mean, look at those things." Those limbs were thin. Really thin. But unfortunately so were his, because he wasn't exactly in great shape and was underweight. But that aside, he was fairly decent at running. At the very least he got leg training in from riding a bike. That was something. "I mean, there's gotta be some strength in those deceptively-skinny limbs. Tails is apparently only eleven but he managed to drag my whole body. But are Mobians fast?" Sorun's blue eyes squinted as he continued to look at Sonic's legs. "... Nah, no way he's that fast. I got this."

He'd win the race and earn the right to do absolutely nothing until they sent him home. That'd solve all his problems, and he was just fine with it.

"Alright, Sonic. I'm game." Sorun stepped up to the other side of the line, and Sonic sent him a competitive smirk as he got into a running position behind the line. "If it'll get you to drop the idea of me joining the Freedom Fighters, I'll beat you in a foot race."

"Ooh, someone's confident." Hopping from one foot to the other, Sonic backed up and took a similar running position to Sorun as he glanced at the human from the corner of his eye. "I'll tell you what. I'll even let you do the countdown."

"Okay..." Sorun took a deep breath, and then tensed his muscles up and he intensely focused on the target tree. "Three... two... one... GO-!"

Sonic was already at the tree.

He didn't even know what happened. Sorun had said "go", and he'd blinked. In that blink his vision had cut out for a single millisecond, and when the eyes opened back up Sonic was standing next to the target tree with a victorious smirk on his mouth. It was such a shocking display that Sorun had frozen one step in, and hung still like a statue as he stared dumbstruck at the Mobian who was cheekily waving at him.

And after he was done waving, Sonic went back to the starting line Sorun was frozen at, and this time he did see what happened due to his eyes being open. Sonic simply moved . He ran at a speed that was so high that he went from standing at the tree to standing next to him in less than a tenth of a second, having turned into a blurry, blue shape as he moved.

"Ah, well, you know how it is, Sorun. Rules are rules." Sonic gave the human a hapless shrug, and the smug smirk he was sending him had Sorun's cheeks burning in embarrassment. "Welcome to the Freedom Fighters! You're gonna have a great time, trust me."

"... Guy's literally the friggin' Flash," Sorun mumbled to himself as he straightened his body out and turned to Sonic. "Super speed. You seriously have super speed?"

"They don't call me the fastest thing alive for nothing," Sonic said.

"Of course." The human teen face-palmed his own face. "So is that a Mobian thing, or a hedgehog thing, or- or what am I missing here?"

The hedgehog shook his head. "No, that's a me thing. I've always been that fast. Don't know why, never bothered to ask." He shrugged again. "How else do you think I've been fighting Egghead this long? My plucky attitude sure didn't carry me this far."

"Yeah, guess not," Sorun numbly replied. "So, uh, does everybody in the Freedom Fighters have super powers?"

"Eh. Some," Sonic answered, and Sorun visibly withered. "But everybody is special in their own way, super powers or not. They just need to find out what they're good at to help out. Like you."

"... You know, you try to come off as this ultimate pillar of altruism, but you're really coming off as a huge hypocrite to me, man," Sorun told him. "You hustled me. You literally hustled me to join the resistance."

"Hey, don't make a risky bet you know you can't win."

The oh-so-innocent grin supplied with that statement was equally as infuriating as it was mocking. He was so right, too, and it frustrated Sorun to no end. Even worse was that he lost the bet and had to join the Freedom Fighters.

"But do I have to join them?" he thought. "No, I do. Integrity aside, they'll probably do something like drag their feet getting the Emeralds or something if I go back on my word. My hands're tied here. Dammit."

He didn't want to. But now he didn't have a choice because of that stupid bet.

"You know I still don't have anything going for me," Sorun weakly told the hedgehog. "And I think this is a big mistake you're making here, but... ugh, bet's a bet. I'll..." He had to swallow a lump in his throat. "I'll go back to the HQ tomorrow and tell them I'm in."

The wide smile that was beamed at him from the blue hedgehog was so intense that Sorun actually was forced to look away from him. He didn't think he'd ever seen Sonic so happy since he'd met him, and the raw happiness radiating off of him was almost stifling to the teen. "You don't know how relieved I am to hear that, Sorun. Now come on!" He waved him forwards and then turned around to walk back into Knothole. "It's really late and we have a busy day ahead of us tomorrow!"

Sorun stared after the blue Mobian with wide eyes, but eventually he hung his head and began dragging his feet across the ground as he slowly trailed behind Sonic. "Man, I just wanted orange juice..."

Episode 4- The world's most useless Freedom Fighter

"Goddammit, it wasn't a dream."

A large part of him- about ninety-nine percent if he were to portion his soul off- had hoped that it had all been a bad dream. That he'd went and ignored a wet floor sign in the supermarket or something and that he had just hit his head and imagined all this. That he was in a hospital room or his own room or wherever and that all of these terrible things happening to him were nothing but a figment of his imagination. That he would be able to wake up and go back to his normal, ordinary life without a care in the world.

Those hopes were dashed when he awoke to Sonic's ceiling.

After the depression came and went, Sorun dragged himself out of the bed, stomped out of Sonic's room, and hunted around the house for a solid five minutes before he finally found the bathroom. And the first thing he did when he locked the door behind him was head right to the sink, splash his face with cold water, and stare at his own wild face in the mirror.

"Alright, keep it together man. You're probably gonna not make it through this, but there's still a chance. It's abysmal, but it's there. It exists." A young, gaunt, pale face stared back at Sorun from the mirror he was staring at, and he had to brush back long locks of black hair to be able to see the blue eyes that were staring at him in terror. For a brief moment he eyed the bandage stuck above his left eye, and his grip on the sink tightened. "All you gotta do is fight robots with furry people and not die. Easy-peasy." His eyes dipped towards the sink as he heaved out a deep sigh. "God, I'm so screwed."

He was starting to forget was optimism felt like. He'd been in such down spirits that such things like that were becoming too difficult to even try and attempt to think on. Probably not a good sign, but there wasn't anything he could do about it, so that left him with little else to do than power through it. Even if he was rapidly losing willpower.

"I wonder if there's a clothes shop or something I can get some spare clothes at," Sorun muttered to himself as he examined his clothes. "I only got the one set on me, and that's not gonna last me very long. What do I got, anyways?

"Let's see..." He began to pat down parts of his body as he listed off his clothing. "Okay, so... black sneakers, check. Socks, check. Black sweats, check. Blue t-shirt, check. Underwear?" He pulled his pants back and stared down at his crotch. "Thank goodness, I remembered to wear underwear," he sighed out as he released his pants, and then dug into his pockets. "How about my phone? How's that doing?"

His hands rooted around in his pockets. Rather alarmingly, he couldn't find his phone.

"What the? Where's my... oh, I swear if it fell out of my pocket when Tails grabbed me in that store," he angrily muttered under his breath. He didn't want to believe it, but the more he searched the more realized his phone wasn't on him, as the only things that were in his pockets were pieces of pocket lint and a gum wrapper. "Damn, that's rough," he sighed out. "My poor phone's either in a lost-and-found bin back on Earth or it got lost to the friggin' multiverse ether when Tails pulled me in that portal. Either way, it's gone. And I think I lost my wallet, too." He hung his head backwards. "Those things were expensive."

Well, that was his last lifeline to his home universe gone forever. It also meant he literally had nothing but the clothes on his back. And a gum wrapper.

After taking care of everything he needed in the bathroom, Sorun found himself wandering around the house some more until he'd found his way into the kitchen. A high-speed blue object chose to bump into his side at that exact moment.

"Hey, Sorun!" He didn't even get a chance to think of a response before he felt Sonic pulling at his arm and dragging him to the kitchen table. "You know what today is, right?"

He quite simply didn't have the energy or drive for banter, but he didn't have the energy to be antagonistic towards the hedgehog, either. "No clue," he replied with a subdued yawn as he was seated at the kitchen table, with Sonic sitting right next to him. He could see the hedgehog's mother cooking something at the stove at the other end of the kitchen, and he could catch the scent of something sweet being cooked.

And, of course, right at the other end of the table was Sonic's robotic father. He had a newspaper in his metallic lap, but Sorun could swear the red sensors that were his eyes kept flashing briefly and moving in their black, eye-like screens from the newspaper to Sorun and back again. Like he was trying and failing to surreptitiously sneak glances at him.

The robot hedgehog must have realized he was doing a poor job, too, as he'd shifted in his seat, made a synthesized coughing noise, and rose up a mug filled with a black liquid that he poured down his mouth-grill.

"What the hell is he drinking? Oil?" Sorun thought as he stared at the mug. "The weirdness just keeps getting deeper every second. I swear, this Looney Tunes shit is gonna drive me insane..."

"I know somebody's hungry!" The teen was startled from his thoughts when plate stacked absurdly high with pancakes was set right in front of him. Sorun's surprised eyes slowly turned from the pancakes to the female hedgehog who was setting another plate in front of Sonic. "Something the matter?" she asked upon noticing Sorun's staring.

"... You made me breakfast?" Sorun asked, voice laced in confusion as he picked up a nearby fork to poke at the pancakes.

"Of course." She turned towards her robotic husband. "Jules, there's more oil in the fridge if you need it, dear."

Jules nodded. "Thank you kindly, Bernie."

While continuing to poke at the pancakes, Sorun glance at Sonic. "Bernie?" he questioned.

He nodded. "Yeah, short for Bernadette."

"Oh. That makes sense." The teen was still poking at the pancakes. "She made me breakfast?" he mumbled.

Concern began to creep into Bernadette's features as she noticed Sorun's continued assault on his food. "Oh, no. Don't tell me they're not to your liking? I can always-"

"No, it's fine." A tore a chunk of pancake out and brought it to his mouth. "I just didn't really expect you to... huh."

There were two things he realized the second that he at that first bit of pancake: one was that Sonic's mother was an excellent cook. The second was that he hadn't eaten a single thing since coming to Mobius, and was just now feeling the fact that he was starving.

Eating was a blur for him, literally and metaphorically. His hands were moving too fast for him to keep track of and his mind was so focused on eating the pancakes that he could even remember moving to eat them. He wasn't even able to keep track of the time, so by the time he finished he was looking down at an empty plate that, from his perspective, had been full just a few seconds prior.

To say Sorun was stunned by the fact he'd so voraciously eaten the pancakes was an understatement, to say nothing of the reactions all the hedgehogs around him were giving him. Even Jules looked surprise, which was really impressive to Sorun considering most of his face couldn't move.

"Uh... wow, Sorun," Sonic chuckled, "you really like pancakes, huh?"

"Your mom makes really great pancakes." He felt embarrassment begin to burn at him as he placed his utensils on the plate before carrying the plate to the sink in an attempt to wash it. He couldn't even get that far before he felt somebody gently pull the plate out of his hands.

"Oh no, dearie, I'll take care of the dishes." Even as Bernadette pulled the plate away from him, the embarrassment Sorun felt was still too great, so he was forced to turn his eyes away from her. "I appreciate the sentiment, though," he heard.

"O-of course. Thank you, ma'am."

He heard a pleased trill next to him. "Honestly, my own husband and son could learn a thing or two from your behavior."

The sound of distorted coughing rang out as Jules crumpled his newspaper and sat up straighter in his chair. "Sonic, didn't you and Sorun have something to do today?"

"You know it!" From the corner of his eye, Sorun was reminded of Sonic's speed when he wolfed down his own pancakes even faster than he had before dashing next to Sorun and handing his mother his empty plate. "Don't you remember? We gotta go talk to everybody at Freedom HQ."

"Yeah-I-know-cool-let's-go." They could barely be counted as words, but Sorun wanted to badly to go away right now to even bother to care. It was no sooner did he say that string of barely-passable words did he begin to speed-walk out of the kitchen, and right behind him he could hear Sonic bid his parents farewell before he heard rapid footfalls and felt the hedgehog's presence right besides him.

He didn't even need to look at him to know he had a smug grin on his face.

"Lookin' kinda red there, Sorun," he teased. "You doin' okay?"

Sorun didn't speak and resisted looking at him.

"But wow, you must REALLY like my mom's cooking. I actually had to try to keep up with how fast you ate, and that's saying a lot!" Sorun continued being silent, and Sonic's voice lowered as he stepped closer. "Hey, seriously, is something the matter?"

"No, I just... didn't really expect your mom to be so nice is all," he told him. "You and your family are being a lot more hospitable than I thought you would be. There's nothing wrong. I'm just surprised."

Sonic sent him a puzzled glance. "Why wouldn't we be nice?" he asked him. "Everybody here will be nice to you. They're all great people. I'm telling ya, you just gotta chill out and give them all a chance."

The pale teen's response was to point to the bandage on his forehead and mumble out, "Rock."

"The rock was a fluke." Sonic waved a hand. "I'm gonna talk to those kids later to make sure that doesn't happen again, alright? I know that you might still be a bit shaken by everything, but just give life here a try while you're here. You'll be surprised if my mom's cooking is what's stopping you in your tracks."

Sorun groaned, and then held his face in his hands. "Can we please stop talking about the pancakes?"

"Sorun, I'm never going to stop talking about the pancakes now."

The whole journey to the HQ had been spent with Sorun suffering in silence as Sonic unleashed jab after jab at him. By the time they had finally arrived he wasn't sure he had an ego anymore.

"I'm starting to regret a lot of my life choices right about now."

It was strange being back down there in Freedom HQ, the place where his life took a turn for the absolute worse. He felt all sorts of emotions the first time around when he was learning just what happened to him: disbelief. Doubt. Sadness along with crushing despair. Fear. Anger, lots of anger.

Admittedly he was still holding onto that anger, but over time it was slowly beginning to simmer into frustration.

The fear was still there, too, though when he reflected on it he figured that it was more nervousness and embarrassment than actual fear. He didn't have anything to fear- except for the killer robots, but that would come later. No, this was just him being nervous about talking in front of a group of people whose first impression of him had been seeing him at his lowest. Who were, by Sonic's account, these amazing people that put their lives on the line for other people with all sorts of powers and fighting skills. And then there was him, the human who tried his hardest to weasel out of fighting, who cost them seven infinite power gems, and who almost had a mental breakdown in front of them and screamed at a child.

It legitimately scared him thinking about how little they must have thought of him. And here he was about to tell them all he was going to join them despite having absolutely nothing positive to add to the team.

He felt like a bad joke.

Now that his eyes weren't killing him and he'd finally adjusted to whatever was up with the colors in this world, he was able to get a good look at all the Mobians that had gathered in front of him as he leaned on the kitchen table in the HQ's kitchen. Seventeen of them in total with Sonic and Tails among them, the former near the head of the group giving him an encouraging smile while the latter was hiding near the back.

Everybody else was as colorful as he remembered and were all watching him with mixed looks of curiosity. Try as Sorun might, he couldn't bother to try and classify what kinds of animals they were. A very select few were obvious: he was fairly certain the tall, green one that looked like a crocodile was a crocodile. Or an alligator. Something along those lines. The small, floating one that literally looked like an anthropomorphic bee was most likely a bee, and if Sorun learned he wasn't he'd jump off a cliff at the absurdity of it. The white one with the bat wings could have been a bat, but Sorun didn't want to make assumptions with her. Everybody else with the exception of two could have been anything else, and for all he knew they were all alternate-universe animal breeds that didn't even exist on Earth.

The two exceptions seemed to be other hedgehogs, like Sonic. One was a pink one with much flatter and shorter spines than Sonic's that looked female, who looked about as curious as everybody else who had divided their attention to him. Her, Sorun was curious about due to the fact she had significantly more clothing than Sonic or the other hedgehog, as she had a dress that fully covered her torso. And now that he looked closer, it seemed all the female members he saw had more clothing than the males.

The clothing thing still confused him as much as everything else in this world did.

It was the third hedgehog in the group that was really making him worried, because the way he was looking at Sorun was legitimately making him scared. A male, black-furred hedgehog with the same tan-furred mouth that Sonic possessed, with a white patch of fur on his chest. Interestingly, the spines on the back of his head were pointed upwards unlike Sonic's or the pink one's, and even more interestingly he had a red stripe on each of the spines, his limbs, and around his eyes. Red eyes that were constantly affixed at Sorun in a perpetual angry scowl.

"He just keeps glaring at me. Why does he keep glaring at me?" Sorun wondered. "Nobody else looks angry. It's just him. It's making me really nervous."

Sorun decided to just not look at the angry, black hedgehog, but even then he could almost feel him burning a hole into the side of his head with his stare.

But angry hedgehog or no, he had to get this started so he could get over with it as soon as possible. So he cleared his throat, lightly sighed as he thought over the words he planned on saying for the millionth time, and faced the crowd as he opened his mouth to speak.

"So... uh... yesterday kind of got heated, and I apologize for that," Sorun began. "I wasn't used to going to a whole new universe 'zone' place, so I was pretty shocked. I'm admittedly still trying to adapt to... well, literally everything, but Sonic's been helping me with that.

"I'm... aware you needed to use all seven of the Chaos Emeralds in order to bring me here. I'm sorry that you got somebody as useless as me instead of the super-cool, mega-awesome guy you were all hoping for, but here I am. And while I'd like nothing more than to just go home, I've also been made aware that you all can't afford to look for the Emeralds I'd need while fighting Eggman, and I completely understand. And after some considerable convincing from Sonic, I've decided to go ahead and join your group of Freedom Fighters.

"I will warn you right now. I have absolutely no combat experience whatsoever. I'm not particularly strong or smart. I don't have any special powers like Sonic or any of you might have. I have absolutely no tactical know-how or any knowledge of how war works."

Some of the Mobians began to look at one another with unsure, confused looks while others were grimacing in pity at Sorun's sake.

Sonic was glancing around with a nervous smile while it looked like he was beginning to sweat. The black hedgehog was glaring at Sorun even harsher.

"I don't have any technical or mechanical knowledge. My medical knowledge is slim to none, especially considering I have no idea what Mobian biology is like. I can't track or survive in the wilderness to save my life. My cooking skills are nil. I have absolutely no practical skills that are of use to anybody. I don't even have a high school degree. What I'm trying to say is that I'm more of a liability than an asset to you all, and I seriously doubt that I can be of any help to any of you." He sighed deeply, looked down at the floor, and rubbed at the back of his neck. "But I'm already here and everything, so I guess I'll do what I can to help out," he finished.

It was possibly the worst speech he'd ever given in his entire life, but he honestly had nothing better to say in his defense. And at the very least, it was honest. Whatever good that did him.

Unfortunately, any confidence he had was quickly beginning to vanish when he looked back up at the group of Mobians in front of him. It almost physically hurt to see them all wincing at him and giving him pitying looks, and even Sonic looked downcast at Sorun's words. Even then he was trying to support him with a smile, but even Sorun could see how fake and forced it was.

The black hedgehog looked ready to bite his head off.

"Yep. This is even worse than I thought it would be." He desperately wanted any excuse just to leave right now just so he could escape this embarrassing hell he was in. "Should never have made that stupid bet with Sonic."

A full, solid minute of awkward silence was spent as they all stared at each other in equal parts embarrassment and pity, and Sorun was beginning to wonder when the pressure of the situation would actually knock him out before anything else happened when one of the Mobians stepped forwards in front of him. The red-haired one

Sonic had pointed out from yesterday, who looked like a brown chipmunk now that Sorun got a better look at her.

"Um... Sonic said your name was Sally, right?" Sorun asked as he leaned harder into the table behind him. "Something about royalty or something? Does that make you the leader here?"

She shook her head. "Not officially, no. The Freedom Fighters don't really have so much a leader as people who coordinate it. I would be one of those."

"That's... the literal definition of a leader, Sally."

He saw one of her blue eyes twitch, and Sorun idly wondered if antagonizing the royal chipmunk was perhaps not the best move to make right now. Fortunately, she seemed to brush it off and stared him square in the eyes with a serious expression on her face. "Sorun, I understand your plight, and I appreciate you understanding that we can't divert any resources towards sending you back home at the moment. But do you seriously want to join the Freedom Fighters, even after everything you said? I don't think I need to tell you the dangers involved."

"Want? Want is, uh, want's a strong word. Strong word," Sorun mumbled. "It was more Sonic's idea than anything."

The long-drawn out sigh that came out of Sally followed by the look of sympathy she shot him made Sorun feel that maybe he wasn't alone at holding some contempt for Sonic. "I'm not going to lie to you," she started. "The Freedom Fighters are hurting right now and are accepting any help we can get."

"You're so desperate you'd take a loser like me?"

"... Unfortunately, yes," she said with a resigned nod. "So if you want to join, I'll let you join. And I promise that, regardless of what you say, if and when we ever come across all seven of the Chaos Emeralds again I will personally ensure that sending you straight to your home zone is a top priority. But Dr. Eggman and the safety of Mobius comes first above all else." She extended her right hand to Sorun. "We'd be happy to have you."

So much for scaring them off with how useless he was. That was his last strategy in the bag for getting out of this. Looking down at the hand being offered to him, Sorun wanted to go back on his word right there and tell her that he couldn't do it. That he wasn't cut out for being a Freedom Fighter and should just stay away. He wouldn't even be lying, because he knew for a fact he wasn't cut out for this.

Thoughts of his home were the only thing that kept him from doing such a thing. As it stood, they were his best bet going back. He had to.

"Mm. I feel like you won't be thinking that for long." He meant that with genuine sincerity. "Well, regardless, I'm in. For better or worse." He held his left hand up and grasped it with hers, trying his best to ignore the perplexing, alien feeling that he felt when grasping her hand. She was one of the few he saw that didn't wear gloves. "Until I find a way home," he added. "Then I'm out of here and we never see each other again."

"Of course." They shook on it, and Sorun felt like he just signed his life away. But it was a step forwards for getting him home. A small, minuscule step. Barely something that could be registered, really. But it was more progress than he'd made since coming to this world, and that alone was enough to make him feel some positivity.

Home was still so far away to him. But maybe he'd make it back now.

"Now, I'm sure you'd like to meet the people you'll be working with now that you're one of us," Sally said as the two of them pulled their arms back, "but before all that, there's something we need to take care of first."

"Hm? What's that?"

"I need to take you to Castle Acorn to meet my brother. The king," she clarified upon seeing Sorun's questioning face, to which the pale teen blanched. "My brother, Elias, is usually busy with his royal affairs, but he likes to take time to meet anybody new who chooses to settle in Knothole City. That goes double for any new Freedom Fighters, and that goes triple for you in particular since he was the one that green-lit the use of the tablet's coordinates as our request. He specifically told me he wanted to meet you, actually, so we should go see him sooner rather than later."

"Ah. I see." Sorun nodded in understanding. "Your brother is gonna be a very disappointed man, Sally. Sorry in advance."

The Mobian laughed a little, and it took Sorun a moment to realize that she must have thought he'd told a joke. He didn't have in it him to correct her. "You're not as bad as you say you are, you know," she told him. "Now come on. We're burning daylight."

"Yeah, sure, let's-" Sorun stopped himself when he saw Sonic hopping on his feet to gain his attention, and then looked back towards Sally. "Actually, gimme a sec. I'll catch up."

She'd followed his gaze to Sonic, and then nodded in understanding before turning to leave. Most of everybody else had dispersed to deal with their own business, while Sonic had dashed up in front of Sorun with a big grin on his face.

"Great job, Sorun!" He gave the human a thumbs-up. "I knew you had it in you! How d'ya feel?"

"Like the biggest idiot on the planet," Sorun answered. "I literally just told everybody I'm dead weight, and they all probably think I'm worthless now. And they'd be wrong. Because I'm way worse than worthless."

"Aw, don't be like that. What'd I say about self-confidence?" He stepped to Sorun's side and shook his shoulder in a playful manner.

"We'll fix that in no time, buddy. We just gotta figure out what you're good at and work on that."

He made it sound so easy. And if Sorun didn't know any better, he would have believed him and felt relieved about the whole situation. But unfortunately he did know better. "I... thanks, Sonic." He gently pulled away and nodded his head to the stairs leading to the exit. "I gotta go meet the king. Oh, wait, quick, before I go, you got any advice for me? What's the king like?"

"Elias? He's a nice guy. Not that much older than us, actually." Sonic shrugged. "I wouldn't be too worried about it. Just be yourself."

"'Be yourself' he says. Most generic advice ever," Sorun muttered under his breath, but gave Sonic a nod of thanks regardless and turned to the exit. "Sure, I'll go for it. I might be gone a while, so I guess I'll see you back at the house." He waved a goodbye behind his back. "Later."

"I'll have mom save some pancakes just for you!"

A deep breath was needed to steady Sorun after he heard the jab, but to his own surprise, a breathy chuckle left him when he exhaled it. "You better," he called behind him as he ascended the stair. "Those pancakes are great."

A/N- Yeah, there's not really a set length for how long these chapters are gonna be. I've tried doing hard word limits in the past, and they really kill the flow for me. Some chapters could be 2k words long, they could be 20k words long, I dunno. They end when they end.

Chapter 5

A/N- So I goofed up and named named Jules Charles for some reason, which was pointed out to me. My brain had a critical error or something; I dunno how I screwed up that badly. Don't even know where I got the name "Charles" from. Anyways, I went back and stealth-patched it, so it's all good now.

Episode 5- The post-apocalyptic furry wasteland is brutal

"As you might have imagined, my brother lives in Castle Acorn being the king and all. You might have seen it?"

"Yeah, giant castle in the middle of the city. Hard to miss."

"I thought so." Sally adjusted the short, blue jacket she wore, and then began walking towards the direction of Knothole City with Sorun closely in tow. "So how have you been finding everything so far?" she asked him. "I know it can't be easy, what with you being stranded here and all, but otherwise have you been getting by okay?"

Oh, how there were so many ways he wanted to say no. So many ways he wanted to display his bitter resentment towards this entire situation through a harsh choice of words so Sally could stop asking him about his feelings and they could spend the rest of the trip in silence. He wouldn't yell, but the remarks would be scathing enough to cut just deeply enough to get the message across.

"I'm telling ya, you just gotta chill out and give them all a chance."

But Sonic's words ringing in his head stayed his tongue. For as many negative thoughts as he had about the hedgehog- and quite a few at that- even Sorun would admit that the hedgehog was trying to help him through this, and at the very least everybody seemed to regret bringing him into the circumstances he found himself in. At the very least, Sorun appreciated that. And even he would admit that something about the blue Mobian's boundless optimism spoke to him in a good way, though he'd never admit it.

Was he still upset at them all for opening that portal and dragging him here against his will? Yes, he was. Did he blame them? Not anymore, no. Did he forgive them? That remained to be seen.

A lot of things remained to be seen.

"I'm getting by, yeah," Sorun answered. "Some kids chucked a rock at my face, but Sonic's mom took care of the cut. Otherwise things have been manageable."

Sally visibly winced as she peeked up at his forehead. "I was wondering about that," she said. "What happened with the kids?"

"Sonic said he'd deal with them."

She looked relieved at that answer. "That's probably for the best."

Sorun raised an eyebrow at the response, and then leaned forwards to nudge her in the shoulder. "What, don't trust me to handle a bunch of kids?" he asked. "I know we just met and I didn't give off a good impression when it comes to kids, but sheesh."

"You did scream at Tails." That shut Sorun right up. "And that's not what I meant. Sonic's a hero to those kids, to kids all over the world. I was just saying that they'd listen to him a lot easier than to, well, somebody like you. No offense."

"... Ah-huh." He actually did take some offense to that, but didn't say anything and chose to keep walking next to Sally.

Unfortunately, the chipmunk seemed to notice his silence, and then began to nervously rub at her arm as her eyes darted around awkwardly. "Are you still upset at us?" she asked him. "For bringing you here. It's just that, well, with the way you acted with Tails-"

"Geez, I get it, I shouldn't have yelled at him," Sorun interrupted with a harsh wave of his hand. "Gimme a break here. I already told Sonic I was going to apologize to him. I'm just looking for a good time is all." He swiveled his head away to avoid Sally's eyes. "I didn't even know he was a kid," he mumbled. "Didn't even know what a Mobian was until Sonic told me."

"... That's good," she said after a few moments of silence. "But please don't forget to talk to him. It's hitting him really hard."

"I doubt it's hitting him any harder than it is me," Sorun thought. The pair continued to walk in silence afterwards, with the human teen sneaking glances at Sally every so often as the wooden buildings of Knothole began to grow closer and closer. "I guess I should ask her something? Try to get to know her? Ask what, though? What it's like being in a royal family? Nah, she probably gets questions like that all the time. Hobbies? No, she'll probably say something like she's too busy with the Freedom Fighters and get pissed at me." He scratched the back of his head. "Dang, I don't know how to talk to people."

It was really hard to come up with anything to say, too, especially considering he didn't know what kind of person Sally was having just met her. The thought about asking her something Sorun was interested to know crossed his mind, but choosing a single question out of the millions floating around in his head proved to be a rather difficult task. "Maybe... I dunno, there's so many things I wanna ask. Maybe what the deal with humans here is? Better than nothing, I guess."

"So I noticed that there aren't any other humans that live in Knothole," Sorun voiced. "Also it looks like Mobians don't particularly like humans. Is there a reason?"

"There's a... general stigma towards them, yes," Sally admitted after a terse moment. "A large part is Eggman, but even before him our kinds never really mixed all that well. We've had wars and a lot of bloodshed between each other." She turned away to avoid Sorun's inquisitive stare. "And I don't mean to be rude, but... any confrontation between our kinds were more often than not initiated by the Overlanders. Mobians just wanted peace between everybody. We only ever fought to defend what was ours." She looked back to him. "So you'll have to forgive everybody for being a bit tense around you. Even if you are from another zone, you still look like one of them."

Well, that didn't paint a really big picture. Sorun felt like she was glossing over a lot of details, but when he thought about how much history she was trying to condense into a few sentences, he didn't blame her. But knowing that there were a sizable enough amount of humans on Mobius to be able to wage wars was an interesting tidbit. The fact they actually did wage wars wasn't as surprising, but it did give him some context for the general animosity he felt from any passing Mobians.

"That so? I'm not really surprised," Sorun said.

"Huh? Why not?"

"Dude, Sally, there's whole historical textbooks filled with human wars back from where I'm from," he told her. "Humans fight for a lot of reasons. It just happens."

She stuck her tongue out at that explanation. "That's barbaric," she said. "Why? Why does your kind think it's so okay to wage war?"

"Well, it's not like every single human goes 'aw yeah, war! Awesome!' all the time. I can't speak for the ones here, but most, and I mean, like, a large majority, back home on Earth don't. And why?" He hummed in thought, and then sighed as he rubbed the back of his head. "I dunno. I'm not really a big historical philosophy buff. Things happen. And I sure couldn't tell you why the people here fought your kind when I got no other information than 'they just did'."

He certainly had a few assumptions, land dominance and a general dislike for anything nonhuman being the greatest suspects in his mind. They sounded too stereotypical to be true, but on the other hand he didn't nearly have enough faith to not believe in the possibility. And he had to remind himself that this wasn't Earth; it was Mobius, with a different set of humans. And apparently one of them was an evil tyrant using robots to take over the world. For all he knew humans in this world were just walking evil stereotypes. It would fit in with all the other weird logic he'd been exposed to so far here.

Sorun really hoped that wasn't the case, because he really didn't know what he was supposed to do with that information if it was.

"Something you said's bothering me," Sorun continued. "Overlander. You called humans Overlanders. Is that, like, the Mobian nickname for humans or something?"

Sally shook her head. "No, there's a clear distinction between the two of them. Overlanders are humans that evolved from the gene bombs that formed Mobius as we know it today. Humans are simply descended from normal humans who were never mutated by the bombs."

"..." There was a lot of information in that statement that Sorun was drawing a blank on, and now he was just confused. "Uh... gene bombs?" he mumbled out. "Wh- what are you talking about?"

The chipmunk stopped in her tracks and whirled towards Sorun with surprise in her eyes. "Did Sonic not explain this to you?" she questioned.

Sorun shook his head. "Explain what?"

"Oh, for the love of..." She slapped a hand to her forehead, and Sorun could have sworn he heard faint murmurs spill out from her mouth as she tiredly shook her head. "Shouldn't have trusted Sonic with him. Should have left him with somebody more responsible. How could he not explain this to him?" Sorun had rose a hand to try to get her attention, but stopped himself when Sally slid her hand off her face, took in a deep breath, and looked Sorun straight up at the eyes.

He felt a bit wary at how serious she looked all of a sudden.

"Sorun, there's something important about Mobius you should know since you're, well, stuck here for now," she stated. "It'll help clear up your confusion and may answer a lot of your questions. I was hoping Sonic would have the common sense to tell you beforehand, but it looks like he didn't." She grumbled under her breath again and glanced the the side while crossing her arms. "How come I can trust him to save the day but nothing else?"

"Sally?"

"Oh, right." She cleared her throat and turned back to Sorun. "You said your home zone is called Earth, right? Is that the name of your planet?"

Quirking an eyebrow in confusion, Sorun slowly nodded at the Mobian. "Yeah...?"

"Well... this planet wasn't always called Mobius. Once upon a time, it was called Earth, too."

"Buh." There were so many implications with that sentence that he didn't even know where to begin. "Explain," he demanded. "Explain now."

"I will, I will," she assured him while raising her hands to calm him down, as the human teen began to breath heavier. He nodded and slowly slowed his breathing. "You said back when you first came here that there weren't any Mobians on your planet Earth. That it was dominated solely by humans and nothing else but what I assume were normal, non-sapient animals. Am I right so far?"

Sorun confirmed her question with a shaky nod of his head. "Mh-hm, mh-hm, yeah."

"Well," she began, "This planet was the same way once. It was called Earth, and the only sapient species that lived on it were humans, the same as yours. This all changed when an alien race named the Xorda visited the planet."

"Ah. Aliens. Of course." Why not? Sonic already told him about aliens. Everything else about this world was so crazy that it seemed normal by comparison. Why would this be any different? "What do aliens have to do with this?"

"You have to understand that a lot of what I'm about to tell you is relatively new information to us," she quickly explained to him. "It was a bit over a year ago when the Xorda came back and explained a lot of details to us before we had to repel their invasion. We cross-referenced a lot of historical data from the royal archives after and managed to piece together as consistent a timeline of the planet's history as well as we could."

Sorun rose a hand to stop her. "Sally, I don't want to know about the alien invasion that happened last year. I'm still trying to understand the whole 'Mobius is Earth bit', okay?" His head actually felt like it was going to explode, and much to his alarm he could hear his heartbeat thumping in his ears. "It's... you're dumping a lot on me right now. Can you please, please just stick to the important bits?"

"Okay, Sorun. Okay. I understand. Just calm down." She stepped forwards and but a reassuring hand on his shoulder. She needed to stay there for a few seconds, after which Sorun's breathing began to even out. He gave her a shaky nod, which she reciprocated with her own nod before stepping back. "As I was saying, the Xorda came and sent an ambassador to have peaceful talks with the humans," she continued. "The humans' response was to dissect the ambassador."

The pale teen's only response to this was to roll his eyes while muttering curses under his breath too quiet for Sally to hear.

"The Xorda saw this as a sign of war, and bombarded planet Earth with weapons called gene bombs," she explained. "There were a precious few amount of human settlements that managed to survive underground, but for the most part all life on the planet was completely annihilated by the gene bombs. The Xorda, thinking the planet had been completely destroyed, left afterwards." She paused, and looked out at the distance past all the trees and towards the plains past the castle they were walking towards, right at the horizon. "What happened afterwards is what history calls the Days of Fury," she said. "Practically all life that didn't escape the bombs were reduced to primordial sludge. The tectonic disturbances caused by the bombs' explosions were so great that they caused natural catastrophes on the planet's surface. Storms that tore the land up, volcanoes that scorched the skies and the earth, and earthquakes that reshaped the entire surface. Eventually the planet calmed down, but all that was left was a lifeless planet above ground." She stopped to take a breath and turned back to Sorun, who remained completely silent while paying rapt attention to Sally's story. "Thousands of years would pass before life would begin to evolve out from the primordial sludge left by the gene bombs," she continued. "Details on this point in time are... scarce, but from what little data we were able to gather along with... 'statements' from certain questionable people and sources, there were extinctions on the first species to evolve from the sludge, and it was during this time that the Chaos Emeralds came to exist on the planet, though back then they took on a different form. How they got to be in the state they're in today is another story entirely, and we can talk about it later if you want.

"Getting back on track, eventually species arose out of the sludge that didn't go extinct, and they evolved into what walks on the planet today. Mobians, and Overlanders. Technically speaking Overlanders are Mobians, too, but they would never admit to it since they're so attached to their human ancestry." She turned sideways and pointed towards Castle Acorn. "One of my ancestors was responsible for uniting the various Mobian tribes to make a single kingdom that stood for unification regardless of what subspecies of Mobian you were. He believed in strength of unity and friendship above all else, and everybody agreed with him. So the Kingdom of Acorn was born, and the line of royal succession has been handed down through a monarchy every since." She looked back to Sorun, and sympathy was cast over her face when she saw the lost look on his face. "Sorun, I know that's a lot to take in all at once on top of everything else you're going through, and I know you must have a lot of questions. If you want to know any finer details, feel free to ask me or anybody else. Otherwise, that's a basic, and I cannot stress the word 'basic' enough here, crash-course on the history of the planet."

"... Ah-huh." He was honestly surprised his brain hadn't melted and poured out of his ears yet. It certainly felt like that's what it should be doing right now, because he couldn't think properly right now. He had to keep rethinking the words of Sally's story over and over again in his head to make sense of it all, and though he gained a little bit more clarity each time, he also felt his sanity slip away in equal amounts.

Sally's face was marred with concern as she saw the conflict on Sorun's own face, and held up a hand to try and calm him. "Sorun?" she softly asked. "Are you alright?"

Very slowly, he nodded, though he had to maintain a hand on his forehead to try and soothe the pounding in his head. "Sure, probably," he moaned out as he tried to order his thoughts out. "So-so this... this zone. It's Earth? Earth, but in a... what, some kind of post-post-post alien apocalypse? That's why everything is so weird? That's why there's walking, talking animals everywhere and why the logic in this place is all screwy? It was aliens?" He moaned again as a headache assaulted him, and he had to begin to use two hands to try and rub the pain out of his head. "And you're sure that this is an alternate universe?" he clarified. "This is an alternate universe and not the future? This isn't my home, right? Oh my god, please tell me you're not mixing the two up, Sally, please ..."

There was only so much he could handle, and Sorun had already crossed that threshold yesterday. This? This was too much, because if they were wrong and this was actually just the future, his future...

"It's another universe, right? It can't be the future. It's-it's-it's all just some screwed up alternate plane of existence. It's not my home. Everybody isn't dead. They're... nobody's dead, right? Everybody I know didn't die, r-right?"

Did she make a mistake?

She didn't want to think she did, and in her heart of hearts she believed she hadn't made a mistake. Sorun had asked her, and she'd told him the history of Mobius. It was supposed to be a harmless little history lesson used so they could get to know each other, something to do a little bonding over so Sorun would be a little easier around her and other Mobians so he wouldn't be so jumpy. She had just wanted to help her.

What she didn't want was for her explanation to turn Sorun into the shaking mess she was looking at, and for the life of her Sally didn't know what to do. Had she said something wrong? She didn't think so; everything she had told him was accurate. So why was-

"Oh my god, please tell me you're not mixing the two up, Sally, please ..."

And then it dawned on her just why Sorun was freaking out, and she instantly became mortified behind the implication of his question.

"S-S-Sally, say somethin'," he mumbled. "Everybody I know isn't dead, right? Th- they're fine? I- I don't, this isn't, I-I-I..."

"Sorun? Sorun, look at me." The desperate urge to correct this misunderstanding was rapidly beginning to well up inside of her, and she ran right up to Sorun and began to gently shake his shoulders to try and gain his attention, but it just wasn't working. He was shaking so intensely that if, anything, merely touching him was shaking her more than him, and his eyes were so wide with terror that it unsettled her to a great degree.

So she tried to do the first thing that came to mind in order to give him any kind of comfort to snap him out of his episode and tried to give him a hug. Just a gentle, reassuring thing to let him know that everything was okay. But she didn't even get close before his entire body jerked and he pushed her away. She stumbled backwards and looked at him with a hurt expression, but it was wiped away when she saw his terror-stricken eyes and the raw contempt that was buried underneath all that fear that was being directed right at her.

"Right," she thought, and a pang of guilt began to tear through her. "He... still blames us for putting him here. He still doesn't trust us. He isn't ready for something like that." Her hands tightened at her sides. "I still need to snap him out of this, though. I can't just leave him like this."

"Sorun? Please calm down." She slowly moved her arms in a lowering gesture, and hope began to well up in her when the quiet, wheezing breaths Sorun was breathing began to die down at her words. "It's not a mix-up, okay? We know what we're talking about when it comes to zones. We're not in your world's future. This is a completely separate world. Your world and everybody you know are fine. They're just a bit similar, alright? Everything is fine."

"Separate? Separate. Yeah." She exhaled the breath she'd been holding when the shaking began to subside and Sorun's hands began to lower off his head. "Okay, yeah... just a different universe. Nobody I know died. They're all still alive. Everything back home is okay."

The guilt from earlier began to come back, and it was those words that made her realize just how much they had taken away from Sorun when they had dragged him through the portal to this world. "Just how much did he leave behind when we... why are you even asking that?" she berated herself. "He had a whole life. Friends, and family, and a whole lot of other things, probably. And we took it all from him when we brought him here. It wasn't supposed to be like this at all. We didn't think... we rushed into it too fast. Eggman made us too desperate, and we rushed right into that tablet and- it's too late for regrets." She shook her head roughly. "It's bad now, but we can fix it. Sorun's here, but we can send him back eventually. It'll all be fine."

There would never be a point she didn't regret pulling Sorun into their mess. She knew the rest of the Freedom Fighters felt the same, Tails especially, but she didn't know if they fully understood the weight of what they had done like she did right now. And they would make it right and send him back to his home zone when the opportunity was right. But she had to wonder if letting him into the Freedom Fighters was the right decision after all, because at the end of the day, he was right. He was a normal teenager who made it sound like the things they dealt with in this zone didn't even exist in his zone. And she was worried that if merely explaining Mobius's history shook him up so bad, that he would freeze up entirely the first time he saw a Badnik. And she didn't want to think about what would happen if he froze in front of a robot trying to kill him.

"Sorun... you know, if you're having any regrets about joining the Freedom Fighters..." She looked away from his disheveled face a scratched at the back of her head. "Nobody would blame you for quitting. We'd understand. It's not your fight, and-"

"I already said I would, didn't I? Drop the subject already." On the upside, his sentences weren't fragmented anymore and he sounded composed once more. But he also sounded extremely bitter, and his tone had a cold edge to it that made Sally do a double-take on Sorun. "Can we just go to the castle already?" he asked.

"U-um, sure." She watched as Sorun stomped past her towards the castle, and had to stifle the sigh that threatened to leave her as she followed him. "I wish I'd brought Nicole with me," she found herself thinking. "I could really use her advice right now, because I just don't know how to talk to him."

They'd finally arrived at the castle gates. Sorun noticed that were were a rather large amount of Mobians stationed around the castle perimeter- ones in green uniforms who were wielding swords and spears. He also noted the way they were eyeing him from his position, but a quick nod from Sally always put them at ease. He felt mildly ticked off at the treatment, and wanted to tell somebody, but he just couldn't find it in himself to do so. So he remained silent for the most part, even as they entered the castle.

He'd calmed down from Sally's story about Mobius, but a part of him was still shaken from the thoughts that had been running through him. Sally had assured him that, no, this wasn't his world's future, and he was relieved beyond words. Relived, but still shaken, because the scare had been bad. So bad he'd almost lost it.

"Hell, I practically did lose it back there," he thought as he lagged behind Sally, who had elected to lead him through the castle. "Shoved her and everything. Even after I told Sonic I'd try and get along, but it's... it's hard. It's all still too new."

Sorun really hoped that he hadn't offended her by pushing her away when she'd just been trying to comfort him, or at least apologize to her, but he wanted so desperately to forget the whole ordeal that he was too scared to bring it up again. So that left them at this awkward impasse where they would just pretend that didn't happen and they would just forget it.

That was what he was doing, at least. He didn't know how Sally was dealing with it, and he was too scared to ask.

Eventually these thoughts became too uncomfortable for him to think on, so he chose to distract himself by looking around the castle they were walking in. For all intents and purposes, it was about as large as it looked like and about as spacious as one would expect a castle. Big rooms, lots of stairs and hallways, and a layout so convoluted that he would be doubtlessly lost if it weren't for a fact he had a guide. A lot of guards, too. So many guards that Sorun had to wonder if it wasn't overkill.

"There sure are a lot of guards here," Sorun noted. "Don't you think it's a bit much?"

Sally spun her head around to look at Sorun, and he saw her blink her blue eyes in surprise, almost like she hadn't expected for him to talk to her again. "It was my father's idea," she said. "He was the previous king, before my brother. There aren't usually this many, but, well..." She stopped to take a deep breath. "Remember when Sonic said we had one of the Chaos Emeralds here?" she asked.

"... Vaguely?" It certainly sounded familiar, but he couldn't quite remember. He certainly didn't blame himself for forgetting such a small detail. Things had been so hectic that he was sure he'd forgotten all sorts of details. "Remind me," he requested.

She nodded. "The seven Chaos Emeralds were all locked away into a zone called the Special Zone, which was presided over by a being called Feist. Sonic at one point had ventured into the Special Zone to retrieve one of the Emeralds, the gray Emerald, to help my father who was deathly ill at the time."

"And he got the Emerald?"

"Yes, he did. Afterwards, we kept the gray Chaos Emerald safe in the castle, but... but then it was taken." She stopped, and her body shuddered as she squeezed her eyes closed. "We're not entirely sure what happened. Just that something came in here and stole the Emerald. Out of nowhere. Hershey, one of the agents to the kingdom's Secret Service, just happened to be on duty and nearby and was... we think she saw whatever was stealing the Emerald, because we found her dead." She opened her eyes and looked down at her feet with a forlorn expression. "It wasn't just her," she continued. "Over twenty guardsmen were found cut to pieces. There were cuts and slashes all along the walls and floors, like something was swinging around a giant sword or something."

"Oh... geez," Sorun mumbled, and he shot her a sympathetic look. "That sounds really bad."

"It was," she agreed. "We think that it was one of Dr. Eggman's robots, but we honestly don't know, because nobody who saw it lived. And right after Eggman somehow managed to acquire the other six Emeralds."

"But they were locked away in the Special Zone, right?"

Sally shook her head. "That's the thing, Sorun. We tried going to the Special Zone to ask Feist who had taken the Emeralds, but we couldn't find it. The Special Zone is just gone ."

Those were certainly disturbing implications. He wanted to ask more, but he saw the pained expression her face was making, so he decided to hold his tongue and tried changing the subject. "So Elias?"

The chipmunk straightened up upon hearing her brother's name, and then pointed down the hall. "Right. This way."

Walking with silence between them once again, the pair continued to make their way through the castle's winding corridors until they stopped in front of a large set of double doors. Sally motioned for Sorun to stay where he was before she went to the doors, knocked on them, and then entered after waiting a few moments.

Sorun chose to obey and wait, and then idly began to rock back and forth on his feet. He heard and tried and discern the muffled voices from the other side of the door, but failed to make anything out. After some more waiting, the doors opened back up and Sally's head poked in through the opening.

"He said he's fine to talk to you right now," she said. "And try not to look so nervous. My brother really isn't scary at all."

"Nervous? Who's nervous? I ain't nervous." It was a complete lie, but she didn't know that. He hoped she didn't, at least, but the knowing look in her eyes didn't give him much hope in that regard. "Anyways, he's in here?" he asked as he pulled the door open further and slipped in past Sally.

It was, quite unsurprisingly, a throne room. A rather modest one compared to what he had expected, but still a rather large room considering. Wide open space, large pillars, giant, rectangular windows on the walls, and a big throne right at the end. Though, to Sorun's surprise, the sole other person in the room wasn't in it, and was in fact standing near the entrance to the room and looking at him in an expectant manner.

"Wow, this guy has more clothes on him than anybody else I've seen around," Sorun observed. Elias certainly looked the part of a king, too, with the blue and gold vestments he wore on his whole body. It was readily apparent that he was Sally's brother, too, as he had the same hair, hair, and fur color as her as well as even some of her facial structure. "Except his tail's way longer. What is he, a squirrel?" the teen wondered when he looked at the long, curled tail behind the king. "Huh, that's kinda... wait. Waaaaiit... squirrel, chipmunk, Kingdom of Acorn, oh my god it's called Acorn because they're a royal family of squirrels it's a damn pun oh my god that's so STUPID-!"

"Yo, what's up? I'm Sorun." The flippant greeting was the only one that Sorun could manage, as the rest of his focus was being diverted towards trying to not tear his hair out. He held up a 'v' with his fingers and tried to smile, but due to his inner turmoil it looked less like a smile and more like a rictus grin one might find on a corpse.

Overall, not his worst greeting.

The young king actually seemed a bit flustered by his greeting, so much so that the small, gold, acorn-shaped (Sorun had to resist gagging when he saw it) crown on his forehead slipped down, and he had to fumble to right it. "Oh! Greetings! Hi." He cleared his throat, clasped his hands behind his back, and then looked to his sister. "This is Sorun, then, sister?"

"Yes, brother. That's Sorun." She gave her brother an affirmative nod before turning to Sorun. "I'll be waiting outside. Just come find me when you're done, okay?"

"Uh, sure. I'll do-" The door was closed behind her before he even finished. "... That," he finished with a slump of his shoulders. "Hm. So!" he cried out while whirling to the king, and his sudden change in demeanor caused Elias to jump slightly. "Kingy. What'd you wanna see me for?"

"Well, everybody was making such a large buzz about that wooden slab and the... individual the Freedom Fighters planned on bringing on behalf of it." Elias's eyes flicked nervously towards the door Sally had closed, and then went back to Sorun. "I understand you've volunteered to help them after being guided here by-"

"Abducted. I- I was abducted," Sorun interrupted. "You can use the word abducted, Elias."

He gave the teen a stiff nod. "Nevertheless, I am glad to hear you've volunteered your services-"

"Coerced, really."

A large breath was quickly inhaled by the king when he was interrupted, but then he hung his head and slowly released the breath. "You really don't want to be here, do you?"

"What part of abducted didn't you understand?" Sorun asked him. "Abducted; verb: to take someone away illegally by force or deception. Example: I was minding my own business buying orange juice from a store when your Freedom Fighters dragged me through a magical portal. Chaos portal. Whatever portal."

He would have went further, but his words began to grow quieter when he saw Elias shrink back further and further away from Sorun the more he spoke while looking increasingly uncomfortable. And then he thought that, just maybe, he was being a bit overbearing again. So he paused to take a deep breath and calm his thoughts before speaking again.

"Maybe a I went a little far. Don't worry about it," he told Elias. "I mean, yeah, I don't want to be here. Like, I really don't want to be here. But I am, so, you know, I'm trying to make it work. I don't think I'm doing a very good job, but I'm trying."

He must have said something right, because Elias's body relaxed at his words and he stopped slowly backing away. He even nervously laughed a little as he shuffled closer to him while looking to the side. "You're not giving yourself enough credit. I... think I would be rather terrified if I were in your shoes. I'm honestly shocked you haven't tried running away."

"Oh, I did. I came back 'cause I realized the Freedom Fighters are the only realistic bet I have on getting home."

"... I see." He sighed out loud and turned his back to Sorun as he walked towards one of the large window panes that overlooked the city below. "Suppose I can't blame you," he admitted after stopping in front of the window. "I somewhat know what it feels like to be thrust into a world you're unfamiliar with, though I speak more of a metaphorical sense."

There was a strong, sarcastic rebuttal Sorun thought of, but he held in it for fear of making his first impression worse than what it already was. Instead he stepped besides Elias and stared out at all the wooden buildings below them. "Wild guess here, but it's the king thing?" he guessed. "How old are you, anyways?"

"Twenty-one," he answered. "And, yes, that is indeed what I refer to. My father, Maximillian, was the previous king, but while he's okay now he's not... physically fit for the position anymore. He's bound to a wheelchair these days, you see."

"Yeah, Sally said something about him being sick. So, what, you ran away?"

A pained expression flickered across Elias's face. "I thought I could handle the pressure that came with all the responsibility. I was woefully wrong," he admitted. "So yes. I ran. Tried to settle in a village, even took on a wife and her daughter after her husband disappeared due to one of Eggman's machinations. But to make a long story short, things here became dire, so I returned to take back the crown. But now... now I'm just not so sure, Sorun." He ran a hand over the glass. "Even after the Freedom Fighters took the Emeralds back from the Doctor, his hold on the world hasn't diminished in the slightest. I worry that I'm performing inadequately in service of the people I've sworn to lead, and the fact that we haven't so much as made a dent in his forces despite all the fighting only strengthens that notion within me."

"This is a lot of heavy stuff he's unloading on a guy he just met," Sorun thought as he listened to Elias. "Is it just because he sympathizes with me so much? Even then, we're still strangers. I get that these Mobians guys are a lot nicer than pretty much anybody else I've ever met, rock aside, but... seriously?"

It was niceties and trustfulness to an absurd degree, really. He's seen it in Sonic and his folks and in Sally. Tails had seemed sincere when he tried to tell Sorun he was sorry, and by all rights he was. People had been glaring at him, sure, but the only ones who had actually assaulted him were children which he chalked up to idiot kids being idiot kids stressed by the war. He sure couldn't judge.

"You're being really forthcoming considering I'm a total stranger," Sorun noted. "It's kind of weird."

"Is it?" The Mobian actually looked confused by Sorun's statement. "I was just trying to open up and get to know you. Did I do something wrong?"

"Nah, it's just a... culture thing," Sorun explained. "People are a lot more socially closed off where I'm from. By that I mean nobody likes telling each other their problems. That's why we have therapists nobody can afford or wants to go to."

That just seemed to make Elias even more confused. "I don't understand," he admitted. "Wouldn't it be easier talking to people?"

"Dude, nobody wants to because it's super embarrassing. I don't know how you're telling me all this stuff with a straight face." Shaking his head, Sorun ran a hand over his face as he turned from Elias to the window. "You people are the weird ones, being so open with your feelings," he added, and the urge to quickly divert the conversation to a different subject overtook him. "But if it makes you feel better, I don't think you're doing a bad job. Pretty sure a lot of kings where I'm from would've folded already, so hey, you got that goin' for ya."

"Oh, really?" Elias shot him an inquisitive look as he turned his head to the side. "How do the kings of your world fare?"

"Er, yeah, monarchies aren't really a thing anymore where I'm from," Sorun corrected. "There used to be kings and queens and all that, but they kind of got phased out for democracies and republics 'cause of, you know, all the wars. And revolutions. And the famines. And the fires. And the mass decapitations of the upper class." The squirrel standing next to him grew appalled. "I'm only talking about one country here. France had it rough. I'm not even gonna try to get into any of the other countries, because they all have really sordid origin stories, mine especially. But I mean it worked out for them all in the end. Mostly. Sort of." The human teen exhaled sharply. "Okay, fine, my world's a mess, but it's a mess that we make work for the most part." He cleared his throat. "But, uh, y- you look like you're making it work. I've only been here for a couple days, not even twenty-four hours really, but it, uh, it all looks like it's going pretty good. So yeah. Good job. You're doing a good job."

"I suppose?" Blinking at the teen in confusion, the king cleared his throat as he looked towards the afternoon sun. "Well, I think I've heard all I need to," he said to Sorun. "It's already midday, and I've yet to even begin any of today's work. But our conversation was very enlightening. If it's not too much to ask, I'd like to continue these discussions further. At a later date, when we both have free time."

Sorun wanted to say no, but he couldn't think of a good reason to. He still could have said no, but the cautious side of him warned that saying no to a king may not pay off in the long run, and that maybe he could use this later. Or at the very least kill off an afternoon if he ever grew bored. So he squashed down his reservations and gave Elias a curt nod. "If I can." Short, noncommittal response. Perfect.

Elias looked very pleased by his answer, and he gave the teen a wide smile. "I very much enjoyed talking to you, Sorun. Thank you."

"Alright, man, alright. Geez." He almost regretted agreeing now that he had to see that. "All this positivity. It's suffocating," he thought as he backed up towards the door leading out of the throne room. "Seeya around, kingy."

He couldn't get out of there fast enough, and it was all he could do to not make it apparent as he had to fight to not slam the door behind him he'd closed it so quickly. He breathed out a heavy breath as he steadied himself, and composed himself as he turned away from the doors.

The fact that Sally was leaning on a wall nearby and saw all that shattered his self-confidence once again, but he tried not to let it show.

"Sorun? Did everything go okay with my brother?" she asked.

"Hm? What? Elias? Uh, yeah. Cool, uh, cool guy, your brother. He's kind of weird, but decent dude."

"Good. That's, good." Sally cleared her throat and turned down the hall. "Well, we should get going, then."

Sorun nodded, and trailed a few paces behind Sally. But the incident of her cutting him off by closing the door so quickly hung in his mind, and the black-haired teen just couldn't get his mind off it.

'"Wouldn't it be easier just talking to people?' No, Elias, it isn't. Maybe for you people it is, but for me it isn't. But man, that shove move I did really isn't gonna do me any favors... gah, man, I gotta at least say sorry."

It was uncomfortable just thinking about it, but it made him even more uncomfortable thinking about what Sally would assume about him if he just let what happened be without talking about it. He had to work with her now, what with him being a Freedom Fighter and all.

"So, uh..." He took a breath, and then braced himself for the coming apology. Sally slowed to a stop and turned to him as he began to speak. "About that... thing that happened..." He breathed out again, shoved his hands into his pocket, and avoided her gaze. "You said this is a different zone, but there are things like time zones, you know, and they sounded so similar 'cause of the 'zone' word and I don't know if the terminology here isn't different or not, so I just- I made some stupid assumptions."

She gave him an astonished look, and Sorun had to wonder if he was really that bad that him apologizing was so surprising. "Are you trying to say you're sorry?"

"Y-yeah. For the, you know. Shoving and... anyways!" He reached his limit on awkward conversation and briskly walked past her. "S-s-so, uh, you said something about me getting to know all the other Freedom Fighters. Which I guess is important, since we're all a team now."

He didn't hear an immediate answer, and slowed down just a tad so that the Mobian could catch up with him. He heard the sound of footsteps walking alongside his, and glanced to the side to see that the chipmunk was keeping up with his pace.

He also saw the appreciative smile on her face, and mumbled under his breath while turning his head away again so he didn't have to look at her.

"Well, first of all, only half of the people you saw at Freedom HQ were part of the Freedom Fighters here. The other half are part of Knuckles' team, and two of them are a separate team of their own called Team Dark."

Sorun nodded along to her explanation. "Okay. What's the deal with Knuckles and his team?"

"The Chaotix- oh come on, the name isn't that bad," she said in an admonishing tone when she saw Sorun raise his eyebrows. "They share our ideals, but always had their hands full with their own problems up on Angel Island to ever help out much with Dr. Eggman. But circumstances changed, and now they're down here helping us since things are so bad with him."

"Angel Island?" Sorun questioned.

"It's a floating island that moves around the planet."

An exasperated breath left the human teen. "Sure, why not? Not even the weirdest things I've heard all day," he muttered with a shake of his head. "And Team Dark?"

"That would be Rouge and Shadow. They're here due to extenuating circumstances as well regarding Eggman's forces."

"Shadow," Sorun repeated. "He wouldn't happen to be that black hedgehog with the red stripes that was staring at me the whole time I was making that speech, was he?"

Sally blinked in surprise when Sorun looked to her for confirmation. "He was staring at you?"

"It felt like the dude was trying to set me of fire with his eyeballs."

"Oh." She winced, but at the same time she didn't look at all that surprised at what Sorun said. "Shadow's a... complicated case. Try not to let it get to you, okay? I can't speak for him on what he's thinking, but if he says anything can you please be patient with him?"

There were a lot of questions that explanation raised, and while Sorun wanted to ask them, he couldn't help but notice the pleading look in the chipmunk's eyes, and he relented by giving her a small nod. The black hedgehog didn't like him for some reason. Considering he didn't like any of them, that was fair. All he had to do was avoid him and he'd never have to think about it again.

"With that all said," Sally continued, "I think it would be more beneficial if you just talked to them all and got to know them. To better improve team cohesiveness and to make you feel better at ease. Maybe you could even get Shadow off your back."

Dammit.

"Yeah, sure, sure," he mumbled. "I'll get right on that. And Sally?"

"Yes?"

"You said if I had any more questions about that planet that you'd help me out. You wouldn't happen to have a map of the world or something I can look at, would you?"

He could complain all he wanted that Freedom HQ was basically in an underground burrow, but at least the lighting down here was decent, the space was equally decent, and the way they got the kitchen section to look like an actual kitchen was nothing short of miraculous. He didn't even know how they managed to power the fridge or anything else down here, but he wasn't one to question it.

What he was questioning was if there was anything good in the fridge to drink, because he hadn't drank anything since coming to Mobius.

Sorun opened the HQ fridge, and then slung his arm over the door as he leaned in to look at the contents. "Cheese, fruits, vegetables, random-ass food brands I don't recognize... hell even is this?" he muttered as he grabbed a small, spiked purple thing that may or may not have been a fruit. "Weird," he mumbled as he set the thing back.

Something near the back caught his attention, and his eyes nearly bugged out of his head when he saw a glass bottle with a familiar shape filled with an even more familiar, brown liquid. His hand shot towards the back of the fridge as he grabbed the bottle, and he immediately brought it to his face so he could read the label.

"'Chao-Cola'..." he read. "Nice to know some things never change no matter where in the multiverse you go. It's even got the same funky font as Coca-Cola. Actually, wait, that's way too coincidental. What are the odds somebody just found a bombed-out soda factory from the old world and just stole the logo?" He stared down at the bottle for a few more moments, and then shrugged as he shut the fridge. "Ah, well. Not my problem and I don't care as long as it tastes about the same."

The teen walked over to the kitchen's circular table, sat down at the nearest chair, and leaned back as he twisted the cap off of the bottle and took a sip of the soda. He was mildly surprised to find that the taste was virtually identical to the Earth-brand of cola, and this was immediately followed by a wave of nostalgia as the flavor drudged up all sorts of memories at the back of his mind.

"Yeah, this was probably a mistake," he muttered to himself before taking another sip. He was sad now, but he was also too thirsty to stop.

He knew it was only minutes, but it felt like he'd been there for hours as he leaned in that chair, taking periodical drinks of his soda as he relived the memories playing through his head. He was so engrossed that he didn't even notice when somebody walked into the kitchen, and even when they froze halfway to stare at Sorun staring blankly at the ceiling he still didn't notice.

"Uhhh, hey, new guy. You doin' okay?"

The voice was so startling that Sorun had nearly fallen out of his chair, and he spluttered out in surprise when he had to balance himself and save the soda he was holding. Bottle clutched tightly in his hand, Sorun slowly turned his head towards the person that addressed him.

A pair of violet eyes attached to a red body was staring back at him. For the life of him, Sorun couldn't discern exactly what he was. He thought the dreadlock-like appendage... things he had for hair may have given him some hint, but they only made Sorun even more confused the more he thought on it. The white crescent on his chest gave him no clues, either. So he gave up, shook his head, and waved the Mobian a greeting.

"Yeah, just thinkin'," he answered. "Nice to meet you, red... man."

The red Mobian gave him a deadpan stare. "My name is Knuckles."

Sorun nodded, and found his eyes traveling down to the Mobian's hands. He almost scoffed when he saw that each of his fists had two large, spike-like protrusions under his white gloves. "Probably could have guessed that," he quietly muttered before looking back up at his face. "Knuckles, right. And you're a, uh..."

"Echidna."

"IN WHAT UNIVERSE- nope, in this universe. Logic doesn't exist here. Guy says he's an echidna, I'll believe it." A shaky breath left Sorun's mouth, and he needed another drink of cola to steady himself. "Well, nice to meet you, Knuckles. I'm Sorun." He pointed his bottle at the Mobian. "You're the, uh, Chaotix guy, right? Sally told me."

"She did, huh?" He gave a shrug. "It's honestly more Vector's team than anything. I think he's just too lazy to lead it himself, so he lets me do it. I don't really care all that much as long as we get things done."

Sorun blinked. "Vector's...?"

"He's the crocodile you might have seen."

His mouth opened in an "ah" of understanding. "Big green guy, right." He nodded. "So Sally said you live up on a floating island? That sounds wild."

"Wild. Right." Knuckles turned his pointed, tan muzzle away from Sorun. "You could say it's something like that."

"Okay? This guy doesn't seem like much of a talker. Maybe he doesn't like me, either. Or it could be the whole, I dunno, war thing. " He shook his head and turned back to his soda. "Well, I'm not opening that can of worms. I've had enough emotional distress for one day."

"What are you doing here, anyways?" Knuckles asked him.

Sorun glanced to the side, and set the bottle down on the table before leaning further back in his chair. "I asked Sally for a map of the world, and she said she'd get one for me. I figured, y'know, since I'm stuck here and all I might as well get a lay of the land. Or at the very least know what the planet looks like."

"Ohh, I gotcha." He pointed one of his hands forwards. "That her right there?"

Sorun turned his head to see Sally walking towards him with a large roll of paper in her hands. He stopped leaning back on the chair and sat up straight as she came to a stop to the table while setting the map down, and then gave Sorun a tired smile.

"Well, it took some doing, but I managed to get you a map," she said.

"Some doing?" Sorun repeated. "It really that hard to get a map?"

"Well, you wanted a global one, and I figured you'd want something as accurate as possible, so we, um..." She coughed into her hand. "We may-or-may-not have hacked into a Overlander satellite and stolen topography data. A while ago. We actually already had the map on file; I just needed to print it off."

Sorun's eyes widened in surprise, and a bemused chuckle left him as he grabbed at the map. "Ooookay, I'm just gonna go with it. Let's see what we got."

He rolled the map out on the table, and idly he could feel Knuckles lean over his shoulder in interest. Sorun chose to ignore this and looked down at the map. And then he stopped cold when he recognized very familiar geography.

"Well, that's... yeah." It was a 2-D map of all the worlds continents and oceans spread out before him, as well as labels for the continents, and the fact that it looked extremely similar to Earth's topography was the first thing that jumped up at him. Similar, but not the same. He'd even felt his heart rate spike, but he quickly calmed himself down. "Relax man, relax. Different world different world different world... Sally said so."

"So?" Sally asked, and to Sorun her voice sounded distant. "What do you think?"

"It's... yeah, if I squint it's pretty much the same as my zone," Sorun said. "Yup, that's Earth, but... shaped wrong."

He heard an interested hum from the echidna behind him. "So our world is shaped the same as yours?"

"Well, according to Sally they're exactly the same, except aliens never came and bombed my world," Sorun explained. "There might be a difference of thousands of years between them, too, but I dunno." He leaned closer to the map. "So, guess I'll go through this all one at a time here...

"So, the North and South Poles look about the same," he started. "Are they still frozen wastelands, or do Mobians live there?"

"The Tundra is home to some villages, yes," Sally supplied. "I think Rotor's family lives there, actually."

He didn't know who that was, but at least his question was answered. "Okay. Northamer- which sounds an awful lot like North America, which is what it was called in my zone. Actually it is just North America with missing spaces and letters," he commented. "Canada looks the same... except for the fact that the upper-right portion there is connect to the eastern continent. How'd that happen? They were completely separated by ocean in my zone."

"You must be talking about the Great Continental Bridge," Sally mumbled as she looked at the spot Sorun stared at. "The landscape being changed by the destruction of the gene bombs? Thousands of years of continental drift? Take your pick. Any number of things could have moved them closer together."

"I guess," Sorun agreed. "Moving down to America. Looks like some bits came off into islands on the sides there, but otherwise it's the same."

"This is where the Kingdom of Acorn is." Sally pointed at the area that was once America, and tapped at where a large river was cutting down the landmass and dividing it in half. "The eastern portion is completely forest and plains," she added, "and Knothole is right about here."

Sorun hummed as he followed her finger. "We're right above Florida, so... somewhere around Georgia or Alabama, I think. Could have fooled me with all the trees. It isn't even that hot. Guess thousands of years would change the climate." He pointed to the western portion of once-America. "How 'bout that half?"

Knuckles chose this moment to speak up. "The west half? Ain't that part just mostly desert?"

Sally nodded. "Yes, it is. There are some patches of green here and there, but for the most part the western portion of lower Northamer. It's where Sandblast City lies, too, a settlement of-"

"No-good jerks and bandits?" Knuckles angrily muttered.

"I was going to say vagabonds, but yes, Knuckles, that works too," the chipmunk sighed out.

The human teen hummed in understanding. "Yeah, that place was pretty desert-y in my zone, too, but it wasn't the whole western half. Mostly just around Nevada, where Vegas was. Man, I wonder if Vegas is still around?" he wondered, and then moved up. "Actually, let me see if I can find my home. I lived in a place called Detroit, and it should be pretty easy to find. The state it was in was this weird mitten-shaped landmass surrounded by lakes, so- where is it?"

He blinked, and then looked closer. Michigan wasn't on the map. Both the upper and lower Peninsula were completely gone, and the five Great Lakes that once surrounded the state had melded together in what looked like one large super lake that fed into the stream dividing America in two.

Detroit was completely gone.

"... Oh, it just doesn't exist anymore here," he mumbled. "Yeah, that figures."

Sally gave him a sympathetic look, and he could feel Knuckles shift uncomfortably behind him as he coughed nervously to the side. "You doing alright?" Sally asked.

Sorun nodded. "Yeah. It wasn't my Detroit, anyways. That one's still around. Just somewhere else." His eyes moved down the map. "Somehow the Caribbean got bigger. Dunno how that happened. Central America and Mexico are just gone , so North and South America are completely separated now. And South America got renamed to Soumerca. Jesus, that's even less effort than Northamer.

"And Soumerca is... wow, it's even more fragmented than Northamer is." The southernmost part of what was once South America looked to be broken, and pieces of landmass-turned-islands were spread out all around the tail-end of the continent.

Noting nothing else of interest, Sorun moved to the eastern portion. "Oh, Greenland and Iceland are completely gone, too," he noticed.

"Greenland and Iceland, huh?" Knuckles commented. "I bet Iceland was a pretty cold place and Greenland a pretty green place, right?"

Sorun shook his head. "No, it's backwards. Greenland was the frozen one. Iceland was the nice place everyone lived in."

Knuckles grinned and barked out a laugh. "Hah! Good one."

"I'm serious."

The grin slowly drained away, and the echidna shook his head in disbelief when he saw Sorun's blank expression. Sally stifled a giggle at the display. "Wait, for real? That doesn't make any sense! Why would they name it all backwards like that!?"

"Hey, I didn't name 'em," Sorun said with a shrug. "Okay, Eurish, formerly Europe. Looks like it's the United Kingdom, France, London, Italy, Spain, Greece, Finland, Ireland, Scotland, Sweden, Germany, and the rest of Europe all rolled into one. And it looks like Italy and big chunks of Europe split off and formed a island right next to it, too."

"There were really that many countries before the Xorda came?" Sally asked, and there was a hint of amazement to her voice. "I... never even considered how diverse humanity was before the gene bombs came, and how close they were to one another, either. It's almost too much to believe."

"Oh, yeah. It was really neat," Sorun said. "It's hard to see now since it's all a single color without any borders, but there used to be so many countries here. All with their own cultures, languages, architecture, man, they all had different everything that they shared with the world... but, uh, I guess they don't anymore." He paused, and then tapped his finger on Eurish. "So what's up with this place?" he asked.

"The middle part here is a forested mainly home to the Kingdom of Mercia. They're a lesser-known Mobian body that mostly keep to themselves," Sally explained. "There's also a couple of cities that fall under the United Federation's jurisdiction." Sorun sent her an questioning look, and she nodded to let him know she'd explain. "They're, for lack of a better term, the Overlander government. The surviving human cities I told you about earlier were converted into Overlander settlements, and they are all part of it, though the cities maintain their own independence of one-another. That said, the United Federation is the main governing body over all of the Overlander settlements." She pointed at the large island next to Eurish. "This island here, for example, is all United Federation territory. And I think the name of one of the Overlander cities here was... Spagonia, was it?"

Sorun snorted at the name. "Never heard of it, but is sure sounds Italian. Weirdly enough." He rubbed a hand behind his head. "So United Federation is all Overlander stuff. Anything else?"

"Sadly, the United Federation doesn't really interact with Mobians all that much, especially after the Great War between our species. We don't really know that much at all," she told him. "Shadow and Rouge would, though. They're part of G.U.N."

"... G.U.N.?" Sorun repeated.

"The Guardian Units of the Nation," she clarified. "It's basically the United Federation's military. They were sacked completely pretty early on after Eggman got the seven Emeralds, and all United Federation cities were occupied by him afterwards. The only reason Team Dark is even here helping us is because G.U.N. isn't in a position to do anything in an official capacity anymore due to the occupation."

"Pfft. 'Course they would name their military G.U.N." Sorun shook his head. "And you don't know much outside of that?"

Sally hummed, and then moved her hand back to the western portion of the map. "Our only connection is through this place, here," she said as she tapped at Soumerca. "There's a human city called Station Square. It's unique in that, unlike all the other cities that were made to survive the Xorda, this one was made completely by accident and was never affected by the gene bombs. From what they told us, a plane had crashed into a mountain, and the humans inside decided to build an entire city-state in a massive hollow that was under the mountain. It was actually discovered by us during a mission some time ago, and the mountain itself was lost later on. Our understanding is that they joined up with the United Federation." She rubbed at her shoulder. "Actually, the only reason we even know about the United Federation is because of Station Square. They're the only UF-affiliated settlement that will talk to us since we helped them and maintained friendly contact."

"They seriously just decided to build a whole city under a mountain and live there for thousands of years?" Sorun sat back in his chair, and then began to tiredly rub at his eyes. "Okay, sure. Lines up with all the other wacky stuff." He looked back at the map. "So Station Square, huh? Looks like it's around where Brazil used to be. And the rest of the United Federation is mostly on the eastern side of the world?"

The chipmunk nodded. "Yes, but mostly in small pockets of city-countries."

"Gotcha." The human looked back to Eurish. "What about this?" he asked when he pointed to a smaller island near the top of Eurish, near Mercia's coast. "Actually, I might be wrong about Iceland. I think that's Iceland? Or it could be another piece of Europe that broke off. Can't tell. That UF, too?"

There was a grunt from behind him. "That's Albion," he stated. "And no, it isn't."

"Okay?" He'd turned back to look at the echidna, but all he was doing was glaring at the island on the map. Sorun shrugged it off and looked down below Eurish. "So Africa is Efrika now. It looks way smaller than I remember. Looks like Madagascar's gone, too. Or it might be one of those broken-off bits on the eastern side of the continent. I don't know.

"And, oh boy, Asia. Now Yurashia. I think that's the first one that had its name extended," he idly commented. "So this is all of Russia, China, the whole Middle East, and India, looks like. Any details?"

Sally looked closer at the map. "Mostly more wild lands and pockets of Mobian settlements and villages. If I remember correctly, they refer to it as the Dragon Kingdom."

Sorun threw his hands up. "What happened to the Kingdom of Acorn being the only official Mobian kingdom?"

"It is," she defended. "The only recognized one that can be officially called a government, at least. Places like the Dragon Kingdom and Mercia aren't nearly as organized as we are, and in matters concerning Mobians as a whole judgement is usually deferred to us. And like Mercia, the Dragon Kingdom mostly keeps to itself."

"Alright, fair enough. Moving on." Sorun moved the map further to the left as his eyes traveled east. "Well, the Philippines, Indonesia, New Guinea and any of the other island countries don't exist anymore. Geez, the whole archipelago got wiped out. And Australia-" His voice abruptly stopped, and his eyes widened when he saw Australia and the new name on the map. "Oh, come on. You're kidding me." He grew so weak that he slumped forwards and hit his face against the table. "Ugh, whyyyy..."

The two Mobians next to him looked at each other in confusion, and Knuckles reached over to shake Sorun's shoulder. "Er, Sorun? You okay?" he asked.

The human's response was to shoot straight up in his seat, a motion that was so sudden that Knuckles flinched away. "Downunda. They seriously called it Downunda?" His tone grew clipped and disbelieving as he looked to Sally. "Do the people there talk in this really weird and distinct accent?"

"Um... yes, they do," she confirmed, and Sorun's mind began screaming. "Did that accent exist in your zone?"

"Yes. It did. And somehow space aliens blew away all human culture and it still survived." A long, drawn-out sigh left his mouth along with a defeated chuckle. "Alright, cool, cool. Anyways, last but not least: Japan. It looks like it went from being the most eastern country to being at the dead-end of the west, but compared to everything else it looks the same for the most part."

Sally's eyes followed to where Sorun was pointing at the map, and a sound of understanding left her. "Oh, that's the Flicky Islands," she said.

"Ahh. I don't know what that is."

"It's a island completely unique in that it's entirely comprised of precious gems and other rare geodes," she explained, causing Sorun's eyes to widened. "It's inhabited by a species of bird Mobini-er, normal animals you could say- that eat and survive off of the gems."

Some seconds passed as the pale teen stared at her in complete silence, and then she shook his head with a bemused chuckle. "You know, considering this is Japan we're talking about, that's actually the least weirdest thing you've told me yet," he said.

"Huh?" Knuckles tilted his head to the side in confusion. "Why's that?"

Sorun affixed him with a deadpan stare. "Japan was weird, dude," he said. "They made some great stuff, but man, they were weird. Shame they got obliterated like everything else." He sighed, and then rested his head again his closed hand. "The Australian accent gets to survive, but Japan gets turned into a rock? That just ain't fair."

More sanity had been shaved off of him than he would have liked, but at the very least he got an overall idea of how good a shape the world was currently in. And overall, it was pretty bad. Yes, he could recognize it as Earth, but at the same time it looked so different that it was practically a different planet.

Well, it was a different planet, but the similarities were still there.

It was boggling how the borders in all the continents had been completely erased and all the countries he'd known were gone, too. Hell, there were even whole landmasses that just didn't exist anymore. But what did interest him were those precious few surviving human cities, the places the Overlanders lived, and just how much human culture had survived along with them. They seemed completely xenophobic towards anything that wasn't a human or Overlander, but fortunately he was a human. Could he go there?

"... Probably not. It's a whole continent away. Yeah, they're connected now, but I'd have to trek all the way up America and Canada just to get to get to the Continental Bridge, and after that'd I'd have to cut through Mercia and the rest of Europe. Eurish. Whatever. I'd have to get through all that just to get to a UF city. That'd take me months on foot, and that's assuming something doesn't kill me on the way. It ain't happenin'."

So much for satisfying his curiosity. Maybe they'd at least take him to Station Square someday, since they seemed friendly. It seemed better than nothing.

"Sorun, what's your problem with the accent people in Downunda have?" Sally asked him. "I've talked to people from there. Sure, it's a bit off-putting, but it's not something unpleasant."

"Eh, that accent was kind of a joke back where I'm from. Me and everybody would always make fun of it," Sorun answered as grabbed his bottle of cola. "I mean, that was kind of our thing, you know? Making fun of things that are different."

The reactions he got from both Mobians were not positive in the least. Sally looked taken back by the answer, and even Knuckles looked uncomfortable with what he said. It took Sorun a second of thought to realize why he'd gotten that reaction, and he grimaced once he realized the gravity of what he'd just said.

"Okay, yeah, maybe saying me and my friends made fun of things for being different to a species of animal people who had a race war with aggressive humans wasn't the greatest thing to say in hindsight. Think next time, dumbass." He took a nervous sip of his soda and cleared his throat. "But I mean, you know, Australians were- they were cool. Nothing wrong with having an accent." He tapped his fingernails against the glass. "I personally never had a problem with it. Not like I did with a French accent."

Sally froze. "F-French accent, huh?" She started to rapidly blink and nervously tap at the table. "What's wrong with that?"

"I don't know. I always thought it just sounded weird," Sorun said. "The weird pronunciations, the heavy emphasis on the letter z, you know, those things." He took another drink, and for some reason Sally was becoming more tense the more he talked. "But I mean, hey, Australian accent may have survived, but it looks like France got annihilated, so there's no way I'll ever hear-"

"Bonjour, mes amis! How is it zat we are doing today?"

The glass bottle held in Sorun's hand cracked when his grip tightened.

He could hear muffled laughter behind him from Knuckles covering his mouth with his gloves. Sally, who had chosen to wear a highly-forced smile, turned towards the source of the new voice in greeting. Sorun sat completely still in place, the cracked bottle thankfully still holding the liquid inside, but he paid it no mind as his face became completely blank and stared aimlessly forwards.

"I didn't hear that. Auditory hallucination or something. They put something in the soda that's making me sick. It's my immune system freaking out because I'm drinking alien liquids. That's all it is."

"Eh? Knuckles, what is ze matter? Did I miss the funny joke or something?"

The laughter behind him increased. "N-no, Antoine, you didn't miss anything. We were just talking with Sorun."

"He's talking to the hallucination, isn't he? Goddammit, it's real." The deepest breath Sorun had ever taken in his life entered and exited his lungs, and he gingerly set down the damaged bottle as he turned his head so slowly that he could feel the bones in his neck grinding against each other. And he could have sworn he heard it, too.

There was a third Mobian who had entered the kitchen and was standing on the other side of the table. And just like Knuckles, he couldn't tell what he was. Definitely-possibly-maybe a canine of some sort if the light shades of brown and the dog-like muzzle said anything. But for all he knew that didn't mean anything and it would turn out that he was a badger or something.

"He's more clothed than the rest," Sorun noted as he looked at the blue, military-esque jacket the newcomer worse. "A sword, too," he thought as he looked to the sheathed saber that hung off his side.

But absolutely none of that compared to the small mop of blonde hair that rested on top of his head, and for whatever reason Sorun had the urge to rip it off. He theorized that it was the stress of the situation giving him that urge.

"Sorun?" The new Mobian turned his head towards Sorun, who was currently chewing aggressively at his lips. "Ah, yes, ze newcomer to the Freedom Fighters! How is it that you are doing? It is very nice to be meeting you!"

"Somebody help," Sorun's thoughts cried out as he addressed swallowed the lump in his throat and gave a very stiff nod. "Yes. Hello. I am Sorun," he droned out. "Antoine, was it? You have an interesting accent." His head snapped to Sally. "His accent's really interesting , Sally," he said through grit teeth.

"His, uh... his family is from Mercia," she explained while looking away from Sorun. "Didn't you say that the part of Mercia your family is from mainly spoke French, Antoine?"

Sorun's eyes widened. "No , Sally, don't give him a reason to talk more-!"

"Ah, yes. My parents had been having the argument over which language for me to learn, so I ended up learning both from them. But apparently such a thing proved to not be easily as done as said, and the war made things difficult, and the two languages ended mixing together and being tossed around much like the salads that Bunnie keeps trying to force on me." So lost was he in his own thoughts that he didn't even notice Antoine slide over next to him and wrap an arm around his shoulder. "But such things are minutescule and not at all very important, non?"

His whole body was screaming at him to throw the French thing invading his personal space off, and as much as he wanted to, he wanted to build a good reputation with these people even more. So Sorun exerted as much control as he could muster and patted the Mobian on his back. "Yeah, man, what are language barrier between friends?" he mumbled, and then added, "Minuscule."

"Pardon?"

"It's minuscule, not minutescule," Sorun corrected. "Minuscule is the word you use when describing something small. Minutescule isn't a real word."

The Mobian standing right next to him blinked in surprise, and stood still at his words. For a moment, Sorun feared that he had said something wrong, but then light laughter began to leave to Mobian as he gave Sorun a friendly shake. "Look at zis one, already giving me grammar advice. And you all were so nervous over him. He isn't seeming like so bad a guy after all, especially for a human!"

Sorun slowly peeled himself out of the other's grasp and pushed his feet on the ground so that his chair would move away from him. "Yeah, you don't seem so bad either, for a... I wanna say wolf...?"

Antoine gave him a questioning glare, but then his eyes lit up with understanding along with his ears that stood up. "Oh, no, I am a coyote."

At that, Sorun's head impacted the table, and his arms flopped uselessly alongside it. "I give up," he muttered into the table. "Coyote, man? Seriously? How is that..." He turned his head so that a single eye could see Antoine. "... Actually, yeah, I can see it. Huh."

Maybe the problem was him after all in that he couldn't recognize what some of these people were species-wise. But then he was reminded about the echidna in the room, and thought to himself that, no, he wasn't at fault for not being able to tell who was what. It only made him feel marginally better.

"... Wait, what did he mean when he said you guys were nervous over me?" Sorun asked. He picked his head up and looked towards Sally. "What'd he mean?"

"Oh, you know, it's just you weren't the most, er, enthusiastic person when Sonic asked you to join us..." Her voice trailed off and she looked to the side. "By the way, I wanted to ask. What did Sonic say to you that changed your mind, anyways?"

"I don't want to talk about it."

"Oh, come on!" He felt Knuckles pat him on the back, and he almost angrily hissed at him in response. "What could he have done that was so bad?"

They weren't going to drop it. He could glean that much from the looks they all had in their eyes, and Sorun knew that if he didn't say anything, Sonic would eventually tell them. What he had to wonder was which was worse? They would probably laugh if he told them. But if they heard it from Sonic they'd know he was too embarrassed to tell them, and that could be even worse.

But they wouldn't actually laugh at him, right? They seemed too nice to do something like that. To do something like bruise his already rapidly-disintegrating ego. What was the worse that could happen?

So, taking a deep breath, Sorun decided to tell them. "I made a bet with Sonic. He said I'd have to join if I lost. The bet..." He finished the sentence, but his voice had tapered off so much that the others weren't able to hear it.

"Huh?" Knuckles leaned in closer. "Could you say that again?"

Sorun crossed his arms. "... Foot... speed..." His mumbling was still too quiet to hear.

The other two Mobians leaned in closer, too, with Sally requesting, "Could you please speak a little louder?"

The pale teen sighed, and then hung his head. "Sonic challenged me to a foot race."

A beat passed. All three of them had stunned looks of disbelief on their faces. The hope was that any minute now they would be giving him pitying looks and words of encouragement to help him not feel so bad.

What actually happened was that they all burst out into uproarious laughter. To Sorun, it felt like his very spirit left him, and he visibly deflated into his chair while his head continued to hang down.

"S-S-Sorun, don't feel too bad about it," Sally laughed as she wiped a tear out of her eye. "We're laughing with you, not at you."

"You know, it really doesn't feel like it."

"Ah, but who can blame us? Pfft-hah-ha!" Antoine was so amused that he was doubled over on the table and holding his head in his hand. "Challenging Sonic to ze foot race! It's the most hilarious thing I have heard all month! Just wait until I get home to tell Bunnie about it!"

Knuckles couldn't even speak he was laughing so hard, and it seemed to spur the other two into another laughing fit.

Sorun, who was having none of it, rose up off his chair. "Okay, I'm done for the day," he announced as he began to step around the table. "I'm gone, I'm out, I'm going to Sonic's house. If anybody needs me I'll be there."

"Sorun, wait!" He stopped, and then looked back towards Sally who was still barely containing her laughter. "C-come back here tomorrow, alright? We- we got something for you to do."

"Yeah, sure. I'll be here." He waved them all off, turned around, and walked as fast as he could towards the stair leading out of the HQ. It wasn't until he left entirely and shut the door behind him did he finally stop hearing the laughter. Even then he heard it being played in his head, and he couldn't help it when he leaned against the HQ's door for support as he tried to compose himself.

It took him a whole half an hour to finally recover from the embarrassment, and another fifteen minutes to find the willpower necessary to push himself off the door and walk back to Sonic's home.

A/N- Thank goodness that Sonic encyclopedia on the comic exists, because I've been checking that thing over like a crazy person so I don't get details wrong.

So yeah, these first few chapters have been really slow, I get it. But I got a lot of things planned for the future, and I need to build up a lot of momentum up so I can have a big impact later on in the story. But it'll pick up relatively soon.

Anyways, I didn't say it before, and I'm never gonna say it again, but if you somehow actually like this story then I always take reviews. Not that I'm trying to pressure anybody into reviewing so I can feel self-gratification or anything shallow like that, it's purely out of interest for people's thoughts on the story as well as critique.

Heh.

That all said, hope you enjoyed and see you whenever I decide to upload next.

Chapter 6

Recursion Error

Episode 6- The first day on the job

Sorun didn't really know what "Freedom Fighting" entailed when it came to being a member of the Freedom Fighters. He had enough context clues from all the conversations he had to make a rough gist of it: the big bad of this world, Dr. Eggman, would do something. This something would involve robots usually. The Freedom Fighters would fight those robots and/or help those affected by the maniacal schemes of Eggman.

He assumed at least, but it was a pretty good assumption. And he imagined there was other stuff involved, too, but he didn't know.

But he wasn't doing any of that right now, which suited Sorun just fine as it meant he didn't have to put his life on the line right now at the moment. No, he got the most glamorous job in all the universe today: guard duty. To "better help acclimate him to his life as a Freedom Fighter" and to "get some experience under his belt in a nice, easy manner to start with" and all other sorts of reasons they gave him to avoid saying "we don't really have anything for you to do since you're so useless".

He wouldn't even mind so much if he didn't know for a fact the kingdom had guardsmen that could do this job, and probably even do it better than him. But it was a relatively safe job for him, so he couldn't complain.

And the one chosen to escort him to this most prestigious of positions today? A walrus.

There wasn't much to say about Rotor, mostly because he'd been leading Sorun through town in relative silence. He was tall. Purple. More focused on carrying the... technological-whatever he was holding in his hand-claw fingers than on Sorun himself. He had a cool flight jacket, though, so there was that.

"Rotor, I've known you all of however many minutes we've been walking, and I've realized that I don't know a single thing about you," Sorun said, hands tucked loosely into his pockets as he walked next to the large Mobian. "These long, silent and awkward walks I've been having with everybody's been getting old, you know."

"I didn't know you wanted to talk," Rotor answered without even looking down at the human. "You don't really seem like the most sociable guy."

"I mean... I'm not," Sorun admitted, "but I'm still a person, you know? With feelings."

"Oh, trust me. Everybody saw your feelings when you screamed at Tails."

Sorun inhaled sharply, and then pursed his lips as a low hum rumbled in the back of his throat. "You know, Rotor, I don't know if you've ever been abducted before-"

"One time by a alien robot, yeah."

"I'm sorry I asked," Sorun spluttered. "Look, it was a really shocking experience for me, okay? They don't have things like going to other zones or aliens or killer robots or flipping Infinity Stones where I'm from."

"Ah. Sounds nice. Good for you. I hope you make it back to your peaceful life."

The human teen narrowed his eyes at the Mobian's bland tone. "You don't like me very much, do you, Rotor?"

"I don't dislike you, either. But what you did with Tails didn't set a good precedent."

That was fair, Sorun supposed, even if he didn't want to admit it. He'd made a lot of mistakes since coming here, but the "screaming at an eleven-year-old" blunder seemed to be the one hurting him the most. Some people seemed to understand him at least somewhat. Knuckles and Antoine hadn't brought it up. Sally and Sonic at least tried talking to him about it. Rotor was the first one to give him a cold shoulder over it, but again, he couldn't blame him for the passive-aggressiveness. Even if it did hurt his feelings the smallest amount.

It made him wonder what everybody else thought about it, and brought up the idea that maybe, just maybe, he should hurry up and talk to Tails so he didn't have to find out. And also to ease the mind of a child who was probably mentally eating himself alive because he thought he was directly responsible for ruining Sorun's life.

Well, he wasn't entirely wrong, but as long as he got back to Earth eventually it wouldn't be ruined. Greatly inconvenienced, perhaps, but not ruined.

"Here we are," Rotor announced as the two of them came to a stop. "This is a guard tower at the edge of Knothole City primarily used to monitor the distance for threats. You're gonna spend the whole day up there."

"Oh boy, Rotor," Sorun drawled as he looked up at the tower. "You don't even know how excited I am for this."

There wasn't much to say about it. It was a large guard tower held up by wooden supports with the only entrance being a wooden ladder underneath it. And in front of it? Green plains and trees for as far as the eye could see, which was pretty far considering it was the afternoon.

Looked fun.

"I'm glad you're excited. Here," Rotor said as he handed the large device he was carrying to Sorun. "This is yours for the day."

The device was dropped into his hands, and Sorun immediately went to work examining it. His first assumption was that it was some kind of rifle, but he honestly wasn't too sure. It had a grip and trigger that looked like it was made of piping. The main body and barrel looked like a metal tube, and there were a couple of panels missing that revealed a mess of wires and electronics on the inside. There was also a scope on top of it, but it was so large that it was practically a telescope.

It looked less like a rifle and more like a failed science project.

"Is this a gun?" Sorun questioned with raised eyebrows as he looked the weapon over. "I... Rotor, seriously, what is this?"

"That's a prototype personal infantry anti-Badnik weapon I designed a few years ago. It never really made it past the prototype stage," the walrus explained. "I had it lying around and thought, why not, you can get more use out of it than me."

"Ah-huh..." Sorun turned the gun over in his hand while squinting. "So is there a place to insert ammunition, or is it like a laser gun you have to charge or somethin'?"

"Oh, it doesn't fire," Rotor said, and Sorun nearly dropped the gun right there. "Freedom Fighters don't use guns. Sets a bad image of violence we try not to endorse. And these days the titanium plating on Eggman's robots are so tough that conventional ammunition doesn't really damage them anyways."

"So why am I holding this, then?"

"You're holding it because I modified the lenses on a old telescope I had and bolted it onto the frame of the weapon to use as a scope when I was making it. Just use it to keep an eye on the horizon."

Sorun slowly nodded, and then looked up at Rotor. "You couldn't have just given me binoculars?" he weakly asked. "I gotta haul this thing up that ladder."

Rotor shrugged. "Scope on that thing's way stronger than any pair of binoculars."

"Mm." He found that there was a strap on the weapon, and managed to sling the defunct gun over his shoulder before turning to grab the first rung on the ladder. "Welp. Guess I'll just go do that, then. You want this back when I'm done, or-?"

He turned his head to the walrus, but he had already turned around and began walking away.

"... I guess I'll just give it back when I'm done," Sorun decided, and then began climbing up the ladder towards the top of the guard post. "'Freedom Fighters don't use guns'... hell do they expect me to do then, punch the bulletproof robots?"

In hindsight, it was probably a good thing that Rotor had given him a gun that couldn't fire. Because he was at the point that he would have considered shooting himself to get out of the tedium that was doing this job.

There was absolutely nothing to do up in the guard tower but guard. It was quite literally just an empty wood box suspended in the air with chest-high walls and nothing else. Not even a chair for him to sit in. So what had he been doing for over an hour? He did his job and guarded by using the scope on the experimental gun to look out at the horizon.

But there was absolutely nothing. Nothing but wide open space, grass, and trees. He tried to pass time by looking at clouds but there were barely even any of those today. There was nothing. Nothing at all to draw his attention.

He wasn't bored to straight tears quite yet, but he was getting there.

"You know what would go a long way in making this place safe? Some damn walls," Sorun mumbled to himself. He had the gun propped up on the lookout box's wall, but he was so bored that at this point he wasn't even looking through the scope. "Seriously, Knothole doesn't have any walls. That's, like, fundamental defensive strategy number one or something in a kingdom. Make a wall that goes around the whole place. But nah, they don't got walls. Just a bunch of guard towers circling the place with poor fools like me to keep an eye out. And what am I even supposed to do if I see something? Climb down the tower and run all the way to the guards to tell them I saw something?"

A heavy sigh left him. "Maybe I'm overthinking the wall. We're fighting robots, right? And the only material out here they have in bulk is wood. Doubt a wall would do anything." He focused the scope on a nearby patch of grass. "It'd still be better than nothing, though. Just saying."

It probably said a lot that he was so bored he was having a full conversation with himself, but he was too bored to be at all concerned over it.

But something happened that fortunately dragged him out of his doldrums and made him straighten up in surprise. He heard the trapdoor to the guard box behind him open. So, while silently thanking the universe for a brief reprieve, Sorun turned around to the trap door to see who was coming up.

He went right back to cursing the universe when he saw it was a familiar fox Mobian sticking halfway through the door, staring right at Sorun.

"Oh holy hell I thought I was mentally prepared for this and I'm super not," Sorun thought, his breathing increasing to control his growing panic as he slowly set the prototype weapon against the short wall behind him.

This was long time coming. Even he could see that much considering how much everybody had been bugging him about it. And he agreed with them that, yes, he had to talk to Tails. But he hadn't seen it coming so sudden like this. He hadn't even taken to time to mentally rehearse what he was going to say to him!

"Well, he's here. Can't just ignore him now. Screw it, I'll wing it."

"Um... hi," Tails shyly greeted as he pulled himself up from the trapdoor, shutting it behind him. "Are you busy right now?"

Sorun glanced behind him at the nothingness stretching all the way to the horizon, and then glanced back at the fox. "Nah, not really," he answered.

"O-oh. Okay." He fidgeted with something he held in his hands. "I brought you this."

The human blinked in surprise. He hadn't expected anything, least of all a gift. His surprise only increased when he looked closer and saw that it was a glass of orange juice that he was offering him.

"... Orange juice?" He walked to Tails and slowly grabbed the glass from his hands. "You brought me orange juice?"

"It... the tablet said to." Tails turned his head away from Sorun. "It said you would appreciate it. Now seemed like a good time."

"That's... incredibly convenient and coincidental," Sorun noted, but nonetheless drank the orange juice. Speaking in a literal sense, it tasted fine. More than fine, really. Speaking from a metaphorical sense he didn't know if he'd ever drank anything more bitter in his life.

And the more he thought on it, the more Sorun realized that what Tails just said didn't make a lick of sense.

"Wait, the wood tablet? The thing that brought me here? It told you that I would like orange juice?" he asked. "You know, I've heard so much about this tablet, but I have yet to actually see the thing. What was actually on it that led you all to me?"

The ears on the fox's head perked up. "Oh, it was really weird. It had a really long string of numbers that took me a while to decipher, and when I did it became pretty clear what they were: coordinates. Specifically, coordinates that pointed directly to where your zone was in the multiverse, down to the exact spot where you found the portal. It was kinda scary, actually, how accurate and precise those numbers were, but everything about that tablet and how weirdly specific it was was weird."

"Ah-huh." Sorun took another drink of the orange juice. "Can I see it?"

"Uh... you can't. Sorry." Tails rubbed the back of his head. "It said we had to burn it after we deciphered the coordinates. It said it three times, actually. There's nothing left of it."

"Um. Okay then. Forget I asked." That sounded like the most suspicious thing in the universe, and left him with nothing but more questions. But he supposed that nothing could be done for it if it was already burned. "Do you at least know why it opened up in the middle of a random grocery store I just happened to be in at the time?"

Tails shook his head. "It just said to trust in the coordinates, and that the person on the other side would help us. That they would be a hero with a pure heart that would have the power to help us save the world. And with how bad things have been, we all really hoped that it would be true. That's why I was so desperate and pulled you."

"I see. Everybody's been saying how bad the war with Eggman's been, so I can see where you're coming from."

"Right." The yellow Mobian shifted his bright blue eyes down to his feet. "You know I'm really sorry for what I did, right?" he asked Sorun. "I... I didn't mean to pull you away from your life. I didn't want to drag you into our war. I just..." Sorun heard him quietly sniffle. "I just want all the fighting to finally be over."

Sighing deeply, Sorun pressed his backside to the short wall and slowly slid down to a sitting position. "I'm not good at this," he thought, "but I gotta say something."

"You know, it always bugged me," Sorun began, his voice causing Tails to look up. "People saying sorry all the time," he explained. "I never got it."

Tails looked up and tilted his head in confusion. "Huh?"

"Everybody always says it all the time for the littlest things. So much that saying sorry to somebody just feels cheap now. Sorry used to mean something, you know?" He patted the spot next to him and moved over, and Tails took it as a sign to walk up and sit in the spot next to Sorun. "Sorry's supposed to mean that you recognize you made a mistake, and that you'll make sure to correct it and never make the same mistake again," Sorun continued. "That's why it bugs me when people say it for little, inconsequential stuff. The right way to say sorry is this." He turned to Tails and softly flicked him on one of the three bangs of fur hanging off his head. "I'm sorry for snapping at you like that. I was really scared and upset. I'm fine now."

There was as much raw sincerity as he could humanly pack into that apology, and Sorun had even gone as far as to speak as softly as possible. He'd never been one to say sorry all that much in the entirety of his life, but even so, he felt that what he said just had to have the impact he was hoping it would have. Because while he was sincerely sorry for what he'd done, he just didn't know if he was physically capable of conveying that he was sorry.

But his words, much to his relief, seemed to do the trick. There was a cautious joy in behind Tails's eyes, and he had a small smile on his white muzzle so bright that Sorun could hardly stand it. "You really mean it?" he asked in a wavering voice. "You're not mad at us any more?"

Sorun pursed his lips and sighed through his nose. "Look, I... I'm still upset at this whole 'stuck in another zone' problem, but I've been here three days now and I'm calming down," he admitted, and Tails's smile lowered a little. "I'm never not going to be upset at it. Don't get me wrong, everybody here in Knothole seems like they're really great people and this whole war thing is really terrible, but if I had a choice between coming here and staying home I would have stayed home. That said... I don't blame you for pulling me in. Because things here seem really rough and I understand why you did what you did. So I can't blame you." He clicked his tongue. "I know this is a really bad apology, but it's the best I got."

"No, it's fine." Tails rubbed at one of the tufts of fur on his cheek. "This is actually a lot more than what I was expecting."

"Geez, I know I'm bad, but you don't gotta lay it on that thick."

A light chuckle from Tails. "I was just kidding. But really. Thanks."

Sorun mumbled incoherently, but managed to give the short Mobian a small nod. His head froze halfway in the nod though when he saw Tails leaning in dangerously close in what looked like a hug, and he held up a hand to stop him while scooting away a bit at the same time. "Let's, let's not," Sorun said. "Nothing against you. I'm just not, y'know, that touchy-feely."

"Oh. Sure." He looked slightly confused by what the black-haired teen said, but he nodded all the same, and the two of them stood back up. "Maybe we should just restart," he suggested. "My name is Miles Prower, but all my friends call me Tails."

"I'm Sorun," he greeted. "Tails, huh? Why do they call you that?"

He looked even more confused by that statement. "Uh... the tails?" he quietly answered as he gestured to his backside.

Sorun's eyes traveled down, and then widened when he saw not one, but two fox tails slowly swishing behind his backside. And then he had to mentally kick himself for not having noticed them earlier and putting together why he was named Tails.

"Dude, I'm not gonna lie. I didn't even notice those until you pointed them out," Sorun admitted, and Tails's mouth dropped open in disbelief. "But they're neat, I guess."

"Heh. Thanks." One of his tails moved in front of him, and he began to stroke it. "I've always been a bit self-conscious about them since nobody else has anything like 'em, but everybody's always been supportive over them, and they've helped me more times than I could count." He paused. "Well, technically I could count them since I remember all those time, but that'd take way too long."

Sorun rolled his eyes and snorted. "Real brainiac, huh?" he commented. "Actually, wait, you're the one that deciphered the coordinates that brought me here, right? And... I think Sonic even said that you developed the machine that made the portal?"

"Well, Chuck and Rotor helped out, but yeah, it was mainly me," Tails confirmed with a nod. "It wasn't so hard once you figure out the quasi-dimensional configuration of the-"

"Dude, how smart are you!?" Sorun gasped out. "I thought you were eleven!?"

Tails shrugged. "I've always been pretty smart." His eyes widened when he saw the way Sorun's shoulders slumped. "But don't feel so bad! Not everybody can be... you know, everybody's good at something! Just because I'm smarter than most people doesn't make me better! I can't run like Sonic, or lead like Sally, and a whole lot of other things, but-"

"Tails, it's too late. My self confidence is already gone." The pale teen leaned on the guard tower's wall and stared forlornly up at the ceiling. Tails reached out to him with a concerned expression, but he stopped when a small grin spread across Sorun's face as his body shook with light laughter. "I'm kiddin', man, don't worry about it," he said, and Tails chuckled along with him. "Seriously, though, I can't believe you're a genius and you're only eleven. Smartest thing I ever did was get an A in English class, which in of itself isn't really that great an accomplishment."

He turned around and rested his elbows on the wall as he stared out into the distance. He idly noted Tails step next to him, but didn't acknowledge him and kept staring forwards.

"Did you not do well in school?" he asked.

"Hey, no, I did decent," Sorun defended. "Straight B's and the occasional C isn't bad. And that one A averaged out the C's."

Tails hummed beside him. "I get it," he said. "Say, Sorun? What was your life like back in your zone?"

Sorun shrugged. "I mean, my life was pretty great until I got shanghaied into the global furry resistance from another universe," he admitted. "It was... average, I guess. I went to school, I had hobbies, I had friends. I only lived with my mom and didn't really have any other relatives, but it was still technically a family. It was a life. It wasn't a particularly exciting life, but it was mine. I was happy with it."

"Oh. I see." The suddenly nervous Mobian began to idly rub at one of his tails. "Did you have a lot of friends?"

The older teen's eyes squinted in thought. "To be honest, they were all less friends and more a lot of people at school I made jokes with and talked with. Nice folks, sure, but nobody I'd ever go out of my way to hang out with. Except David. He was cool. Kind of a know-it-all. I played video games with him." He looked down at Tails. "Sonic said that you all have been fighting Eggman for over a decade, right?"

"Right."

"So... you've been fighting him pretty much your whole life, huh, Tails?" It was a fact he only realized right there talking to Tails. And he'd just went on and practically bragged about having a quiet life to somebody who'd been in a war all their life. He felt embarrassed and uneasy. "That, uh... that sucks real bad, man."

Tails blinked, and his expression became unreadable as he began fiddling with his hands. "It hasn't been so bad," he said. "It's not like we ever fought Eggman all the time. There were quiet days. Quiet weeks, even. Sometimes even longer than that. And we've always had each other, so we were never alone. We helped each other through it all." He suddenly grew uncomfortable. "But it stopped being manageable when he got all the Chaos Emeralds," he said. "Everybody always says I shouldn't be anxious, but that's hard to do when I go out on missions and see the world outside getting worse and worse each time."

Humming in understanding, Sorun drummed his fingers along the top of the wall. "I don't really have anything to say to make you feel better," he mumbled. "Sorry."

"I thought you said not to use sorry so carelessly?" He felt a light punch on his side, and looked down to see Tails shooting him a teasing smile. "Just so you know, I think you're wrong about that," he said. "Just because people say sorry all the time doesn't make it any less meaningful. You don't have to act all awkward about apologizing all the time. You're really nice; I think everyone would like you more if you just opened up." He stepped forwards and pulled himself up to the top of the wall. "And Sorun? Don't worry too much. It looks bad now, but the Freedom Fighters will take care of everything. We always do. And we'll get you back home in no time." The fox gave Sorun a two-fingered salute, and- much to Sorun's confusion- his tails began to rotate. "I gotta go. Keep up the good work!"

It was around when Tails' tails began to rotate like a helicopter's rotor did Sorun begin to mentally check out. And when the fox jumped off the guard tower and began to fly away by using his tails like a helicopter, he needed to down the rest of his orange juice just so that he could set his mind straight.

"Oh, he can use his tails to fly. That's cool." Sorun gently set the empty glass on the ground next to him, but froze when a horrifying revelation hit him. "Christ, I'm starting to get desensitized to all this crazy shit."

Hours passed. Boredom mounted. Sorun prayed for death. Or at the very least a way out of this horrible guarding position.

Uneventful. That was the only way to describe how his day was going. Aside from the brief reprieve provided by Tails, absolutely nothing had happened his he was staring out of the watchtower. It was such a mindnumbing experience that Sorun was honestly shocked he hadn't fallen asleep at some point, and searched for any distraction in lieu of sleeping away the hours.

His desperation led him to staring at ants out in the distance through his telescope-scope.

"And we're off boys and girls, we're off," he quietly announced as he watched a sole ant carry a leaf three times its size up a tree. "Antony races up the tree carrying the largest payload in his whole life. He's looking to make his whole family happy tonight, but OH, big upset from Antony as he steps into the tree sap leaking out from that one spot on the tree!" Sorun hissed when he saw the ant and the leaf it was carrying become completely buried in the golden sap oozing out from the tree. "And he's down, folks, Antony is down and out. You hate to see it, but that amber gets the best of us at the worst of times." He sighed. "God, I'm bored."

Sorun yelped and fumbled with the prototype weapon in his hands. It nearly dropped out of his grasp, but he managed to lean forwards just in time to pull the gun close to him and cradle it safely to his chest. He breathed out a sigh of relief, and then set it down on the floor next to him as he angrily turned to the new voice that addressed him.

His anger quickly began to fade away into worry when he saw a black hedgehog with red stripes leaning on one of the tower's corners, arms crossed and crimson eyes affixed right on Sorun. He still had that scowl on his face.

"Guess this is happening now," Sorun mumbled to himself before clearing his throat. "Hey, how's it going? Shadow, right? I'm-"

"Completely worthless."

Sorun paused, and then let a slow breath out as he leaned back and rested his elbows on the wall behind him. "We seriously are doing this, huh? Okay." He closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and opened them up to the dark hedgehog. "I've gotten some pretty cold greetings, but you're the first guy that went out of his way to straight-up say what's on everyone's mind."

"I'm not surprised everybody has been dancing around the issue," Shadow stated. "Nobody wants to admit they wasted all of the Chaos Emeralds we gathered on a useless waste of space like you."

"You're preachin' to the choir, pal," Sorun remarked with a roll of his eyes. "You seriously come all this way to insult me?"

"Of course not. I have better things to do than waste my time berating you."

"And yet here you are. Being an asshole and berating me."

The dark Mobian flinched, and then turned his head away. "You always use that kind of language around people?" he asked.

"Oh, dude, I've been holding myself back really hard in front of people to keep up with appearances and because it sounds like nobody talks like that here." The human crossed one leg over the over. "And boy, lemme tell ya. It's been a struggle. 'Cause I'm pissed, Shadow. I've been pissed out of my mind at everybody since day one here." He held his index finger up. "But here's the thing. Most everybody has been super supportive of me and I'm getting used to things here, so I've been getting better. But then this dick with stupid stripes comes up and starts telling me I'm worthless, something I'm already fully aware of, and it doesn't help that he was one of the people who decided to bring me here, so I don't really feel like censoring myself around-"

"I didn't decide anything," Shadow snapped at him. "For your information, I was the only one who knew that wasting all of the Emeralds on you was a foolish mistake. But they decided to make the decision a democracy, so any complaint I raised was ignored."

The single finger Sorun held up went limp. "I see." His hand flopped to the side, and his blue eyes slowly rolled away from Shadow. "You must be feeling pretty good about yourself, then, huh?"

All this statement seemed to do was make Shadow angrier based on how his face wrinkled. "No. As a matter of fact, I'm not. I'm not happy that I was right about that tablet being a waste of time. I'm not happy we threw the one advantage we've had over Dr. Robotnik in months away." He shot the human teen a pointed glare. "I'm certainly not happy we have to deal with you on top of everything else."

While a heated argument carried on below, an individual lying flat on his back on the roof of the guard tower was forced to listen to every word being spat back and forth. This figure was covered completely in a red cloak save for their human hands, which currently held a long sword with a broad blade.

The cloaked man's main focus was using the reflection on the sword to examine his teeth on a face that was otherwise shrouded by his red hood.

"Damn, this is boring," he thought as he used one of his fingers to pick at a tooth.

"Yeah, Shadow, I get it. I'm useless. I'm the last person in the whole world you need to remind. What the hell is your deal, anyways?"

"My 'deal' is that you infuriate me, human."

"Oh, wouldn't have guessed!" Sorun's voice grew intensely scathing. "Here I was thinking you trying to murder me by staring at me was a gesture of friendship. You know how uncomfortable it was making that speech when you kept looking at me like that the whole time?"

"You being a liability as you so eloquently put it is only part of the reason I find your existence irritating," Shadow coldly stated. "My frustration in you stems from the fact that you're aware you're useless and refuse to do anything about it. You've spent your entire time here complaining about your situation instead of actually trying to become useful."

"What the- dude, it's been three days! And what the hell do you think I'm doing right now!?" There was the sound of something metal being shaken. "And what, what do you expect me to do, huh? What, I'm supposed to find somebody to train me to fight? That it?"

"It would certainly be a step in the right direction. I believe there's somebody in the Freedom Fighters with extensive training in martial arts."

"Oh, so I'm supposed to learn how to kung-fu the bulletproof robots with my bare hands?" There wasn't a response from Shadow, causing an exasperated breath to leave Sorun. "I don't even know how you people do it. You don't use guns, so how do the people without powers like Sonic even fight robots?"

"... Mobians have superior physical capabilities to humans," Shadow reluctantly admitted. "Even Mobian children are vastly stronger than adult humans. The only reason humans even manage to compete with them is because they primarily use guns. Unfortunately, they're ineffective on Eggman's Badniks."

"Okay, newsflash Shadow: maybe a Mobian can punch a robot to death, but if I try it I'm just gonna break my hand off!"

There was an inaudible sigh from the figure cloaked in red, and he silently turned onto his side in a resting position as he tried to fight off sleep from the boredom.

"Look, what do you want from me?" Sorun threw his hands up in frustration. "I'm doing my best here."

"Are you?" Shadow questioned him. "Have you really been exploring every possible way you could provide even an iota of assistance to the Freedom Fighters instead of complaining? You don't think you're at least slightly obligated-"

"Obligated? Obligated!?" The human teen felt outrage at that statement. "You know what? You're right. Problem's me. I'm sorry I'm up here doing a job that, let's be honest, anybody else could do but at least it's something for me to do instead of nothing. I'm sorry I chose to join the Freedom Fighters when, let's face it, I don't belong with them! I'm sorry I'm a normal human and can't fight like a Mobian! I'm sorry I was minding my own business before I got dragged into some other universe's war!"

He really thought he'd buried these issues finally, but Shadow's words dug them right back up and now they were all he could think of. And along with that came all the anger he'd thought he'd finally worked through to some degree, all brought back through this argument. It was enough to make him want to throw the useless weapon he held at Shadow, but he grit his teeth and kept a firm hold on the gun.

But at the very least, something he said got to Shadow. He still looked as angry as when he'd arrived, but his eyes widened the slightest amount and his mouth clamped shut. They stood across from each other in silence, Sorun breathing noticeably heavier while Shadow was still enough that Sorun would have confused him for a statue if he didn't know any better.

And then the dark hedgehog simply pushed himself off the corner he was leaning on and crouched down to open the floor's trapdoor. "Just so you know," he said, "I actually did have a reason for coming here. You're relieved of your duties for today. And Rotor said he wanted you to deliver his prototype weapon back to him."

There was a loud scoff from Sorun. "You couldn't have lead with that?" he asked while shaking his head. "Sure. I'll go back to the HQ and drop it off."

Shadow simply grunted and swung his legs over the open trapdoor, and then stopped. "... Sorun."

"What?" he tersely replied.

"Nobody ever said you had to fight with your bare hands." He dropped out of the guard tower right after saying this without even bothering to take the ladder.

Sorun felt a bit alarmed when he saw the Mobian simply drop down, but when he looked over the edge, he saw that Shadow was walking away from the tower without even so much as a limp. "What was that all about? I don't have to use... actually, didn't Antoine have a sword? Guns aren't fine, but I guess weapons are fine if he gets to use a sword. So I should... use a weapon?" Sorun blinked in surprise. "There's an idea... Wait, was- was that him giving me advice?"

He looked again, but Shadow had already disappeared from sight. Sorun rolled his eyes, slung the defective gun over his torso, grabbed his empty glass, and began descending the ladder. "Okay, maybe he ain't as bad as I thought. Still a bit of a dick, though."

The teen's feet touched the ground, and every step he took away from the guard tower felt more and more liberating. There was a moment where, after walking a large distance away, he felt a strange sensation like somebody watching him, but when he looked back all he saw was the empty guard tower.

Sorun shrugged and turned back around, his mind stuck between the idea of the weapon suggestion and thinking about how bad he wanted to crash into his bed and sleep.

Chapter 7

Recursion Error

Episode 7- Glove culture sucks

"You want a stun baton?"

"Stun baton. Electric truncheon. Zap rod. Something along those lines." Sorun shrugged his shoulders. "Tails, there's only so many different ways I can say I want a stick that shocks things. I'm runnin' outta nouns here."

It wasn't like it was the most selfish request in the world. Maybe him rushing into Freedom HQ and ambushing Tails while he was in the kitchen eating a sandwich wasn't the most tactful way he could have gone about this, but on the other hand there weren't many better ways of going about and asking something like this.

He wanted that weapon, though. He really wanted it.

Tails blinked at his request in surprise, and then slowly set the half-eaten sandwich down on a plate in front of him as he gave the human his full attention. "Why do you want something like that?"

Leaning back in the chair he'd pulled up next to Tails' chair, Sorun pointed a finger at the young fox. "Lemme ask you something, Tails. You fight Eggman's robots, right?"

"That's... correct...?"

"And you're actually out there personally destroying them?"

The yellow Mobian slowly nodded. "When the situation calls for it, yes," he said. "I usually bash them to pieces with my tails or spin into them to destroy them."

"Okay, see, this is where my point lies." Sorun propped both his elbows on the table and leaned in closer. "You're eleven. Still growing. But you can destroy robots just by hitting them since you're a Mobian." He stuck his thumbs out at himself. "I'm sixteen. Technically not fully mature, but speaking in practical terms I'm pretty close, so the difference is negligible. But I'm a human, Tails, so if I try hitting a robot I'm gonna break something. You see where I'm going with this?"

Tails hummed in understanding. "I'd heard humans and Overlanders weren't as physically apt as Mobians, but I didn't know it was this bad. You really can't-?"

"Tails, it's hard enough admitting an eleven-year-old is however many times stronger than me. Don't make me go into further detail with this."

The younger between the two raised his gloved hands in defense. "Okay, okay, I get it." He drummed his fingers along the table in thought. "Why a stun baton?"

"'Cause they're robots, right? So I figured, y'know, robots are weak to electricity, so I could go with that."

"Where did you get the idea that robots are weak to electricity?"

Sorun opened his mouth to answer, closed it, then turned to avoid Tails' gaze. "... Video games," he admitted.

The answer elicited a sigh from the fox, followed by him rubbing at his forehead. "I hate to tell you this, but Eggman uses EMP shielding on all of his creations. That's electro-"

"Electromagnetic pulse, yeah, I know what EMP stands for." Sorun looked back to Tails. "So electrical-anything won't work on Badniks?"

He shook his head. "Nope. Sorry."

"Dang." Certainly not the answer he would have wanted to hear. He'd had great plans for that stun baton. "Well, you gotta give me something, man. I'm gonna get creamed if I go out there with nothing. I'd personally just like a gun, but Rotor's running his weird anti-gun policy and apparently they're useless against robots, so I need something I can swing."

"Normal ballistics, yeah, but energy-based projectiles and heavy munitions work fine against them." Sorun would have words with Rotor if he got the chance. "Where did you even get the idea for using a weapon?" Tails asked him.

"Uh... someone pointed out using a weapon, and I noticed that Antoine had a sword," Sorun answered, "so I thought, 'why not just get a weapon?'"

"So get a sword like Antoine's," Tails suggested. "He cuts apart Badniks like nothing with it."

Sorun's eyes widened when he heard that. He'd seen the sword, sure, but he hadn't pegged him as the kind of person that would be going around cutting robots in half with a sword. That alone made his respect for the coyote raise a little, even if he did speak butchered French. He didn't even think it was possible to cut titanium-plated robots apart with a normal sword, but apparently in Mobian hands it was possible.

Unfortunately, his hands were human and rather frail in comparison.

"I'd love a sword, Tails, but I'm not Antoine. Any blade I swing is just gonna bounce off a robot's chassis because of my weak human muscles."

"Oh, yeah." The fox rubbed inquisitively at his chin. "A hammer? One of the Freedom Fighters, Amy, uses a hammer. You could have her help you."

With a frown, Sorun's eyes traveled down to his arms. His rather unimpressive arms that were thin even by human standards. His arms that looked like they didn't even have any muscles. And try as he might, he couldn't see these arms holding a hammer of any kind.

"... Tails, I'm not even that strong compared to other humans," he admitted, "so I think we can cross off anything that needs more than one hand to hold. Anything bladed won't work, either, so it needs to be blunt. Hey, you know what fits in that criteria? A stun baton!"

"Electricity still won't do anything to Badniks," Tails reminded him.

"Okay, fine, normal baton then." He clasped his hands together in a pleading gesture. "I know asking you to make me something after all the terrible things I did makes me look really low, but I wouldn't be asking if I didn't need it. And I really need it."

Tails sent him a look of understanding and smiled. "It's okay, Sorun. I understand. I'll see what I can do."

Relief flooded the human. "Great, man. Thanks." He gave the Mobian a thumbs-up as the other returned to his sandwich. Sorun chose that time to get out of the chair he was in and exit the HQ's kitchen.

He felt a little disappointed that he wasn't able to get the stun baton, but the normal baton was better than nothing. His main worry was that he would still amount to nothing even with the baton, because there were large doubts in his mind that hitting titanium-plated robots with a stick was much better than hitting them with his hands.

At the very least, it was better than nothing. He just didn't know how far above nothing it was. But maybe Tails would pull through for him and give him something he could actually use. He wasn't completely sure on entrusting his survival to an eleven-year-old, either, but at the same time that eleven-year-old could do things Sorun couldn't even dream of doing himself along with everybody else around him, so he wasn't one to nitpick.

"But man, would my life be easier if they would just let me use a gun," Sorun thought. "'Freedom Fighters don't use-' I'm so tilted at that statement. I'm technically not even a real Freedom Fighter. I'm a temp if anything. And I'm putting my life on the line here, so the least they could do is give me a decent advantage so I don't have to ask a kid to make me a stick!"

It genuinely angered him, and Tails telling him there were ranged weapons that worked against Badniks only made him madder. And he doubted he could ever convince Rotor to change his mind, considering he wasn't on the best standing with him. Even if he apologized to Tails, at best that made him neutral in his book.

On the other hand, Sally, who Sorun saw walking past him as he made his way through the HQ's main room, should have been rather high in that book. And all of a sudden the possibility of getting a gun didn't seem to be an impossibility.

"Hey, yo, Sally Sally Sally." Sorun bolted right in front of the Mobian, and his sudden appearance had startled her enough to make her jump in surprise. "Look, could you talk to Rotor? We were talking yesterday and he brought up this whole 'guns are bad' argument. Is that a real thing? No guns in the Freedom Fighters?"

The other teen calmed down quickly from her surprise and affixed him with a questioning look in response to Sorun's question. "Why do you want a gun?" she asked.

"... You've seen me, right?" He looked down at himself and gestured to his body. "I'm a human. I'm squishy and fragile."

"You know Mobians are flesh and blood just like humans, right?" She gave him a wry grin. "We're squishy, too."

"Yeah, but do you know what you all have that I don't? The ability to destroy a robot without your body exploding because it evolved to handle that kind of stress." He flipped a hand up before it flopped down to his side. "Not all of us evolved from gene bomb soup, you know, which I'm pretty sure is the only reason you're all able to do this stuff."

Her eyes squinted in confusion, and then slowly opened wide as realization dawned on her. "Oh, I think I seem the problem," she mumbled as she grasped at her chin in thought. "Right. Humans aren't very strong."

"I'm right here, you know."

Sally shushed him and held up her free hand. A few seconds passed as she thought, and then she slowly sighed as she lowered her hands. "So what's your plan?"

"My plan is that I asked Tails to make me a baton, but these are titanium robots we're talking about, Sally. They could be made of aluminum foil and I'd still be too weak to take them on."

She gave him a skeptical look. "Really?"

"... Okay, fine, even I could take on aluminum foil robots, but they're not, Sally. They're titanium."

"Yeah, and those are just the weaker ones," she informed him. "But Rotor's right. The Freedom Fighters don't use guns. I realize you're a bit nervous-"

"I'm scared to death, Sally."

" I get it , but we can't make an exception." She gave him a sympathetic look. "I'm sorry, really. But we can't."

Sorun groaned, and then ran his hands over his eyes. "But why? You're seriously not going to let me use a gun because of some arbitrary no-gun rule?" His voice grew an octave deeper. "'Oh, the Freedom Fighters can't be seen using guns. No sirree.' It's stupid," he complained with his normal voice.

"That's not- it's complicated, okay?" Sally closed her eyes and held a hand up to her forehead. "There's a general dislike of guns and similar ranged weaponry among the Mobian populace," she explained to him. "It's mostly from the Great War with the Overlanders. You wouldn't believe how much heavy artillery they used. They had all their soldiers use guns. I only heard stories, but it sounded awful."

"Uh... yeah." She must have been expected some reaction from him, because when Sally opened her eyes she looked surprised at Sorun's nonplussed face. "War was fought the same way where I'm from," he said. "Armies fought by shooting each other and blowing each other up. Not necessarily in that order."

She blinked in shock at him. "Why are your people so drawn to fighting with guns?"

"'Cause it's easy. And they do a lotta damage." After saying this, Sorun spluttered and waved his hands above his head.. "What do you want from me? You point and shoot, enemy goes down. It's a million times more efficient than fighting hand-to-hand, and I'm not surprised the Overlanders took the gun route considering they were fighting a whole race of animal people that could evidently bend them into pretzels!" He coughed and turned his head to the side after Sally crossed her arms and gave him a perturbed look. "But, uh... I guess lotta Mobians got gunned down in that war, huh?"

She stiffly nodded. "Yes. A lot."

Maybe bragging about how great is whole race thought guns were wasn't the wisest argument for him to make in his defense, and it was only now that Sorun realized it. And now an unsettled feeling was beginning to grow in his gut as he saw that downcast expression Sally held.

He cleared his throat and turned back to her. "You know I'm not condoning the wholesale slaughter of Mobians or anything like that, right? I'm, uh... I'm just saying. Guns. They're really effective."

"I know, Sorun. I'm not upset at you or anything." She didn't sound too convincing from the shaky breath she took. "Mobians don't like guns because of the Overlanders," she said with a flat expression. "That isn't to say they're banned outright. In fact, there were a few select Mobians during the war that stole Overlander weapons to use against them, and even some to this day that use guns based on their designs, but Mobians like that are few and far between. Guns generally invoke negative responses among Mobians, partly due to the trauma they inflicted in that war, and mainly because they're seen as weapons that are, well... dishonest to use. Cheap. Cheating, you could say."

Sorun shook his head in disbelief. "What the- Sally, you can't cheat in war -"

"I know, but that's not how the people see it," she interrupted, and then sighed. "Look, bottom line is that the Freedom Fighters are more than a ragtag group of rebels, despite appearances," she added when she saw Sorun raise an eyebrow. "We're a symbol of hope and freedom for the people. What does it look like when we start using weapons everybody is afraid of? That we have to resort to those things? The people start losing hope and trust in us, and what are we supposed to do if it grows to the point they don't want us to save them? What then?"

The human teen blew air out of his nose and rubbed the back of his head. "I mean... I guess you're right," he conceded, "and I get that normal guns don't really do much to robots anyways, but wouldn't it be a bit easier on you all if at least a few people used energy weapons or something?"

She shot down his idea with a shake of her head. "They're too similar to guns, and weapons like those aren't easily manufactured," Sally explained. "I know it might be frustrating from your perspective, Sorun, but please try to understand our position."

He wanted to argue the point more, but he couldn't find it in himself to do so. Because he actually understood the argument she was making, and while he still thought it was extremely foolish to not use guns, he did understand where they were coming from. That and the pleading look she was sending him made him hesitate in even trying to think of a way to counter her argument, and in the end he ended up making a long, drawn-out groan while throwing his head back.

"Fine. Fine, I'll drop the whole gun thing," Sorun said.

A relieved smile spread across Sally's face, and she gave him a thankful nod. "Thank you, Sorun. And don't worry too much; I'm sure the baton idea will turn out to be great."

"Guess we'll see. Here's hoping."

"Hah, yeah... Hey, Sorun?" Her eyes had wandered down to his torso, and Sorun saw that her nose briefly wrinkled. "How long have you been wearing those clothes?"

He felt his body tense up. "I didn't exactly have a spare set of clothes on me when I got dragged here," he said, "so I haven't been able to wash my clothes because I wouldn't have anything else to wear in the meantime. I tried showering with my clothes on, but it- it just didn't work, Sally. You ever try walking around with wet socks? It's the worst feeling in the world."

There'd been an unbearable amount of disappointment, too, when his "wash his clothes with him in it" idea didn't pan out. Because his clothes were starting to become rank, and it was a problem he was rapidly running out of solutions to. And now somebody had noticed, the one thing he had been most afraid of. And the worst part, which he just now realized, was that everybody probably had a stronger sense of smell than he did due to being evolved animal people.

He really hoped he was wrong in that theory, but Sally taking a step back away from him wasn't a good sign.

"Oh man, this is super embarrassing..." Sorun thought, and then unconsciously brushed some of his hair in front of his face to try and hide his expression from Sally.

"Well, um... oh!" Sally's eyes lit up. "That could work. Hang on a second."

Her hand reached into the inside of her blue vest as she began to search for something. Curiosity briefly crossed Sorun's mind, but grew too skittish to look closer when he remembered that she worse nothing but that open vest on her torso. So he made a light cough and looked away.

"Around a month ago Eggman burned down a fairly populated village near Knothole. We managed to evacuate everybody, thankfully, but the kingdom had to take them all in since they had nowhere else to go," Sally explained as she continued to dig around in her vest. "One of the Mobians that moved into the city was a cat named Honey. She's a tailor. A, uh... bit eccentric, but she's honestly talented in her trade."

"Okay...?" Sorun slowly turned to look at Sally, but his head snapped back away when he saw her still looking inside her vest.

"I don't think you're going to find a lot of places that will sell clothing that can fit you, even if you are around our size. But she does custom work for clients, so maybe she could help you out. Oh, here it is." She pulled out a small drawstring bag as Sorun looked back, and she lightly tossed it to him. Sorun's hand shot up to catch it, and experimentally shook it to get a feel what was inside. He felt the sensation of many small, circular objects rattling around inside the bag.

"Is this... this is money?" he asked.

Sally nodded. "Mobiums," she clarified. "We get donations from the royal dowry, so I'll just write it off as an expense for the Freedom Fighters. Don't worry too much about it and just get yourself some clothes, alright?"

Sorun blinked at the bag, and then tilted his head up to Sally. "Are you sure? 'Cause this seems like a lot and-"

"Freedom Fighters expenditure," she reiterated. "You're one of us now. You need more than a single set of clothes. It's completely fine." She stepped past him. "I've got something important to do, so you'll have to find her shop yourself. Just ask around the city and you'll find it in no time."

He didn't even get a chance to say anything in return before she disappeared out of sight through a door, which left Sorun standing alone in the middle of Freedom HQ dumbly staring at the wall with a bag of money held in his hand.

"Getting pity money from a princess for clothes. Not even a week into this world and I've already hit rock bottom." His eyes didn't stop staring ahead as he pocketed the bag of money. "Tch. 'Mobiums'. I really am in hell."

It took some doing, but he finally had found that tailor shop. It had taken a half hour of asking anybody who didn't give him odd looks and wandering around aimlessly after he reached Knothole City, but he finally found the place.

There wasn't much to say about the outside. It was a large, wooden structure like most other buildings and houses in the kingdom. What was different was the large display window out front with wooden mannequins displaying articles of clothing. The large sign above the door that said "Honey's" in large, stylized golden letters was also a big hint for him.

"Eccentric, huh?" Sorun muttered under his breath. "Oh, what have you gotten me into, Sally?"

He had a lot of reservations about the place on first glance, but he did need those clothes, and Sally had made it sound like this was his best bet. So the pale teen had taken a deep breath and walked through the front door before he could have second thoughts.

The first thing he noticed was the small chime he heard from the bell above the door he walked through. The second thing he noticed as the door swung behind was how distinctly vibrant the inside of the shop was: pink carpeting, yellow wallpaper with orange stripes, bright lighting, and a wide plethora of clothes packed on shelves all around the shop. Shoes, shirt, dresses and other clothing items of various styles and colors practically littered the place, and all of that was just what he saw upon entering the place.

It was all so colorful that he almost felt as ill as when he first entered Mobius, and had to rub at his eyes to sooth them.

"I-is someone there?" he heard a female voice call out. "Just a minute, please!"

Sorun's ears perked up, and he looked towards the sound of the voice to find a counter at the rightmost side of the shop, next to the door he just entered through. He could vaguely see a figure hunched over and a long tail waving in the air above it as the figure rummaged around on the ground for something. Sorun chose to remain quiet and patiently waited.

"Now where did I put... oh, forget it," the figure huffed before standing upright. A yellow-furred cat with black hair smiled widely at him before spreading he arms out to her side. "Welcome dear and valued customer to my humble-!"

She stopped dead when she saw that it was a human standing in front of her. All Sorun could manage was a small wave.

"... Oh, I know you!" The cat's golden eyes widened in realization. "You're that human that everybody in town has been talking about! The one that joined the Freedom Fighters!"

"Yep, that's me," Sorun confirmed with a nod. "Yo. I'm Sorun."

"Sorun. Sorun, Sorun, Sorun..." She tested the name a few times before smiling brightly and hopping over the counter and landing right in front of him. "Well, Sorun, welcome to my humble boutique! What brings you here?"

So far it seemed to be going good. A bit more energetic than he expected, but otherwise Honey just seemed like a normal person. It was enough to give the human a bit more confidence in what he was doing, and the smallest of smiles began to form as he explained himself. "Well, I only have a single set of clothes on me, and Sally, er, the princess said that you were a tailor that could-"

"Tailor...?"

The teen stopped right there when she hissed that word out. It was a word uttered with such contempt that Sorun was nearly floored by the hostility in her voice, and her face changed to match her tone.

"So that's what I am now, huh? Just a humble little tailor?" The yellow cat in a red dress turned around and gripped the counter behind her. "I've really gone so low as to be called a tailor, huh?"

The air around Sorun began to grow heavy, and he reached a nervous hand out at Honey. "Uh-"

But then her grip on the counter increased so much that the wood splintered, and in the same instance she turned back around to face him with fiery eyes and a snarling face.

"I'm a fashionista, you hear me!? A bona fide fashionista!" she screeched at him, causing Sorun to take several steps back in fear. "People from all around the whole continent used to come to me for my high-quality product! But then that vile, evil, reprehensible, horrid, no-good Dr. Eggman had to go and ruin everything and burn down all those poor people's homes and ruin my business!"

"She's nuts! This lady's nuts!"

"You understand, right!?" She zoomed right in front of Sorun, hands clasped together with comically sized tears pouring down her face. "To be torn away from the only world you ever knew? To have the life you made with sweat and tears be ruined and to be reduced to nothing more than a glorified tailor? You understand me, don't you, Sorun?"

"... A little bit?" He honestly just wanted to leave, but he was too afraid of what she would do if he tried. "Dude, I-I just wanted some extra clothes."

Honey's whole body perked right up, and her face snapped right back into the happy visage it had been prior. There wasn't even any evidence that she had been crying, which left Sorun absolutely stupefied. "Some clothes, huh?" She started to scratch at her chin, and a devious smirk began to grow on her face as her tail slowly swished behind her. "... Yeah. Yeah, that can work." She stepped closer to Sorun, much to his silent protest. "You're a Freedom Fighter, Sorun. You're out there fighting for the planet and representing the people, right?"

"I, uh, haven't done anything like that yet technically, but I, um, plan to?" he answered in an unsure voice. "Where're you goin' with this?"

"'Honey' was a well-known name in the fashion industry before my business was burned to the ground, Sorun. But now with the war and everybody being so anxious over Eggman every single day nobody could ever possibly care about branding. But you!" Her tragic tone turned near-manic in its excitement as she pointed to Sorun. "You're out there fighting and making a name for yourself."

"I'm really not-"

"Details!" She waved his denials right off. "What matters is that you're a Freedom Fighter. More than that, you're a human Freedom Fighter. That's never existed before, which means in time people will be talking. Paying attention. Freedom Fighters like Sonic are already known heroes around the world for what they do in the fight against Eggman, but you? You're unique. A bit bland, maybe. Not very strong-looking if I'm being brutally honest. But unique."

A spike of irritation shot through Sorun. "Hey-"

"No other Freedom Fighters wear my brand. You'd be the first," she interrupted, and then affixed him with a serious look. "So here's what I'm offering: not only do you wear my clothes, but you wear nothing but any clothes I make for you."

Understanding soon began to dawn on the black-haired teen. "You want me to advertise for you?" he asked in a flat tone. "Really?"

"Really," she echoed with a nod. "I mean, are you kidding? A Freedom Fighter going around the world, fighting in front of the people's eyes? You couldn't pay for better advertising. And the fact that you're a human? Even better. It gives me a chance to develop my technique past Mobian clothing, but more importantly it gets other humans to take notice. Could you imagine how lucrative it would be for me if I got into the human side of the fashion industry? They're usually so closed off to Mobians, but at the very least if I could gain a foothold in Station Square my reputation would soar ."

At this point Sorun was completely lost. "Isn't the world being dominated by Eggman, though?" he weakly asked. "I really don't think anybody is gonna care... t-the whole world is under siege, you crazy cat lady."

She didn't even looked fazed by the insult. "You're all fighting for the world's freedom, aren't you? The current status quo isn't permanent." She waved her hand from side-to-side. "Admittedly this is all long-term talk, for sure, but when it pays off, and it will pay off, it'll be more than worth it." She pointed at Sorun with a smirk. "And it's not like you wouldn't get anything out of this," she added. "After all, I wouldn't dream of asking all this from you for absolutely nothing! I can easily offer you an extensive discount on all my apparel, and I would even go as far as to put any orders by you on the top of my priority list!" The cat fluttered her eyes and pressed a finger against her cheek.

"But let's be honest, here. The fact you're getting such quality clothing alone should be enough; the rest is just icing on the cake. So what do you say?"

Crazy, conceited cat lady aside, the offer was tempting. Becoming what he would personally consider a sellout didn't sound appealing at all, if he was being completely honest. But going back to Sally or anybody else and asking for money if he ever needed more clothes was even less appealing with that, Freedom Fighter expenses be damned. His dignity may have been beaten and battered the whole time he'd been on Mobius, but he'd at least try to save as many shreds as he could.

Above that, making a deal with Honey could have benefits in the long run. She had to be talented; the clothes scattered all around the store actually did seem high-quality to Sorun's eyes, and in such variety, too. By all accounts, she was the real deal. Certainly had the attitude to back it up. And it wasn't like he lost anything but a bit of self respect for saying yes. And cheap clothes did sound rather appealing.

"Alright, Honey. Sure. I'll take that deal." He stuck his index finger out at her. "But no modeling. I draw the line at modeling."

"Aw." She pouted at him in response, but it was quickly wiped away into a smile when Sorun's expression didn't change. "No problem. A deal it is, then!"

They shook hands on it. Sorun couldn't help but feel like he was shaking hands with a devil. The smirk she wore the whole time they were shaking didn't alleviate him of these thoughts in the slightest.

No sooner did he do the equivalent of sign his soul away than was Sorun dragged further into the boutique by Honey, and all the while Sorun could genuinely say that he feared for his life.

"First things first: We're burning those clothes," Honey said as she continued leading him. "Starting right now you wear nothing that wasn't made by me."

"Hold on, hold on!" Sorun dug his feet into the ground and pulled his hand away from the cat. "Look, I don't got a lot on me from back home but these clothes. I don't mind if you make me wear anything else, but do we really gotta burn them? And, uh... think we could, you know, keep the color scheme? Maybe?"

The red-dressed Mobian turned around and gave his clothes a scrutinizing glare. "Do what you want with them as long as you don't wear them. As for the color..." Her eyes went up to Sorun's face. "Eh... I don't normally do black and blue combinations- they blend too easy in my opinion. But it matches your hair and eyes, so we can make it work."

Sorun silently cheered on the inside. It was the small victories that really mattered.

"Now," she continued as she began dragging him again, "believe it or not there actually are a few prototype pieces I worked on that are about your size. I made them during a... we'll call it an experimental phase I had. I want your opinion on them moving forwards."

"That's... fine, I think?"

Whether it actually was fine or not he didn't know, because she didn't answer him. Instead she pulled him into what looked like a well-lit storage room full or more wooden mannequins stuffed in glass cases, each with various pieces of clothes on them. "This," Honey announced with a wave of her hand, "is where dreams come to die. Unless I change my mind and come back, in which case they come to life. But otherwise this is where I put my experimental pieces. So let's get lookin'!"

"What do you think of this piece?"

"You serious? I'm not wearing this!" The clothing piece on the mannequin he was staring at quite literally looked like three jackets sewn together into a single jacket, with a fourth one hanging off the display's shoulders. "I'm gonna get heat stroke or something if I wear that!"

"Oh, come on, it's got that stalwart hero vibe all the ladies drop dead over." When Sorun refused to uncross his arms at the sight of the display, Honey sighed out loudly. "Fine. How about this?"

It was possibly the most egregious pair of pants he had ever seen. There were so many pockets and zippers that he could scarcely even tell it was pants. There were more pockets than pants.

"You're kidding."

"Hey, just think about it for a second." Honey tapped the side of her head. "You could fit all sorts of things in those pockets for your missions with the Freedom Fighters. Eh? Eh?" She nudged his side with her elbow.

Sorun shook his head. "I never was a big item user whenever I played video games. I'm not about to start now in real life." And he wouldn't be caught dead wearing that abominable thing. "What else ya got?"

"A skirt?" He gave the black piece of clothing in front of him a questioning look. "A skirt ? I ain't a girl, man."

The Mobian gave him an affronted look. "Hey, the notion that skirts are a solely female-oriented clothing item is completely wrong. Besides, we pair this with a skintight shirt or something similar to contrast between your upper and lower body? You'll be gorgeous."

Sorun shook his head. "I don't wanna be- hey, you know, that thing actually does look kinda comfortable, and the freedom of movement it'd give me-" He shook his head harder. "No!"

"I don't even know with this one, Honey."

Belts. That's all it was- pants made of belts. It had to be belts and nothing but belts, because he couldn't see the actual pants beneath them. It was nothing but belts on belts on belts.

"Yeah, I don't know what I was thinking with this one, either," Honey admitted. "Still wanna try it?"

"Not happening."

"Okay, enough. Stop." He felt like they'd been looking at clothes for hours. For all he knew it had been hours, and that fact alone scared him more than anything else. He couldn't physically go on without passing out.

"Eh?" Honey shot him an inquisitive look. "What's the matter?"

With a groan, Sorun sat down on a nearby wooden crate. "The matter is that I just wanted some normal clothes, man. That's the whole reason I came here. Clothes." He tiredly gestured to the display cases next to them. "But now you got me back here and you're trying to doll me up like a Final Fantasy character. I know you don't know what that means, but it's what you're doing. I don't want these weird, impractical clothing pieces. I get enough looks from people already."

And it was more than they looked weird. That played a large part, but it was much more than that. They frankly looked uncomfortable. Some were so bulky with added... things on them that he wouldn't know how to move in them if he tried. And other pieces were accessorized to hell and back to the point they were more accessories than clothes.

All he had wanted was spare sets of clothes. He wouldn't have taken this deal if he knew this is what it entailed.

"'Impractical' you say..." Surprisingly, none of Sorun's complaints seemed to upset Honey in any way. In fact, she looked deep in thought as she slowly stroked her chin. "Something that isn't plain, but practical," she murmured. "Something that doesn't sacrifice uniqueness for functionality. That'd... be a really special style!" She leapt to her feet and dove towards the back of the room, behind stacks of wooden boxes. "Stay right there! I have just the thing!"

He wasn't even sure he could go anywhere if he wanted to. For all he knew Honey would hunt him down and drag him back. So he responded by giving a half-hearted wave while his attention slowly drifted towards the display cases next to him. He found himself looking at the pants made of belts in particular.

"I know she said it was experimental, but geez, all that leather... might as well have made chaps or something," he thought. "... Wait, where the hell do they get leather from in this world?" His eyes widened. "No, really, where? Normal dogs and Mobini are a thing, sure, but... but what do they make the leather fro-"

"I found them!" Sorun was roused from his concerned thoughts and turned back to Honey, who was walking towards him with a pair of black pants. "Look at these! They're leagues better than that travesty you're wearing right now," she claimed as he tossed him the pants.

Catching the pants, Sorun gave the yellow cat a pointed glare. "What's wrong with my sweatpants?" he asked.

"Ugh, they're atrocious. Baggy and loose, and not in a stylish way. You look like a bum with those pants." She pointed to the new pair of pants in his hands. "But what you said finally made me realize the style you're going for. A simplistic look that offers you practical movement on the battlefield without sacrificing style. It's the perfect choice for a Freedom Fighter!" She clasped her hands together. "It's also something I've never tried before. It'll be a real challenge to meet that kind of standard, but I'm all for it!"

"Simple but stylish, huh? That's... hey, that actually sounds kinda cool," he admitted. He didn't know the first thing about style, but she the way she described it just fit with him somehow. He didn't even know how to describe it. It just felt right. And now that he thought about it, he never was one for flashy, complicated clothes. Granted he'd always been on a tight budget when buying clothes, but still.

But he had to question the pants. "Why these, though?"

"It's made from a polyester-cotton blend and fitted in a way that makes the pants secure but non-constrictive on the wearer," she explained. "They're the kind of thing that can take a lot of punishment and provide you all the mobility you could ever need without restriction, and comfortable to boot. You don't even need to worry about stains since they're black. Perfect for fighting."

Sorun turned the pants over in his hands, and then gave Honey a deadpan look. "These are just cargo pants," he claimed.

Honey's shoulders drooped. "I don't get a lot of customers asking for pants, okay? At least try them on before you say anything, Mr. Judgey McJudge."

The human teen raised his hands in a sign of surrender, and after looking around found a large crate nearby. He hopped off the one he was sitting on and stepped behind the crate and out of Honey's view, who was patiently waiting for Sorun with her hands clasped behind her back. There were various rustling sounds from behind the crate, and soon after Sorun walked out with his old pants in his hands and his new pants on.

And it killed him to admit it, but they felt good .

Honey hadn't been kidding when she said they were non-restrictive. He felt them being secured onto his body, but at the same time they felt so loose that he could easily forget he was wearing them. It was almost like they molded to his legs naturally, and they even looked great on him on top of everything. They didn't look too baggy nor too tight. They were just right.

And Honey knew he liked them, too, because she was sending him one of the smuggest grins Sorun had ever seen. All the teen could do was sigh and hang his head.

"Yeah, okay, I want them," he whispered.

"What was that?" Honey held a hand up to one of her triangular ears. "Didn't catch that."

His head snapped up with a flustered look on his face. "They're great!" he shouted.

"Hah. Told you." The cat hummed and looked down at his legs. "I'm surprised they even fit you, to be honest, but I was trying out a lot of sizes. I got some socks in the back somewhere that should fit you, too, and some black boots to go along with the pants."

"Boots?" Sorun asked while tilting his head back. "What, you're a cobbler, too?"

"Oh, Sorun. If it goes on the body, I make it." He opened his mouth to ask something else, but Honey waved the question away. "They're combat boots, but they have short shafts if you're worried about that. So about everything above the belt-"

"Hey, come on, not the shirt." Sorun defensively hugged at his own chest. "Shirt's non-negotiable."

Honey sighed out in frustration while she tapped her foot on the ground. "I'm not having my investment walk around nothing but plain t-shirts, even if they're made by me."

"Yeah, well, I'm not going outside wearing what looks like a coat you stitched a carpet onto." He nodded his head at one of the display cases. "You got my style in mind, right? You can go ham with it later, but for now I just want some blue t-shirts." Plus it would give him time to think of a weak excuse not to wear anything crazy she made, or at the very least give him time to ease into it.

Fortunately, it seemed to be enough for Honey to accept. She sighed and slowly nodded her head. "Fine, we'll go with plain t-shirts for now. But you're not getting out of wearing anything I make from here on out." She didn't even acknowledge Sorun nodding at her as she began walking towards him with a tape measure in hand. "Now come over here so I can measure you," she ordered. "You're lucky I have some things lying around that fit you now, but going forwards anything I make for you is going to be custom-fitted."

Sorun rolled his eyes. "Yes, ma'am," he grumbled out. He rose his arms to his side as the Mobian began murmuring under her breath while wrapping the tape around parts of his body. This went on for a few minutes before she paused and looked up at Sorun.

"Oh, hey, before I forget," she said, "what size underwear you have?"

A small blush made its way to his face. "Why do you gotta know that?" he mumbled out.

"What part of 'I'm making everything you wear' wasn't clear?" She gave him a serious glare. "I'll freely admit that not a lot of Mobians bother with them, but if I'm ever going into the human market I'll need the practice making them. So give 'em up."

"Oh, come on..."

The fear that he would never make it to checkout had been at the front of his mind, but after what had to be the most awkward measuring experience he'd ever had, the two were finally back at the store's front counter. Honey was behind the counter counting out the mobiums- a name for currency he still detested- out while Sorun did his best to avoid eye contact with her by examining his new clothes.

She'd been true to her word and refitted him head-to-toe in new clothes. The pants were still amazing. The new boots were equally amazing, doubly so as she happened to have something close to his size. The blue t-shirt was still a blue t-shirt. A paper bag containing his old clothes and the spares he bought from Honey laid at his feet.

Once again he was actually thankful for being so short, because otherwise he didn't think she would have had all these clothes in his size on hand already. And he had to admit- Honey was a master at what she did, even if she was loopy.

"Hey, I've been wondering something," Sorun suddenly said as he rested his hands on the counter, careful to avoid the spots Honey had destroyed with her hands. "What's with the glove thing? Almost everybody around here wears gloves."

Honey's ears stood up. "Oh, do you want some? I got a pair right here, actually." She reached under the counter and dropped a pair of large, white gloves on the counter. Sorun immediately backed up away from them.

"Oh, no way. I don't want the Mickey Mouse gloves. Uh-uh." He shook his head. "You don't have something, I dunno, slimmer? And darker?"

"Darker?" A sly grin stretched across Honey's face. "Why, Sorun... I didn't know you swung that way."

His pale face went even paler. "Huh?"

"Well, it's common knowledge that Mobians who wear dark gloves gravitate towards a certain... orientation not commonly seen among couples." With a shrug, she placed the white gloves back where she found them. "It's a surprise, but I'm not one to judge a client on who he chooses to-"

"I take it back!" Sorun quickly rose a hand to stop her before she could continue. "I'm not- look, how 'bout fingerless?" he asked. "Could you do fingerless gloves?"

Honey rose her eye ridges in surprise. "... You didn't strike me as someone who would do something like that in public, Sorun."

"What does that even-!?" He felt about ready to pass out from embarrassment, but he stopped cold when he saw Honey trying and failing to muffle stifled laughter behind her hand. "... You're screwin' with me," he accused. "You made all that up!"

"Complete lies. I would never... pft, yeah, I did," she admitted, causing Sorun breath out and collapse on the counter. "You're right, none of that is real. I just wanted to see how you would react."

Sorun let out a breathy groan on the counter. "Oh... oh, that ain't funny, dude..." He shakily picked himself up off the counter, equal parts relief and irritation in his eyes, and looked to Honey. "Seriously, though. What's up with the gloves?"

"Honestly? There isn't much to say." She gave Sorun a shrug. "Mobians don't wear much clothing on principal, but it mostly comes down to personal preference at the end of the day. The gloves are a staple in people's wardrobe mostly because everybody wears them with a few exceptions here and there."

"So it's just, what, a trend everyone follows?"

"Pretty much."

"Oh." Well that was a relatively underwhelming explanation. He'd expected something over the top, and half of him expected aliens to be involved with it somehow. But all things considered that was a surprisingly reason. Who knew something as innocent as that could exist on Mobius?

There was a small ding! as Honey finished closed the small register on the counter next to her. "Well, you're all set," she told him. "I'll get to work on the rest of your ensemble as soon as I can. You just keep being you."

"Ah-huh, sure." He bent down to pick up the bag of clothes, and made his way towards the shop's door. "Thanks."

"And Sorun?" The teen stopped right as he put his hand on the door and looked back at Honey, who was smiling at him. "It's a pleasure doing business with you."

He couldn't get out of that store fast enough.

"Oh, I just wanna sleep forever..." Sorun sighed as he plopped his body on the living room's couch. He'd walked straight to Sonic's home right after leaving the store, and he hadn't even been able to make it to Sonic's room where their beds were. He'd only made it as far as the living room before he'd finally collapsed.

"Eccentric she said. Eccentric. If that's this world's standard of eccentric than I'd hate to see what full-on crazy is," he thought as he closed his eyes. "Ugh, at least it's all over now. I just wanna go to sleep and make it to the next day-"

"Hey, Sorun!"

On the inside, he was screaming. On the outside, Sorun slowly opened his eyes so that he could see the blue hedgehog that was standing next to the couch and staring at him.

"What do you want, man...?" Sorun yawned out as he stretched his arms over his head. "It's been a long day."

Sonic looked at something across his room. "It's only two in the afternoon," he informed the human.

"What!?" His eyes snapped fully open as he followed Sonic's gaze to a wall clock. It was, indeed, just past two. "Oh, for the love of- ugh." He went slack on the couch. "What is it, Sonic?"

"Just wanted to compliment the snazzy new threads." He snapped his gloved hands and pointed his fingers at Sorun. "You get new clothes?"

"Yeah. I went to Honey." Sorun ran a tired hand over his face. "It was an experience and a half, lemme tell ya."

Sonic blinked at him. "You don't sound very happy about the new clothes."

"I am, but an insane cat woman knows my underwear size now because of it. I'm not gonna be able to sleep at night knowing that."

And now Sonic just looked confused. "And that's bad because...?"

Sorun's looked down to Sonic's bare crotch, scoffed, and turned his head away. "You don't wear underwear. You don't know the struggles." A strange scent hit his nose and caused him to look back at Sonic. "What's that smell?"

"Oh, I'll tell you what that smell is." He zipped onto the spot next to Sorun on the couch and held out his hand to the human. "I thought to myself, 'hey, I think Sorun's still a bit stressed over his situation,' and bam! It hit me. You need the greatest food ever conceived by Mobian minds."

The teen's blue eyes focused in on Sonic and the object he held in his hand. From what he could see it was a normal hot dog he was offering to him, but he couldn't place the topping that was put on it.

"... That's just a hot dog, man," Sorun said.

Sonic vehemently shook his head. "No. It's a hot dog with chili on it."

"That sounds like the most disgusting thing in the universe," Sorun thought as his eyes flicked to the hedgehog and back to the hot dog. "What ever happened to just using ketchup?"

"Ketchup ain't got nothing on chili." The chili dog was forced into Sorun's hands, with a second one being held in Sonic's other hand. He gave Sorun an encouraging look. "C'mon, Sorun. Don't knock it 'til you try it."

He most certainly didn't want to try it. The die-hard fan of ketchup inside of him absolutely refused to even partake in any condiment other than ketchup. His very spirit considered it self-betrayal, even if chili was fairly close to ketchup. He didn't even like hot dogs that much.

That look Sonic was sending stayed his hand from outright throwing it away. That wide-eyed expectant look in combination with that small smile he wore. And Sorun just didn't want to be plain rude to his host by throwing away offered food.

"This thing still looks gross," he thought. "Screw it. I'll eat it."

It was with much resignation that he took a bite.

The taste was fine enough, he supposed. Certainly better than what he had expected. The spiciness of the chili complemented the meat flavor of the actual hot dog well, but it was still a flavor that he found lacking. Passable, but not something he'd go out of his way to get. An overall six-out-of-ten for him.

"Eh. It's okay," he said with a shrug. When he looked to Sonic to gauge his reaction, he saw a wide-eyed look of surprise plastered on the Hedgehog's face. "What?"

"I... had Chuck load that chili dog with extra spicy peppers, you know, as a joke. You didn't even react to them," he said in a voice that was almost in awe. "What's your secret?"

The fact that he'd almost been pranked went completely over Sorun's head as he took another bite of the chili dog. "I dunno. I've always had a weirdly high pain tolerance. It's one of my only redeeming qualities." His chewing slowed down as he looked at the chili dog. "Hey, Sonic?"

"Mm, yeah?"

"Where, uh... where... where did the meat used to make this thing come from?" He glanced to the side at Sonic, who was busy consuming his own chili dog. "'Cause, like, animals here are people, so... is there, like, a Mobini meat industry or something? Because this is... it's kinda weird..."

Sonic gave him no answer whatsoever. On the contrary, all he did was passively stare into Sorun's eyes as his still head continued to eat his own chili dog. It was an unusually creepy gesture from the hedgehog that sent a chill through Sorun's spin.

"... What the fuck is that look supposed to mean!?" Sorun tried his best to not let his immense confusion show on his face, and decided that perhaps the subject was better off dropped entirely. "So," he said as he finished off the chili dog, "haven't seen you in a while. Where ya been?"

"Ah, you know, the usual. Eggman does a bad, I do a good, and the universe balances itself for about two seconds before he pulls something else we have to solve." He took the last bite from his own chili dog. "The others are trying to ignore it, but we're losing ground fast out there, Sorun. I don't know how much longer we can keep going like this."

An unusually somber look crossed Sonic's face, and Sorun grew uncomfortable from just sitting there next to him. Even more sobering was being reminded that things in this world weren't so peaceful despite how Knothole appeared. Fighting a war against a tyrant trying to take over the world would make things rather dower, Sorun supposed, but now that he thought on it he realized there wasn't actually much he knew about Eggman. Now seemed like the right time to ask.

"So, this Eggman guy," Sorun began. "Dr. Robotnik. Crazy robot guy. What's his actual deal? Everybody's been talking about him, but nobody ever actually explained him to me."

"Eggman, huh?" The expression Sonic wore on his face was one Sorun had rarely seen on him. His face was scrunched up in a way that suggested even thinking about the madman was unpleasant to the hedgehog, and Sorun could hear his gloves strain when he tightened his hands. "What do you want me to say? He's an evil genius who makes robots to take over the world."

"Sure, but why?"

"Because that's just how he is," Sonic answered. "There isn't any reason to what he does. He wants to take over the world just because he wants to. Because he thinks he's better than everybody else, so it gives him the right to do whatever he wants with other people's lives." He looked down to the floor. "I'll never admit he's right, but he's trying really hard to prove his point by successfully taking over the world."

Sorun blinked. "That seems... really shallow, even by evil tyrant standards."

Sonic dry chuckled. "Yeah, well, he's a real shallow guy. Always was." He looked up at Sorun. "You know that he used to be the kingdom's warlord? He's practically the only reason Mobians won the Great War against the Overlanders- that's how my dad puts it, anyways."

"That guy was actually part of the kingdom?" Sorun rose his eyes in surprise. "How'd that happen?"

"Dad said that he was running from Overlanders. He and my uncle were actually the ones that found him, and the kingdom offered him asylum. And then he went and stabbed everybody in the back after he helped win the war. Using the roboticizer to turn people into robots, enslaving people, using his own robots to try and take over the world..." Sonic sighed. "We fought him for ten years, and we finally thought it was all over when his final grand master plan blew up in his face. Literally. But then he got replaced by an even worse one."

A beat passed, and Sorun slowly sunk back into the sofa as he gave Sonic a perplexed look. "Come again?"

"Yeah, an Eggman from an alternate zone came to this one." The hedgehog waved the answer off like such a thing was normal, and Sorun could only stare at him in silent disbelief. "The way he put it, his zone was a mirror version of our zone where he actually won and took over the world after turning himself into a robot, but he got bored. So he came over here to take ours over. We've been fighting that one ever since."

"So... it's a weird alternate-universe version that's pretty much the same but worse," Sorun summarized. "And he's a robot, too?"

Sonic shrugged. "Well, he was. But while me and Tails were fighting him and his nephew- he has a nephew helping him, by the way- some aliens abducted us and turned him back into a... well, I dunno what to call that weird body of his. He turned back into a living person."

A long, drawn-out breath slowly escaped Sorun. "Sonic, how come every time I ask somebody something, half of the time the answer I get back is 'it was aliens'?"

"Eh-heh-heh. Come on, Sorun, it isn't that bad."

"No, Sonic, this has been consistent in the four days I've been here." Sorun pinched his thumb and index finger together. "Every single day here I've had at least one conversation that involved aliens. Why is it always aliens?"

He gave the human a wry smile. "No idea! We're just so popular nobody can leave us alone, I guess."

"I guess," Sorun said with a roll of his eyes. "So why'd aliens de-robot him?"

"It was these aliens called the Bem. They, uh... have this weird thing with turning people into robots and turning robots into people, but the one that visited Mobius and turned Eggman back to normal was one that wanted to help us." Sonic rubbed at the spines at the back of his head. "She went and turned all the roboticized Mobians into regular people again, and made it so that the roboticizer would never work again. That's why Eggman has to resort to building his own robots now; his little slavery trick doesn't work anymore."

Sorun nodded in understanding, but stopped halfway. "But... your dad...?"

The hedgehog's face lowered even more. "He couldn't turn back because of his wounds from the war. It'd... he'd die. Being a robot is the only thing saving him." He tapped at his knees. "That's why the roboticizer was even made, you know? To turn people into robots so they could be fixed if they got hurt really bad. It was my uncle's dream project, but Eggman twisted it into... well, you know. He ruins everything he touches."

"Oh." And now it all made sense why nobody liked this Eggman person, aside from the obvious "he's trying to rule the world" bit: he sounded like a legitimate psychopath to Sorun's ears. A megalomaniac bent on ruling the world no matter what. A sociopath that didn't care about hurting and enslaving literally every single person in the world if it meant he got to take it over. There were so many negative psychological terms he could fit from the description given to him alone that Sorun could barely sort them out from one another.

"I know comic book villains from back home that aren't as bad as this guy," Sorun thought to himself. "At least some of those guys had reasons for doing what they did. Awful reasons, sure, but still. But this guy... he's wrecking the whole planet just because he wants to? Because he can, and that's it? It's just hearsay from Sonic, but... but he's been fighting Eggman practically his whole life along with everybody else in the Freedom Fighters. If anything, he's the most reliable source of info on the guy, and if Sonic of all people is saying he's absolute evil..."

He said it before, and he would say it again: Mobians, the ones he'd talked with at least, were all unusually nice. Some were a bit more unique than others, crazy cats aside, but overall they were nice to the point of off-putting to Sorun. They were kind to a fault, really, and Sonic embodied this more than anybody else he met so far. That's why he found it so hard to believe they would all paint Robotnik as an unredeemable tyrant. That just didn't seem like something they would do.

But after hearing all of that, Sorun could understand. The robo-slavery, the conquering, the ruining of lives? And for years at that? The fact he was doing it all just because according to Sonic? It was no wonder they all hated him.

"I wasn't too far off when I called this world nightmare-bizarro," he realized. "Man. Hard to believe that a single guy could cause so much trouble. Just who is Robotnik?"

"Do you guys at least know where he is?" Sorun suddenly asked Sonic. "Does he have a base of operations or something like that? Or does he move around?"

Sonic shook his head. "No, his round butt's firmly planted in New Megaopolis. It's..." Sorun stopped himself and made a slight hum. "Hey, you still have that map Sally gave you?"

"Yeah, it's in your-" Sonic was gone and back in less than a second, holding the rolled up map in his hands. "- Room, yeah. Showoff."

Grinning, Sonic unrolled the map and pointed at an extremely familiar spot to Sorun. "This is where New Megaopolis is," he explained. "From what I heard, it was a Overlander city a long time ago, but they lost it in the war."

Sorun leaned in closer to the map. "That's... New York," he whispered under his breath. "He actually went and took over New York? I mean it's not New York anymore, but... but seriously? I can't believe the place is even still around, but now he's in charge of the city?"

Now it was just insult upon injury at this point. He really liked New York. And not only that, but it was so close to the Kingdom of Acorn with it being on the east coast. He was way closer than Sorun would have thought.

"I don't know about what it used to be, but nowadays it's robot central," Sonic said as he rolled the map back up. "Nothing but metal, metal, and wouldn't you know it, more metal there. We can't get close without his defenses pinging us, and even if we could he's got so many robots there a head-on attack would be pointless. That whole city is a fortress for him and a factory for his Badniks."

"So attacking him's no good," Sorun summed up. "So what have you guys been doing?"

Sonic sighed at the question. "Try to disrupt his supply lines. Steal what we can for ourselves. Destroy his refineries that keep poisoning the planet. Dismantle his factories. But usually we're so busy saving people from his Badniks that we can barely ever make a dent in his operations, and when we can, we do so little that it feels like we aren't making a difference. For all I know we aren't."

"Which is why you banked on what that wood tablet said."

Sonic started at what Sorun said, but then gave him a slow nod. "Yeah, that's why we did what we did," he confirmed. "You see why we were so desperate now? We need a win here, Sorun. No, more than a win- we need hope. Because at the speed we're going? Hope's runnin' out real fast, and once it goes away completely? I don't know." He shook his head. "The Freedom Fighters'll keep fighting to the end, no matter what. But everybody else? I just don't know."

He did understand. It didn't make him feel better for being here in the first place, but he at least understood. And more than that, to his surprise... he honestly felt bad for them. "Sorry you got somebody as bad as me," Sorun mumbled out while pulling a knee up to his chest. "You... deserved someone better. Someone that could have helped."

That statement earned him a shocked look from Sonic, who looked so stunned that he nearly dropped the map he held out of his hand. He shook it off quickly though, and a small smile, sad but appreciative, found its way on his face. "Hey, come on. I already said no negativity," he said. "We're putting together a big mission, you know. We're gonna need all hands on deck for this one, too, so chances are that you'll finally be pulled into the field." He stepped forwards and put a hand on Sorun's shoulder. "But really man, thanks. For helping us, even if you can't really do that much. And for talking with Tails- he told me you two are cool now. I really appreciate it."

Sorun said nothing at first, and simply just looked down at the hand. He then shrugged the hand off while getting up off the couch at the same time. "We made a bet," Sorun airily replied as he walked away. "That's all."

"Yeah, but you didn't have to honor it."

The human teen didn't so much as look back at Sonic, but he could feel the smile being beamed into his back from the hedgehog. And as it was, he was too tired to care, much less respond. He just wanted to sleep, to the point that he'd passed out the moment he crashed on Sonic's spare bed.

A/N- For his neutral special, Sorun does NOT wield a gun. He'd really like one, though.

So I'm taking a few liberties on this story and adding characters that didn't exist in the OG pre-plot wrecker wave universe. I still think it was the most egregious story choice in anything I've ever read, but I'll freely admit that the reset universe at the very least had some cool stuff in it. And I can use that.

Chapter 8

Recursion Error

Episode 8- When I tried my best and didn't succeed

Today was the big day.

For a full week now he'd been on Mobius, and while the experience wasn't exactly miserable, per se, Sorun's mood was up there. One whole week away from his home zone, and he wasn't a single step closer to getting back. The Freedom Fighters had yet to even collect a single Chaos Emerald.

But in that week he'd been acclimated to his new surroundings and had formed... bonds with those around him. What those bonds were, he didn't rightly know. He wouldn't go as far as to say they were bonds of friendship. Even calling them the bonds of comrades felt like going too far. He wasn't too surprised; he was a newcomer. Someone who people had only been around a week when they'd been fighting together for years. And unless he had to Sorun usually went out of his way to avoid people, as the "they're the ones responsible for my misfortune" thought still plagued his mind. There were those few exceptions, Sonic chief among them, but otherwise he'd yet to even have a single conversation with over half of the Freedom Fighters.

In the meantime, he'd kept busy. Done more useless busywork to make it at least look like he was doing something with his time. Slept unusually long hours to pass as much time as possible, because there wasn't exactly anything to do that was fun when he avoided most people. It was a nice little routine that kept his mind off himself and kept people from paying attention to him.

That all came crumbling down on day seven, when all the Freedom Fighters had been summoned to Freedom HQ for what was apparently a very, very big mission. A mission Sorun recalled Sonic mentioning at one point, but had chosen to ignore in the hope that it would go away on its own as he didn't want to deal with it.

In hindsight, that probably hadn't been his best move.

So now, once again, everybody was gathered around in the main room of the underground Freedom HQ, with Sorun hanging back far enough so that he wasn't next to anyone but close enough to hear everything. But while he could hear everything, his focus was more on the small, silver cylinder he was grasping in his right hand. Tails had come through with his request and made him a collapsible baton. Whether it would actually do him any good or not remained to be seen, though Sorun still had his doubts over its effectiveness. Many doubts.

"It'll be a three-pronged attack, with each team heading an attack..." A small table had been set up in the main living room of the HQ, with a large map spread out across it with various circles drawn on it in red marker. Sally was at that table with Sonic and Rotor standing next to her as she explained their plan of attack and organized the mission in front of everybody. And out of everybody in the room, Sorun was the only one that wasn't paying rapt attention to every word she said.

A poor choice? Most definitely, but he just couldn't bring himself to listen. Not because he didn't care, but because he was too scared to listen. Because if everybody was here, that meant everybody was going out on the mission. And unfortunately, he was part of everybody. Which meant he had to fight. Which meant his life would almost assuredly be at risk. He'd been fondling his baton as much as possible to try and calm his nerves, but it just wasn't enough. It was a miracle that he was even able to keep a straight and even face as he continued to roll the baton on his hand while he listened out for his name to come up.

"What was that one quote that sergeant guy said a million times in that one movie? The one with the guy that kept dying and reviving?" Sorun wondered. "Oh, right. 'Battle is the Great Redeemer. The fiery crucible in which the only true heroes are forged. The one place where all men truly share the same rank, regardless of what kind parasitic scum they were going in.' Eat your heart out, Farell."

An not-so-amusing quote considering who he was compared to all the heroes he was around. Who was he compared to them? A weakling. A nobody. Dead weight. A liability. Somebody that was so useless he'd slow them down and probably get somebody hurt or worse because of it. He wasn't an equal in their eyes, and going on a mission with them where he was almost certain to screw up in some way wasn't going to change that. He didn't even have as good a reason to fight as them. They fought because they chose to; Sorun was fighting because he arguably didn't have a choice, and they all knew he didn't want to.

He couldn't even understand how they could stand to be around him.

"- Last but not least is the Chaotix. As we discussed, you'll be attacking the factory directly. Team A will be running the distraction out front by directly attacking the Badnik forces stationed there while Team B will be taking advantage of the chaos and infiltrating the facility with the explosives." There was a pause from Sally. "Sorun?"

"Yeah?" he called out. His eyes were still down on the baton he was rolling in his hand.

"You'll be going along with Team A on this mission." He looked up from his baton in surprise at that. "Some of the heaviest hitters are going to be on that team," Sally explained, "but that being said, there's still only going to be two of them out there. I'd like you to go along with them to provide support and to... ease you into these types of missions."

"... That so?" And now he was wishing he'd paid more attention, but he had at least heard enough to play off his ignorance. "You're only sending two guys on the distraction run, not including me? That's kinda low, ain't it?"

There was some movement as a red figure pushed through the small crowd of people. Sorun's eyes lazily tracked Knuckles as he stopped in front of the human while crossing his arms.

"A couple of our guys got wounded in an earlier op. Light injuries, but they're out for this one," he explained. "You're ridin' with me and Mighty for this one, pal."

"Alright." Sorun looked back down at the baton. "Just tell me when and we'll go."

He didn't pay attention to the odd look Knuckles gave him as he shuffled out of sight, and the rest of the meeting was largely tuned out by Sorun's ears. Too many nerves getting the better of him. Too much anxiety creating white noise in his mind. So focused was he on the metal object in his hand he couldn't even correctly perceive time slipping past him.

"Why the hell did I let everybody talk me into this...?"

"I'm really worried about him."

By now most of everybody had made their way out of the HQ in preparation for their part in the upcoming mission. There were some exceptions, though, mainly the human who had yet to move from the spot he'd practically glued his back to as he stared at a metal tube in his hand and the blue hedgehog who was looking at him from across the room.

The one who had expressed concern over Sorun wasn't him, though. It was the chipmunk standing right next to him who was giving Sorun equally concerned eyes.

"Aw, who? Sorun?" Sonic waved a hand in the face of her concerns. "Yeah, sure he's a bit nervous, but so is everybody their first time around. You remember how Antoine was. It's just first mission jitters."

"I'm not so sure," Sally argued with a shake of her head. "He gets freaked out pretty easily. You didn't see how he was when I was explaining the planet's history to him." She shot Sonic an irritated look. "Something I would have thought you'd think to do considering we decided to leave him with you."

Sonic shrugged. "He had other things to worry about. It didn't seem important."

She did a double-take in disbelief. "Not impor- how could something like that not be important!?" She pointed her hand out to the human. "Sonic, he had a panic attack when I told him! I thought he was gonna pass out it was so bad, and when I tried to calm him down he wouldn't let me!"

He froze at hearing that. This was new information, and now he actually was beginning to get a bit worried. "I didn't know," he said, and then immediately shook his doubts off. "But c'mon, Sal, Sorun's a tough guy. He's gotten this far, and compared to how he was on the first day he's practically a different person! He'll be fine."

"I'm not saying he hasn't gotten better," she said in a cautious tone. "I'm just worried he's not, you know, cut out for this sort of thing, and this is a big leap compared to what he's been doing so far."

"Look, Knux and Mighty are gonna be there too, right? They're two of the strongest guys around, and the factory their team is hitting isn't even that big," Sonic reasoned. "If anything bad happens, they'll be there to make sure Sorun makes it out in one piece. They've fought bigger Badnik hordes than what we're expecting them to find, so it should be easy for them."

After making his point, Sonic stepped around the table with the marked-up map and began making his way towards Sorun. On his way he'd turned back to Sally, and gave her a reassuring smile while pointing both of his fingers at her.

"Seriously, don't worry about it," he said. "We've made tons more dicier plans than this. It'll all work out."

He turned around too quick to catch the doubtful look on her face.

"There's no hope for this private, nope, dunno what I was thinking..."

The silent panic was still going strong. He was squeezing the baton hard enough that the joints in his hand were going white.

That all ended when he felt somebody shake his arm.

"Hey, Sorun? You doing alright?" Hearing Sonic's voice ripped Sorun away from his mild panic and caused him to look up at the blue hedgehog, who was looking at him with a mildly concerned expression. "Your team for the mission is heading out. Aren't you going?"

"... Lost track'a time," Sorun mumbled out as he pocketed the baton. "Yeah, yeah I'm goin'."

He made the motion to move past the blue Mobian, but the grip on his arm remained firm. When Sorun stopped and turned around, Sonic still had that concerned expression on his face.

"You sure you're good?" he asked.

Not at all. "Mm. Sure I am." Sorun lightly shook his arm free of Sonic's grip. "What brought this up?"

"Oh, ah, nothin', nothin'," Sonic said with a light chuckle. "You're gonna be fine out there. You have two really strong guys backing you up, and hey, you got that cool new weapon, right? There's nothing to be worried about." He gave Sorun a thumbs-up. "And after it's over

I'm sure mom'll have the biggest stack of pancakes you've ever seen back home. We can make it a celebration!"

While that sounded nice, Sorun had nothing but worries. Worries the baton was a waste of his time. Worried about dying some time within the next however many hours this operation was going to last. Worried he'd never see home again. He had so many worries that he felt like the stress of it all was going to kill him before a robot got the chance to.

And of course he wasn't going to tell Sonic or anybody else the innumerable fears and worries he had. Too much embarrassment on his part, too much baggage on their part when they had bigger things to worry about concerning the war. They didn't have to worry about him. He didn't want the attention. So he'd fake it for as long as he could.

"Mm. So where am I actually going?" Sorun asked Sonic. "Is there a- a car or something, or what?"

A devious smirk slowly spread across Sonic's face. He didn't like it one bit. "Oh, something way cooler than that. You'll love it. Trust me."

Sorun didn't trust him.

Sorun was right not to trust him when he saw what it was Sonic had been referring to.

"Plane? Y-you guys got a plan? Plane?"

Knothole City had a little clearing that had been converted into an airstrip near the kingdom's outskirts where the Freedom Fighters kept their aircraft. It was surprising to Sorun because he hadn't realized they had aircraft, let alone an airstrip. And not even a particularly good one at that- it was just a long dirt road with a large wooden hanger next to it. A hanger that was way too large for just the one little plane he was standing in front of, which made him question what else was in there.

The plane he was looking at, though? He wasn't sure what to make of it. A blue airplane with an extra seat behind the pilot's seat. What drew his eyes though was the fact that there was a logo on the top of each wing. A logo of a pair of yellow and white tails.

The same pair of tails attached to the fox that was sitting on one of the plane's wings and grinning down at Sorun.

"Of course we have a plane," Tails said in a tone that implied it was the most obvious thing in the world. "How else do you think we get around? I sure didn't build it just to look at it."

The teen's mind ran blank at that. "You built an airplane."

"Sure did!"

"Of course he did," Sorun mumbled under his breath as he pinched the bridge of his nose. "I already knew he was a kid genius. You didn't need to show me evidence and emasculate me further, universe."

As if he needed more hits to his confidence. Again. Now of all times when this may have been the last day of his life.

"You're not afraid of flying, are you?" Tails asked him with a tilt of his head. "Are you?"

"What? Pfft, no, I'm not- no way, man." Sorun scratched the back of his head and turned away. "I've never flown in a plane before but I'm totally cool with heights so yeah, hah hah, I'm all set." A low whine sounded in the back of his throat. "Oh man, I gotta get in that...?" he hoarsely whispered to himself.

It had to be sturdy. Everybody seemingly trusted Tails to fly them. Tails, the same person that helped make a portal to another dimension. What was a plane compared to that? Practically nothing, really. There was no way it wasn't good even if it was a homemade plane. It even arguably looked better than planes he'd seen on Earth. There was no way it wasn't stable.

He so dearly hoped his logic was sound.

"You're not getting cold feet now, are you?" There was a pat on Sorun's back with so much force behind it that it had almost knocked him right off his feet. The startled teen stumbled, caught his balance, and then whirled around to see Knuckles standing behind him. "Not too late to turn back."

"That's arguably untrue," Sorun argued as another Mobian approached them. "You're Mighty, then?"

He definitely saw him around, but otherwise Sorun hadn't paid attention to him. A Mobian with black fur and the same kind of peach stomach and mouth that Sonic had. But what he had instead of spines was a shiny, red shell of some sorts on his back. Most surprising of all was the unusually friendly aura he had hanging around him, more so than most other Mobians Sorun had met thus far. He found it strange.

"Yeah, that's me. It's nice to meet you." Even his voice sounded friendlier than friendly. "You're coming with us on the mission, right?"

"For however much worth I am, yeah," Sorun answered. "So, Mighty. You're..." He clicked his tongue as his eyes briefly roamed to the shell and then back to Mighty's face. He was guessing at this point, but considering the shell, he felt solid about this guess. "... An armadillo. Right?"

It was a baseless guess on his part. He was fairly confident Armadillos didn't have fur, and he really did just look like a hedgehog but with a shell in place of quills. But thinking with that kind of logic hadn't gotten Sorun anywhere in trying to guess people's species with only a few exceptions, and he didn't have anything to lose. So he took a shot in the dark.

He looked unsure at the question. "Uh, yeah? Why?"

The shot in the dark paid off.

"Yes!" Sorun silently hissed as he turned his back to Mighty and held up a fist in victory. "I got one. I'm gettin' better at this." And here he'd thought he was hopeless at identifying Mobians, but he'd finally gotten one right. Maybe there was hope after all.

"Uh, Sorun?"

"O-oh, right." Sorun spun back around and cleared his throat. "So you're, like... a big defense guy?" he asked. "'Cause of the shell?"

"Hm? The shell?" He looked back at the red shell on his back. "It helps, I guess, but my main strength is, well... my strength." He lifted up his right bicep and flexed it. "I'm stronger than most Mobians. Like... really extra strong. Scary strong."

Sorun's face fell flat. "You mean super strength?"

"Yeah, that!"

"I see. The guy with super strength is named Mighty. The guy with super speed is named Sonic. Feels like the world is trying to tell me something." On that note, Sorun turned around and made his way towards the plane. "Welp, we got a mission to do, right? Better get to it."

Maybe it was a culture thing he was ignorant of, or maybe Mobians just weren't that creative with naming things. Or some other third thing he wasn't thinking of. They couldn't all be this blunt with names; Tails at the very least had a normal-sounding name with a nickname. Sally and Antoine had normal names.

"Mm, but wait, they ain't got powers from what I've seen. At least Antoine doesn't if he has to resort to a sword," Sorun thought as he climbed up the side of the plane and into the seat behind the pilot's seat where Tails was sitting. "Did Sonic's parents seriously name him Sonic out the womb? Or is Sonic just a nickname like Tails' name? Oh, what if he has a really embarrassing real name or something funny like that?"

"So my job is to deliver some of the teams to their respective positions. I'll drop you all off and swing by to pick you up later," Tails informed Sorun before turning to the plane's controls.

Sorun said nothing in response, instead choosing to hug his arms against himself as he sat back further into his seat. A thought occurred to him suddenly and he pressed back forwards to get Tails' attention. "Hey," he called out over the plane's spinning propeller, "where're the other two gonna sit!?"

He got his answer when Knuckles and Mighty casually walked up to the plane and jumped right up on the wings, with each Mobian standing on either side of the plane's wings. Sorun's jaw dropped the slightest amount when he realized they intended to just stand on the wings while in flight, but he quickly managed to shake off his disbelief and went back to shrinking into his seat.

"Why am I not even surprised?" the teen wondered to himself as the plane began to move down the dirt runway. "That's actually one of the less surprising things I've seen here. Says a lot."

Any further thoughts were muted by the sheer anxiety Sorun felt as the plane finally took off. It was an experience that lasted the entire flight.

Tails had dropped the three of them off in a forested area and had flown off soon after. After a small trek through some forest they came to the edge of a small hill under the cover of trees. Anything beyond that hill was practically a different world: unlike the forested area they had just come out of, there were absolutely no trees for as far as the eye could see below them. Nothing but flat land comprised of dried, hardened soil. The sky was orange and the clouds ominously dark. Even the smell was different, and somewhat reminded Sorun of his home city, but somehow even worse. More metallic.

And at the center of what was practically a wasteland? The factory they were sent here to destroy. A compound with a large building at its center that had two tower-like cones protruding out of the top billowing black smoke into the air, reminding Sorun of the nuclear power plants he'd seen pictures of on Earth. There were smaller buildings around the main one scattered throughout the compound, and even paved, concrete roads connecting them all together. Further out there were construction cranes and signs of half-finished buildings.

On the upside, there wasn't any type of fence or wall they had to bypass. On the downside, there were dozens of robots walking around the whole compound.

Now, Sorun had never seen a real-life robot before. Not surprising; the technological curve on Earth had made it so the closest thing he'd ever seen to an actual robot was a mindless vacuum that skirted around on the floor before it got caught on a chair or something. But he'd been an avid consumer of entertainment, and had seen his fair share of fictional robots across a wide variety of video games, movies, and anime. So he had a general idea of what to expect when he was told the force they were fighting was robots.

At least he thought he did until he actually saw the things.

If he remembered correctly, he'd heard the term "Egg Pawn" be thrown around at some point, and looking at them now, he could see where that name would come from. Robots painted various colors with round, almost spherical torsos. Thin limbs with large hands and feet. Squat, round heads with pointed, needle-like noses, blue, circular lights for eyes and a blue, eerie smile built beneath those eyes. They honestly looked like something out of a cartoon to Sorun's eyes, but there was nothing cartoonish about the lances, hammers, and what looked like hands that were laser canons if his fictional trivia-savvy mind was to be trusted.

"So those are the robots, huh?" Sorun mused. He was leaning against a tree behind his two Mobian comrades, who were crouching near the edge of the hill. "They look weirder than I woulda thought."

"Eggman modeled them after himself," Knuckles grunted under his breath. "Honestly, it's so... what's a word that work? Self-indulgent? No, wait, that's two..."

"Obsessive?" Mighty tried, but looked unsure of his answer.

"Narcissistic," Sorun supplied, and the two Mobians let out a small "oh" at the word. "So we're going down there to be the big distraction?"

Knuckles nodded. "Yeah, we draw their attention out here while Espio and Charmy sneak in with the bomb to detonate the factory. We fall back right after. They got their own ride back home." He looked up at the sky with a slight pained expression. "It won't help much with the pollution, but it's better than nothing."

Wordlessly, Sorun pushed off the tree and stepped besides the two Mobians while trying to ignore the fact he didn't know who Charmy and Espio were. "So we, uh-" he pointed to the factory, "- we're just gonna rush right in, huh?"

"That's the plan," Mighty said.

"Ah." He didn't like that plan. The plan sounded hazardous to his health. "You guys mind if I just, y'know, hang back a bit?" They both looked up at him with questioning looks. "You know, just... have me pick off the stragglers. Or something. They're all gonna be focused on you two anyways, so I don't really have much to do otherwise."

The two looked at each other, and the breath Sorun had been holding was slowly exhaled when they shrugged their shoulders and gave the human a nod.

"So we going in right now?" Mighty asked.

Sorun did a double-take. "Wait, now now? 'Cause I-"

"Yup." Knuckles already began shuffling his body over the hill's edge. "Let's hit it."

"This seems sudden-"

They were already sliding down the hill. Halfway through him trying to think of what to do next, he already could hear explosions and an alarm going off.

"Well Sorun, guess, uh... yeah, just go in there," he whispered to himself. His hands, clammy with nervous sweat, shakily reached into his pocket to pull out the baton which he promptly flicked so that it extended to its full length. "How hard can it be? They're just killer robots." He began to slowly slide down the hill. "Man, I'm so screwed..."

Every single footstep he took towards the factory felt like his shoes were full of lead, and when ground gave way to concrete his anxiety only increased. Littered all around him were the remains of destroyed robots that looked like they had been literally ripped apart by either Mighty or Knuckles, and Sorun had to wonder if he was even needed here. Only minutes in and those two were tearing their way through Badniks like it was nothing. Meanwhile he was slowly walking around with a clueless look on his face, glancing from his baton to anywhere around him.

"Why am I e-even so upset? It's good th-that they get all the robots, isn't it?" he wondered to himself. "I-I can't fight, so it's... it's fine? What am I even doing here? I can't- oh."

In his aimless wanderings, he'd come to the part of the larger factory area that was under construction. There was an open area right in front of him, near a half-finished building with a construction crane overhead and with steel beams littered around. And right in the middle, in a space that was relatively clear, was a robot. A red Egg Pawn with its back turned to Sorun, a metal shield in its left hand and a long lance in its right.

Sorun gulped. "Fuck. It's one of them." He struggled to get his breathing under control as he lowered into a crouch. "Okay. Okay, you got this. Just... do what they do in every movie and video game ever. Sneak up to the thing in a crouch-walk, then whack it with the baton. That's all you gotta do. You can do it."

His heart was hammering so hard in his chest he felt like it was going to explode any second now, and he was sure his heavy breathing wasn't doing it any favors, but he pressed on. He was actually thankful for the loud alarm blaring from the factory and the distant explosions, because otherwise the Egg Pawn would have for sure heard him slowly approach.

And what a slow approach it was. Sorun made sure to crouch-walk as slow as possible, half because he wanted to remain unseen, and half because he wanted to delay him actually hitting the robot at much as possible. But the paranoia of the robot suddenly spotting him and turning around spurred him forwards, and if not for that alone he probably would have remained rooted to the spot in fear.

Finally, however, he managed to get behind the robot. Even when he rose to his full height, the Egg Pawn towered over him by an inch or two, but despite its height it had yet to even notice him or turn around. A miracle, really, seeing as he was breathing so hard he was practically blowing on it.

"Damn, how the hell did Snake crouch-walk for so long? That's rough on the knees," Sorun internally complained as he held his baton up. Any soreness in his knees was overridden by the anxiousness of what he was about to do. "Alright. Alright, just... just hit it." He reared the baton backwards. "Give it everything you got and hit it!"

He grit his teeth, and with a grunt of exertion slammed the baton down on top of the Egg Pawn's head. There was a loud ting! sound as well as a few sparks when the baton landed before bouncing right off. A heavy vibration began rumbling in Sorun's arm from the impact, and he had to step back and hold his arm to nurse the shakes going through him.

Unfortunately, much to his dread, when he looked up he saw that his strike had done absolutely nothing. The robot's head was completely pristine and dent-free. The paint wasn't even scratched in the slightest.

Worse still, it turned around.

Sorun was so afraid in that one moment that he was completely frozen as the Egg Pawn stared at him with those large, blank lights for eyes. Its head tilted down slightly, and then it dropped the shield and lance it was holding on the ground. The Badnik reached its empty hands out and, almost gingery, took the baton from Sorun's shaking hands.

The creepy, perpetual grin it wore was almost mocking as it held the baton up to Sorun's eyes before it grabbed both ends with a hand and snapped it in half with about as much effort as it would take to snap a chopstick.

"... Uh..." So stunned was he from the act that he just saw that Sorun couldn't even think of words. All he could do was stare dumbly down at the fragments of the baton as the robot dropped them with wide eyes and a still, rigid body. "Um..."

The Badnik wasn't nearly as stunned as Sorun and casually reached down to pick up the dropped lance in a single motion. But when it bent back up straight to face the human, he was already gone.

"Oh no oh no oh-no-no-no..."

Run for cover. It'd been the one thing Sorun's fear-addled mind had managed to convey to his consciousness, so that was what he did. In the moment the Egg Pawn reached down to grab its lance, he'd bolted towards the first thing he saw that could place something between it and him. In this case, a sheet-metal wall that was nearby next to a small metal shack. Sorun was currently cowering behind that wall.

"The baton was a stupid idea what was I thinking oh god I'm gonna die..." In hindsight, no, banging a metal stick on a titanium-plated robot wasn't going to do anything to it. But it was something, and something was better than nothing. And Sorun had hoped that something would be enough, even if it was practically nothing.

But oh, was it not enough. It was not enough at all. And now there was a killer robot aware of his existence and currently trying to kill him.

"Okay. Alright, maybe if I run REALLY HARD I can find Knuckles or Mighty and they can take care of it. I'm gonna look like the lamest person ever and they'll lose all respect for me, but fuck it, I'd rather live with that than not live at all." They couldn't be that far, after all. The sound of robots exploding in the distance was fairly close, and Egg Pawns didn't look that fast. He could do something like that. "Good plan? Good plan. Just gotta-"

A red lance punched its way through the sheet metal inches from Sorun's face, and he screamed at the top of his lungs.

The lance pulled back through the hole as Sorun fell backwards onto his back. Right as he landed the lance tore through the metal again, right above him where'd he'd been standing before he fell. The teen immediately scrambled to his feet and began running away as the lance punched through the metal wall over and over while chasing him. Eventually Sorun had run past the entire wall, and turned his head briefly to see the red Egg Pawn on the other side of the wall with its lance. It turned its head towards him and began walking towards the human at an alarming rate.

He ran to the metal shack that was near the wall, but when Sorun tried for the door he found that it was locked. In his panic, he looked left and right, and then found a small wooden table nearby with an open toolbox sitting on top of it. Sorun, desperate for anything to help him at this point, reached for the toolbox, grabbed it, and then spun around to face the advancing robot.

And what did he choose to do with the box of tools he picked up? He reached inside to throw the contents at the robot. Hammers of various sizes and shapes, screwdrivers, metal rulers, if it was even remotely heavy he picked it up out of the box and chucked it as hard as he could at the robot. The effect was about to be expected: every single item he threw bounced harmlessly off of the robot's shell, and it was to the point that it wasn't even slowing down.

Eventually it came down to the last item in the box, which Sorun thoughtlessly grabbed and held behind him in preparation to throw. Right before he swung, he noticed that the shape he felt was familiar, and quickly looked back to confirm that, yes, he was holding a regular tape measure. "Goddammit, gimme a break," his exhausted mind thought as he yelled out and threw the tape at the robot.

The Egg Pawn actually took the effort to deflect the tape with its lance before thrusting the tip forwards towards Sorun.

He yelped in fear, and then instinctively held up the empty toolbox to his face to defend himself. By some miracle the lance pierced through the box with the tip stopping millimetres from Sorun's eye, but to his alarm the Egg Pawn began to use the lance to lift the box and Sorun upwards. Sorun, too afraid to let go of the toolbox, held on fast. But then the Egg Pawn swung the lance in an arc over its head, swinging the box and Sorun overhead with it. The momentum caused the toolbox to come loose from the lance, and at the same time Sorun lost his grip, causing the teen to fly backwards away from the Egg Pawn.

Landing on the ground, Sorun grunted out loudly as the momentum caused him to roll a brief distance before coming to a stop on his back. He only managed to get one terror-stricken breath out before a shadow fell over him, and a scream escaped him as a shape shot down towards him. He rolled away just as the tip of the Robot's lance went through the ground where his head was, though it was while he was mid-roll did the robot's free hand reach out and grab him by the throat.

Genuine fear along with obscene amounts of adrenaline flooded Sorun's systems when he felt cool, metallic fingers wrap around his windpipe. His terror-filled breathing became short as he felt his airway become constricted, and then felt a tight pain in his whole throat as he was lifted up in the air off his feet by the robot. He desperately kicked at the robot and tried to pry the fingers off of him, but the robot proved to be too strong, and he was rapidly losing strength due to the fact he couldn't breath.

It was quickly becoming hard to see, as the edges of his vision was becoming dark. He had enough sight left in him to see the Egg Pawn's fixed, glowing smile, and even more alarmingly he saw the lance in its other hand reared back and aimed right at Sorun's head.

"No. Stop it..." Sorun's movements were becoming more and more feeble, and between the adrenaline and oxygen deprivation he was beginning to lose all feeling. It wasn't enough to stop the cold dread seeping though him when he saw the lance and thought that, yes, he was about to die. "No no no please stop it I don't wanna die please-"

The lance never came. It would have, but a large, heavy object falling on top of the Egg Pawn and crushing it stopped any attempt by it.

Sorun was slammed right into the ground from the force of the fallen object dragging the robot's arm down along with the teen. He crashed right into the ground and immediately pried the lifeless fingers away from his throat, and then crawled a few inches backwards in fright. He held a hand up to his raw throat as wheezing gasps escaped him, and looked in confusion at what had befallen the Egg Pawn. It laid completely crushed under a mess of metal cross beams, buried to the point that the only parts visible was the arm that had held Sorun and half of its round, grinning head. The lights on its eyes and mouth were thankfully dimmed to a muted gray.

Panting heavily, Sorun tilted his head up just to see what had fallen to crush the robot. To his shock, he saw the culprit immediately in the form of a construction crane's arm suspended high in the air above him. It appeared that the tip of the crane's arm had somehow been cleanly cut off, the remains of which he assumed had been what fell down and crushed the Badnik.

"The hell...?" The confused teen thought as he looked at the destroyed Badnik and then back up to the crane. "It... that piece of the crane just... came off? What the- huh?"

He saw something, near the base of the crane's arm. What that something was, he didn't know. It was red in color, but he couldn't discern any visible shape as it moved too fast, and in the blink of an eye the red something was gone completely.

"Am I seeing things?" Sorun whispered. "The hell was-?"

The sound of loud, creaking metal made the teen cut himself off, and he looked up in fright at the crane arm. Fright turned into alarm when he saw that the rest of the crane's arm had been segmented, and was all falling towards him.

"Oh shit!" he shrieked, and looked around for the nearest anything that could shield him from the crushing debris quickly falling towards him. But there was nothing- nothing but wide open space and pieces of open construction around him. The shack may have worked, but even if the door was unlocked, it was too far for him to reach.

Panic racing through his mind made him think faster than he thought possible, and in a split second he noticed that there was a noticeable gap in the crushed, metal debris that was the piece of crane that had crushed the Egg Pawn. Debris that had a relatively covered top with all that metal. Without thinking, Sorun dived right towards the debris and squeezed his body inside as far as possible. Not a second was left to lose as he fitted his entire body inside before the next piece of debris crashed down on him. His ears rang with the sound of crashing metal and the shock sent vibrations throughout his whole body, but thankfully he didn't feel any part of him become seriously hurt.

But then the next piece fell after than, and he could feel the steel prison he'd wedged himself into begin to constrict all around him. The effect only increased further when the next piece dropped, and Sorun began to worry if he'd made the right choice after all.

One after another the pieces of the crane's arm crashed into that one spot. By the time the final piece touched down a large dust cloud had been kicked up from the large, concussive impacts, and whole minutes had to pass before the dust finally settled to reveal the massive, house-sized pile of red metal in the construction yard that Sorun was trapped in.

"So this is what that raider in Fallout felt when he tried to beat my player character in power armor to death with a wooden cue stick. Shame and humiliation," Sorun thought as he released a low, shallow breath. '"Nobody said you had to fight with your bare hands,' he said. Yeah, that went real well for me, Shadow. Real fuckin' well."

On the bright side, he'd survive a whole crane's arm falling on him. On the downside, his dumbass decision of diving headfirst into the debris instead of running away, while possibly having managed to save his life, also trapped him. The rest of the crane falling on him had crushed the metal he was hiding inside in to the point it was all pressing against his body. He couldn't move, and therefore was trapped.

At least he didn't feel injured, which, all things considered, may as well have been a miracle. The metal beams pressing against his chest made breathing a challenge, but he was alive. That had to count for something.

"How long has it been? Five, ten minutes? I can't even see in here. I wonder where the others are?" As if on cue from his thoughts, he felt the ground beneath him rumble as a loud, deafening explosion was heard in the distance, followed by a shock wave making the metal all around him rattle worryingly. "I guess that was the factory blowing up," he reasoned. "Knuckles said we were gonna fall back after it went off, but they wouldn't leave without me. Would they? Probably not. I don't know."

He honestly didn't, but he really hoped they would come looking for him. He'd be stuck here otherwise, and didn't want to think about what would happen if he were just left here. Dying of dehydration after being pinned in place for days came to mind. Being excavated by robots and being taken prisoner or worse scared him even more.

"Sorun? Hey, Sorun!"

That was Mighty's voice he heard, much to his relief. The armadillo was shouting his name and, based on the volume, was relatively close. Unfortunately Sorun couldn't get enough breath in him to shout back, but he did have a hand with enough freedom of movement for him to bang on something. So he made a fist and rotated his wrist so that his fist hit a piece of metal to make a loud clang! sound.

"Sorun!? That you!?" Mighty called out. Sorun hit the metal a few more times in an attempt to give an affirmative sound, and was thankful to hear rapid footfalls approach his position. Soon enough he heard the sound of heavy pieces of metal being lifted off of him, and breathed in a large breath when the constriction on his chest was relieved. Minutes passed with more and more sunlight hitting Sorun's body as more metal was cleared away until a particularly large piece was lifted off him, exposing him entirely.

Blinking at the harsh sunlight in his eyes, Sorun slowly turned his head to his savior. Mighty was standing right above him, holding up a piece of crane high above his head with a single hand in what was a ridiculous display of strength. His face was marred with worry as he looked down at Sorun, who coughed and blinked blearily at the armadillo.

"Hey," Sorun croaked out. "One of my legs is pinned. Help me out?"

"Y-yeah!" The metal debris Mighty was holding was tossed over his shoulder and crashed into the ground far behind him. "Just hold on, okay? I'll get you out of there in a second."

The human teen remained silent and let Mighty dig him out. To his credit, he seemed to be genuinely careful in his work, and even went as far as to look to Sorun whenever he lifted something to make sure he wasn't causing him any pain. But Sorun remained silent for the most part, due to both the shame he was feeling and the heavy exhaustion settling through him. Eventually the last piece of debris was lifted off him, and Mighty wasted no time in offering Sorun a hand to help him stand up. He accepted the hand, and then softly groaned as he was slowly picked up to his feet with Mighty pressing his second hand against Sorun's back to steady him.

"Sorun, man, what happened?" Mighty asked him. "We went looking for you after the factory blew, but we couldn't find you."

"What happened? What do you think happened? Crane fell on me," Sorun mumbled as he brushed Mighty off of him. "Which one of you flatfoots decided it be such a great idea to drop a crane on me?"

"Huh?" Mighty blinked and flicked one of his ears. "W-we didn't drop this on you!"

In response, Sorun gestured wildly to the bits of crane scattered around them. "Well, it didn't fall on its own! And I saw something red up there before it fell, so it was either you or Knuckles!"

"Sorun, really, we didn't!" There was still concern in Mighty's eyes as he looked up and down Sorun's body. "Are you sure you're ok-?"

"Yeah, fine, I'm fine," Sorun grunted as he rubbed at his head. "Agh, forget it. Let's- let's just go. I don't wanna be here anymore."

He stumbled past Mighty who held a hand out to try and help him, but Sorun refused and pulled his arm away before the Mobian could grab it. He heard Mighty let out a consigned sigh in response, but heard him follow closely behind Sorun. He didn't care too much, and he cared even less about what the deal with the crane was. He just wanted to leave.

There was a slight pain in Sorun's left ankle that caused him to limp, but otherwise he felt fine enough to keep going. As they made their way out of the construction area, Sorun had turned his head around to see the large, central building that had once been the factory. Half of it was rubble now, with the other half on fire and slowly crumbling away. Even some of the nearby buildings had been hit by the blast and had been heavily damaged if not outright flattened completely.

But more than that? There were destroyed robots everywhere. For as far as he could see past the cracked streets and wrecked buildings were dozens upon dozens of Badnik corpses ripped to pieces and completely dismantled. There were so many destroyed robots that Sorun didn't think there were even any left. Mighty and Knuckles had destroyed them all.

The fact alone sent Sorun's blue eyes shaking as a feeling of complete self-loathing overtook him. His body threatened to shudder, too, but he kept it in check for fear of Mighty noticing.

"They... managed to do all this..." He felt like a walking disgrace at what he saw. He'd called himself useless so many times, but now he genuinely felt like he was completely useless when he saw the devastation that just two Mobians were able to do, compared to him. Him, who wasn't even able to destroy just one robot. Who was still so shaken over the fact he almost died it was taking all his focus not to break down right there.

"I'm absolutely useless after all..."

He didn't speak a single time after the fact, as he was too worried his voice would crack from how bad he felt and that Mighty would notice. Even when Knuckles found them halfway back and joined the group he remained silent and even took steps not to meet any of their eyes so they couldn't see the devastation in them. It wasn't even when Tails met them at the rendezvous point with his plane did he choose to say anything. He merely climbed into the seat behind Tails while absolutely refusing to meet anybody's eyes or answer any questions.

Sorun couldn't even enjoy the view of the plane ride back. His head had been hung down in shame the entire time.

The plane's propeller hadn't even finished rotating before Sorun had jumped out of the plane and began skulking away. He thought he'd heard his name being called out to him, but this was largely ignored by Sorun who couldn't even hear anything outside of his own negative thoughts.

His limp was getting better, at least. Halfway back to Freedom HQ he was able to walk fully on his two feet. He sighed out when he finally saw the small, red flag on the pole mounted on the HQ's hill, and slipped through the door before gently shutting it behind him. A short trek through halls and stairs later, and he'd somehow found his way into the HQ's kitchen. He immediately went for the fridge and opened it, but to his dismay the only drink it was currently stocked with was water.

A listless sigh left him as he closed the door, and he endeavored to drag himself all the way to Sonic's home to just end the day already. He only made it as far as the kitchen table before he collapsed into the nearest chair and went limp.

"What did I actually think was gonna happen? I never had a chance. I knew that, everybody else knew that... why'd I even try? Just to say I did? Is that what I almost died out there for?" He still felt on edge from that fact. Even after getting on the plane and flying far away from that factory he still felt nervous. Still felt afraid for his life. Still felt terrible at his own weakness. "Damn it all. What am I doing?"

He would have went further, but he felt a sudden tap on his shoulder that caused him to jump up in his seat in surprise. He wildly looked around, but settled down when he saw it was just Tails standing in front of him. The young Mobian wasn't alone, either: Knuckles and Mighty were hanging back near the kitchen's entrance. Sonic and Sally were there, too, with each one giving Sorun looks of concern. Even Antoine was there, much to Sorun's exasperation.

"Sorry. Didn't see you there. Did you guys just come back from your mission?" Sorun asked, tone completely dull as he looked towards Sonic.

Sonic gave a slow nod. "Yeah, everybody's mission was a success. A couple of us were just chilling in the HQ when you just... kind of stumbled in the kitchen."

"Yeah, we chased you all the way from the airstrip, but you wouldn't listen to us," Tails added. "Sorun, what's wrong?"

"... You did?" Sorun mumbled. "I didn't notice. I was..." He sighed out, rubbed at his eyes, and sunk lower in his chair. "Alright, guys, look. I'mma be real here." His eyes gazed up at the Mobians watching him. "I tried, okay? I tried really hard. But I'm- I'm not cut out for this. For any of this."

There was an awkward pause, and everybody glanced at each other with questioning eyes before a majority looked to Knuckles and Mighty for clarification. Knuckles gave a half-shrug, and looked to Mighty for help. Mighty was biting at his lower lip before he let out a small sigh and stepped forwards.

"Look, Sorun, I know it didn't go so well for you-" he began, but stopped cold when Sorun gave him a wide-eyed stare.

"It went terribly, Mighty," he interrupted. "I couldn't do anything! You two were out there killing robots by the literal dozens while I couldn't even beat a single one! I lasted barely a minute against the thing when I tried!" Sorun, feeling heated from the discussion, kicked up out of his chair and began pacing back and forth in a little line. "I-I almost died! I was this close to getting a spear jammed through my face and out the back of my head before divine intervention or whatever that was decided to drop a crane on the Badnik- amazing I didn't get crushed to death!- and I woulda been stuck there if you didn't dig me out!" His hands flew up to his hand and rubbed at his hair in a frenzy. "I just- I don't- there isn't anything- I just can't- augh, I don't know..."

Any energy had had been building up suddenly felt like it was being drained out of him, and Sorun found himself collapsing back into the chair he'd shot out of. "Look, at the end of the day... I'm just not you guys," he said, voice and face both tired. "I'm not a Mobian. I can't handle the things you guys can do. I wasn't born with special powers. I don't have super strength, I can't run fast, I'm not some genius and I can't fly..." He lifted a hand to Antoine and sighed in defeat. "I don't know what he has, but whatever it is I ain't got it," he mumbled as the hand dropped. "I... I just can't do this. I would if I could, but I really can't. I tried."

After he finished talking, Sorun sluggishly rose up out of the chair and kept his head held down so he didn't have to see anybody's faces. He passed by Tails, and then stopped before digging into his pocket to bring out the two pieces of the broken baton. "It has some design flaws. Mainly that the guy operating it is physically incompetent." He handed the pieces to the fox, who accepted them with shaking hands. "I'm sorry for wasting your time with this, Tails."

He left right after without another word, thankful for the fact that nobody chased after him. His plan after this? Go back to his pseudo-home and wallow in self pity before falling asleep. And after that? He genuinely didn't have a clue what came after this, and right now he couldn't bother to care.

"... Did a crane seriously fall on him?"

The overall mood that hanging over the kitchen soon after Sorun left was dour. Frowns were seen on faces all around, though none more than Tails as he looked down at the broken baton in his hands in dismay. The one who had asked the question, however, was Sonic, who was looking towards Mighty hoping for an explanation.

"I don't know how it happened!" The armadillo raised his hands up in defense. "I just found him like that! Maybe a Badnik dropped it on him or something, I dunno!"

"But you guys were supposed to be keeping an eye on him," Sonic bemoaned as he rubbed a hand over his face. "We all promised him everything would be fine and a crane ended up dropping on him." He turned towards Knuckles. "What happened to keeping an eye on him?"

Knuckles turned his head away from Sonic and gave a half-shrug. "He... said he's hang back to deal with the stragglers," he explained. "It seemed like a safe enough play, but... he seriously couldn't even take out one robot?"

"Humans aren't that strong," Sonic mumbled out with a shake of his head. "I knew it was bad, but I didn't think it was... oh, man..."

Taking strength for granted was something nobody present in the room had ever done. Overestimating someone's strength was a different matter entirely, though, and was evidently a lot easier to do than Sonic would have liked. He'd genuinely believed that Sorun would at the very least be able to fight one measly robot if nothing else, but apparently even something like that was beyond him. He didn't blame him in the slightest- everybody had their limits, and it wasn't Sorun's fault his were so low compared to theirs. But it did leave him wondering what was left for Sorun at this point.

Even more than that, he was getting worried over the human and how he was handling all of this. He could tell from the faces all around him that everybody was thinking the same.

"Sonic?" His green eyes turned towards Tails, who looked up from the pieces of the baton to the hedgehog. "What's gonna happen with Sorun now?"

"I dunno, buddy. He's..." He grunted in frustration and turned around. "I'm gonna go talk with him and-"

"Wait, Sonic." Right as the hedgehog lifted a foot up, he was stopped by the sound of Sally's voice. "I don't think going to him would be a good idea right now."

He whirled towards the chipmunk in surprise. "Why not?" he asked. "You saw how he is. I can't-"

"Sorun's... volatile under stress. You know that," Sally said. "I don't mean to demean him in any way, but you heard what happened. He's shaken because of how that mission went. He could lash out because his nerves are so high right now."

"He wouldn't... he's been getting better with that, Sal," Sonic argued as his shoulders went slack. "Sorun's a little freaked out, sure, I get that, but he's not like what he was a week ago when he first got here."

Sally nodded her head in understanding, but the saddened expression on her face didn't change. "I'm not saying don't talk to him. I'm just saying give him some time to cool down," she elaborated. "Let him sleep this off so he can get his thoughts in order, alright? It's been a long day for all of us, anyways."

"Easy for you to say. You don't share a room with him." Sonic's foot began to tap aggressively on the ground. "I don't like it, but... yeah. I'll get back with him tomorrow." It wouldn't be his first choice, but he could see the wisdom in it. Even if it did hurt him inside.

"I'm going for a run to clear my head," he announced as he turned away from them all. "Have a good night you guys."

His hope was that running would take his mind off of what he had just witnessed, and just maybe give him a chance to think over what he was going to say to the human tomorrow to make him feel better. But even after he left the HQ, and even after he began sprinting through the forests, he couldn't get it out of his head. Even as the trees he passed began to blur into unrecognizable shapes, all he could think of was that look Sorun had on his face. That utterly defeated face that looked like it was on the verge of breaking down.

Sonic didn't like that face at all, and wanted to do everything he could to fix Sorun's mood and maybe even make the human smile for once. A real smile that would tell Sonic that Sorun was alright so he didn't have to worry about him anymore. But no matter how hard he thought, he just couldn't think of what he was going to say.

"Sorun... what are we going to do with you?"

Chapter 9

Recursion Error

Episode 9- I just wanna play video games

"You know, I've been thinking. Maybe- just maybe- what happened yesterday was a good thing."

Waking up the very next morning (which by Sorun's standards was the afternoon) Sorun had seen that Sonic was absent from the room. So with that and the fact he currently had no standing orders from the Freedom Fighters, combined with the thoughts from yesterday still plaguing his mind, he'd decided to wander around Knothole. To try and get his thoughts straight now that he was calmed down from a good night's sleep.

It was something he'd done often back on Earth whenever a problem arose that he needed to think on. Him aimlessly wandering down streets while deep in thought, though this eventually turned into David or one of his pals from school taking him to a local snack shack near their school. Sorun had found back then that food helped immensely with sorting his thoughts. And, as it happened, Sonic's uncle owned a small diner which the human incidentally walked into.

There wasn't much to say about it. Small and quaint, and as it was Sorun had apparently just missed the afternoon lunch rush, so the place was empty save for Sonic's uncle, Chuck. So what was Sorun to do other than sit down at the diner's counter and order some food? At the very least it was familiar territory, which put him somewhat at ease. Something like that had been sorely missing from his life for the past week.

"I... thought you didn't do too well in the mission?" the mustached hedgehog commented as he set a plate down in front of Sorun on the counter. "Sonic told us about it last night. You seem rather calm given the description he gave us."

Sorun looked down at the plate that was set in front of him. He felt his face scrunch up when he saw the lone chili dog on it. "You don't serve fries or anything like that?" he asked.

"Huh? No." Chuck shook his head. "These are a delicacy here in Knothole. Why would I serve anything else?"

There was something seriously wrong with the people here if that really was the case. "Eh, forget it," Sorun grunted as he reached for the chili dog and took a bite. "Anyways, yeah, Sonic wasn't wrong. I was pretty messed up. Almost dying for the first time in your life will do that, I guess."

"I see. Want to talk about it?"

"No way." Another bite. "But I slept it off, and then a thought came to me." Sorun pointed a thumb at himself. "I'm a total scrub. Common knowledge at this point, right? And- and Chuck? I tried. Everybody wanted me to give the Freedom Fighters a shot, and boy howdy did I give it the biggest shot I could. But at the end of the day? I'm just a random normal dude who's seriously under-powered compared to literally everybody else around me." He raised his index finger in the air. "But now that I've tried and failed? Given irrefutable proof I can't actually do anything? Nah, they ain't gonna let me on any more missions." He took a final bite out of the chili dog and leaned back in his chair. "I'm home free, baby. All I gotta do now is ride out the rest of this trip and I'm all set."

He didn't know why he hadn't thought of it sooner. It could have had something to do with the raw adrenaline high he'd been on, or the near-death experience shaking him so bad. But with the clarity of sleeping it off? It made Sorun realize that it may have been the best thing to happen yet. No more fighting equaled no more risking his life, which meant all he had to do was sit around and do nothing until the others gathered the Chaos Emeralds and opened the way home for him.

Unironically the greatest fumble of his life, really.

Chuck didn't look nearly as proud of this plan as Sorun was. In fact, he had a rather disapproving scowl on his face, and even his mustache became furled. "Isn't that a bit selfish of you?" he asked. "They did use all the Chaos Emeralds to bring you here. You don't think you're entitled to help out at least a little?"

Sorun's eyes snapped to Chuck's blue eyes, and he scowled. "Three points," he began before raising his index finger again. "Point one: I didn't ask for this. None of this. Not the 'abducted into the robot war in a different zone' bit, not the 'go fight said robots' bit, none of it." He held up two fingers. "Point dos," he continued, "it's not like I'm faking incompetence or anything to get out of fighting. I really am useless." Three fingers were held up. "The coup-de-grace to all that, though, Chuck? That's point three: I almost died out there. Died in a stupid war I have no right to be in, because I shouldn't even be here." He slowly inhaled as he lowered his hand, and then exhaled. "So no. I don't feel entitled to help them considering it's their fault I'm in this situation to begin with. It sucks they used all the Chaos Emeralds, sure, but that's on them, not me. I just want to go home, Chuck. Can you really blame me for thinking like this?"

Sure, maybe playing the "I'm a victim" card in this scenario was a low blow, but Sorun honestly couldn't care less. Just because it was low didn't mean it wasn't true, and as far as he was concerned that gave him a free pass to be as low as he wanted to be. He'd almost died, after all. Gruesomely at that. So he'd weasel out of everything as hard as he could if it meant getting back home risk-free.

And mentally speaking, he wasn't sure he could handle having another near-death encounter. He wasn't even sure how much more of this world's nonsense he could handle before he had a mental breakdown.

"So you're content to just sit on your haunches while the Freedom Fighters risk life and limb searching for the Chaos Emeralds to send you home?" Chuck questioned.

It sounded bad when he put it that way, but he wasn't wrong. Sorun didn't care. "Pretty much, yeah," he admitted with a shrug. "In my defense they're not even actively searching for the things. They said they'd just pick them up if they happen to run into them on missions."

Chuck sighed, and then reached for the empty plate in front of Sorun. "Are you sure this isn't you being too afraid after nearly losing your life?"

"You know, now that you mentioned it that was actually the most traumatic thing that's ever happened in my entire life." Sorun gave the hedgehog a flat look. "What do you think, man?"

"I think that I knew a lot of people like you back in the war, me included." The older male reached for a cloth and began cleaning the plate. "People who saw terrible things and didn't want to go back to the battlefield. More often than not they did, though, because the terrible things they saw, sonny? They'd rather fight it themselves than have all that awfulness reach their loved ones back home. So they fought, not because they want to, but because they have to."

"Mm. It's a good thing I don't have to, then, huh?"

The scrubbing of the dish became more vigorous. "At the end of the day, the choice is yours, Sorun. And I'll say that, at the very least, choosing not to fight is a choice nobody can blame you for. But you're not going to get very far with this attitude of yours." He gave Sorun a piercing look. "Going it alone just isn't something a person can do. Even my nephew Sonic, with all his power, knows this. Knows it better than anyone. They all do, which is why they stick together. Sometimes all you need is a helping hand, and if you have that, you can get through anything." He looked back down at the plate. "You might realize this and actually make a friend to help you through this if you stopped treating everybody like monsters that abducted you."

Sorun scoffed, and then hopped out of his chair. "If you ever find yourself in my shoes, old man, then you can talk. 'Til then, though? Stop pretending you know how I feel."

"If you say so, sonny," Chuck rumbled. "It's two mobiums for the chili dog, by the by."

"Oh. Yeah, man, I'm broke." Sorun turned his back to the wide-eyed hedgehog and began walking away. "Thanks for the food and talk, though. Seeya."

He walked off with that, ignoring the hole that the hedgehog's eyes were boring into his back. He couldn't care less about his thoughts, especially after everything that had happened yesterday.

"If he was trying to do his 'wise old man' bit to get through to me, it didn't work. What does he know about my problems? Nothin'," Sorun bitterly thought as he thrust his hands into his pockets. "I stopped treating everyone so negatively. I said sorry to Tails. That ain't enough? Go to hell. I just want to leave.

"Agh... but they're trying hard is the thing." He wasn't completely callous or blind. Sonic was completely transparent in his attempts to befriend him. Tails was more shy about it, but was arguably the same way. Sally was trying her best to help him, but Sorun didn't know if that was just courtesy on her part due to the guilt of helping bring him here or if it was a genuine attempt at friendship. Others like Antoine, Knuckles, and Mighty were friendly towards him. Even that king, Elias, had been way nicer than he'd expected. Even went as far as to say he wanted to see him again.

Shadow and Rotor were different stories, but those were outliers Sorun would rather just leave alone.

Honey... Sorun just didn't want to think about her for as long as he could help it.

"Fine, so maybe being this weird, antisocial guy that kind of just hangs around isn't doing me favors. But friends? With the guys that brought me here? That pressured me into endangering my life?" He just plain didn't feel like it. He'd been fine with letting bygones be bygones and leaving it at that. Taking it a step further and extending hands of friendship? A bit too much for him. "I don't think I could ever be friends with them. But maybe I should at least talk to them like Sally said. Team cohesiveness and all that. At the very least, it's something for me to do to pass the time, 'cause man oh man am I bored. I wonder if anybody's at the HQ?"

As it turns out, there wasn't. A rare occurrence, really, considering this was the one hangout spot the Freedom Fighters had to gather in. Hence why it was headquarters, Sorun presumed. But even as he wandered into the living room and looked around, there was nobody. The place was completely empty.

"Huh." The sight produced raised eyebrows from Sorun, who was thoroughly surprised enough that he was scratching at the freshly-healed wound on his forehead. It was fine, though. It freed him up to do something else. What that was, he didn't know, because there honestly wasn't that much for him to do in Knothole other than walk around and ponder on what was currently on his thoughts. It beat talking with one of the Freedom Fighters, though.

Unfortunately somebody chose that time to open the doors to one of the rooms near the back of the living room, and Sorun had to suppress a sigh at realizing there actually was somebody there.

When he looked over to the opening door, he saw Mighty stepping out of the room while yawning and stretching his arms over his head. It was after he lowered his arms and opened his eyes from the yawn did he see Sorun standing across the room, looking at him. The armadillo tensed and and briefly looked uncomfortable from the stare, but then made a small sigh as he made his way towards the human.

"Sorun. Hi. I... didn't see you there," Mighty awkwardly greeted as he stopped in front of Sorun, and then began to rub at his shoulder. "You doing okay?"

"I'm still alive," he answered. "That's always nice."

"H-heh, yeah..." Mighty looked down at his shoes. "About yesterday... I'm, sorry. About the crane thing. We were supposed to be keeping an eye on you, and... yeah. That happened."

Yet another prime example of these people being too nice for their own good. Sorun could barely keep from rolling his eyes. "Well, you're not the one that dropped it on me. So it's fine." He was still unclear on just what it was that dropped it on him, but he didn't care enough to pursue the answer. And he sure wasn't going all the way back there just to investigate it further. He wanted to put that crane as far behind him as possible.

Mighty didn't look too convinced at Sorun's forgiveness. To his credit, he wasn't too far off. "It's just that things like that don't happen... often." He looked really hesitant at saying often, which caused an eye-raise from Sorun. "Okay, when it comes to fighting Eggman nothing is really what you would call 'traditional'," he said with finger-quotes, "so a crane falling on you wasn't the most surprising thing in the world, and I get that it was your first time and this is all jarring for you, but I, well, y-you're doing fine, right?"

Sorun blinked. "You sound worse than I am, and I'm the one that had to brush off almost dying." A feat he was still coming to terms with, right alongside what he was seeing unfold right in front of him. "You're really that worried about me?"

"I don't want to see anybody get hurt, and it's messing me up a bit that you got crushed while under our watch," Mighty confessed. "And I really don't wanna see a friend get hurt."

There was a flinch from the black-haired teen when he heard that friend word. "You guys sure like to toss the word 'friend' around real casually," he commented.

"Well, yeah." The armadillo grew a confused expression. "Why wouldn't we be friends?"

"We just met yesterday," Sorun deadpanned.

"So what?"

Sorun had to hold his shaking right hand so it wouldn't slam into his own face. "I really don't understand these people," he thought, and then breathed out a slow breath. "So where is everybody?" he asked in a desperate attempt to change the subject. "Place is kinda empty."

"Oh, they're off doing their own thing," Mighty answered with a shrug. "I didn't have anything to do, so I'm here."

"Yeah. Same."

"Ah, cool." There was an awkward pause between the two as they both looked away briefly, and then once again locked eyes. "Wanna do something?" Mighty asked.

He didn't, but at the same time Sorun didn't have anything better to do. "Why not?" he mumbled. "You got anything in mind?"

Mighty hummed in thought for a few seconds, dipping his head down while rubbing at his cheek. "We could... play a video game?" he suggested.

Somewhere in Sorun's mind, there was a jolt. A spark of excitement so intense he couldn't even remember the last time he felt something similar. "You have video games here?" he asked.

"Uh, yeah." Mighty pointed towards the middle of the living room, where there was a couch with a TV in front of it. "We don't have many, but-"

Sorun raised a hand to stop him. "Yes. Yes I do," he quickly said as he nearly ran to the couch. "Where's the... oh, I see..."

The world practically froze around him when he saw the small, electronic box sitting in front of the TV and connected by cables. The two game controllers sitting in front of it only made it even more recognizable. It was a welcoming enough sight that a short, breathless laugh escaped him as he crouched down next to the device and ran his hands along it.

How long had it been since he'd played a video game? Too long. Most definitely it had been too long since he'd been deprived of his most favorite pastime on Earth. So much had happened that something as simple as video games hadn't even crossed his mind since coming to Mobius, but now that he had the opportunity to play something, he couldn't help the deep, longing feeling growing inside of him. The urge to sit down and take a damn break from it all. To just not think about anything as he played a game.

He needed this. This escape from everything, even if it was just for a bit.

"I guess I shouldn't be surprised. World has robots. Why wouldn't it have a game console?" It was a bit silly to assume they wouldn't have something like this, now that he thought of it. The TV looked older than he would have liked, but he easily managed to navigate towards the power button and flip it on. The console was another matter. "Looks like an old Sega Genesis, but... more streamlined," he observed as he looked at the small black and orange game console sitting on the ground. "There's a single slot on the side here with a cartridge plugged in... is that the game cartridge? This thing must be old even by this zone's standards if that's the case. Or maybe they never focused that hard on game development with everything else going on. Well, whatever. Game's a game. I can deal."

Questions for later, but they sure as hell could wait until later because he needed this now . The power button on the console was a bit harder to find, but he eventually found it on the front and pressed it. There was a small whir from the console, and the screen on the TV changed as Sorun grabbed one of the controllers- corded, much to his disgust- and hopped on the couch behind him. Mighty sat down on a spot next to him.

"Oh, you're playing this one, huh?" Mighty noted as the game's main menu loaded on the TV. "Good luck. Everybody in the Freedom Fighters has had a shot at this game. It's insanely tough."

A indistinguishable mumble left Sorun as he looked at the main menu. There was a little gameplay segment playing in the background of the menu, and he was able to tell enough from watching the small loops of gameplay. 2-D shooter from the looks of it with bullet hell mechanics. Player character was a small spaceship fighting alien spaceships that varied in size and complexity both in their design and projectile attacks. He'd seen enough of these on Earth to get the gist.

"Mm, just beat all the bosses at the end of the stages to win it, right?" Sorun quietly muttered as he navigated the menu. There weren't many menu's to go into- simple "play", "quit", "options", and "scores". Scores interested Sorun. "How does scoring in this game work?" he asked as he navigated to the score menu.

"I think by how many of the other ships you blow up?" The tone in Mighty's voice made it sound like he was unsure, which mildly irked Sorun. "There might be a time thing, too?"

"I'll figure it out," the human teen grunted as he opened the score menu. His eyes widened when a long list of names with scores next to them slid onto the screen. "Are these the top scores of all the Freedom Fighters?" he wondered.

Mighty nodded. "Yeah, I think so," he said.

Sorun hummed. Predictably, all of the names comprised of three letters. The scores all only had five digits, and were posted next to each three-letter name. He snorted at a majority of them; most were around ten-thousand in score, with a few above that. One that stood out was "ROT" with a score just above twenty-thousand, likely Rotor Sorun presumed, and another named "TAI" at thirty-five thousand. Tails, most likely.

But at the very top of the scoreboard were three names whose scores were so above the rest Sorun couldn't help but notice them.

SON: 52500

Sonic and Shadow, then. Abysmal scores in Sorun's opinion, but practically amazing compared to everybody else, and he almost laughed when he saw how close the numbers were. What really piqued his interest, though, was the name at the very top of the leaderboard.

NIC: 98100

A decent score indeed. Not great by his standards, but decent.

"Who's Nic?" Sorun asked.

"Hm? Oh, that's Nicole," Mighty answered. "You haven't seen her. She's a, uh, computer."

Sorun paused. "Computer" ran through his head some times, but he remained confused at the phrasing. "What do you mean by that?"

"She's, like... a fake person? A program, but really smart like a normal person," Mighty explained.

The pale teen blinked. "So... an AI?" he tried.

It was Mighty's turn to blink. "A-what?"

"Artificial Intelligence." When Mighty continued to stare blankly at him, he sighed. "Robot. She's a robot?"

The armadillo's eyes widened in realization. "Ohhh...! That's what that means!" He shook his head. "I mean, kinda? But not really. Her body's this little pocket computer Sally carries around with her, but sometimes Nicole will transfer herself into the computers in the Freedom HQ's lab." He turned around and pointed to a door near the back of the living room. "It's through there."

He decided to just go ahead and accept that, but the mention of a lab interested him. "There's a lab back there?"

"Yeah, it's where they do, you know, computer stuff. And things."

The teen nodded in understanding. He wouldn't have expected them to have something like that down in an underground place like this, but if they had a fully-functioning kitchen and the electricity to power everything down here, he could see them having something like that. And he could also see why they would need something like that. That map had to come from somewhere, after all.

Turning back to the TV, Sorun pointed to the screen. "So if Nicole's an AI, how'd she play the game to get that score?" he questioned.

"Oh, Nicole's little computer body can project a real body for her to use sometimes," Mighty answered. "I don't really know how it works; you'd have to ask her or Sally. But one time Nicole made herself a body and tried out all the video games when we were having that one slow week that one time." He lightly chuckled and rubbed the top of his head. "She's really good at video games. Nobody's ever been able to beat her scores. Perks of being a computer, huh?"

"Looks like it," Sorun agreed. "She smoked all of you and got an almost perfect score. Almost." He scoffed and exited out the score menu. "Pfft. I can beat that, easy."

As he navigated towards the play button, Mighty gave the teen a slightly startled look. "Huh? I dunno, man. This game's really hard." The first stage began to load. "I haven't even come close to beating Rotor's score. I don't even dream of beating Sonic's or Shadow's.

But Nicole's score?" He shook his head. "I'm tellin' ya, she's too good."

"All I gotta do is get a perfect score," Sorun reasoned. "Simple."

"That's not simple at all!" Mighty began waving at the screen as the game loaded. "Sorun, you're not listening! Nicole's unbeatable at this game!"

Sorun's fingers instinctively pushed at the thumbsticks on the controller to move the spaceship on the screen, and a feeling of pure content flooded him as he sat back into the couch. This. This is what he needed. For the first time since landing on this planet, he felt completely content. Like he was in his element as his hands naturally conformed to his controller's shape and began to almost automatically press buttons.

And slowly, a small smile spread across his face, and he slightly turned his head towards Mighty to respond to his previous claim of Nicole's ability.

"Let's just see."

"Maybe he could... no, that wouldn't work..."

There wasn't many things in life that could so easily stump Sonic. Unfortunately, Sorun was one of those very few precious things. And try as me might, he couldn't find any answers to Sorun's problems. It was an issue that put an unending amount of duress on Sonic.

For once in his life, running to clear his mind hadn't helped him think of an answer. Pacing in circles, counsel from his parents and uncle, even the other Freedom Fighters... nobody had any idea what to do with Sorun. A large part of why he was choosing to walk down to the Freedom HQ. He hoped that he would be able to find something, anything, that could give him some idea on how to solve the Sorun problem. Or at the very least an idea had come to somebody else they could use. He was desperate for anything.

"But what can he do? He can't fight- he really can't, and we should've listened to him more when he said he couldn't." Human fragility was something that had slipped his mind entirely, much to his shame. It wasn't a mistake he was ever going to make again, he'd already promised himself that, but that still left him wondering what Sorun could do if not fight? "It'd be so easier if he just talked to us more, but it almost feels like he avoids us all the time. It'd be easier to put him somewhere he'd actually be helpful if we just knew more about him. It's not even that he's shy. He's just... so cold sometimes."

It was another problem, but this one was more easily fixed. Sorun just didn't socialize, and Sonic feared he actually went out of his way not to talk to people. On the bright side, it was better than what he was. He didn't seem angry anymore and didn't lash out. He was just distant. A great improvement, but Sonic knew he could do better.

"Would bringing people to him work? Get him to open up that way?" Sonic thought as he descended the stairs into Freedom HQ. "Feels kinda mean just ambushing him like that, but he can't keep going on like this. We can't help him if he won't let us."

Those were the thoughts running through the blue hedgehog's head as he entered the HQ's living room, at least. But then his ears perked up when he heard the telltale boops and beeps of a video game, and he turned his head towards the sound. He almost couldn't believe his eyes at what he saw: Sorun playing video games with Mighty sitting next to him. Almost like they were hanging out. Almost like... Sorun was voluntarily socializing with somebody.

A large smile grew on Sonic's face. This was exactly what he had been hoping for- a chance for Sorun to finally interact with somebody like a normal person. It came out of nowhere and was honestly shocking, but he'd take it. Because as far as Sonic was concerned, something as little as this was progress for Sorun.

"Hey, guys!" He zoomed right behind the couch in a blur and leaned over it so his head was between the two. "Sorun, Mighty, how's it going? Mighty?"

There was a certain look on Mighty's face that he couldn't place. The armadillo's eyes were glued to the TV screen where a video game was playing, and he had an expression of amazement on his face. He was so amazed, in fact, that he was completely shocked still and wasn't moving a single facial muscle. It was honestly a little creepy to Sonic.

When he looked to the other side at Sorun, though, Sonic became even more freaked out. Sorun's face looked more calm and at ease than he'd ever seen him. Serene, almost, with the exception of his eyes which were entirely focused on the TV screen he was facing. And his fingers- those fingers were flying over the controller he was holding at a speed that even had Sonic impressed.

"Neh, Sonic, hi there," Sorun mumbled. Even his voice sounded softer and more calm than what it usually was. "Mighty showed me this game, so I decided to give it a try."

"Which one is- oh, that one." He felt his own face wrinkle when he saw that particular video game Sorun was playing. One of the more difficult ones in their collection, and more importantly the one where Shadow had just a slightly higher score than him. He never lorded it over Sonic but there had been that one smirk and he just knew it was inflating the dark hedgehog's ego. "So how are you doing on it?"

"Well, we're about to see. Final boss is in his dying animation." True to Sorun's words, a large, alien ship was in the middle of falling apart and exploding into clouds of fiery pixels. With one last digital explosion the ship disappeared entirely and the text "FINISHED" began to flash on the screen. After some seconds of flashing, the text disappeared and Sorun's final score appeared on the screen.

Sonic's jaw almost dropped right onto the couch when he saw it. Mighty's practically did. Sorun looked completely impassive.

"Aaaand to the top of the leaderboard you go," Sorun whispered as his name settled neatly above Nicole's score and name in the score menu.

"Huh!?" Sonic's head began to rapidly turn from the TV to Sorun's face. "That's- how!? How did you get a score that high on your first try!?"

"Eh, wasn't that hard." The sheer flippancy in Sorun's voice was baffling to Sonic, and only served to make him even more surprised. "All the enemies and bosses have set bullet patterns, so you just anticipate what's gonna come at you when you see the models appear on screen and dodge between the projectiles. The tracking attacks were a bit tricky, but nothin' special. The final boss has this really cheaty pattern, but if you eat a hit at the very beginning you can use the i-frames you get to move into a sweet spot and dodge everything else. It's not the most viable strategy in the world, but I saved up a bunch of the laser special shots and since those things hit for frame-by-frame damage they just melt the boss's health bar since he stays in place. I still had some spare hit points left which gives you a score multiplier at the end." He tossed the controller on the couch. "Ya'll are trash at this game, by the way. Nicole's decent, but the rest of you are just awful."

The explanation had gone completely over Sonic's head, and based on the blank, unthinking expression on Mighty's face he assumed it had gone over his head, as well. Or maybe he was still paralyzed from the shock that Sorun had done so well at the video game.

Wait. He'd done well. He was good at something.

Sorun was good at something.

"Sorun, you're really good at video games," Sonic marveled. "Like, really, really good. Nicole got close, but even she couldn't get a perfect score, and she's a computer!" An idea began to race in his mind as he hopped over the couch to sit in the gap between him and Mighty. "Hey, maybe this is it!"

"What's it?" the human asked

"Your skill! Your special something!" Sonic claimed as he wildly gestured to the TV. "You got a perfect score on your first try! Literally nobody else in the Freedom Fighters could do something like that! You don't think a skill like that would be helpful when nobody else can do it?"

Sorun blinked, and then frowned at Sonic's words while shaking his head in denial. "Yeah, amazing. Video games. The one thing in the world I'm actually good at and it's completely useless when it comes to fighting robots. You're reaching, Sonic."

"Well... yeah..." He honestly had a good point there, and once more Sonic found himself struggling with finding something good to say. But after some thinking he could practically feel a light bulb go over his head, and he grinned widely. "You could be a pilot!"

There would have been complete silence between them all if the TV wasn't still silently playing beeping sounds from the video game and if Mighty wasn't still in his stupefied state. Sonic was trying to appear encouraging while the pale teen was apparently struggling to process what the hedgehog had just suggested.

"... Pilot," Sorun slowly repeated. "You think that, because I beat a video game, I could be a pilot."

Sonic nodded vigorously. Maybe a little too vigorously, as it rapid motion caused Sorun to lean away from him. "Totally! I know that playing as a little ship in a video game isn't the same thing as flying a real ship, but the fact you did so good there has to mean something! And yeah, almost everybody in the Freedom Fighters has some flying skills, sure, but the only real pilot we have is Tails. And Antoine, too, on certain occasions. But if we had another pilot that would free up positions and they could be doing something else! It'd be great!"

He thought it was great, at least. Beyond great, even. Not only would it finally give Sorun something to contribute, it would free up more people to help out in the actual fighting. Maybe even Tails would have more time for his inventions and projects if Sorun took over some of the piloting work. It was a plan that worked out for everyone!

But unfortunately, Sorun didn't seem all that enthusiastic about the plan. If anything, he looked extremely hesitant at the idea. "I don't know... I've never flown anything in my entire life, Sonic. And I really don't think video game experience equates to real-life piloting experience."

"So you can learn!" Sonic suggested. "Tails could show you. He'd be more than happy to!"

"But isn't he busy?"

"Well... okay, yeah, we're all busy most of the time with Eggman, but we could make time!" A thought popped into his head. "In fact, I think Tails was free tomorrow! I'll just go ahead and ask him later and we can find him tomorrow morning."

Now Sorun was starting to look distressed, but for the life of Sonic he couldn't figure out why. "Sonic, I didn't really do too well the last time I did a... fight thing," he said. "You really wanna put me behind a plane and try again? I don't want to crash into the ground and explode or something."

"It's fine! You wouldn't be doing any fighting at all- that's all on us. And it wouldn't be right away. We'll have Tails square you away first and then we can ease you into the whole thing." He hopped off the couch while flashing Sorun a smile. "I'm gonna go find him right now. Don't worry, Sorun. We're gonna figure this out. I got a great feeling about this one!"

This was the answer he'd been searching for. He wasn't completely sure of it, but he was confident enough in it that Sonic may as well have been sure. Sorun wasn't raising any complaints, either, electing to just sit back in the couch and give Sonic a reluctant nod. It was all he needed, and like that Sonic bolted right out of Freedom HQ in search of Tails.

"Yeah. Yeah, this is the one." Sonic felt lighter to the point that he could have sworn he was running faster than normal, which only caused the smile he was wearing to widen. "It's all gonna work out now."

Well. That happened.

A withering sigh left Sorun as his back sunk further into the couch. All he'd wanted to do was play video games. To engage in his favorite pastime and take a break from it all for just a little bit. Maybe show off a bit by getting the high score just so he could feel a little better about himself, because at this point he needed it.

And now Sonic wanted him to be a pilot. All because of a video game.

He just couldn't catch a break anymore.

"Ugh, I thought I finally got out of fighting and then he goes and dumps this on me," Sorun thought as he rubbed at his forehead. "I guess it's technically not fighting, but... maybe he's got a point? Flying way above the ground, away from everything... Could this actually work?"

It had merits, now that he thought about it. An Egg Pawn certainly couldn't stab him if he was hundreds of feet above it in an airplane. It'd get everybody off his back if he started doing something useful like that, even if nobody had said anything about his uselessness barring Shadow. He most definitely wouldn't be bored, either, for better or worse.

But above all that? If he made enough of a difference and actually helped by letting more people fight instead of fly? It would mean the process of collecting the Chaos Emeralds so he could go home would speed up.

Maybe Sonic was on to something after all.

"So what do you think?" Sorun nearly jumped out of the couch when he heard the voice next to him, and turned towards Mighty who was looking at him in an expectant manner. After all the piloting talk he'd nearly forgotten he'd been sitting there the whole time. "About learning to fly? Think you'd be up to it?"

"... I guess?" Sorun gave the armadillo a shrug. "It's something to do. I can't fight, so this would be the next best thing, right?" A startling thought suddenly occurred to him. "Wait, Eggman doesn't have flying robots or anything like that, right?"

To his dismay, Mighty nodded. "Oh, yeah, he's got lots of flying types. He has a whole armada of ships he made, actually."

And there was the clincher. He wouldn't be completely safe if he became a pilot, not if there were flying robots. Or worse yet, weapons designed to take flying vehicles out. Sorun wouldn't be surprised in the least if something like that was a reality given the armada revelation, and even if it wasn't, which he highly doubted, there was still the flying robots and armada problem.

Mighty must have seen the second thoughts going through Sorun's face, because he immediately leaned forwards and waved his hands to get Sorun's attention. "But I think Sonic has a really good point!" he said. "If you were a pilot it would make things a lot easier on Tails and Antoine, and everybody else! And it's not like you'd ever be alone, either. Somebody would have your back." He gave Sorun a small smile. "After all, it's not like we'd ever let you get shot out of the sky or something horrible like that. We all look out for each other, and I really think you should consider this piloting idea."

He really didn't want to now that Sorun knew there was an air of danger involved with this piloting idea. Saying that they'd watch his back didn't mean much to him after the crane incident, but he was willing to write that off as a fluke if he needed to. And as it was, he was helping wage a guerrilla war against an army of robots. Pretty much anything he did would be dangerous.

And, of course, the merits of it still existed. He'd be helping, which would speed things up, which would get him the Chaos Emeralds faster. Then he could finally go home and forget all of this.

"I'll... think about it." He was still torn between his personal safety over getting home faster, but as things stood now he wasn't in any condition to make a decision, especially right away. He needed time to mull it over.

It seemed to be a good enough answer for Mighty, who nodded happily in response to Sorun's answer. "That's great, Sorun. Seriously." He turned back to the TV and pointed at the game console. "So, uh, there's a racing game we could both play. You wanna take a go?"

If Sorun was being honest with himself? Yes. He could easily go for something like that, if only to take his mind off the piloting idea. "Sure. Load it up."

And that was how the rest of that day had gone, with Sorun wasting the hours away playing video games with Mighty. A few short conversations passed between the two, and Sorun decided that Mighty was a pretty decent guy. He was in no way a good video game partner, especially compared to his friend David, but he was a solid person regardless. Solid to the point that Sorun was almost upset when they had to say their goodbyes at the end of the day and go home, Sorun back to Sonic's home and Mighty to his room at the Freedom HQ.

Out of all the days he'd spent on Mobius, this one so far was Sorun's favorite.

A/N- Sorun would have crushed it if I made this one of those Gamer fics. Guy's a min-maxer.

Chapter 10

Recursion Error

Episode 10- Ace Combat didn't prepare me for this

So he decided to go ahead with the piloting in the end.

There were many reservations Sorun had with the idea, sure. The chance of great bodily harm and dying chiefly among them. But the benefit- namely, getting home as soon as possible- outweighed that in his opinion. So yeah. He'd be a pilot. What's was the worst that could happen?

He'd die. The worst that could happen is that he would die. But it was a relatively low risk, so he'd take it.

Unfortunately, learning how to fly a plane under Tails' tutelage, in addition to bruising his ego from learning from an eleven-year-old, was a bit more involved than he expected. Actually, everything about learning to fly a plane was a bit more than he expected. His main hope had been it would be just like it was in video games and he'd get the hang of it immediately, but it was nothing like the flying simulators he played.

"Okay, so the yoke stick controls the pitch and the, uh, the..."

"Yaw," Tails helpfully supplied.

"Yaw, yeah, that." With a hum, Sorun tapped at one of the gauges on the plane's dashboard. "This is the fuel gauge, right?"

Tails shook his head. "No, that's the altimeter."

"... Where's the on button, again?"

Two hours of this. Two hours of the both of them sitting in the blue airplane's cockpit with Tails trying his best to teach him the controls and basics of flying. But none of it was sticking to Sorun. The basics of basics, sure, but everything beyond that? Practically in one ear and out the other. He'd mix one control instrument up for another or forget something important entirely, and then it would only turn into a confusing mess from there.

Worse yet, he could see it was getting to Tails. He wasn't exactly irritated with Sorun's ineptitude, but the human teen could tell that the fox was beginning to grow exhausted over this. His fault for being a terrible student, he supposed. So he decided to be merciful and just end it here.

"Tails, let's be real. I'm not getting any of this." Sorun moved over to the edge of the cockpit and sat down on the edge, with his legs hanging over the side of the plane.

He heard something shuffle next to him, and looked to his right to see that Tails had sat down next to him. "What aren't you getting?" the fox asked. "Is it the-"

"The whole thing," Sorun finished for him. "I don't know, it's- it's really complicated. The whole constant adjustment due to altitude and wind speed, calculating fuel consumption based on what feels like a million factors, I still don't understand what a knot is-"

"It's a unit of measurement concerning wind speed."

Sorun sighed. "Yes, that, thank you, Tails." His feet began to kick outwards. "I don't even really wanna learn to fly if I'm being completely honest with you. It was all Sonic's idea and I kind of just went along with it, and I thought it'd be easy to learn but now that I'm actually going through with it... man, I just don't wanna."

Tails frowned at Sorun. Deeply. "It kind of sounds to me like you're just too lazy to learn, Sorun."

"Nooo... that's not it at all, man, come on." Actually, that was what it sounded like, wasn't it? Sorun could see how Tails would make that assumption based on what Sorun said. And now that he thought of it, it was kind of how he felt. "Fine, maybe a little bit. Like, the littlest of little."

The frown the fox was wearing turned into one of disappointment.

"Hey, c'mon, don't give me that look," Sorun pleaded. "It's not like I'm not trying at all, but this-" he waved to the plane's controls, "- this is all beyond me, and with the whole war thing going on in the background I don't think you guys are gonna have a reasonable enough amount of time to train me. Especially at the rate we're going."

"It'd go faster if you could just remember the basic maneuvers the control yoke makes," Tails told him.

"Yeah, yeah, pitch and yee-haw, I remember." He missed the small twitch Tails' eyelid made at his remark. "The only reason I even went along with Sonic's idea was because it was something I could do, you know? Something I could contribute to the team so I could get home faster. But I don't think this is gonna cut it."

There was an understanding hum from Tails, who began to kick his feet in the same way Sorun was. "Was that really the only reason?" he asked him in a quiet voice.

Sorun took a second to think. "Well, that and I'm, well... a bit self-conscious about the fact that I'm not really helping out all that much. And it kind of makes standing around people awkward 'cause I feel like I just don't belong."

Tails perked up slightly at that explanation. "I think I understand," he said. "You feel guilty about not contributing all that much and just want to help out, right?"

"You're giving me too much credit here, Tails. I just don't want to feel awkward around people since I'm practically mooching off of you all at this point." He couldn't actually say that, of course, because he was already a shallow enough person in everybody's eyes. The last thing he wanted to do was commit social suicide when his reputation was already on shaky legs to begin with. "Sure, something like that."

"I didn't think you cared so much about what other people thought about you," Tails commented.

"Well, I don't- huh. Wait." Why should he care? Reasonably speaking, what everybody thought of him shouldn't matter in the long run. As long as he got home in the end, everybody's feelings towards him should be completely irrelevant. Sure he'd look like the scummiest person in the world if he just lazed around and did nothing until all the Chaos Emeralds were gathered, but who cared what they all thought once he left? It wouldn't matter.

Except, wait, they might take exception to him if he did that. He kept forgetting. He didn't think him doing nothing and drawing everybody's ire would negatively impact the gathering of the Chaos Emeralds, but it sure wouldn't help. And even more, he just didn't want to be that guy . Nobody liked that guy, and he sure wasn't going to become him.

Or he would try not to, at least. And he didn't think he was doing too good a job.

"Are you good at anything?" The only reason Sorun didn't glare at Tails was because he'd asked the question in such an innocent tone. As it was, Sorun just sighed and shook his head.

"Video games. I'm good at video games. That's about it," he answered. "You wouldn't happen to have a big mech or something I could pilot with a gamepad, do you? 'Cause I could do that."

Tails chuckled, and then shook his head. "Sorry, but no. We don't have anything like that."

Damn. Of all the crazy things they had in Knothole, mechs wasn't one of them. That was something he could have actually made work.

"Ah, well. It's fine." Sorun scooted off of the plane and landed on the ground below. "I'll figure something out. Don't know what exactly, but-"

The sound of a speeding object approached Sorun's ears, and he turned around right as a high-speed, blue object blurred into his view and stopped right in front of him. The sudden stop caused a cloud of dirt to be kicked up, making Sorun cough and wave in front of his face to clear the air of dust.

"Sorun! Yo." Sorun's vision cleared just in time to see Sonic standing right in front of him. "How are the flying lessons going?"

With a quick glance back at the plane, Sorun shook his head after turning back to Sonic. "Not too well," he admitted. "Piloting isn't really clicking with me."

"Aw, really?" Sonic's shoulders slumped in disappointment, but then almost immediately picked right back up as a grin grew on his face. "Well, I know what's gonna cheer you right up! You and Tails need to get back to the HQ ASAP!"

Something to cheer him up? He doubted it, but he decided to humor the hedgehog regardless out of curiosity. "What's going on at HQ?"

"Oh, I don't wanna spoil the whole thing. You'll have to follow me back to the HQ to find out." He turned around, but then swiveled his head back far enough to glance at Sorun with a single eye. "But I will say there's a good chance at us finally nabbing a Chaos Emerald today."

Sonic was right. That did cheer him right up.

There was a clear memory in Sorun's mind about an offhand comment Mighty had made about there being a lab in Freedom HQ. He'd expressed interest at the time, but in the face of playing a video game it had quickly worn off. But today he had good reason to finally enter the coveted room to see what it was all about.

And boy, did it not look anything like how the rest of Freedom HQ looked.

It was almost like stepping into another world (again) when Sorun walked through the door leading to the lab. It looked... modern. Beyond modern, even. Sleek metal plating covering all the walls, smooth flooring, lights everywhere to make the room bright. There were computers and other machines Sorun couldn't identify lining practically the whole perimeter of the room, and at the very back there were large screens bolted to the wall with an extremely large computer under it.

Place was even air conditioned. It made him wonder why this room got air conditioning and not the rest of the HQ.

Sorun decided to wander to a nearby machine that caught his eyes. Sonic and Tails, who he'd followed into the lab, walked forwards towards the large computers and screens in the back of the lab. Sally and Rotor were there waiting for them.

"What's this thing?" Sorun wondered as he stopped next to a... thing. A small, metal pole with wires running out the top and going all the way to outlets in the wall. "Some weird metal... yeah, I don't know."

"- So the sensors we had in that sector went off?" His attention was drawn from the pole to the four Mobians at the computers in the back. He cursed silently at missing the beginning of the conversation and made his way over to them.

"What's this about Chaos Emeralds and sensors?" Sorun asked as he joined up with the group of four.

He saw Rotor glance back at Sorun before facing back forwards to point at the computer screens. "Back when we were trying to get the Chaos Emeralds back from Eggman, we managed to cobble together these long-range sensors that could detect Chaos Emeralds. They give off a unique energy signature, so it was easy enough to calibrate them to pick up Chaos energy. We set them up in a bunch of sectors all around the eastern portion of Northamer just in case." He tapped a few buttons and one of the computer screens flipped to an image. "Well, we got a ping on one of the sensors, and the camera we installed in it picked this up."

Sorun squinted at the screen. It looked like plain enough grove at first glance, but what caught his eyes was what was up in the sky, just barely inside the camera's field of view. A ship, from the looks of it. A ship painted black and red that almost looked like the kind of air carrier he'd seen in pictures on Earth, except this one was floating in the air from large thrusters on its sides and back.

"That's one of Eggman's ships from his armada..." Sally grimly mumbled. "Don't tell me..."

"Yep. Signal from the Emerald is coming right from it," Rotor confirmed. "My best guess is that he sent out detachments of Badniks to go find the Emeralds, and this one found one. And then it just happened to fly over the sensor for us to pick up."

"That doesn't sound good. I need those Emeralds to get home." Frowning, Sorun began rubbing at his chin. "Everybody makes it sound like they had a really hard time getting them the first time around. They'd probably have an even harder time getting them a second time if Eggman gets them all back."

And that just wouldn't do. He'd rather not directly confront the evil genius with the robot army on top of everything else in the effort of getting all the Emeralds back, but if he was gunning for them as hard as Sorun was, that may not have been possible. The prospect alone made Sorun uneasy.

"Well, we know where it is, right? Then it's simple." Sonic balled one of his fists up and slammed it into his open palm. "It's not even one his bigger ships. Just one of his scouting cruisers from the looks of it. Tails flies me over, I go down and bust heads, grab the Emerald, and get out." He turned his grinning head towards the human. "Oh. Sorun's coming, too."

Sorun's heart rate suddenly spiked. "Uh... no?" He backed up a step away from Sonic. "Fighting robots didn't really work out so well for me last time."

"No, don't worry about that. You won't be fighting." Sonic zoomed next to Tails. "You said flying lessons weren't going so hot, right? So why not just watch Tails fly the plane for real?"

A beat of silence passed between everybody, and as Sorun stared at Sonic owlishly he nodded at the hedgehog for him to continue.

"Look, it's simple. Tails flies the plane, you sit there and watch, and while you're all doing that I'll go and take the Chaos Emeralds back." Sonic locked his fingers back behind his head as he leaned back with a pleased smile on his face. "Perfect plan all around."

He didn't think so. Sorun thought it wasn't, at least. He wasn't wild about flying in the same cockpit as Tails since that seat was so small, but he could see them making it work. And actually, as long as he didn't have to fight as long as Sonic handled everything... and he did say it was a small cruiser. "Yyyyeah, alright," Sorun agreed after a moment of thought. "If Tails is up for it, sure."

The fox shrugged. "I'm good if he's good."

Sally blinked in confusion at the three of them. "You're trying to teach Sorun how to fly the Tornado?" she asked. "How's that been working out?"

"Well-" Sonic began, but was cut short when Sorun lightly shoved him.

"What're we waiting for? Ship's getting further away the longer we wait c'mon let's go."

Not even waiting for any reply, Sorun left the lab. Everybody else silently stared after the human, with the silence being broken by a bemused chuckle from Sally. "So flying's not going well?" she guessed.

Sonic gave her a small shrug. "He trying." He turned to Tails. "Come on. We gotta go get that Emerald."

"Yep. Still not getting it."

It wasn't like he wasn't making an effort of learning an airplane's controls. The thing was, learning an airplane's controls was about a hundred times more convoluted than Sorun would have ever imagined. At this point he felt like he'd have better luck trying to learn to fly a UFO from watching an alien. And upon thinking harder, he realized that this was technically already happening.

There wasn't much to say about what happened after they left the lab. Tails had hopped in the plane, Sorun had squeezed in the seat right behind him, and Sonic didn't even bother to sit in the seat behind them and instead chose to stand on the wing. Taking off into the air had been an event without flair, though Sorun was more focused on Tails and his hands working the Tornado's controls over the actual scenery.

He didn't even realize they were already hundreds of feet up in the air until he looked away after a half hour later, eyes half-lidded and exhausted. He rubbed at his eyes, and then moved his head over to the edge of the plane so he could look at the land they were flying over.

"It really is just all trees, huh?" It really did feel like the whole eastern portion of what was once America was nothing but forest. Forests, plains, groves, and every once in a while a small mountain or large hill. A grand vista of green that carried on all the way to the horizon, and even further Sorun imagined. It still boggled his mind how different Mobius looked compared to Earth. "'Least it looks pretty, I guess. For a post-apocalyptic world at least."

But what boggled his mind even more than that was seeing Sonic stand on the plane's wing with his arms crossed without even showing a hint that he was having trouble keeping his balance. How Mobians managed to accomplish such a feat, Sorun didn't know, because he'd seen Mighty and Knuckles do it, too. He knew that Tails sometimes made rough turns and dives- he'd seen it watching the controls. But Sonic was making it look as easy as standing on still ground.

"Maybe their kind is just really good at balance. Chalk up something else Mobians can do that humans can't," Sorun morosely thought as he looked ahead. He saw something that caused his eyes to widen. "Hey, ain't that...? Yeah, it is."

The small cruiser they were pursuing was finally coming into view, and from Sorun's perspective it was anything but small. And it was only now he realized he wasn't exaggerating when he compared it to a air carrier; it really was that big, maybe a bit bigger.

It was a bit of a sobering sight, really. A flying air carrier, something that Sorun never once in his life ever thought he'd see. So distracted by the sight was he that when Tails dove the plane towards it he'd almost lost his own balance and had to grab onto the sides of the cockpit for support.

"Egg Carrier spotted!" Tails called out as he dipped the plane downwards. "It looks like they spotted us, too! They're aiming their anti-air cannons at us!"

"Anti-what now?" Sorun's irises snapped down to the ship they were flying towards, and they constricted in fear when he saw the weapons Tails was referring to. Six double-barreled cannons were lined on both sides of the ship's main deck, with all twelve cannons slowly swiveling up towards the plane. "Isn't that a bad thing!?" Sorun yelled out as the plane began flying overhead.

He would have thought it was a problem. Getting blown out of the sky seemed like a huge problem that had Sorun extremely concerned, and it was written on his face. But unlike the human teen, the two Mobians he was riding with looked the opposite of concerned. Tails, wearing a smile, was shooting Sonic a knowing look, and Sonic, for his part, had the most confident smirk on his face Sorun could see.

"A problem? Hah, as if!" The hedgehog crouched down into a running stance on the plane's wing as the Tornado began to swoop near the guns. "Watch this Sorun!"

And then he jumped off. Just like that, he jumped off right as the plane passed over one of the guns. With his eyes locked onto the hedgehog's body, all Sorun could do was stare as Sonic's body fell towards the gun. Much to his confusion, right before impacting with the anti-air cannon Sonic had curled his body into a ball. An oddly spherical ball, he had noted, with the quills on the back of his head sticking out from the sphere.

And then, even more oddly, he began spinning.

Sorun didn't know how. His knowledge on physics was extremely limited, but even he knew that there must have been some law of Newton's that said something couldn't build up that much momentum in such a short amount of time while falling, even with the kind of super speed Sonic had. But apparently that hedgehog defied the impossible, because his curled-up body began spinning to such a degree that any features disappeared as his body blurred, making him indistinguishable from a perfect, blue sphere. And Sorun could have sworn he even started to slightly glow, though that could have been a trick of the light from the bright sun overhead.

After all that, Sonic's spinning, curled-up body slammed into the barrels of the anti-air gun. The barrels proceeded to fall onto the deck of the ship. Just like that. Sonic had used his body to cut right through the barrels. There hadn't even been any resistance; his body went through those large, steel tubes like it was nothing.

But he didn't stop there. After cutting through the barrels of the first anti-air cannon, he uncurled and landed on his feet on the deck of the ship before sprinting at super speeds towards the next anti-air cannon. And just like the first, he'd curled up into a ball, span, and launched himself up to the cannon before cutting through a barrels all in a time frame that Sorun would have blinked if he missed. By the time the severed barrels fell onto the deck of the ship Sonic was already sprinting towards his next target.

"Oh, he can- he can just do that," Sorun marveled as he watched what should have been an intensive battle be rendered practically trivial by Sonic's efforts. He actually found himself at awe at the sight. The sheer power of it. "He can seriously just buzzsaw his way through those things like that?"

"It's pretty cool, huh?" Tails commented with a light chuckle. "Yeah, that's our Sonic. He isn't called the Hero of Mobius for nothing, after all. People all over the world look up to him."

"Hero, huh?" By the time Sorun got that thought out, the last anti-air cannon had been completely disabled by Sonic, who was waiting in the middle of the ship's deck and waving up to the airplane. Right after, Tails began to slow the plane down and lower it towards the deck where Sonic was. "I can see it," Sorun thought with a frown as he looked at his right hand. "I just don't know what he sees in me. How am I supposed to help with anything with guys like THAT in the Freedom Fighters? How are the Freedom Fighters slowly losing if people like that exist? "

It didn't even surprise him anymore, but seeing somebody as laid back and as nice as Sonic become something short of a weapon of mass destruction and lay waste to air carrier's entire anti-air defense system was beyond humbling for Sorun. If it wasn't already shattered to dust, his confidence would have taken a big hit at seeing that. As it was, he barely felt anything at all at this point. Just a bad feeling in his stomach he couldn't quite describe.

Was it fear? Sorun honestly didn't know, but he couldn't help but wonder how it was that Eggman was successfully taking over the world despite the fact people like Sonic were fighting him. It didn't imply anything good, that was for sure.

The Tornado's wheels touched down on the steel deck of the ship and slowly came to a halt next to Sonic, who stood in wait with his arms crossed and a big grin on his face. Sorun still had an awestruck look on his face mixed with downcast eyes, but he managed to tear his gaze away from the sheer destruction around him down to the hedgehog standing below the plane.

"How was that for a way past cool display, Sorun?" Sonic asked, an accomplished gleam shining in his eye. "Impressive or what?"

"Way past c- what?" Sorun blinked in confusion, than shook it away. "Yeah, man, sure. You took 'spin to win' to a new level." He slumped against the edge of the cockpit and let his arms hang limply down. "You're amazing. What do you want me to say?"

He'd said that in the most bland tone he could possibly muster, but Sonic didn't seem to notice. He'd adopted a thinking pose as he blinked in surprise at something Sorun said. "Spin to win?" he slowly repeated, and then a large smile broke on his face. "Hey, that sounds really cool! Why haven't I thought of that before!? I'm gonna use that from now on! Thanks, Sorun!"

"..." Sorun opened his mouth, and then closed. "Ah, what have I done?"

"Anyways, Tails! Get down here!" Sonic spun on his feet and pointed down the deck of the ship, where the command structure that Sorun assumed led to the ship's interior was. "Let's go get that Chaos Emerald and jet out real quick!"

"Wait, Tails is going too?" Sorun asked as Tails spun his tails up and flew out from the cockpit. "You guys are leaving me here alone?"

While hovering in the air, Tails spun around so he could address Sorun. "I'm technical support," he explained. "Sonic can usually navigate through Eggman's traps fine and locked doors usually aren't a problem for him, but knowing the Doctor that Emerald will be locked away somewhere real secure. He might need my help getting to it or solving any other problems that come up."

"Yeah, but don't worry!" Sonic gave Sorun a thumbs-up. "Pretty much all of the heat's gonna be on us, so you can just chill out on the Tornado 'til we get back!"

That sounded reasonable enough. As long as it kept all the danger away from Sorun, he was fine with it. "Okay. Stay safe," Sorun said as he waved the two goodbye.

The two Mobians gave him a nod, and then left to do whatever it was they did. Blast through a legion of robots and other deadly things, probably. Do other things that would usually express a high chance of massive bodily harm that would likely be blown through like nothing.

As for Sorun? He planned on huddling up in the Tornado's cockpit to wait it all out, completely safe and away from all of that. He might have even been able to sleep, too, but Sonic and Tails were causing so much of a commotion inside of the ship already that it was shaking from all the explosions.

"This works. Right? Yeah." Locking his hands behind his head while kicking his feet up on the plane's controls, Sorun let out a content sigh as he relaxed in the pilot's seat while trying his best to ignore the pandemonium shaking the Egg Carrier. "The people with super powers can go do the actual dangerous stuff while I just stay behind like this, all carefree-like. No murder bots trying to turn me into a shishkebab, no falling construction equipment, and no tangible threat to my life... yep. I can deal with this no problem."

If the rest of his tenure here on Mobius turned out like this, than it would be smooth sailing. Hopefully. The whole "Eggman was still technically winning and gaining ground on them" bit of the current situation had him a little nervous, but seeing a blue hedgehog slice through heavy artillery like that had a way of making him forget problems. And it wasn't like there was much he could do to change the situation anyways, so he didn't see the point in worrying about it.

So yeah. Staying back and letting everybody else handle all the fighting? It seemed like a solid plan for getting through this nightmare.

At least it did until a saw a metal lance fly over his head.

"... Nah, that didn't happen," Sorun decided as he closed his eyes. Right as he did, he could see the sunlight bleeding through his eyelids darken for just a second as something else passed over his head. Seeing this, Sorun groaned out loudly before picking himself up to see what the commotion was.

When he popped his head over the plane's windshield to see what was throwing lances, he let out a high-pitched shriek and ducked back into the cockpit.

Egg Pawns. It was dozens and dozens of Egg Pawns slowly marching towards the plane. There were circular hatches all along the deck of the ship that would periodically open, with a metal tube shooting up through the hatch. The tube would open and a Egg Pawn would march out towards the plane.

"Oh shit! Oh man! That ain't good!" Sorun heavily blinked his eyes a few times and peeked his head over the plane's dashboard just to make sure he was correct in what he saw. He screamed and lowered his head when a lance flew just over his head after an Egg Pawn had thrown it. "Alright-alright-alright! Options! What are my options!?" He squeezed his eyes shut to try and think of some idea, but much to his dismay nothing even closely resembling a reasonable solution came to mind. "... Shit!"

And here he'd been congratulating himself on having found such a perfect solution for surviving this mess of a war he'd been dragged into. It apparently wasn't as foolproof a plan as he'd been hoping it was, but that thought wasn't nearly as terrifying as the sight of a small legion of robots coming to rip him limb-from-limb. Literally, if the fact one had tried to skewer his head said anything.

"Oh, man...! What am I supposed to do!? We're hundreds of feet in the air and the only thing separating me from them is this airplane!" Right as that thought ran through the teen's head, he slowly blanked out as a realization came to him. "... Wait, you goddamn moron! You're in an airplane! Do something!"

Just like that, a determined scowl folded over Sorun's features as he sat forwards in the pilot's seat and looked at the controls. The controls that featured a myriad of lever, knobs, and switches that was already making the human teen more befuddled than he would have liked. For the life of him, he just couldn't remember what most of these did even after Tails showed him. Multiple times at that, too.

"Alright, uh... so if I wanna fly the plane, I... on switch is this, right?" Sorun muttered to himself as he flipped a small switch near the center of the control board. To his delight, he felt the plane shudder to life as the propeller in front began to spin. "'Kay 'kay 'kay 'kay... so then what I do is... uh..."

He couldn't even say he wished he'd paid more attention, because he did pay attention. But all those lessons were quickly slipping his mind, and the fact that the Egg Pawns were getting closer by the second was making him panic more and more to the point his vision was becoming shaky, and that was just making him forget faster.

"Damn, why didn't I write any of this stuff down!?" he cursed. "Ergh, maybe... no, that's not the... or maybe it is!? Fuck it. I'm just gonna start hitting random buttons."

A pretty terrible strategy if he was being completely honest with himself, but he was extremely desperate and didn't have any better ideas. And doing something was better than nothing, even if he didn't know what he was doing. So with that in mind, Sorun began to randomly pick out and press different buttons in the hope that one of them would do something to make the plane fly away from the robots.

"Uh, this one?" He flipped a small switch, but nothing happened. "This one!" There was a slight jerk in the plane, but otherwise nothing else happened. "Oh, come on! How 'bout this one!?" He pushed a small, green button, causing a pair of windshield wipers to being wiping across the plane's windshield. "That's... aw, yeah, great," Sorun breathed out, "just what I needed!"

A distressed whine sounded from the back of Sorun's throat as he looked at the wall of controls, switches, and flashing lights in front of him, but it was quickly becoming apparent to the teen that this was all beyond him. He didn't know what any of this did, and the closest Egg Pawn was a good ten seconds away from making it to the plane.

With his eyes flashing around the control board wildly, Sorun's gaze stopped upon the throttle stick right in front of him. There was a small, red button on top of the stick, and in his desperate attempt to make the plane do anything helpful he'd thoughtlessly pressed the button.

Boom!

Something peculiar had happened. One of the approaching Egg Pawns that had been right in front of the airplane exploded, right after Sorun had pressed the button on the throttle stick. Sorun blinked owlishly at the small, black burnt spot the robot had been standing previously, and even all the other Egg Pawns seemed to stop and stare in surprise at their missing comrade. After a single, heavy blink, Sorun slowly moved his eyes back to the throttle stick and hit the button again.

There was a high-pitched, electronic thrum from the plane, and in the next instant two short beams of yellow light flew out of the front of the plane and impacted the Egg Pawn that had been standing behind the one that had exploded. Just like the first, the second Egg Pawn exploded in a bright flash. When the dust settled, there weren't even any parts leftover. It had been completely destroyed.

"... This thing has laser cannons...?" Sorun's mouth dropped open in surprise at his discovery, and then just as suddenly clamped shut into a thin frown. "Oh, fuck you , Rotor. 'Freedom Fighters don't use guns' my ass. You'll trust the eleven-year-old with a weaponized plane but won't even give me a gun!?"

The sheer gratitude towards the world for this new discovery was easily overshadowed by the simmering rage he was beginning to feel bubble up within him, but the heavy footfalls Sorun heard distracted him from those thoughts. He looked up from the button at the Egg Pawns, and almost laughed out loud when he saw they had all turned around and were running away from the airplane as fast as their robot legs could carry them. He even heard distorted, electronic screaming coming from them.

Well, he wasn't going to have that. Sonic and Tails had enough trouble on their end as it was; they didn't need all these robots to pile up on them as they searched for the Chaos Emeralds. But even more importantly, Sorun was still incredibly sore over nearly being killed by that one Egg Pawn. And now here he was, manning a plane with a laser gun. Pointed right in front of them all.

A savage grin slowly formed on Sorun's face, and he hissed out "Therapy...!" as his hands roughly gripped the throttle stick with his thumbs over the button.

He'd thought it was impossible ever since he failed to kill a single Badnik, but he'd done it: he'd gotten destroying robots down to a science. He couldn't move the plane, but with the propeller running he could at least turn it with the stick, and that was all he needed to aim. From there it was a trivial matter of merely aiming the plane at groups of robots and hitting the button to fire the laser cannons and destroy them. Sometimes he didn't even need to hit them; the blast made from the laser impacting the ground near them projected enough force to destroy robots sometimes.

"And here I was, always complaining about turret sections in video games." He didn't even know levels of catharsis this intense was possible, but to Sorun it felt that every Egg Pawn destroyed sent a burst of ecstasy through his entire system. Seeing something he'd feared so much and had traumatized him running in fear and being blown up in droves- by his hand, no less. He was ecstatic. "Never again. I'll never say bad things about turret sections again."

The sound of hysterical laughter coming from the teen was drowned out by the sound of laser fire and the dying wails of Egg Pawns.

"Do you think Sorun's okay?"

"Why wouldn't he be okay? All the trouble was inside the ship." A brightly-glowing, diamond-shaped object was tossed up in air, and then fell down on it's tip on top of Sonic's finger as he balanced the spinning gem on top of his appendage. "Does it feel like Egghead was slacking with this one? Felt like he was slacking."

Because really, stealing as something as valuable as a Chaos Emerald of all things from the mad Doctor shouldn't have been a complete cakewalk. But that what it was: a complete cakewalk. A lackluster amount of robots guarding the interior of the ship, some of the most simplest traps the pair of ever encountered in their careers with dealing with the man, not so much as one giant, super robot to fight...

There wasn't even so much as a single spike trap. It was almost insulting.

"Well, this was presumably a scouting vessel made to look for an Emerald and bring it straight back to Eggman," Tails reminded him.

The pair were making their way through the darkened corridors of the Egg Carrier, with the blue light being given off by the Chaos Emerald Sonic held being their only source of illumination. Surprisingly, they'd yet to encounter any resistance after destroying the storage crate holding the Emerald and taking it away. Sonic would have assumed that meant they were walking into a trap, but they'd yet to encounter anything. And it didn't feel like a trap.

"Yeah," Sonic agreed, "but-"

"It probably isn't gonna be as easy the next time around," Tails continued. "He manned the place with some basic Badniks, but nothing overwhelming for people like you or me. I doubt somebody like him is gonna make the same mistake twice."

"Mm, yeah, you'd think. But it's Eggman we're talking about here."

The fox smirked at the jab. "Heh, yeah." He pointed to a door they were approaching. "That's the door we came in from. Let's get out of here and back to Sorun so we can leave."

"I hear that." Sonic began tossing the blue Emerald up and down in his hands as Tails fiddled with the controls to the door. "Hope Sorun didn't get too bored out there while we had all the fun."

"Are you kidding? Sorun probably slept through that whole thing. Besides, I don't really think he considers this type of thing fun." There was a small spark from the door control Tails was fiddling with. "Actually, I think that's just you, Sonic."

He couldn't disagree with that, and shrugged in response. His thoughts were still mainly on the human stuck in the airplane, however. He should have been fine- he'd cleared out all those cannons on top of the ship and everything, after all.

"Ah, you're worrying yourself too much," Sonic thought to himself as the doors leading outside slowly slid open. "Sorun's probably enjoying sleeping through all the action. Guess I can't really blame him after what happened the last time he tried fighting, but the fact he even came out here with us is a good sign, right?" He pursed his lips and nodded. "Yeah. I hope this piloting thing pans out for him, 'cause- wait, huh?"

Of all the things he expected when the two of them walked back out to the deck of the ship, a scorched deck littered with bits and pieces of Badniks scattered everywhere wasn't one of them. Sonic's walk slowed to a halt as he gazed out at the destruction around him, and Tails did the same as he stared wide-eyed at all the robot bits around them.

"Where did all... is this where all the Badniks went?" Sonic wondered as he looked around. "Huh. No wonder the resistance on the inside was so lackluster, 'cause... wait." A thought came to him, and he gasped out. "Oh, no! Sorun!"

Tails looked up to Sonic in confusion after hearing his panicked cry, but then grew horrified as he realized the same thing Sonic realized. Most of the Egg Pawns on the ship had been sent to the upper deck after the plane. That's why there was so little resistance on the inside; they'd all been up here.

"Argh, we were so stupid!" Sonic thought as the pair of Mobians whirled towards where they had left the plane. "We thought it was going so easy when of course they were all up here! Did they attack Sorun!? Is he...!? Wait. Sorun?"

Both Sonic and Tails had sprinted and flown respectively towards the plane in panic when they'd seen all the destroyed Egg Pawns, but as they grew closer their frantic approach slowed down when they saw that the plane was perfectly fine. Even better, Sorun was there and looked no worse for wear. He was sitting on the deck of the ship and leaning against one of the plane's wheels, with one knee propped up and an arm slung over it.

A relieved sigh escaped both of them, though Sonic had still blinked in surprise as he approached the human and called out his name.

"Sorun? Hey, what happened out here?"

The black-haired teen turned his head towards Sonic, and the hedgehog could have sworn that something was a bit off with him. He wasn't smiling, but his lips were curved up in a way that suggested that he had been smiling and he'd simply grown too exhausted to keep it up. His eyes seemed drowsy, too, and his breathing seemed a bit heavier than usual.

"Oh, Sonic. Tails. You're both back." Even Sorun's voice seemed tired. "Hey, what happened to no guns?" He looked up towards the front of the Tornado. "'Cause that felt like a gun. What's up with that?"

That certainly hadn't been something Sonic was expecting him to ask. "Huh? What do you mean?"

"Oh, after you guys left a bunch- like, a BUNCH- of robots popped up outta the ground." Sorun waved his hand at the field of robot parts and scorch marks. "I fumbled around with the plane's buttons and found the laser cannon button. So I shot all the robots with the laser cannon. Why is there a laser cannon?"

Both of the Mobians blinked, glanced at each other, and then looked back to Sorun. "You destroyed all of those Badniks on your own?" Tails questioned him with a surprised tone of voice.

Sorun shrugged. "Technically the plane's the one that blew 'em up, but yeah."

"You... seriously?" A large smile began to grow on Sonic's face. "That's amazing, Sorun! You managed to blow up all those robots on your own!"

The human teen thumbed the plane. "Plane."

"Same difference!" Compared to his performance so far, this was the hugest leap Sorun could have made! Sure he needed the plane to beat all those Badniks, but even that alone was more than most people could have managed. Sonic almost couldn't help the feeling of swelling pride that was welling up inside of him. "It couldn't have been easy shooting all those bots, huh, Sorun?"

"I mean... it kind of was," Sorun admitted with a shrug. "You just aim the plane and shoot. And they all started running when I blew the first one up." His face scrunched up in confusion. "Also apparently robots... feel fear, I guess?"

"Yeah, Eggman has some real weird priorities when it comes to programming robots, but don't worry about that!" The hedgehog zipped to Sorun's side and gave his shoulder a teasing shake. "You must be feeling great after all that."

The pale teen slowly shrugged the hand off his shoulder, but Sonic had caught that small smile that formed on his face. The brief sight alone was enough to make him happy. "Yeah, felt real good," he agreed. "But seriously, how come you got laser cannons on a plane when you all don't use guns?"

"Uh... what does the Tornado's weapons systems have to do with guns?" Tails asked as he walked up to the two.

Sorun shot the fox a questioning glance. "Are you trying to tell me that guns aren't okay, but laser planes are?"

"The Tornado needed a defense system," Tails answered. "I couldn't just build her with nothing. She would have gotten shot out of the sky otherwise."

The human look bewildered at the explanation, but he quickly shook the confusion off. "That's a really weird distinction for you guys to make, but whatever." He pointed to the glowing gem in Sonic's hands. "That the Chaos Emerald? Baller. Let's go."

After stretching his arms over his head, Sorun climbed up to his feat and turned to the airplane before he began climbing up towards the cockpit. Tails looked at Sonic, and then gave a shrug before spinning his tails up to fly to the same seat Sorun was settling into.

Before going to the plane himself, Sonic looked down at the blue Emerald in his hand, hummed, and looked up at the plane. "Hey, Tails," he called up, "you think Sorun could fly us back instead of you?"

Tails blinked in surprise. "What?"

All the exhaustion in Sorun's eyes shifted into panic. "What!?"

"He's been watching you fly the thing, right? And he just took out all those Badnik's with it!" He jumped up to the Tornado's wing and gave the two a reassuring smile. "It'll give him a chance to show us how much he's learned."

"I dunno..." Tails looked back at Sorun, who was completely still as his eyes darted between Tails and Sonic. "You think he's really ready, Sonic?"

"Aw, sure, and if he messes up you'll be right there to correct him. What's the worse that could happen?"

The walk back to Freedom HQ had been an uncomfortably quiet one, with Sorun doing his best to not look at Tails while Sonic walked besides them tossing the Chaos Emerald up and down in his hands. Sorun felt he couldn't have opened the door to the HQ fast enough. The three soon found themselves navigating the short halls and stepping down the steps towards the living room, though Sorun could still feel the disgruntlement roiling off of Tails.

"Never again," the fox told him as the three stepped down into the living room. "You're never touching my airplane again until you learn to fly."

"I said I'm sorry," Sorun muttered in a defeated tone.

"Sorry!? You almost crashed us three times! Three! You lost one of the landing wheels when you clipped that mountain!"

Sorun rounded on Tails and pointed an index finger at him. "That mountain came out of nowhere, Tails. Anybody could have made that mistake."

Tails blinked at him in disbelief. "We all saw that mountain coming from miles away! Literally! And when I told you to pull up you pulled down!"

"I'm not used to inverted controls!" Sorun argued as he lifted his hands up in frustration.

"Alright, alright." Sorun gave Sonic a silent thanks when the hedgehog stepped in between the two. "Sorun screwed up a little bit with the plane, but it was his first time, so cut him some slack. Besides, you can just fix it later."

Tails looked ready to argue the point, but he stopped himself right before he said something and closed his mouth. His expression softened, and he gave Sonic a small nod before passing one final glance at Sorun and then turning around to walk away. Sorun for his part, let out the breath he'd been holding as he gave Sonic a thankful look.

"In my defense, that mountain really did come out of nowhere."

"It... it really didn't, Sorun," Sonic said with a shake of his head.

Sorun hummed, and then looked to the side at the living room's couch. "Tails isn't mad at me, is he?" he asked Sonic as the two walked towards the couch. Sorun felt it was a little deserved after the yelling incident, but he hadn't intended to make the fox Mobian upset with his flying. He'd tried really hard, too.

"Who, Tails? Nah, he's fine," Sonic assured him as the two sat down on the couch. "He's just a bit annoyed over having to fix the plane, but he spends so much time performing maintenance on that thing anyways that I feel like he isn't even losing any time over it. But you really didn't do yourself any favors scraping Tails' logo off on that rock."

He was relieved that Tails wouldn't stay mad over the plane, but Sorun couldn't help the withering look he sent Sonic over the rock jab. "Man, I tried pulling away."

"I know. You're doing really good! But, eh, I think you might need some more practice behind the wheel. Er, stick. You know what I mean."

Sorun's response was to grumble under his breath and cross his arms, which caused Sonic to chuckle at the sight and lean further into the couch.

So he hadn't done so well flying the plane. Seeing as it was the first time he'd ever flown anything, Sorun thought he'd done pretty well. The plane may not have been in one piece anymore, but he'd managed to get it back to the airstrip. Even if Tails had to take over on the latter half of the trip back. And then absolutely refused to let Sorun touch anything despite his and Sonic's protests.

Well, he'd tried at least. It was more than even Sorun expected out of himself. And the fact he'd flown a plane semi-successfully? He was rather happy over that fact, even if he'd already almost forgotten everything about flying.

"Hm..." In his thinking, Sorun's blue eyes had wandered to to the gem in Sonic's hand with an equally dark blue shade that the hedgehog was holding. "So... that's a Chaos Emerald," he observed.

Sonic nodded. "Yep," he confirmed as he tossed the blue gem to Sorun, who caught it with his right hand. "One gem of infinite power out of a set of seven. Six more and we can get you home."

"Cool." Sorun held the gem closer to his face to get a better look at it. It was a gem cut into a diamond shape, and was so large it barely fit in his hand. It continually shined with a dark blue light with the gem itself colored the same shade of blue.

He found himself frowning. Other than the fact it glowed and was rather shiny like any highly-lustrous gem ought to be, he couldn't really feel anything special about the gem he was holding. It definitely didn't give him the impression that he was holding a source of infinite power.

"Not gonna lie. This thing is kind of underwhelming," Sorun admitted, his eyes still affixed to the gem. "Also, shouldn't this be green? You said they were Chaos Emeralds . Aren't emeralds green?"

He looked to Sonic for clarification, and then raised an eyebrow when he saw Sonic wince slightly. "Yeah, that's... kind of complicated," he said in response to Sorun's question.

"Hah... of course it is." Sorun tilted his head back and let an tired sigh out. "Why's everything gotta be so complicated with you people?" He held the blue Emerald up. "Alright, Sonic. Gimme the lore. What's the story this time?"

"The story is that there used to be more than seven of those. A whole lot more." Sonic paused, and then mumbled something as he scratched his chin in thought. "Actually, wait, I gotta back up a bit further. So, uh, way back when there used to be hundreds of thousands of the things scattered all over the universe, but they were all way smaller. Still infinitely powerful, but small," he elaborated. "All the green Chaos Emeralds were here on Mobius an in some small, localized parallel zones, across the universe all the red ones were on a different planet, the blue ones on another, you get the idea."

Sorun nodded in understanding. "So what happened?"

Something strange happened with Sonic's face. For just a moment he made a grimace, as if the subject was uncomfortable, but it disappeared just as soon as it arrived as the hedgehog continued explaining. "Some, uh... things happened. There was this incident with a tower, and all the Chaos Emeralds were brought together here on Mobius. Tails and Shadow dumped them all in the Special Zone, and the guy that was in charge of that place, Feist, fused them all together into the seven Chaos Emeralds." The hedgehog coughed and looked away. "So that's why they're all colored differently. There is a green one if it makes you feel better."

"It doesn't." The human teen found it a bit odd how Sonic had grown a little quiet during the explanation, but he waved it off over examining the gem in his hand further with furrowed brows. "So these thousands of gems of infinite power got gathered together and fused into gems of infinite- er power?"

Sonic nodded. "Yeah, that's right."

"... I'm drawing the line there." He sent Sonic a flat expression. "That's stupid. That sounds really stupid."

"It's... pft, yeah, a little," Sonic admitted with a small laugh. "Makes it a lot easier to keep track of them since there's just seven, though."

Sorun rolled his eyes, but otherwise said nothing. He was too distracted by his own thoughts to pay much attention to Sonic, as well as the strange sensation going through him as he looked at the Emerald.

This was one of the objects responsible for bringing him to this world, and he was holding it in the palm of his hand. Such a thing was almost funny to think about, but he just felt... odd, holding it. He should have happy that he was partway done with this horrible journey, and by all rights he was, but he just couldn't ignore that peculiar feeling welling up in him.

Actually, he was beginning to think that feeling wasn't an emotional one. Because his skin was starting to tingle and he could feel the light amount of hair on the nape of his neck begin to stand up. Suddenly he didn't want to hold the Chaos Emerald anymore.

"Hey, Sonic? Do me a favor a take this back," Sorun requested as he tossed the blue gem into the awaiting hedgehog's hands.

Only the Chaos Emerald never made it to Sonic. It had seemingly frozen in midair, and as Sorun watched it he saw that there were small bolts of blue electricity arcing out of the gem. When he followed the arcs, the black-haired teen grew shocked to discover the electricity was ending at his five fingertips and palm. And right as he made this discovery, the Chaos Emerald decided to defy gravity and snap right back into his right hand's grasp.

"... Eh?" Sorun began to blink rapidly and waved his hand in an attempt to shake the gem from his hand. It didn't budge. "What the... come on, get off...!"

"Sorun?" Sonic's voice sounded concerned as he scooted over the couch to be closer to the human. "What's going on?"

Still shaking his hand, Sorun turned his head to address the blue hedgehog. "The, uh... the Chaos Emerald's stuck," he said. "It won't come off."

Sonic tilted his head back in surprise. "Huh? Why is...? Here, lemme help." He held a gloved hand out to Sorun, who leaned forwards to place the Emerald in Sonic's grasp. The Mobian's fingers curled around the gem, and then he pulled back away as Sorun did the same.

Unfortunately, despite both of them pulling away, the Chaos Emerald remained fixed to Sorun's hand.

"Sorun, c'mon! Let it go!" Sonic grunted through clenched teeth as he continued pulling.

"I did let it go!" Sorun grunted back. "It's not letting me go!"

This continued for a minute before Sonic's grip slipped, causing him to yell out in surprise and roll backwards on the couch. Sorun merely fell onto his back, though he let out an annoyed whine when he held his hand up to his face and saw the blue Emerald was still stuck to his hand.

"What's going on?" As the two of them sat back up, they turned their heads to see that Sally and Tails had wandered to the front of the couch. They were both casting confused looks on the pair. "You two looked like you were struggling with something," Sally explained, "so we came over to see what was wrong."

"What's wrong is this." Sorun held his right hand up for the both of them to see. "The Chaos Emerald isn't letting me let it go. It's stuck to my hand."

The explanation seemed to only confused the other two even further, and Sally offered her hand out. Sorun obliged and placed the Emerald in her hand, but like Sonic, she wasn't able to pull it off his hand.

"Ergh...! Oh, wow," Sally gasped out as she let the Emerald go. "Yeah, it's... it's really stuck on there, huh? How'd that happen?"

"I don't know!" A light amount of unease was beginning to grow inside Sorun, because that strange feeling he felt was becoming stronger. "I just grabbed it and it stuck itself to me!"

Tails' tails swished behind him in a confused manner while his head tilted in thought. "Really? That doesn't make any... wait here, I'll get help," he said as turned and walked away from the trio.

Sorun watched the fox walk off, and then let out a distressed noise as he attempted and failed yet again to shake the Chaos Emerald off of him. "This is normal, right?" he asked. "This is the part where you tell me some crazy story explaining why they stick to things, right?"

To his dismay, both Sally and Sonic shook their heads. "Chaos Emeralds have always been weird, but they've never done anything like this before." He supposed he should have taken some comfort in the puzzled expression Sally wore since it meant they were as clueless as he was, but the odd feeling welling up in him was growing too distracting. "Did you do anything besides touch it?"

"No, I just grabbed it for a minute," Sorun said with a shake of his head along with his hand. "You think we could pry it off? Just wedge a knife or something between it and my hand and leverage it off?"

Sonic looked very hesitant at that idea. "Why don't we explore other options before sticking sharp things into your hand?" he suggested. His eyes wandered to the side, and he pointed away at something. "Oh, look, maybe they can help."

Sorun followed the green-eyed hedgehog's gaze. Tails had returned to them with Knuckles and Shadow in tow, the former looking at a loss at what he was seeing while the latter just looked annoyed.

"What is this about the Chaos Emerald being stuck to the human's hand?" Shadow asked as the three of them stopped in front of the couch. His gaze snapped down to Sorun's hand and the blue Emerald it was holding, and he held his hand out to the human. "Urgh, of all the... give it here. I'll get it off."

"I dunno, Shadow." Sonic sent the darker hedgehog a teasing smile as Shadow grabbed at the Emerald. "It's on there real tight. I don't think it's coming off."

"Don't be ridiculous. It's a Chaos Emerald, not a... hm?" Shadow began pulling on the Emerald, and Sorun gave the gem a nonplussed look as it remained affixed to his hand. He did make a note on how harder Shadow pulled compared to Sally and Sonic. He was a lot stronger than he looked. "It really is stuck on there," the hedgehog realized. "Don't tell me you glued it to your hand or something else as moronic as that, Sorun."

"I look like an idiot to you?" When Shadow didn't answer him, Sorun sighed out loud and hung his head. "No, I didn't. I grabbed it and these weird blue sparks stuck the Emerald to my hand. Now it won't come off."

Shadow blinked in surprise, and then looked down at the gem. "Blue sparks...? How strange. I've never seen such a phenomenon from the Chaos Emeralds." He turned his head over his shoulder to look at Knuckles. "Come over here and help me pull it off, echidna. We might just not be pulling hard enough."

Knuckles nodded and stepped besides Shadow. "Sure. Sorun, c'mere and give us your hand."

He was incredibly nervous over the prospect of two super strong Mobians pulling on his hand, but the alarming feeling growing in him had him even more worried. So, reluctantly, he held his hand out and nodded for the two to grab at the Emerald. They did so, and then immediately dug their feet into the ground as they began to pull.

Both Knuckles' and Shadow's faces were screwed in exertion as they pulled on the Chaos Emerald stuck to Sorun. Sally and Tails stepped back with concerned look, and Sonic, his face a mixture between hopefulness and worry, held on to Sorun's shoulders to try and anchor him in place as the other two Mobians pulled his hand.

It wasn't working, though. Sorun couldn't so much as feel the blue Emerald budge in his hand. What he could feel was the muscles in his arm beginning to become strained from being stretched. Eventually he began to hear his shoulder creak, and the pain started to become too great, so he waved his free hand for them to stop.

"Okay, stop, stop! You're gonna pull my arm off!" Thankfully they let him go when he asked, at which point Sorun pulled his arm back and began to roll it to return feeling to the limb. Everybody around looked disappointed in the fact that they hadn't been able remove the Emerald, with the exception of Shadow, who looked perplexed at the issue. "Any more bright ideas?" Sorun asked.

Knuckles scratched the top of his head. "I could go get Mighty. Maybe he could-"

"No, brute strength isn't enough to remove it," Shadow disagreed with a shake of his head. "We could always cut the hand off."

Reflexively, Sorun hugged his arm to his chest. "That ain't funny."

"Hmph." Shadow crossed his arms and seemed to look deep in thought, and Sorun had to wonder if he really had been joking. "The Emerald affixed itself to his hand... why would it do something like that? How do we undo it?"

"I dunno. You're the Chaos Control expert here," Sonic said as he bounced off the couch to stand at Shadow's side. "Couldn't you just, y'know, Chaos Control the Emerald off of Sorun's hand?" he asked as he gestured to Sorun.

Shadow made a "tch" sound. "What would you have me do? Summon a Chaos Spear and blow Sorun's arm off with it? I have an extremely limited skill set with those abilities, Sonic."

Sorun liked that idea even less than cutting his hands off, and then thoughtlessly tried to pull the Emerald off with his left hand. He quickly found that the left became stuck as well the second he made contact, and grew extremely frustrated when he couldn't remove it. "Oh come on!"

"What the- Sorun, why did you grab it with the other hand!?" Sally exclaimed as she held the side of her face.

"I panicked, alright!? I-" The teen stopped, because that feeling was beginning to grow painful, and even more alarmingly dark blue sparks began to arc off of his hands and slowly creep up his arms. "Guys, I'm getting really worried," he whispered as he shrunk back into the couch, his voice laced with fear.

It was starting to hurt, too, especially around his hands where the sparks were. A deep kind of pain that felt like his hands were being continually shocked. The pain he was in must have been evident on his face, because everybody else, even Shadow, started to look worried at his plight.

"Okay, is there anything else we can do?" Knuckles asked. "We can't leave that on him!"

"Maybe Rouge can get it off. She steals gems all the time, so this should be right up her alley."

Shadow shot Sonic a heated glare at that remark. "We're looking for serious solutions here, hedgehog, not jokes ."

"I wouldn't be joking if you weren't freaking Sorun out by threatening to cut his hands off!"

"We can get him cybernetic replacements if it comes to it, but I really doubt we're going to have to resort to that if you actually tried thinking for once!"

"Should we get him to the lab?" Tails suggested. "We have a- a bunch of equipment used to read Chaos energy, so maybe-"

"Guys?" Sorun interrupted, causing five sets of eyes to move to him. All of those eyes widened when the blue Chaos Emerald began to intensely glow in Sorun's grasp. "Is it supposed to be glowing like this? 'Cause-"

He wasn't able to say anything else. There was a bright pulse from the Chaos Emerald and Sorun was flung backwards off the couch and onto the ground from a surge of electricity ran into his body. But to his horror, even after being flung onto his back it didn't stop. The Chaos Emerald continued to electrocute him and cause his body to uncontrollably spasm as bolts of blue electricity arced off his entire body.

And it hurt. It was a burning, shocking sensation across all whole body and through all his nerves that hurt worse than anything else he'd ever felt in his whole life. He might have even been screaming from it, but he couldn't tell as all he could hear was a light ringing in his ears. His vision was becoming spotty and dark, too, but he could see that the others were shouting at him and that Sonic and Knuckles were desperately trying to pry the Emerald out of Sorun's hands.

But it just wouldn't come off. Sorun's wasn't even sure he could control his fingers anymore with all this power running through his nervous system.

Right as Sorun felt like he was going to pass out from the electrical assault, the Emerald pulsed brightly again. Sonic and Knuckles were thrown off of Sorun, and the energy surging into him increased to such a degree that he could barely even feel anything anymore. After that there was another flash that turned Sorun's vision white, and then, thankfully, he finally passed out.

Chapter 11

Recursion Error

Episode 11- Weird sky people ruin my life even further

None of this was right. I don't recognize where I am. Everything around me is wrong and I don't know why.

Too scared to even think straight. Too confused to try and piece it all together. I-

---

It was raining. I was cold and in pain. Too much was going on at once and I couldn't even think straight where was I why were all those things done to me why did-

"H-hey! Are you okay!?"

Time passes. Months of it.

Everybody here is so friendly even though I look so different. They even-

---

There had been an explosion during a fight. One of my new best friends was so badly hurt. Nobody knew if he would wake up. Nobody even knew if he would survive his wounds. It hurt everybody. It hurt me. And there was nobody that could help him.

Nobody but me. Consequences be damned. I'm tired of the fighting. I'm tired of seeing my friends hurt. I'm tired of seeing my friends die.

I look down at the sword in my hand.

"I don't care how many times it takes... I'm going to save everybody..."

Sorun woke up.

"Agh... that really fuckin' hurt..."

He just couldn't get a win, could he? Oh, no. That'd be too much for Sorun, wouldn't it? After everything he'd been through, he couldn't have his one, single victory. After blowing up all those Badniks with Tails' plane and feeling so good about himself, and then getting the Chaos Emerald which made him go from feeling good to feeling great, he couldn't end the day on a high note.

No. Instead he got to end the day with getting electrocuted by the blue rock. And to get... whatever that memory was when he came to in a semi-lucid state.

"What even was that dream? Somethin' about... rain or... I forget. Eh, whatever." He quickly lost the memory of that vision and pushed it to the back of his mind as he forced his eyes open. "Ugh... where...?"

Sorun's vision was bleary, but it was slowly coming back and he could recognize the HQ's ceiling with what little sight he had so far. He felt sore all over, and there was a dull throbbing in his head, but it was all going away. He blinked a few times and held one of his hands up. Surprisingly, it didn't look like a burnt mess. It looked completely fine, actually. Small miracles.

Groaning softly, he slowly sat up. The first thing he saw was the couch that had been knocked over when he'd been flung, which lead Sorun to believe that not much time had passed since the Emerald shocked him. His theory proved sound when he saw Sonic from the corner of his eye crouch down next to him and gently place a hand on his shoulder.

"Sorun? Buddy? You okay?" He gingerly shook Sorun's shoulder. "You had us worried for a minute there. Are-"

A wave of nausea hit him. "Please don't shake me," Sorun requested, and he felt Sonic take his hand off of him. A quick look around with his eyes confirmed that the others were still there, too, and were looking at him with concern equal to Sonic's. "I... got knocked out, right? How long?"

"Just a few minutes," Sonic answered.

All things considered, that wasn't very bad at all. He would have preferred not being shocked into unconsciousness, but he at least seemed to have pulled through alright. "Cool," he grunted as he looked down at his hands. They were empty. "Huh? Where'd it go?"

He didn't see the Chaos Emerald in his hands. A quick look confirmed that nobody else was holding it, and when he looked around he didn't see the gem on the ground or anywhere else. So where had it gone?

The pale teen turned his head to Sonic, who still had some worry written on his face. "Where'd the Chaos Emerald go?" he asked. "You guys finally manage to pull it out of my hands or something?"

The worry on Sonic's face turned into an uncomfortable expression, and Sorun found himself not liking it very much. "Um, uh... we don't really know," Sonic admitted as he rubbed at one of his arms. "The Chaos Emerald was-was shocking you and you were screaming, so we tried to get it off but there was a flash of light that knocked us off, and, uh... you passed out. And the Chaos Emerald was just gone."

Well, now he was wide awake. That didn't sound good to him at all. "What do you mean it's just gone?"

There had been an angered edge to his voice, and Sonic must have picked up on it as he'd turned his head to the side to avoid Sorun's glare. "Maybe you just dropped it? It's kind of round, so it probably just rolled under something. Are you sure you don't remember?"

"Do I reme- no!" Sorun shook his head in denial while waving his right hand in front of him. "All I remember is grabbing the Chaos Emerald-" he waved his hand behind him, "- then it goes and sticks to me, and while-" his hand waved in front of him, "- that was happening it-"

Bring! Shck!

Sorun paused, as did everybody else. There'd been a sound- a single, low ring that tickled the back of Sorun's memory for whatever reason, followed by the sound of something stabbing into the ground. The teen looked around in confusion, and he saw that everybody's attention was drawn towards something nearby that was glowing blue. He began to sigh in relief as he turned towards the object.

The sigh became choked in his throat when he saw something that was definitely not the Chaos Emerald.

There was a sword sticking into the ground. A blue, translucent straight sword with a W-shaped guard. A sword that, upon looking closer, seemed to be made of energy from the way its entire surface was constantly shimmering and wavering randomly.

And then, just like that, it shattered much in same way a glass would shatter if one were to throw it on the ground. The sound of breaking glass even accompanied it as the entire sword shattered to pieces, which then dissipated into nothing.

Nobody said anything. Everybody, even Sorun, looked completely bewildered at the sight they just witnessed. Sorun himself had went as far as to rub his eyes to make sure he wasn't hallucinating, and while the sword was indeed gone, the small indent its blade had made in the ground was still there. He wanted to believe he was hallucinating, but the astonished faces on everybody present told a different story.

"Uh..." The silence was broken by Knuckles, who blinked heavily at the indent at the ground and pointed at it. "You guys saw that too, right?"

Tails slowly nodded. "The weird blue sword? Yeah."

"That was real?" Sorun mumbled.

"We all saw that," Shadow confirmed before looking at Sorun. The dark hedgehog looked just about as lost as everybody else, but there was an inquisitive edge to his eyes as he looked at the teen. Specifically, at his hand. "Sorun. Was that you who did that?"

The human looked up at Shadow only to tilt his head to the side. "Huh? Me? Uh, no. Powerless, remember?" Had he? No. There was no way. It was somebody else in the group that had a weird power. Had to be.

"You... were waving your hand around a lot, and after what happened with the Chaos Emerald..." Sally, who stood near the back, trailed off before turning her gaze to Sorun. "Can you try again?"

"Wha? What are you- guys, come on." Rolling his eyes, Sorun waved his right hand around. Nothing happened. "Look, see? Nothing. It was one of you."

"Nobody here has the ability to create something like that," Shadow informed him. "Are you absolutely sure? You didn't feel anything strange or out of place?"

"Man, I'm not feeling much of anything after that jolt from the Emerald," Sorun grunted as he stood up to his feet. "Look, I don't know what that was, but-"

It was right when he was calling on the memory of the sword and denying it was him that it happened. That sound appeared again, and accompanying it was a small flash of blue light and a small burst of blue particles on his right side. Sorun's head snapped towards the sound, and he could practically feel his pupils shrink when he saw it. That same blue, translucent sword, floating in the air besides him and pointing outwards with small amounts of blue, ethereal smoke wafting off of it.

By now, Sorun was in deep belief that he was still hallucinating, or that this was some kind of fever dream induced by the Chaos Emerald. It had to be. There was no way that sword could exist. He recognized that sword, and it shouldn't be something that could be real. Especially in this world.

"That's..." he mumbled, stepping backwards. The sword followed him and stayed in its position at his side. "That can't be... that's... isn't that V-"

There was a throb of pain in his head, and the break in his concentration caused the blue sword to shatter to nothing. His feet wobbled, and right as his vision began to darken he could see Sonic reaching out to try and catch him.

Sorun passed out before he could see if he succeeded or not.

"Uuugh... I'm gonna get a concussion at this rate..."

Had he fallen on his head? It sure felt like he'd fallen on his head. Why did it always have to be his head that was hit?

Mumbling a quick string of curses under his breath, Sorun planted his palms on the ground and slowly picked himself up. "Alright, where-" he began to ask, but stopped cold when he saw his surroundings. "Aw, no."

His surroundings were that there were no surroundings. More accurately, he looked like he was in the middle of nowhere- in the sky. All around him he was surrounded by white and golden clouds, and above him was an endless sky that shined a corona of colors so bright it was practically white.

Gulping, Sorun looked down. There was no floor he was standing on; just more clouds. He did feel solid ground when he tapped his boot on where he was standing, but he sure didn't see it, nor did he actually hear the sound of his boot making contact. In a quick experiment, he clapped his hands together, and sighed out loud when he heard the clap.

So he wasn't deaf. That was good. He didn't know where he was. That was bad.

"What is all this?" Sorun quietly wondered as he began walking in a random direction. "I finally die and escape this nightmare? Is this, like... heaven or something? 'Cause I'll take it if that's the case. I practically deserve it at this point after everything I've been through."

"I'm afraid that isn't the case."

A frightened yelp came out of Sorun as he whirled around. The golden clouds behind him parted, and a feminine figure wearing long, light-blue robes walked through. A human-looking figure, much to Sorun's absolute disbelief. One with a human face.

The woman flashed her light blue eyes at him and smiled. "Greetings. I am-"

Any further words were interrupted when a blue sword sailed through the air towards her. Unfortunately for Sorun, it seemed to phase right through the woman, who rapidly frowned at the teen's actions.

"Please don't do that. As I was saying-" Another sword passed through her. "Sorun, please-" Another sword. "Will you stop it!?"

"Fuck you and this mystical bullshit. What is all this?" Sorun snapped as another blue sword appeared next to his side, only to shoot towards and pass through the woman. "And somebody better explain to me what the deal with these swords are real quick."

Oh, he was so done with everything. He'd slowly built up a tolerance to all the nonsense but this was breaking down all the fragile barriers he'd managed to make. Between her and this weird sky place and the swords? He was done. He wanted straight answers.

The woman glared heatedly at him, but then relented under Sorun's furious gaze. "It was my hope that appearing to you in this form would calm you. Very well. Let us try this."

As soon as she finished her sentence, the golden clouds next to her began to swirl around her body, concealing her form as Sorun blankly watched from his spot. Seconds later, the clouds parted. The blue dress and the womanly figure remained. The species sure didn't: he was looking at a Knuckles lookalike in a dress. An echidna.

"There. My true form," she huffed out as she straightened her dress. "I will try once again to introduce myself so that we may talk." A forced smile found its way onto her face. "Greetings. My name is Aurora, and-"

Sorun decided to continue shooting swords at her at a more rapid pace. They were still just harmlessly phasing right through her, but seeing the grimace form on her face made it worth it in his eyes.

"That's enough now, young one." That was another new voice, this one male and aged. Sorun turned around to see yet another echidna standing behind him. Old and wearing ragged robes, with all sorts of trinkets hanging from his red, faded dreadlocks. "The you before us is nothing but a projection of your mind we have allowed into our zone. You have no physical presence to harm us with."

After a second's consideration of the old echidna's words, Sorun willed a blue sword to appear by his side before it flew forwards through his face. It phased through him like it did Aurora, and he sighed at the action.

"Did you not hear a word I just said?" he asked.

"Yeah, but it's still making you mad, and that makes me feel better," Sorun said. "So who are you?"

"Will you stop throwing those things if I tell you?"

Yet another sword was hovering at Sorun's side, but at his will it shattered into nothing, and then he shrugged. "Sure. Let's be amicable. That would be the mature thing to do, right? And we're all mature here."

A thankful smile appeared on the echidna's wrinkled lips. "Rightly so. I am Athair, and-"

A blue sword went through him.

"Are you quite done yet?"

"One more." As Sorun said this, one more blue sword flew through Athair. "Okay, now I'm done. Talk."

"As I was saying-" Athair's mouth clamped shut when, of course, another sword went through him.

The human teen flashed him a cheeky grin. "I had to get one more in. I'll stop for real now."

"... As I was saying," the echidna ground out, "The current circumstances surrounding the world has forced our hands. We must speak."

"Oh, we must, huh?" Sorun scathingly remarked as he watched the old echidna walk next to the younger, female one. "All this time I've been here and it's only after I touch that Emerald and get a weird sword power you wanna talk with me. A very specific sword power. A sword power I have a lot of questions about."

The two echidna cast nervous glances at each other. Sorun couldn't help but wonder why they looked so nervous. "We two are beings intrinsically connected with the Chaos Force," Aurora explained. "The Virtual Zone you are currently standing in is a zone removed from all other zones that-"

"That's cool and all, but I really don't care," Sorun interrupted. He didn't even understand half of what she just said, but he just couldn't stomach all of this nonsense enough to try and comprehend it all. Or care at that. "Just... who are you and what does all this have to do with me?" he asked as he rubbed at his throbbing forehead.

There were little micro twitches on Aurora's face that showed her frustration. The older echidna next to her looked more composed, but the way his eyes were narrowed slightly suggested some level of annoyance. Sorun counted it as a small, petty victory, but one he could call his. Because with how he was feeling right now, he needed it.

"We were tasked with watching the world after the previous Walkers... passed on," Athair explained. "It's only through the powers granted to us through our connection with the Chaos Force that this is possible."

"Walkers. Right," Sorun scoffed, and then looked down at the clouds at his feet. "Well, I'll say this much: you're doin' a pretty awful job." He looked back up at the echidna's with a scowl on his face. "You seen the state of the world? Place is a mess. Some crazy nutjob's using robots to take over the world."

"That which we must watch entails more than just Mobius. It entails the whole universe." The female echidna rubbed her hands together nervously. "That said, we... feel for the plight of Mobius. At one time in our lives, it was both our homes. What is happening is truly unfortunate, and we wish to help."

There was something about her tone that made Sorun skeptical about how saddened she really was over Mobius. Her tone wasn't exactly flat, but the emotional impact was far from somebody who was upset about their world, or previous world, or whatever she considered Mobius to be, under siege by robots. Hell, Athair looked more upset over it, and Sorun couldn't tell if those wrinkles were from frowning or from age.

But, he truly couldn't care less about their feelings. He just wanted answers.

"And I fit into all this how?" the irate teen asked.

"You are somebody who does not belong in this world who was brought here through unnatural means. We did not truly understand the gravity of this until after you came into contact with that Chaos Emerald," Aurora said. "The Chaos Emeralds are linked to the Chaos Force as we are, and act as conduits for Chaos energy. By touching that Emerald, you... absorbed it into your very being and managed to create a link of your own with the Chaos Force. A weak link, unfortunately, but a link nonetheless."

Blinking in surprise, Sorun looked down at his own chest. "What, I ate it?" he muttered before looking back up. "Why me?"

"Tell me," Athair began, "before coming to Mobius, had you ever heard of or experienced Chaos energy?"

Sorun slowly shook his head. "No...?"

"As we thought," Athair said with a nod. "You and your zone are unique, in that you both are completely cut off from the Chaos Force. It's hard to imagine such a world can exist- Chaos energy is the fundamental energy of all life throughout the multiverse- but your zone is so removed from all other zones that Chaos energy just simply doesn't exist there. That extends to all beings from that zone, including you."

"You are completely empty," Aurora continued. "All beings in all zones possess some quantity of Chaos energy in them. It may be so small that it is inconceivable even to beings such as us, but it exists. But you are unique in that you are truly empty, Sorun. From the second you arrived on Mobius we observed you because of this curious phenomenon, but it was only after you absorbed that Chaos Emerald did we understand what it truly meant."

"... Huh...?"

Aurora saw the visible confusion on Sorun's face, and rubbed at the side of her face as she thought of a better way of explaining. "Chaos energy flows to wherever it pleases, such is its nature. Like fluids, it will naturally gravitate towards empty spaces to occupy as much space as possible. Since you are something with no Chaos energy of your own, unlike everything else, you naturally absorbed the Chaos energy to form a weak link with the Chaos Force. Is that understandable enough?"

It barely was, but he thought he got the gist of what they were saying. "Yeah, uh... Chaos energy everywhere in everything. Except me. I get, uh..." There were a lot of concepts being thrown at him all at once, and Sorun found that he was having trouble sorting through it all. He understood the "Chaos energy is a fundamental aspect of the universe" bit, but the rest was slowly escaping him. "... My zone's special, so by extension I'm special because I'm nothing..." he muttered, "so... touching magic rocks gives me powers?"

They both winced at what he was sure was a butchered version of their explanation, but he saw Aurora slowly nod. "Yeees, that is... more or less the heart of the matter."

"Ah. Cool. Cool." Food for thought he could chew on later, but he had more important things to address right now. "Okay. So," he said, and then held his index finger up. A blue sword appeared right over it in a horizontal position and began spinning around like a helicopter blade. "Do you wanna explain to me why the power I got was fucking Vergil's Summoned Swords?"

It's what they were: the power that was supposed to belong to a character in a video game. He knew because he recognized the swords. He'd played enough 'Devil May Cry' games to know those swords from anywhere. So Sorun was extremely confused over why, out of all the powers in the world, the Chaos Emerald decided to give him this one. A power from a video game. It made the least sense out of everything.

And he didn't like how they looked so confused at that.

"Chaos energy is infinite, shapeless energy. That energy can shaped by the heart of those with a connection to it," Aurora clarified. "There are many with strong connections to the Chaos Force who can manipulate Chaos energy to make various techniques using it. This appears to be a technique you've created."

Sorun spluttered at that, and the break in concentration made the sword he was spinning shatter. "B-but he's a video game character," he argued. "It's from a video game! Why did I get this out of everything else!?"

"As I said, Chaos is formed by the heart. For some the manipulation of Chaos energy can be... innate. On a subconscious level," Aurora confessed. "Certain mental biases, likes and dislikes, can influence these subconscious manipulations. Strong memories of recent events or actions could also be a contributing factor."

He did really like that game. And he always did like playing as Vergil, if only because his moveset was borderline busted in how powerful it was. His choice in color had definitely helped. And it was with a dawning realization that Sorun remembered that the last video game he'd played before coming to Mobius had been 'Devil May Cry'. The third one, while playing co-op with David. And he'd been playing the fourth one before that. And both times he'd been playing as Vergil.

Suddenly it was starting to make sense, and he almost hated how much it made sense.

"I seriously just got Vergil's Summoned Swords because I liked playing as him a lot...?" Sorun silently bemoaned as he ran his fingers through his hair. "Oh my... that's such a stupid reason for... You gotta be kidding me..."

Powers were nice, but Summoned Swords definitely wouldn't have been his first choice. It was far from the worse, but he could already imagine dozens of other powers he rather would have had. And he didn't even get a choice in powers? It was all subconscious? It just wasn't fair.

"Okay. Alright, that's... yeah." Sorun had to rub at the temples of his head to alleviate the headache coming on, but it wasn't working. "What do you two actually want with me?"

Because that's what he cared about above everything else. Meeting the two divine echidna or whatever they were had been interesting, getting Vergil's power from a glowing rock had been a shock he needed to fully digest later when everything calmed down, but he still wanted to know why he was even here.

"The days on the planet Mobius have grown dark," Aurora said. "All because of Dr. Robotnik and his evil ways. This has always been true, but... somethings has changed." Her face minutely scrunched up into some expression. Confusion? It was too subtle for Sorun to tell. "As we are connected to the Chaos Force, we are granted all knowledge from past, present, and future. The Chaos Emeralds used by the evil Doctor were, for the most part, to remain in the Special Zone under its caretaker, Feist."

"But something disrupted the universe's path by destroying Feist and the Special Zone, taking the Emeralds, and giving them to Robotnik," Athair continued. "And we know nothing about this... entity, for reasons we cannot even begin to fathom. It remains out of our sight. Elusive." He sighed deeply. "It is as vexing as it is baffling. Something like it shouldn't exist, yet does. And because of its actions, the future of Mobius has been thrown off kilter. It's fated for complete destruction at the hands of the Doctor because of this, Sorun."

Oh, so that was the issue. The semi-omnipotent echidna knew the world was doomed because something gave Eggman the Emeralds. What else was he supposed to expect at this point?

And the worst part was that Sorun could see it happening, too. The Freedom Fighters had grown so desperate fighting the man they'd let him of all people join the fight. Sonic himself admitted they were losing ground by the day. Eggman taking over the world fully at one point? It wasn't just feasible anymore. Practically everyone and their mother was telling Sorun it was fact.

What did that mean for Sonic and the other Freedom Fighters once they lost? For everybody in Knothole? More importantly, what did that mean for him?

"Well, there's gotta be something," Sorun tried as he thew an arm up in frustration. "You can't tell me there's nothing anybody can do."

Athair, seeing the distress on Sorun's face, walked forwards and placed a hand on his shoulder to calm him down. "If there's anybody that can do anything, it would be you ," he said. "You managed to form a link with the Chaos Force by absorbing a Chaos Emerald, granting you an ability. It is doubtless that absorbing more Emeralds would strengthen this bond and endow you with even more abilities- we can both see it. You have that potential."

Staring at the aged echidna, Sorun circled his hand around in a "continue" gesture. "And!?"

"Your future is a... murky one," Aurora admitted. "Perhaps it is because of your kind's disconnection with the Chaos Force, or because you are not a natural inhabitant of the zone Mobius lies in. Even the methods used to bring you here and the very reason for it are a mystery to us. But the Chaos Force shows us a possible future of Mobius free from Robotnik. A future that is only possible because of you and your potential." She clasped her hands together and hung her head. "We, the Neo-Walkers, are asking you- begging you - to go and seek the other Emeralds. To gather strength and join in the fight. We do not want Mobius and all that live there, be it Mobians or humans, to suffer at the hands of that man. Nobody deserves that fate."

"Get rocks, get powers, save the world? That about sum it up?" Sorun gently removed Athair's hand from his shoulder and stepped back so he could address them both. "Okay. Say I do all that. Get the Emeralds, power up, help the Freedom Fighters stop Eggman. All fine and good, sure." He didn't want to, like always, but the prospect of getting actual powers made the load on his shoulders more bearable. Suddenly the impossible seemed doable, albeit barely. "If I do all of that... then can I go home? I can go back to Earth once I help the Freedom Fighters save Mobius, right?"

That uncomfortable, nervous look returned to their faces, and now it was making Sorun nervous with the frequency it was appearing. They looked at each other with resigned looks on their faces, and subconsciously Sorun felt himself tense up. Why did they have those looks on their faces?

"He must know," Athair told the other echidna. "To not tell him would be unconscionable."

Aurora grimaced, but then slowly nodded her head. "I know," she whispered, and then took in a large breath before facing the human. "Sorun. Your kind is unique in that your lack of natural Chaos energy allows you to artificially form a bond with the Chaos Force. While this is true... it is still an artificial means of acquiring power. Your species did not evolve to have natural bonds with the Chaos Force, such as the Mobians did. To put it in terms you would understand, your species' bodies are not built to withstand Chaos energy."

There was a pit of dread forming in Sorun's stomach. He didn't like that at all. "What is that supposed to mean?" he demanded in a low voice.

"We have insight into the effects on your body due to our own abilities," Athair said. "There is no easy way for us to say it, Sorun. Your body simply can't handle these new abilities. It's causing strain that it can't compensate for, and any new abilities will just increase that strain more and more. To put it quite simply...

"For every single Chaos Emerald you absorb, you will lose roughly twelve years of your life."

Utter silence between the three of them. Athair and Aurora were giving expectant looks to Sorun, and both looked incredibly worried at what response he would give. Sorun was gawking at the two of them in stunned silence, his body completely immobile and his face shocked frozen even as a light breeze blew his black hair over his face.

And then he laughed.

The two echidna glanced at each other, dour looks in both of their eyes. The laughter coming from the teen was low and bitter, lacking of any joy at all despite how hysterical it sounded. He was laughing so hard that Sorun had to hold a hand to his face just to steady himself, and this seemed to continue for minutes until he breathed out a long sigh as his hand limply fell to his side.

Powers at the cost of his life? Right. He wasn't dealing with that. No way, no how. He was done.

"Great story, really. You guys should go into show business. You'd be killer," Sorun sarcastically stated before turning his back to them. "I'm gonna go back. Seeya never, hopefully."

Aurora's eyes widened as the teen began to walk away, and she reached out to him. "W-wait! You cannot-!"

"Nope. I'm not dealing with this," the teen called back. "It's not happening. I feel for everybody on Mobius, really, I do, but I'm not giving my life up for them."

He would have kept walking, but the golden clouds in front of him all flowed together and condensed into a wall. He stopped, and then slowly banged a fist on the cloud of wall. He wasn't surprised to see it bounce right off, but it did anger him significantly.

"The hell is this?" Sorun whirled around to face the two echidna again. A deep scowl had settled on Aurora's face as well as Athair's, but Sorun ignored that in lieu of the hot anger that was beginning to course through him. "Let me out."

"Sorun..." Aurora looked away for a brief moment, but then her features hardened and she faced him once again. "No. I cannot. You must-"

"I don't have to do anything!" he yelled at her. "Are you- are you serious!? T-twelve years? Twelve years!? I'm not doing that!"

"You wouldn't physically age-" Athair tried, but was shut down immediately from the glare Sorun sent him.

"You shut the hell up," he hissed before turning back to Aurora. "So, so what, I've already lost twelve years of my life for Summoned Swords? And if I got the rest, I'd..." He did the math quickly in his head, and then balked when he thought the number up. "I'd be a hundred..." he realized in a choked whisper. "How long would I even live after I got all seven?"

Aurora blinked, and then sighed. "Likely not very long," she admitted. "While your body will remain young, the strain put on it from Chaos energy flowing through you would still exist. You would quickly reach the end of your life after absorbing the last Chaos Emerald."

"... You're asking me to sacrifice my life for Mobius." It was a statement of fact that Sorun could see neither was going to deny from the looks in their eyes.

The female echidna slowly breathed out, and then nodded her head in affirmation. "Yes. We are asking that you give your life for the sake of the world."

"Oh. Then no." It was quietly mumbled out, but there was no hesitation in Sorun's words as he shook his head in denial. "I'm not doing it. Go to hell. I'm not dying for Mobius."

"Sorun, please." The fact that Aurora had the actual gall to sound so pleading made the human absolutely livid, and his eyes shot right up to her when she stepped forwards with a look of anguish on her face. "The entire fate of Mobius depends on it! All the lives of those who live there depends on it! Not just the ones you've already met, but the entire planet! Possibly other planets, maybe even other zones should the Doctor succeed in his ambitions! You must-!"

"I'm a white kid from Detroit!" Sorun screamed at her. "I don't... I can't do this! You can't make me!" He started to actually shake as he backed off from the two echidna. "I'm not, I, I-I-I'm just some guy. Y-you can't make me do this. I don't want to die, I don't wanna be some, some jacked-up hero, I don't want any of this!" He waved his hand behind him. "I just want to go home! Why can't you let me go home?"

A low rumble left Athair, who lowered his head before speaking to Sorun. "There is no way for you to return even if you refuse," he told the human, which caused Sorun to shake even more. "There... is no way to remove the Chaos Emerald you have absorbed from your body," Athair informed him. "As we understand, you need all seven Chaos Emeralds to return using the machine that brought you here. But with that one in your body, all seven will never be gathered together again. We understand your desire to return, but it is impossible now."

"No, it... no..." He started breathing. Hard. The shock of the information given to him had passed rapidly and now in its place was fear and denial rocking his very core. "I... I just wanna go home..." he whispered as he continued to shake his head. "I don't wanna die for them. I don't want powers. Just let me go back. I-I'm not even s-s-supposed to be here."

He wouldn't do it. He absolutely refused. He was too scared to die, and he simply didn't like Mobius or anybody on it. He never asked to be abducted to an alien world only to give his life for it. All Sorun wanted was to go back to Earth. He missed his home. His friends and his mother. The whole life he had made for himself there. He wasn't going to give that up for Mobius.

"We would not be asking if there was any other way," Aurora told him. "This is a... terrible, awful thing to ask of you, I know. But would not such a noble sacrifice for all those on Mobius be more than worth-?"

"Fucking. Stop ."

And then there was them . The two echidna who were all but demanding he throw his life away. Just who were they to ask such a things from him? A couple of random echidna with deep connections to the Chaos Force pretending to be gods or whatever it was they were? And they thought he was going to throw his life away just because they asked ?

He was just so upset. Angered beyond words at them. Thrown into despair over the prospect of him not being able to go home because he'd absorbed the Emerald. His life being cut short, and him possibly dying because of the Emeralds. It was too much. He couldn't handle this.

"Just let me leave," he pleaded them, hot tears beginning to run down his face. "I-I don't- I can't- I don't want- j-just please stop it. Please. I just want to leave."

"It cannot be done, Sorun," Aurora said with a shake of her head. "I'm sorry."

That word. That word caused Sorun's head to fly up as his face twisted into one of rage.

"Sorry?" he venomously hissed out. "Don't use that word! You wouldn't be doing this if you were sorry! Y-you wouldn't be killing me if you were sorry! You're just trying to be nice because you know the world is fucked unless I help out, but you know what!? I'm not gonna do it! I'm not gonna go around collecting powers if it's gonna kill me!"

And there was the trigger he needed. Aurora's face instantly went from apologetic to strained, and he knew he was right. All it did was make him more mad. "Sorun, you cannot-!"

"I'll tell Sonic," Sorun suddenly threatened, and both Aurora's and Athair's eyes widened. "I'll tell him and all the other Freedom Fighters everything you've told me. They won't let me near any more Chaos Emeralds if they know they'll kill me."

Aurora's lips pursed, and her hands began shaking at her side. "Sorun, I'm warning you..."

"Or what!? What are you gonna do!? I'm not gonna-!"

He didn't expect a lot of things to happen in the next instant. He didn't expect Aurora's body to slide forwards at a frighteningly fast pace, and he really didn't expect her hand to begin sparking with green energy before she reached out to Sorun's throat. She didn't physically touch his neck, but something did happen to it. Because the second she lifted her hand up he felt his throat become alight with something. He dropped down and began scratching at the pain burning in his throat as his blazing eyes glared up at Aurora.

Behind them, Athair was looking at the display in shock, but didn't so much as raise a hand to stop Aurora, who slowly lowered her hand while she looked down at Sorun in pity. The look alone would have made Sorun lash out at her if he didn't already know it would be useless.

"I've used my power to place a restriction on you," she informed him with a tight voice. "You will not be able to tell anybody of our exchange here. You will not be able to tell anybody that the Chaos Emeralds have a detrimental effect on your body. If ever you try to convey this information to anybody in any form, the restriction I've placed on you will temporarily stop your heart." Sorun's heart practically did stop already when he heard that. "I truly am sorry, Sorun... but the fate of Mobius is too important. As much as it pains me to say it, the life of an interloper such as you is... inconsequential, compared to everything else."

"You crazy bitch, you're insane...!" Sorun gasped out as he scrambled away from Aurora while still grabbing at his throat. "If you care so much about Mobius, then why don't you do anything!?"

"It is our duty as the Neo-Watchers to watch. Directly intervening is... outside of our capabilities. Placing our trust in you is us doing something." As she said this, golden filaments began to float off of Sorun's body as he slowly began to disappear piece by piece. "I am sending you back," Aurora said. "I cannot directly force you to do anything, but please... consider what is at stake. I am sending you back with the hope that you will eventually see what must be done. It's for the good of everybody."

He didn't listen to a single word she said, and she must have understood that by the way she was looking down at him so sadly. But he couldn't speak; he felt so terrible between all the thoughts running through his head to his throat still slightly burning, so he tried to give her the most hateful glare he could muster.

Except it didn't even come out as that. Because of all the emotions running through him, his glare wasn't a hateful one, but a frightened, wide-eyed look of despair that Aurora was forced to stare at with pitying eyes. All that proved to do was add yet another layer to the pile of emotions tearing the teen apart on the inside.

And then just like that, he disappeared.

They didn't say anything after Sorun disappeared. There was a long moment of silence between both echidna as they stared at the spot the teen had been. Aurora wouldn't even raise her head, and Athair had turned his own head away so he didn't have to look at the display. There wasn't any regret in their eyes at all, but all the same they looked deeply disturbed by what just happened.

How sickening.

"Wow. You guys really are sick in the head." The new voice along with an accompanying clap startled the both of them and caused them to spin their heads in his direction so hard that their dreadlocks whipped into their faces. "There are no words. Seriously. There are literally no words in the dictionary that describe how disgusting that was. That's how terrible you two are."

Their gazes turned to the shocking sight of a figure wearing a red cloak, whose entire head was covered by a hood. He was sitting down, with his human hands slung over a single raised knee as his covered face looked at the two echidna.

Athair simply stared. Aurora was less passive, and let green Chaos energy roil up and down her arms as she practically snarled at him.

"You!" she screeched. "You... you are the one that killed Feist and gave that abhorrent fiend the Emeralds! You-!"

"Hey. You saw what I did to Feist, right?" the cloaked man asked. "You really wanna continue that thought?"

She stopped speaking, and the green energy around her arms faded. She still looked incredibly angry at the sitting man, but chose to back away from him.

"How is it that you have entered the Virtual Zone?" Athair asked in a neutral tone, his eyes boring into the hooded man.

He shrugged. "Same way I got into the Special Zone: nunya business," he answered.

"And what do you want?"

"Hm? Want? Lotsa things," he answered as he rose up to his feet. "But from you two? Nothing, really. I just came by to make sure everything here went okay."

The answer caused Aurora's features to wrinkle in anger once more. "You have the nerve to call us ill?" she asked, glowering at the red cloaked man. "After everything you've done? It is because you handed Robotnik those Chaos Emeralds and all but doomed Mobius were we forced to act in such a manner!"

"Hey, I'm not the one that just consigned a kidnapped teenager to death. That was all you," the cloaked man said as he rose his hands in defense. "But I guess I can be a... little sympathetic, all things considered. Not like I enjoy runnin' around doin' all this scary shit. But it's all in accordance with His will, so whatever." He hummed. "Nope, changed my mind. You're both still rotten."

He walked forwards, but stopped when he made it between the two echidna who were giving him cautious glares.

"... I'm gonna give you some advice," he said. "I get you're frustrated over the fact you don't know what's going on. But as it is, you Neo-Walkers are all pretty much just bystanders in this giant mess He created that I'm trying to fix, so don't interfere. It'll go bad for everybody if you do."

"Don't interfere?" Aurora repeated in disbelief. "It is our duty watch after and ensure the safety of Mobius! We cannot simply-"

"Ensure the safety of Mobius? Way too late for that, lady." With that, the red cloaked man continued walking forwards. "I gotta go tell Eggman about Sorun now. You, uh... keep creeping on everybody from your high perch or whatever you two do all day."

There was a shocked gasp from behind him. "You mean to actually inform him of... why!?" Athair asked in a cracked voice. "For what possible reason could you possibly have!? Haven't you done enough!?"

"I'm doing it because of bullshit, arbitrary reasons I don't feel like explaining. Now if you'll excuse me, I gotta put on my 'cool mystery guy' persona. 'Cause fuck my life." He stopped briefly, and the cloaked man's hooded head turned back to address the two echidna. "Oh, one more thing. Don't tell Sorun about me. Ever. That would be bad. And that goes for Tails' uncle, too. I know he's in on this Neo-Walkers thing even though he's still on Mobius." He turned his head back forwards and kept walking. "This is the first and last time we'll ever see each other. Remember what I said: watch all you want, but don't interfere. You two already got that down pat anyways, so it should be a cinch."

A passing golden cloud briefly passed by him, and it was revealed that he was gone by the time the cloud left the spot he'd been on. The two echidna were left behind, and could only cast worried glances at one another.

With a gasp, Sorun sat right up as his right hand flew to his heart. It was beating uncomfortably fast, and he had to tightly clutch at it just to try to calm himself down.

The deluge of terrible memories flying through his head made it a poor effort.

"I don't, what, I... sky people, swords, twelve years, I don't- powers from Chaos- just- WHAT!?"

There was too much. There was actually too much new information to process all at once, but at the same time he remembered everything that had been explained to him and there were so many mixed feelings swirling in him that he felt like he was going to throw up.

But there was one feeling superior to all the other ones tearing him up inside. Something stronger than the interest he had over the new power, or the anger and disgust he held over those two strange echidna, or the fear of everything else. His main concern was the Chaos Emerald inside of his body that had sapped twelve years off his life in exchange for Summoned Swords.

"Get it out." He didn't want it. He didn't want any kind of power at the expense of his life. And he really didn't want one of the items needed to get him back to Earth gone forever if what Athair said was true. He needed to get the Emerald out of his body. "Get it out get it out get it out-"

"Sorun, calm down!"

The teen had stopped scratching violently at his chest when he noticed somebody crouch down next to him out of his peripheral vision. He turned his head just slightly to see that it was Tails that was kneeling down next to him. It was only then did he realize that everybody was still there.

"T-Tails...?" he mumbled out.

The fox nodded at him. "Yeah, Sorun, it's me. What's-?"

"Get it out of me." His hand shot to the startled fox's shoulder and shook it roughly. "You have it get it out of me. I don't want it. Get it out...!"

"O-okay! Just please calm down!" Tails gave him a rapid nod and placed his own hands on Sorun's shoulders in an effort to calm him. "We're... we're gonna go to the lab now, alright? We have some equipment in there we're gonna use to take a look at you. Okay? You're fine."

"Fine? Yeah. Yeah, it's... I'm fine." Shakily, he nodded his head as he slowly stood up. "Yeah. Lab. Let's go do that."

He severely hoped that they could find something out in that lab. Because he didn't know what he was going to do with himself if everything those two echidna said was true.

A bit of time later found a more mellow Sorun sitting on a metal table in the HQ's lab. Multiple sensors were suction cupped to his arms and face, with wires connecting those sensors to a computer Tails was sitting at. Sonic was pacing nervously back and forth next to the table.

He didn't really know what these sensors stuck to him were reading. Tails had tried to explain it, but with everything going through his head all Sorun had only managed to do was pretend to understand. Something about Chaos readings and energy signatures or something like that. He was grateful that there was at least that much he could count on, and that Tails was helping him with this.

"Where the hell do those two get get off? What, I'm supposed to be fine over getting abducted so I can give my life for an alien planet?" He held in the scoff if only because he didn't want to disturb the sensors attached to him. "Nerve doesn't even begin to describe that insanity. I just... ugh. I'll figure it out later. Just wanna wait to hear what Tails has to say first."

There was a lot to unpack. A lot to think about. He had the time for it, but he wanted to get as much information as possible so he could think before acting. Because now apparently not only was his life in jeopardy, but his very means of returning to home was in jeopardy as well, now more than ever. This made him incredibly worried over everything else. But he'd wait a bit longer, if only because he didn't want to screw his situation up any more than what it already was.

"So what gave you the idea that you... absorbed the Emerald?" Tails asked as his eyes scanned over the monitor he was staring at.

He wanted to be completely honest with them and tell them everything that had happened in the Virtual Zone, but Aurora's warning stayed his tongue, both figuratively and literally. Knowing that his heart would temporarily stop if he tried telling them was a fairly powerful motivator in that regard. Sorun honestly hoped that it had been a bluff, but that burning sensation he'd felt while up there had sure felt real. He felt fine now- his whole body felt fine- but he regarded even speaking with trepidation now. He had to be careful.

"Because the Emerald disappeared after the whole shock thing happened. And now I have this." He held his finger up and caused a spinning, blue sword to appear over it. "I dunno. Chaos energy doesn't exist where I'm from, so maybe because I don't have any my body just... absorbed it. For some reason."

It was a bastardized version of the explanation given to him, but it was still technically the truth. But more importantly, it hadn't set that curse off. So far good progress.

Tails momentarily looked away from the computer monitor to stare at the sword spinning over Sorun's finger. Sonic had stopped and did the same. "So... those swords-"

"Summoned Swords," Sorun supplied. If he was really gonna run with this, he was gonna use the proper name at the very least. "My power, so I'm naming it. Summoned Swords."

"Right, those," Tails said. "If that Chaos Emerald really did give you some kind of Chaos Control, why... why the ability to make swords out of all things?"

Sorun shrugged. "I dunno. Just happened." Because powers based on subconscious desire or whatever it was were fickle like that, he supposed. He still wasn't happy that he didn't even get a choice in powers, but at least it was a halfway decent one. And they were cool enough for him.

Tails hummed, and turned back to his monitor. Sonic chose that moment to stop next to Sorun so he could admire the spinning sword. "Well I think it's neat," he commented as his eyes followed the sword. "I just didn't think Chaos energy could make something that, well, specific. It always seemed a bit, you know. Chaotic."

"Chaotic. Right." The sword shattered, making Sonic flinch. "That's an appropriate word if any." Sorun turned to Tails. "So? What do you think?"

"I don't really know. The study of Chaos energy isn't an exact science currently, but Sonic's right. It is weird how specific it is. Shadow can use Chaos Control to make these things called Chaos Spears, but even they're not as uniform in shape as your... what did you call them? Summoned Swords? They don't look like any Chaos ability I've ever seen." Tails shook his head. "It's just weird. All of this is so weird."

On that, Sorun was in agreement. He'd been in agreement with that sentiment since day one. But the tidbit about Shadow and Chaos Control was an interesting thing to note. What made Shadow so special that he could use something like that?

"Or maybe he just happens to be special. Maybe people like Sonic have abilities because they just happened to be born with a special link to that Chaos Force thing they were talking about. Or maybe I'm completely wrong and it's something else entirely." Sorun silently groaned and hung his head. "Why's this gotta be so confusing?"

"So did you get any other powers?" Sonic asked him. "Or was it just the swords?"

Sorun picked his head back up to address Sonic. "Pretty sure it was just the swords," he answered. "I don't... feel anything else, if that makes sense." He barely even felt the Summoned Swords, but he knew the power was there. A strange, innate feeling spread throughout his body. It was weird, but he could at least identify it. And he only felt the one power.

"No, it does. I've always been able to kinda feel out Chaos stuff, so I totally see where you're coming from."

He was glad at least one person could even if he couldn't.

"Well, I think your theory actually has some merit, Sorun," Tails said as he read whatever it was that was being displayed on his computer monitor. "I'm picking up readings that are awfully similar to a Chaos Emerald from your body. It's faint, but it's there, but I'm not detecting anything physical stored away inside of you." He pushed away from the computer on the wheeled chair he sat in and rolled in front of Sorun. "So... yeah. It looks like you absorbed the Chaos Emerald and gained an ability out of it."

That was what he had been afraid of. He supposed he couldn't have expected anything else, but hearing it from Tails for some reason hit deep.

But Sonic didn't look nearly as disturbed as Sorun was or as puzzled at Tails was. If anything, he looked happy, which earned an annoyed glare from Sorun. "What's got you so giddy?" the human gruffly asked.

"Huh? If anybody should be happy, it should be you!" Sonic stated with a wide smile. "You got a power! It's a weird one, yeah, but it's something! You don't have to feel bad anymore since you can actually learn to fight with the rest of us now!"

Sorun had to take in a deep breath. He couldn't be upset at Sonic's words- he didn't know- but boy, if his words weren't irritating him beyond relief. "Tails," Sorun said as he turned away from Sonic and to the fox, "can you remove the Emerald?"

Sonic blinked in surprise, and one of Tails' tails swished behind his back. "Huh? Why would you want to remove it?" Tails asked him. "You'd probably lose your new power."

"Don't care. Can it come out?"

"Whoa, hey, Sorun." Sonic waved his hands in front of Sorun with a questioning look on his face. "What's gotten into you? Why would you wanna get rid of your new power?"

Sorun sent him a harsh glare. "Because it's-!"

Thump-thump.

A deep pain in his chest forced Sorun to gasp out in pain as he reflexively held his chest. To his horror, he couldn't feel a heartbeat under his hand. He heaved a loud breath out five seconds later when his heart started to beat again, but that pain temporarily lingered in his chest from some time.

"Damn it all. She wasn't bluffing. I really can't tell them these things are killing me." That was going to make things complicated. He really didn't like that. "Fuck. Could I write...? No, that wouldn't work. She said something about conveying information in any form, so... dammit. Well, fine. Want me to keep my mouth shut? I'll keep my mouth shut and I won't tell them that I could get more powers out of more Emeralds." It was a short-term solution made out desperation, and his main fear was that somebody in the Freedom Fighters would suggest he eventually touch another Emerald to try and get more powers, but he could think of something better later. For now he had to deal with this.

"Sorry. Aftershock or something. I'm fine now," he gasped out to address the concerned looks both Mobians were flashing him. "I want to get rid of it," he continued, "because I need all seven Emeralds to go back to Earth, and we can't do that if one of them is inside me."

Realization slowly began to dawn on the two, making them both shy away from Sorun. "O-oh. Right." Sonic looked towards Tails. "So can they?"

The look Tails gave them both didn't give Sorun any confidence. "I'm sorry, but frankly, I don't even know how Sorun managed to absorb the Emerald the way he did to begin with. It looks like it's been converted to pure energy and has completely fused with his body. I wouldn't even know where to begin taking it out of him." He closed his eyes and shook his head. "I'm sorry, Sorun, but I don't think it's possible to take the Emerald out of you."

"... Oh. I see." He thought that he was prepared for that answer. He really wasn't, because it felt like Mighty just punched him in the gut. "I'm out of here," he mumbled as he ripped the sensors off his body.

The sensors gathered in his hand were thrown roughly on the ground, and Sorun just missed trampling over them as he slid off the table. Sonic watched as the human stomped away, and then reached a hand out to try and stop him. "Sorun-!"

"Not now." Sorun opened the door to the lab and practically slammed it behind him as he left. Sonic looked towards Tails who had the same troubled expression on his face that he had, which caused the hedgehog to groan out loud and follow Sorun.

He wanted to say he'd made it about ten steps from Freedom HQ's door before he heard it open behind him. Sorun didn't even need to turn around to know who it was, though he did stop and take a deep breath to calm himself.

"Go away, Sonic," Sorun ground out. "Seriously. I'm not in the mood."

"I'm not going away until you tell me what's wrong." Sorun sighed at hearing that, and turned around. As expected, Sonic was there with his arms crossed and one foot tapping at the ground as he looked at Sorun's face with an expression mixed in seriousness and worry. "What's wrong with you? Talk to me."

"Why do you always...!?" The pale teen grunted out in frustration and ran a hand over his face. "Why do you even care...?"

Sonic stepped forwards. "Because you're my friend," he said, "and-"

"We. Are not. Friends ," Sorun hissed out, causing Sonic to flinch back with widened eyes. "I am never going to be friends with any of you. You're all a bunch of anthropomorphic animal aliens that abducted me and forced me to fight in a war, and now this!" he yelled out as a Summoned Sword appeared next to him. "I have yet another layer of nonsense to deal with on top of everything else!"

The hedgehog looked taken back by Sorun's words. "You still feel this way?" he quietly asked, his voice wavering. "Sorun, I thought... I thought you finally moved past this. You were acting so friendly with everyone..." He blinked, and his eyes turned half-lidded when sadness overtook his features. "And it came out of nowhere, but I thought you'd be happy to have a power now. What happened?"

Sorun took a deep breath, and the sword next to him shattered. "I just want to go home, and these powers are in the way of that. Why is that so hard for you to understand?"

"Is that the- Sorun!" Sonic stomped forwards, and while there was still sadness in his features, it was quickly being overwritten with discontent. "I know it looks bad now, but we can figure that out later! After we've finished fighting Eggman! We can find a way to get the Emerald out of you!"

"And what if we can't, huh!?" Sorun argued. "What if I'm stuck here forever because I touched that Chaos Emerald!? What am I supposed to do with that!?"

It wasn't even a fear of him dying, or the fact that his life had been cut short because he'd absorbed that Emerald. Those were factors, but the main fear was that he couldn't go home. And after both Athair and Tails told him extraction of the Emerald was impossible, he felt liable to believe them. And that scared him even more than getting years taken off his life. He could deal with that, eventually. He could avoid dying by just avoiding the other Emeralds. He could maybe survive now with Summoned Swords. That was all manageable.

Home, though? The prospect of never going home again? That scared him. It scared him because it seemed like such a certainty now and he just didn't know how he was supposed to deal with the fact he might never see Earth again.

"I..." Sonic held out a hand to Sorun, but stopped himself halfway. The hedgehog frowned deeply, and then hand went limp at his side. "I'm sorry, Sorun. I'm sorry I pushed you so hard."

Of all the things Sorun expected, an apology along those lines hadn't been one of them, and now he was genuinely confused. "What?"

"I know you never wanted to join the Freedom Fighters. I know I... kind of pressured you into it, even though I knew you couldn't do much. And yeah, maybe... maybe we should have just called it when you got hurt in that mission, but it's- it's so bad out there, Sorun. Eggman, he's... everything is turning so awful," Sonic admitted with a shake of his head. "So I kept pushing you to try different things to be useful somehow because we all need something to help us out, you know? I know it was wrong, and I'm really sorry, but I'm just... we're all so worried over the world, over everyone!

"But you have powers now!" Sonic shouted with a hopeful gleam in his eyes. "You don't have to be scared about being too weak anymore! You can help out! You can be useful! And we all... we all really need your help Sorun, because I..." He choked something back and look down. "I don't think we can do it on our own anymore. Eggman just had too big of a lead when he got those Emeralds."

Sorun could believe. He all but had to when those two sky echidna flat out told him the world was doomed unless he got powers from the Chaos Emeralds and helped defeat Eggman. But none of that changed the fact that he didn't want to . "I already told you I don't even want this power, especially when it-!"

Thump-thump.

"GodDAMMIT...!" Sorun internally screamed as he held his chest once more. Even after his heart started to beat again, he wasn't able to look back up at Sonic. Not from the pain, even though there was plenty of that.

Frustrated. He was just so goddamned frustrated with everything. It was the only word he could think of that described how he felt. Over this whole situation. Over those echidna. Over the Freedom Fighters. Sonic.

Sonic. Why did it all lead back to him? Him and the Freedom Fighters?

They'd stolen him from his home. They didn't force him to fight, but they may as well have, especially with all the effort Sonic put it. And now there was this business with the Chaos Emeralds. Emeralds that gave him powers in exchange for years off his life. He'd already lost so much because of that one Emerald, and now he likely was never going to see his home again, and it was all their fault because they were the ones that physically dragged him through a portal.

And what if they found out he could get more powers from other Chaos Emeralds!? What if they forced more on him? They'd be actively killing him at that point so he could save their world while his remained all the way on the other side of the multiverse, and he didn't want to die, and he couldn't even tell them any of this because of goddamn Aurora ...!

He was so frustrated. Frustrated at Tails for pulling him through the portal. Frustrated at the Freedom Fighters because they were unintentionally killing him. Frustrated at Sonic because he kept raising good points that even Sorun agreed with, but didn't want to. Frustrated at the world. At Eggman. At himself.

He couldn't do this right now. He just couldn't.

"Just leave me alone," Sorun moaned out as he turned his back to Sonic. "I need to be alone. It's too much. We can do all this later."

"Just wait a second-" Sonic stepped forwards again, but then leapt back when a blue sword embedded itself into the ground in front of him. He snapped up towards Sorun with wide, shocked eyes, but they quickly softened when he saw the anguished look in Sorun's own eyes.

"Please... just... leave me... alone," Sorun begged.

Sonic looked like he wanted to say something more, but held his tongue and gave Sorun a reluctant nod as he watched the Summoned Sword in the ground shatter. "Okay, Sorun. If that's what you want," he agreed in a level tone. "Are you coming back home later?"

"... I don't know. Probably not. Might just crash on the couch in the HQ." The human shook his head and stomped forwards towards the direction of Knothole City. "I just want to think. I don't want to deal with anything else right now."

He was thankful that Sonic chose to respect his wishes and not follow him, because the last thing he needed was to hear more words from him. Or anybody else in the Freedom Fighters for that matter. Anybody period, really. He just wanted to be alone with his own thoughts so he could figure out what he was gonna do.

The problem was he had no idea what he was going to do.

"Home, the Chaos Emeralds, these powers... Eggman..." With a sigh, Sorun held up a finger as he walked and let a blue sword appear so that it could spin above it. He found himself lost in its almost hypnotic spinning. "I don't know what to do..."

New Megaopolis. Once it had been called New York, but that was in a forgotten age thousands upon thousands of years. And during that time it had been a home to millions of humans and had been considered one of the biggest metropolitan cities in the whole world.

Now it was inhabited by a legion of robots and two flesh and blood people: a diabolical Doctor set on conquering the entire world and his nephew. Said doctor was in the highest room in one of the tallest towers in his city, admiring the view of his sprawling, metal city through large plate glass windows at the end of the room.

A tired sigh escaped Eggman, and he could see his own mustache droop along with his shoulders.

"It's been too easy," he lamented. "My complete and utter takeover of Mobius is all but assured at this point. The only pocket of resistance left in the whole world with a leg to stand are those furry fools over in Knothole, but even that can be ended at any time. My conquest is almost at an end, and yet..." He frowned, and his hands tightened at his side. "I'm not satisfied. I came into this knowing I'd be the victor at the end, but it wasn't supposed to practically be handed to me! Sure, I could go around and burn the few Mobian villages not occupied by me to the ground. Keep pounding Knothole with robots over and over until the kingdom falls. Send every single one of those pesky Freedom Fighters into utter despair before finally crushing them once for all. Maybe even do it all at the same time in front of Sonic to break him completely just for the fun of it!" He briefly smiled, but his mouth soon settled back into a frown. "Oh, but where's the amusement in that? The thrill !? A victory like that is meaningless without effort, and yet my victory thus far has been effortless.

"It's all because of that man," Eggman claimed as his features wrinkled. "That man who gifted me those Chaos Emeralds all those months ago. Had I known that possessing all those gems would make my Eggman Empire's campaign so trivial I would have outright refused most of them. How I loath him for taking my victory away from me. Because this?" He gestured to the windows and city with his hands. "This just doesn't feel like a victory." He sighed, and then ran a hand over his bald head. "Maybe it's time to call it curtains and end it all already. To stop dragging things out and take it all. I've milked this planet for all the fun it's worth, but in the end I got even less enjoyment out of it than my original zone. It appears my own supreme knowledge has cursed me to forever be confined within the doldrums. Wouldn't you agree, Snively?" There was no response. "Eh? Snively!"

Thwack!

Robotnik jumped at the solid thud, and spun around. The rest of the room, once the penthouse to a high-rise buildings, was littered in cables and fitted with computers at each side, and Snively was supposed to be occupying one of those computers. But behind his tinted glasses Eggman had widened his eyes when he saw his short nephew unconscious and being held up by the same red cloaked man the Doctor had been so bitter over previously.

A long, content sigh left the man. "I really needed that. You seriously have no idea," he muttered as he dropped Snively's sleeping body on the ground before his hooded face turned to Eggman. "Hey. Been a while, huh? Few months or something like that, right?"

"You..." Eggman seethed, and then dramatically pointed his index finger at the red-dressed intruder. "How dare you... you...! What did you say your name was again?"

"Huh?" The hooded man made his way to the center of the room, and then turned his body so that he was directly across from Eggman. "Oh, I never did give you a name, huh?" he realized. "Gimme a second to think of a fake one real quick."

The finger being held out to the man practically deflated at the sheer flippancy the man was exuding, and Eggman couldn't help but sputter as the cloaked man began to mutter to himself.

"Should I... no, that's lame... red was... what was red in... redrum? No, rubrum. Yeah. Rubrum? Eh, sure." He snapped his fingers and looked up to Eggman. "You can call me Rubrum." He paused. "Man, I already hate that name. Sounded way better in my head."

"I don't care what ridiculous name you've chosen for yourself," Eggman growled at him as he held up a clenched fist. "It's because of you my conquering of Mobius is ruined!"

"... Ruined?" Rubrum echoed. "Last I checked it was goin' pretty well."

Eggman waved his clenched fist to the side. "That's the problem! It's going too well!" he shouted. "Claiming Mobius for my own was meant to be a triumphant victory. Something to savor. But then you had to go and break the game for me. You just had to give me those Chaos Emeralds and make everything so easy for me." His shining head drooped. "Finally defeating the blue rodent and destroying all his friends, family, and that insipid kingdom has no meaning now. I'll still do it just because I hate them, but it's almost too much to bother with at this point. And it's all your fault."

There was a moment where Rubrum's hooded face just stared at Eggman, as if he was struggling to comprehend the words he'd just heard. Eventually he took a deep breath and spoke out in a disbelieving voice. "You're upset because you didn't have fun ruining everyone's lives?"

"Of course I am," Eggman replied in a tone that suggested it was so obvious. "What's the point otherwise?"

Slowly, Rubrum shook his head. "I... I got nothing," he mumbled, completely at a loss. "You are actually just the worst. Bar none."

"Well, you're entitled to our own opinions. Even when they're wrong." At that, Eggman snapped his fingers. "Metal Sonic, if you would."

To Rubrum's right was a pair of elevator doors. At Eggman's command, the doors slowly slid open. From the elevator stepped out a Badnik styled after a specific blue hedgehog, right down to the color. The robotic hedgehog flexed its metal claws before its red eyes snapped towards Rubrum, its face expressionless due to a lack of a mouth.

Rubrum hummed at the sight, but otherwise said nothing.

"I've grown tired of you, Rubrum. You've insulted me, ruined my game, trespassed on my territory, physically assaulted my zone-removed nephew... but above all that? You held a sword to my throat." Eggman shook his head. "I'm done with you. Consider this your execution for your crimes against the Eggman Empire."

"Aw, you don't wanna do that," Rubrum said in an indifferent tone.

"Oh, but I do." With that, Eggman turned his tall, round body back towards the window. "Metal. Exterminate."

There was the sound of a roaring turbine as the Badnik flew towards Rubrum to undoubtedly tear him limb from limb. Eggman allowed himself a small smile for that much at least, but he froze when the sound of Metal Sonic moving suddenly cut out into utter silence.

"Finished already, Metal?" Robotnik asked as he began to turn around. "A pity. I would have at least liked to have heard that cretin's death rattle before- huh!?"

The sight that greeted Eggman when he turned around put him at a loss for words. Metal Sonic was destroyed. Completely. His parts were scattered all around the room, seemingly cut to pieces. Rubrum was still standing in the same spot he'd occupied before Eggman had turned his back, holding Metal Sonic's severed head in his hands.

But that didn't make sense to the Doctor. He'd only turned his back for a single second. There was no sight of the sword Rubrum had held when last Eggman saw him to cut Metal apart. There was no possible way a sword could even scratch Metal, let alone sever him to pieces. And by all appearances, Rubrum hadn't even moved. There hadn't even been any sound .

That was impossible. There was absolutely no way one of his most powerful robots had been destroyed in under a second. But Eggman was forced to accept this as fact, because no matter how many times he blinked he kept seeing a room full of bits of blue metal and a man in a red cloak holding Metal Sonic's head.

And now, he was growing nervous. Because Rubrum had just dismantled Metal Sonic with seemingly zero effort, and his hooded face was now facing him. He cursed the bead of sweat that was beginning to roll down his face.

"Anyways," Rubrum said as he nonchalantly tossed the head away, "I just came to talk. No fighting, no more gifts, just talk. That's all."

"... Talk," Eggman repeated as he cleared his throat and regained his composure. "You've made it clear multiple times you have no love for me, so why would you bother coming all this way just to talk?"

Rubrum shrugged. "Because it's all in accordance with His will. You know how it is." He paused. "Er, well, you don't, I guess. Eh. Is what it is."

"And there it is. 'He'. You keep referencing a He," Eggman noted. "Is this oh-so-mysterious He the one that put you up to all this?"

"Who, Him?" Rubrum actually laughed out loud at that. "Hah. Nah. He's dead. He's long, looooong dead. I think? Eh, doesn't really matter. He's gone either way." He placed his hands into the pockets of his cloak. "But despite Him being long gone, I gotta follow His will. To not do so would be... exceptionally bad for everyone."

Eggman huffed. "And just why would that be?"

"Good question." Instead of answering, Rubrum swiveled his head around the room they were in and briefly glanced out the window behind the Doctor before turning back to him. "You've sure been busy since we last talked," he observed. "Built up your Empire and practically took over the whole world. Why, you could have finished it at this point if you weren't dragging your feet to the finish line." He leaned forwards slightly. "Or is that really the case? Can't help but notice those Chaos Emeralds I so generously gave you are nowhere to be seen. Don't tell me you lost them?"

"Feh. So those obnoxious Freedom Fighters managed to swipe the Emeralds from under my nose. So what?" Eggman turned his large nose up in the air. "Everything was going so dull that I practically let them take the Chaos Emeralds, but what do they do with them afterwards? I haven't a clue, but whatever they did scattered the Emeralds all across Mobius. They can't even utilize stolen resources properly!"

"Yeah, those dastardly Freedom Fighters. Fighting so that their friends, family, and, oh, everyone else isn't enslaved and killed. How dare they?"

"Hmph." Eggman turned back to the window once more. "If all you've got for me is petty insults, than I refuse to listen to you further."

Rubrum let out an "ah" sound. "Sure, yeah, I get how it is. Don't you want to know what they used the Emeralds for, though?"

That gained Eggman's attention, as he whirled around with a look of interest plastered over his devious face. "You know?" he asked him. "I'd be lying if I said I wasn't the slightest bit curious over what they used those Emeralds for."

"Oh, then you'll love this. They used them to summon a human here from another zone."

There wasn't any outwards reaction from Eggman at first as he processed Rubrum's words. Soon enough, though, the features on his face began to flatten. "You can't be serious," he replied in an incredulous tone.

"Nope. Completely serious," Rubrum said, and then began to examine his right hand while he rubbed his thumb and index finger together. "The guy's a sixteen-year-old named Sorun. All in all, nothing really special about him. Pretty plain. Bit ornery. Not very strong, either, 'cause one of your Egg Pawns almost brained him before some dumb luck saved his life."

"But that doesn't make any sense," Eggman claimed. "Sonic and his miscreant friends are no strangers to zone travelling. They wouldn't have blundered so hard as to lose all the Chaos Emeralds bringing somebody from some random zone here. I can't even fathom why they would make such a thoughtless decision like that. I half expected them to just give them to Sonic so he could turn Super and bum rush my capital in an ill-fated attempt at stopping me. I made traps and everything."

"Mm, couldn't tell ya why they brought the guy here, but from what I know the zone they brought him from is pretty far from the Prime Zone. I'm talkin', like, ass-end of the multiverse far. Place is so removed from all the other zones that it's not even connected to the Cosmic Interstate, so they needed the power of all seven Chaos Emeralds just to bring him here. They scattered right after."

Stroking his mustache, Eggman gave a half-interested hum. "Fascinating, truly," he drawled, "but yet another useless runt is hardly of any concern to me."

Rubrum gave him an agreeing nod. "Yeah, guy's pretty useless all things considered." He stopped rubbing his fingers together and reached into his hood to scratch at his chin. "Except for the fact he gets powers off of Chaos Emeralds. That's probably important."

Eggman's hand froze mid-stroke. "Say that again?"

"Sorun. He can absorb Chaos Emeralds and get powers off of them," Rubrum clarified. "He just recently got his first one."

"Impossible," Eggman claimed. "I would have known if such a thing were possible. Nobody has ever exhibited an ability to do such a thing."

"Ah, but that's the beauty of it. See, Sorun's special. His zone? There's no Chaos energy in it." That caused Eggman to raise a hairless eyebrow in interest. "Don't really know how it's possible; his whole world's a big, cosmic mistake, I guess. But because he doesn't have any innate Chaos energy of his own, he's an empty vessel for the stuff. A power sponge, basically."

"Huh. Interesting," Eggman hummed. "He's just able to acquire abilities just like that? With absolutely no negative repercussions to his body whatsoever?"

Rubrum hesitated before answering. "... No, of course not. Why would it?" He shook his head. "Point is, as he is now? Sorun's not much. He gets a few more Emeralds and powers up a bit more? Who's to say how much of a problem he'd be for you?" He shrugged. "Those Emeralds get permanently stuck in him, too, so no chance of depowering him."

Crossing his arms, Eggman gave the red cloaked man a slight scoff. "Hmph. It's doubtful he'd ever pose a problem, even with his unique... circumstances. It would be absolutely no issue whatsoever crushing him like all the rest."

"Yeah, sure, crushing him's always an option. Why not recruit him instead?"

As he said this, Rubrum reached into his cloak's pocket as Eggman watched him warily from behind his dark glasses. What he pulled from his pocket was a small tape recorder, which Rubrum looked down to stare at. He quietly sighed, and then hit the play button on its side.

"You know what? You're right," the recorder said. "Problem's me. I'm sorry I'm up here doing a job that, let's be honest, anybody else could do but at least it's something for me to do instead of nothing. I'm sorry I chose to join the Freedom Fighters when, let's face it, I don't belong with them! I'm sorry I'm a normal human and can't fight like a Mobian! I'm sorry I was minding my own business before I got dragged into some other universe's war!"

Rubrum stopped the recording and pocketed the tape recorder. "That was Sorun," he explained. "Surprise surprise, he's not all too thrilled over being abducted. To put it lightly, he completely resents the Freedom Fighters for what they did to him. And there aren't any Mobians where he's from, either, so that's a whole 'nother layer of weirdness he's been trying and failing to cope with. So who's to say what a guy like that, who really hates pretty much everybody around him right now, would do if approached a fellow human... Overlander... former robot-turned-flesh... whatever the hell you call yourself."

"And why would I ever want somebody like him with me?" Eggman questioned. "I've all but won at this point. What use have I for any further resources?"

"Have him fight the Freedom Fighters or something," he suggested. "Back your own forces off and let him do everything. Guy could never beat them all on his own, but he can stall them. Let them grow strength so that when they come for you, it turns into a half-decent challenge. You could go as far as to offer him a way home since you're so brilliant. Hell, the fact you're not even a Mobian might be enough to entice him." At that, he spun on his feet and turned his back to Eggman. "But that's all food for thought. Choice is yours at the end of the day. I got things to do. See you when I see you."

There were further questions Robotnik had for Rubrum, but as the red cloaked man was walking away he had blinked. And when he opened his eyes again, Rubrum had completely vanished from sight.

He jumped in surprise, but quickly huffed before crossing the room towards the discarded pieces that once made up Metal Sonic. He bent down and picked up the severed head, brushing some dusk off its face before giving a contemplative hum.

"Don't ever think I'll ever forgive your transgressions, Rubrum. It's completely preposterous, but... what he says does have some merit. I have to wonder..." He turned the head over in his hand, towards the neck where it had been severed from the rest of the body. He frowned deeply when he saw the clean, straight cut that had went through all that metal and wiring. A cut so clean and straight it almost seemed unnatural.

"Well, nothing a trip to the repair shop won't fix," he decided as he dropped the head, and then looked towards the sleeping body of the short Overlander nearby. He sneered at it. "Very well then. I haven't anything to lose at this point, and I could use the diversion. We'll just have to see for ourselves who this Sorun person really is once my good-for-nothing nephew wakes up, won't we?"

A/N- So I know that so far this whole story was gearing towards a "powerless but still significant/ strength without power" kind of vibe, but that's not what I'm going for here. It's a big shift in tone to be sure, but there's gonna be a lot of that, hence why I'm pacing the story out like this. And I know the biggest concern is power creep, but I'm mitigating that with heavy restrictions while organically threading it through the plot. It's all planned out.

Anyways, that's it for this one. Thanks to all for the reviews; you're all awesome. 'Til next time.

Chapter 12

Recursion Error

Episode 12- Gotta bail

"How did my life go from bad to worse to whatever this fresh hell is?"

It was a question Sorun found himself struggling with as he aimlessly wandered around Knothole while absolutely refusing to meet anybody's eyes. He didn't have to think too hard on the question; he knew the how of the issue. He just found himself struggling with the why.

Why him? Why, out of the seven-odd billion people on Earth, had he been the one to be pulled through that portal by Tails? Out of all the places on Earth, why did those coordinates point to a random grocery store in Detroit? And why, oh why, did he just have to be there at that one specific moment?

Because he'd wanted orange juice. It all boiled down to orange juice at the end of the day. The fact that he'd won the most rigged lottery in the world by accident over orange juice served no end to his frustration.

So where did that leave him? Here. Surrounded by weird animal people. Stuck in a world under siege by some weird mad scientist wacko. Getting the very life sucked out of him by magic rocks. Summoned Swords. Gag curse.

What was he gonna do with all of that? He didn't know. Hours upon hours of thinking of all this, over and over, and now it was dusk and the conclusion he'd come up with so far was that he didn't have any conclusions.

Fantastic.

"Huh? Hey, Sorun! Sorun! Slow down!"

The teen's head picked up. He recognized that voice calling after him from behind his back. That feminine voice that carried such a carefree lilt but had just the slightest hint of being just a little unhinged- oh god it was Honey.

"Oh god oh fuck no not right now." He absolutely refused to take on anything else today, because Honey wasn't going to be the straw that broke Sorun's back- she'd be the whole hay bale. And he was shaky enough as it was with everything else that had happened, so he tried walking faster in an effort to get away.

But then he started to panic when he heard rapid footfalls behind him.

"Jesus she's chasing me!" he internally screamed as he picked up the pace. But the footfalls behind him were gaining quickly, and he soon realized he wasn't going to be outrunning the golden cat. So he spat out a curse, dug his heels into the ground, and spun around to meet the cat.

This was a mistake, as Honey hadn't known that Sorun was going to make such a rapid stop and so ran right into him. They both grunted and stumbled on their feet, but fortunately managed to remain upright. Unfortunately, Honey had been carrying a paper bag in her hand that had been sent flying up into the air.

Sorun's eyes traveled upwards to the paper bag, and he heard a large gasp from the Mobian right in front of him. The bag fell towards the ground, and would have touched down entirely if a blue sword hadn't appeared next to it and stabbed forwards so that the blade caught the bag's string-like handles on the top.

"Well, at least I'm getting some mileage out of these things." The sword floated next to Sorun, and then shattered away right as he grabbed the bag. "Here," Sorun said as he handed the bag to a bewildered Honey, who was flicking one of her ears in curiosity.

"Oh! Uh... I didn't know you could do something like that!" Honey commented as she gingerly took the bag from Sorun. "Guess you're not a Freedom Fighter for nothing, huh?"

"... The swords don't freak you out?" Sorun asked in a surprised tone.

Honey tilted her head to the side. "Why would it?"

"... Mobians," Sorun whispered under his breath. He supposed he couldn't be surprised- they all had to live in this world. It was little wonder they treated strangeness as the norm. "Anyways, yeah. I can make swords. It's kind of a new development for me, actually."

"Oh, huh. Oh!" She suddenly held the bag out to Sorun. "I almost forgot! This is for you!"

For him? He couldn't hold in the blink of surprise, and awkwardly took the bag out from Honey's hand before opening it up. There was only a single item in the bag, and he could tell from the way it was crumpled that it was a piece of clothing.

Of course. She's said something about wanting to expand his wardrobe during their talk about his image. He wasn't too thrilled about that, and with everything else going on he hadn't managed to fit in any time to weasel out of it. And he for sure couldn't find any excuse not to take it now.

Giving an inaudible sigh, he reached into the bag and took out the clothing item. It was a deep blue color that matched his eyes, so at the very least he could appreciate the color. The zipper in front and the hood hanging off the neck hole automatically classified it as a hoodie to Sorun's eyes, but oddly the hoodie was missing sleeves. It was plain otherwise. Didn't even have drawstrings for the hood.

"It's very... utilitarian," Sorun commented as he slipped the sleeveless hoodie on, but just couldn't find the energy to zip in closed. "Part of the practical ensemble, I guess?"

Honey nodded. "Yeah, but looking at it now... I don't know." She gave a dissatisfied hum as she rubbed at her chin with her tail slowly swishing behind her. "I dunno if it's really fitting the aesthetic I'm going for now. The hoodie almost makes you too... punkish. It blends too well with your shirt too, and the contrast between your upper and lower half is a bit too harsh. Hm..."

She didn't sound very pleased at all with his look. "You want it back...?" he asked as he tugged at the bottom of his hoodie.

"No, keep it. It's fine." She shook her head. "I'm gonna figure this out, don't worry. Oh, and I finally got to making those spare pants and boots and other things for you. I tried dropping them off at Sonic's place since I heard you were staying there, but he said you weren't there. I left them with him." She pursed her lips. "Sorun, is everything okay? Sonic sounded kind of... well, sad when he mentioned you."

This was probably the first time he'd heard her sound so concerned. She even looked a bit worried, too, which had Sorun a little surprised. "Yeah, some stuff happened," he confirmed with a nod.

"Oh. Are you alright?"

"No."

She blinked, and then coughed into her hand. "Um... do you want to talk about it?"

"No." He would if he could, but he liked it when his heart actually worked. "Look, Honey, I... don't worry about me," Sorun said as he rubbed the back of his neck. "It's... resistance stuff. Yeah. Everybody's kinda stressed. Just go back to worrying about clothes and your business, okay?"

He didn't even sound that convincing to himself, so he almost expected the skeptical look she was sending him. To his relief, she nodded in understanding and took the empty bag back from Sorun. "Well, if you say so. I should get back to my shop. Have a nice night." She turned to leave, but stopped and looked back at the human. "And Sorun? You look awful, and believe it or not you're more than a walking mannequin to me. So please don't push yourself too hard, because I don't want to see you hurt because of it."

After saying her piece, Honey left Sorun alone in the middle of the street. He watched her disappear around a corner, and then looked down at the sleeveless hoodie he was wearing before sighing.

"Yeah, trust me, Honey," he whispered, "I'm well aware that going too far is gonna kill me."

"Is Sorun not joining us for dinner tonight, dear?"

The fork that was being held in Sonic's hand clattered onto the plate, and his eyes turned upwards. Across the dining table, his mother was giving him a questioning stare, and to the side his mechanical father was doing the same. He shuffled uncomfortably in his chair under their stares, and then sighed before shaking his head.

"No, Sorun's... not coming home tonight," he informed them. "A lot happened today."

"Oh, my." The female hedgehog held a hand to her mouth. "He isn't hurt, is he?"

"Well, no. Er, maybe? I don't... he's not in a good place right now." He shook his head and placed a hand on his forehead. "I don't really know where to start with him."

Because where was he supposed to start when it came to Sorun? There were so many underlying issues that he'd thought were being resolved that he had trouble counting them. Issues that were still there and were getting worse , and no matter how hard he tried to help Sorun nothing changed with him.

Why had it gone so wrong after he got that Chaos Emerald? He seemed to be doing so well until that point...

"So what happened?" His father asked him as he leaned forwards on the table. "I assumed-"

Sonic's mother glanced at her robotic husband. "Jules?"

"Yes?"

"Elbows."

Jules started, and then quickly removed his arms off of the table. "Sorry, dear," he quickly apologized before turning back to Sonic. "As I was saying, I assumed that Sorun was acclimating well. What happened?"

"I don't know, dad. I thought he was doing fine, too." Sighing, Sonic leaned back into his chair and slung his left arm over its top. "You've seen him around. He was still kind of quiet, but he didn't look so upset all the time anymore. I even caught him hanging out with Mighty. He was opening up. I thought... I really thought that was progress. Then today, while he was taking flying lessons from Tails, we got word of a Chaos Emerald that was found by one of Eggman's ships. Sorun needs them all to go back to his zone, and Eggman getting an Emerald is never a good thing, so we decided to go get it. So I grab Tails and Sorun and we fly to the Egg Carrier where the Emerald is. Sorun stays behind in the plane while me and Tails go do our thing and get the Emerald.

"But then it turns out Sorun gets attacked while we're gone. He's fine," he assured his parents when he saw them grow worried. "He found the cannons on Tails' plane and took them out. And I felt really... proud, you know? I felt happy for him because he took out all those robots on his own, and sure, he needed the plane to do it, but it was still him . He even looked happy! He was... sort of smiling, in a weird, tired way. He's always tired for some reason."

"He does sleep in a lot," Bernadette mentioned.

Sonic nodded. "Yeah. After that happened we go back to the Freedom HQ and the Chaos Emerald... stuck to Sorun for some reason. We all tried to pry it out of his hand but it wouldn't come off, and then it started to shock him. It got really bad, and he started screaming..." He had to take a breath before continuing. "But then it just suddenly stopped. The Chaos Emerald disappeared, and Sorun was asleep for a couple minutes. He woke up and... he started making swords."

His two parents stared at him for a long moment, and his father leaned forwards to gain his son's attention. "He... started making swords?" he repeated.

"Yeah, Sorun can absorb Chaos Emeralds and get powers. We don't really know why he can. It was kind of a shock for everybody." His green eyes suddenly lit up. "They're really cool, too! He makes them out of nothing and he can spin them around and stuff!"

Those swords really were cool in his opinion, but Sonic just didn't know why. It might have been the color- he never thought blue would look good on a sword of all things, but Sorun's strange power made it look good. He just really liked them.

"It came out of nowhere, but I was really glad for Sorun. He finally has a power now and can seriously help out. But Sorun..." Sonic trailed off and looked to the side. "He didn't take it well. He flipped out. I think it's because Tails said there isn't a way to take the Emerald out of him, and now Sorun's all worried that we won't be able to send him home because of that. I tried telling him that we'll find a way, but... but I just don't know."

Because what were they supposed to do if he really couldn't go home? What were they going to say to him? "Sorry for taking you away from your home forever, Sorun?" Sonic didn't even know how that conversation would go, and he didn't know what Sorun was supposed to do if that really was the case. Or how they were all going to live with themselves for that matter.

He would have never even considered listening to that stupid wooden tablet if he knew it was going to turn out this bad.

"So anyways, yeah. Sorun's worried over his home, and he's still really sore at us for bringing him here," Sonic finished. "I wish he'd just talk to us, to somebody, but I don't think Sorun likes talking about his feelings all that much. What do you think?"

His mother had a contemplative look on her face, but the unsure look she had underneath that expression said enough. His father eye-sensors had lowered in thought, and eventually picked back up towards his son.

"Is he still going to fight Robotnik with the rest of you?" Jules asked.

"Huh? Uh, I'm pretty sure, yeah. Why wouldn't he?" He understood Sorun was mad, but he couldn't see him being so mad that he would leave the Freedom Fighters. Especially now that he had those weird blue swords of his.

"Well... I can understand the difficulties the young man is facing. And his fears of never going home do seem justified, but if he'll still continue to fight with you all, I don't think he'll be upset forever." His robotic arms crossed over his said. "That said, you have torn him away from his life, son. If it really does come down to him being stuck here, you'll all have to deal with it when that comes."

Sonic sighed. "Yeah, I know. I'm still trying to figure out what we're even gonna do if it's true. I don't want us to be responsible taking him from his home."

"So you're just going to give up on finding a way to get him home?"

"No way!" The younger hedgehog shot up in his seat and shot his father a rebellious glare. "I'm not gonna give up on getting him home even if it looks bad now! We're just... swamped with Eggman right now. You know how it is." He sat back down in his seat, crossed his arms, and began tapping on his shoulders with his fingers. "It's just not something we can focus on right now. After we finally stop Eggman, then yeah. I'm not stopping until we find a way to get Sorun home. But we just can't do it right now."

It was more of a promise towards himself than for Sorun, but it held the same meaning all the same. He wasn't one to give up, especially when it was on something this serious.

"We're gonna find a way to bring him home," Sonic said at last. "I don't know how, but we will."

"And if you can't?" his father asked.

Sonic didn't have an answer for him.

"So... swords?"

Violet eyes flicked to the left to regard the armadillo sitting next to him on the log as Knuckles tied the laces on his shoes. "Yeah, swords. Weird, blue, kind of glowy."

"Like... sword-swords?"

Knuckles' mouth opened slightly. "What do you want me to say? Yes." He turned back to his shoes. "Sorun took a Chaos Emerald inside of himself and attained some form of Chaos Control."

Mighty nodded. "I get that part, but... swords?"

"Yeah, he condensed Chaos energy into a solid state and managed to control that shape somehow. Don't know why he shaped it into swords of all things. Or why they're blue, either, but Chaos energy has always been weird." He finished tying his shoe and sat up to look at Mighty. "Why do you think got that sword power?"

The armadillo pointed at himself. "You're asking me? You have more experience in using that stuff than almost anybody else here, especially when you were walking around all green that one time," he said. "If anybody would know, it'd be you."

"I don't, though."

"Oh." Mighty shrugged. "Eh, than why worry about it? I don't really get it, but as long as Sorun's fine then does it really matter?"

"Who is it we're talking about now?"

Both of their heads swiveled towards the trees in front of them, just behind the hill that Freedom HQ rested under. A purple Mobian with a yellow horn jutting out the center of his forehead walked into their view from behind some trees. A shorter, bumble bee-like Mobian was buzzing around in the air behind him while humming happily to himself.

"Oh, hey, Espio," Knuckles greeted with a wave. "Didn't see you there."

"Naturally," the chameleon grunted as he stopped in front of the other two. "Me and Charmy overhead you. What is this about blue swords?"

"Something weird happened with Sorun," Knuckles answered. "He grabbed a Chaos Emerald and sort of... took it into himself, and now he's got this weird power to summon swords right out of thin air."

Espio hummed in acknowledgment. "What kind of sword?"

"What the- how should I know!? I don't know swords!" Knuckles yelled as he ran a frustrated hand through his dreadlocks. "They were, I dunno, straight. The middle part was kind of weirdly shaped- look, it was a sword, okay?"

"... So a straight sword, then?"

"Sure, that," Knuckles sighed out. "We've pretty much given up on figuring out why that happened to Sorun in the first place, so now we're trying to put together why he got the power to make swords with Chaos energy. You two have any ideas?"

The chameleon shook his head. "I don't think I've shared a single word with him ever since he was brought here. He never approached me, and I never had a reason to speak with him, so we've remained distant," he admitted. "I'm sorry that I'm not much help in the matter."

"Nah, that's not your fault," Knuckles said. "That's just Sorun. He's not really that sociable. Keeps to himself mostly now that I think about it."

Not that there was anything wrong with that. If there was anybody who could understand somebody who wanted their own space and didn't feel like talking all that much, it was Knuckles. Thing was, he didn't get that kind of vibe off of Sorun whenever he saw him. The few times he had actually talked to the human he'd been fairly conversational. Talking to him was one thing, but actually approaching him? Knuckles wasn't so sure.

"Yeah, I haven't talked to him yet, either," Charmy lamented in a high-pitched voice as he floated nearer to the group. "I tried going up to him once, but when I was about to say something to him he just glared at me. Really hard. I got kind of scared and went away after."

Espio's yellow eyes narrowed and flicked towards Charmy. "He didn't do anything, did he?"

Charmy shook his head. "No, he's just... he isn't mean," he said, "but he can really feel mean sometimes, you know? I don't know how to describe it." The corners of his mouth turned downwards. "Saffron's actually too scared to go near him."

"Aw, Sorun's not that bad a guy," Mighty claimed as he waved his hand. "I played some games with him. He's really chill when you get to know him. He can just be a bit... prickly." He paused and began to lightly tap at his knees. "He's really good at video games too," he muttered. "He beat Nicole's score in that one spaceship game."

That drew everybody's attention and caused everyone's eyes to widened. Nicole's scores in those games were nothing to sneeze at. They represented a level of finesse with games that were considered by everybody to be unattainable to anybody who wasn't an AI named Nicole. Knuckles himself wasn't even that good at them to begin with, and he gave up on them altogether when he saw that Sonic never even came close to beating Nicole's score.

What hope did anybody have if Sonic's reflexes weren't enough to beat Nicole? Apparently Sorun found an answer, but he couldn't imagine what it was.

"I don't believe you," Espio said in a disbelieving tone. "There's no way he managed to surpass Nicole's score."

Knuckles couldn't hold in the small smirk that formed, and neither could Mighty or Charmy. Espio refused to even touch a video game ever again when he failed to even make it to the top five on the leaderboard of that game, and always claimed that he was cheated because his control stick and been sticking or something. They all knew better.

Mighty shrugged at Espio's skepticism. "Check the game's leaderboard if you want, but I was there. Did it on his first try, too. Got a perfect score and everything."

"Perfect, huh? Wow. That's impressive," Knuckles said with genuine shock to his voice. "So-" he turned to Espio and Charmy, "- Vector still doing good?"

"His ankle's fine. He should be out and about tomorrow," Espio informed them.

"Oh. Good." The echidna crossed his arms and tapped his foot on the ground. "So nobody's got any idea what the deal with the swords is?"

Mighty shook his head. "Nope, nothing."

"I haven't a clue," Espio said.

Charmy shrugged.

"Yeah, that's what I figured." Knuckles sighed. "Man, what a weird guy."

For hours the sound rapid keystrokes were the only sounds that could be heard within the HQ's lab. The source of this tapping was from Tails, who, for the most part, had been sitting at the same computer he'd sat at ever since he'd recorded those Chaos readings from Sorun's body. So engrossed was he in his work that he didn't even notice when somebody stepped up behind him. He did notice when that somebody tapped at his shoulder.

The sudden contact made Tails yelp and jump up in his seat. He calmed down almost instantly when he saw it was a just a familiar walrus behind him, at which point he pouted and turned back to his computer.

"Oh, hi, Rotor," he tiredly mumbled as he continued typing. "You just get in?"

"Uh... yeah, there were some projects I wanted to catch up on," Rotor answered as he blinked down at the fox. "Tails, it's almost nighttime. Why're you still here?"

"Mm. I'm worried about Sorun. Some issues with the Chaos Emerald happened."

Nearby, Rotor pulled a chair away from a different computer and sat down in it before addressing Tails once more. "Yeah, I heard. Blue swords. Sounds crazy. What about it?"

"Well, I've been trying to figure out the mechanism behind how his body managed to convert a Chaos Emerald from a solid state into a pure energy state and integrate it into... wherever it got integrated into his body," Tails explained as he typed away at the computer. "We need to get it out of him eventually so we can power the portal machine and send him back to his zone, so I've been running a lot of simulations to test out some theories I had."

"And?" Rotor pressed.

Sighing, Tails tapped at one more button and then rotated the chair around to face Rotor. "They've all come up as negative," he lamented. "I just don't understand it, and that's frustrating because I always understand things, but then this happened and none of the data is lining up and-"

"Tails, take a breath." The fox's speech had began to grow more rapid, and Rotor had to hold his hands up to stop him. "I get it, you're freaked out."

"I'm not... yeah. Sorry," Tails apologized. "I just can't find a way to separate the Emerald from Sorun's body. For all intents and purposes, these models are basically telling me they're completely fused. So if we can't remove it..."

"Then we can't send him back," Rotor finished. He hummed, and then folded one his his leathery legs over the other. "You really are worried about the guy," he noted. "I would have expected you to be a bit, I dunno, off-put by him. Especially after he yelled at you."

Tails shook his head, and then turned back to the computer as Rotor watched on. "Oh, he said he was sorry for that. I don't really blame him; I think I would have been a little freaked out if something like that happened to me, too. I don't think I would have reacted so violently, though. Eh heh." He paused to type out a string of commands on the computer. "Sorun's not a bad person. At least, I don't think so. I think he's just sad."

"I think you're mixing 'sad' up for 'angry' here, Tails," Rotor commented.

"Mm, well... yeah, maybe," he admitted. "But he's had a lot thrown at him and he's not us , you know? And... I think that's why I had some trouble understanding him at first. I've been around Sonic for so long and seen him shrug off so much that it seems normal, but none of this is normal for Sorun. So I tried doing something normal for him and talked to him."

Rotor hummed. "And how'd that go?"

"He's... nice, it not reserved a bit. If you're really patient with him he really opens up."

"Oh, come on." Rotor rolled his eyes. "I've only known him for over a week but he doesn't give the impression of being a conversationalist. He usually just spends the day standing around glaring at people. He's as bad as Shadow."

Tails shook his head. "No, he's just shy. At least that was the feeling he gave off when I was talking with him. He can be friendly, but he just... he doesn't approach anybody. And I think it's just because he's always nervous around us." He stopped typing and glanced back at Rotor. "I mean, he's friendly with Sonic, but I think that's mostly just because they're sharing a room." His face fell. "Or, well, they were friendly. Sorun kind of... snapped at Sonic, I think, after the thing with the Emerald."

That was how Sonic had put it to him, at least, right after that incident. He had to wonder if more had happened though from the dour expression Sonic had held, and knowing how upset Sorun must have been, he wouldn't have been surprised to learn things grew a bit too heated. But all he could do was hope that things would settle down soon.

"Well, he still kind of creeps me out," Rotor said as he pulled his chair towards a different computer and booted it up. "But I can guess

I can understand his attitude all things considered when you put it like that. Oh yeah, by the way, didn't you say something about wanting to conduct maintenance on the plane? I saw it got dinged up pretty bad."

"Uh... later. Tomorrow, maybe," Tails answered. "I want a few more cracks at this simulation to see if I can't get an idea about what to do about that Emerald."

"Any progress on that front?"

The fox's blue eyes turned up at the computer screen. They slowly closed when he saw the words "critical failure" flashing in red letters across the monitor. "Not really, no."

Boom!

"I somehow knew I'd find you here."

The location was a small training area tucked away in a small clearing past a stream near Freedom HQ used primarily for, unsurprisingly, training purposes. One section of the training area was a small space comprised of wooden boxes and crates stacked on top of each other spread out all over. Currently this area was being occupied by a dark hedgehog standing on the ground and a white bat that was sitting on a pile of crates and looking down at him.

Shadow regarded the bat for a moment, and then looked down at his hand. A crackling bolt of yellow-green energy that was vaguely shaped like a spear formed in his hand, and he turned towards a nearby crate. "And what gave you that impression, Rouge?" he asked before he threw the energy spear at a nearby crate, which exploded upon impact.

"I thought to myself 'where could Shadow possibly be if he's not in his room' and came to the first place that came to mind," Rouge answered him. She slung one of her high boots over the other and blinked her teal eyes down at him. "What's got you so riled? You normally only chuck those Chaos Spears around so wantonly when you're upset over something."

"I'm not upset," Shadow denied as he threw another Chaos Spear at a crate. "I'm simply... intrigued at something. And intrigue is slowly turning to vexation." Yet another Chaos Spear formed in his hand, and he scowled down at the energy bolt he was holding. "Hmph. It just won't shape the way I want it to," he muttered before throwing it at a crate.

Rouge watched the explosion with an impassive expression, and then looked back to the hedgehog. "Alright, I'll bite. What happened?" she asked.

"Are you aware of the incident that transpired with Sorun and the Chaos Emerald that we recently acquired?"

"Something about him absorbing it? I heard people talking." The bat shook her head. "Waste of a good gem if you ask me. But I heard he got a sword ability or something out of it?"

"He gained some form of Chaos Control," Shadow confirmed. "The mechanism behind how such a thing is possible is unclear, but what's even more unclear is the ability he manifested." His face furrowed into an puzzled expression. "I thought it was a Chaos Spear at first, but it's clearly something different. He made a sword."

"... So a Chaos Sword?" Rouge tried.

Shadow shook his head. "No. You know I have a deep connection with Chaos due to my biology. Sensing Chaos energy is second nature to me, so you can trust me when I say that sword Sorun manifested was nothing like a Chaos Spear," he explained. "Compared to my own Chaos Spear it practically had no power behind it. He could barely even sustain it; it shattered. But... not only did he manage to form it into a completely solid state, but he did so while forming it into an intricate shape. That sword."

The explanation caused a semi-interested hum to come from Rouge. "Alright...? So what's the problem?"

"The problem is that I can't recreate it," Shadow grumbled under his breath. "I have an innate mastery over the manipulation of Chaos energy. I thought shaping my own Chaos energy into something as simple as what I saw Sorun create would be simple, but it appears I was wrong. I can't even grasp how he created such a technique. Or why he created it for that matter."

A very, very strange Chaos Control technique at that. Even the blue coloring of the ability had been peculiar, though Shadow was less concerned about its color and more behind the actual intricacies of it. It was unthinkable that him of all people couldn't replicate a Chaos technique after having seen it firsthand, but that particular ability continued to elude him, though admittedly his desire to create that technique for himself was more out of academic curiosity than anything else.

He would have to discuss it with Sorun at some point, though he had his doubts that the human was approachable at the moment. Especially after all the shouting he'd overheard earlier today. But then again, reading people wasn't a strong suit of his. For Rouge, though, such a thing was practically an inborn skill. The perks of being a spy, he supposed.

"What's your impression of the human, Rouge?" he asked.

"Impression, huh?" She looked up at the darkening sky in thought. "We've pretty much avoided each other for the most part, so I can't really say much. I never really thought much of him so I pretty much just ignored him."

"That doesn't sound like you at all," Shadow noted.

"Hey, you heard him during his big 'inauguration speech' or whatever you want to call it. He didn't give any reasons to be paid attention to." The bat rested her head against a closed fist. "Speaking of which, swords or not, that guy's still technically a civilian fighting as a resistance soldier. He's unskilled, and that kind of thing is dangerous for himself and everybody around him."

Shadow nodded in agreement. "I know, but they're desperate. We all are at this point. But maybe we can make something of him now that he has that sword ability of his."

Rouge scoffed. "What, you wanna train him and his power?"

"More like pick his brain about those swords," Shadow admitted, "but if need be... perhaps. Whether he likes it or not, he's an actual asset to us now. It'd be unfortunate waste for him to suffer a fatal injury because we didn't properly prepare him."

Anybody dying at this juncture would be detrimental to their operations. But Sorun was inexperienced, and if anybody in the Freedom Fighters was in danger of falling due to a stupid mistake, it was him. At the very least he could maybe give him a few pointers on those swords of his so he didn't end up poking his own eye out with them. Or somebody else's for that matter.

He would really need to talk with that human at some point.

"Ah, well, you have fun with that." The two black, leathery wings on Rouge's lower back began to flap, and her body picked up into the air and off the crate. "You gonna be here much longer?"

"Just a few more minutes," he answered.

She didn't say anything in response, choosing to just give a shrug before her body turned around and flew off. Shadow didn't even bother to see her off, as he was too focused on the crackling weapon forming in his hand as he concentrated on an image of a sword.

To his disappointment, the weapon still came up as a Chaos Spear. It was promptly thrown at a crate.

"Huh? What do ah think about Sorun?"

"Well, yeah." Sally sat up in her seat and gestured to the yellow-furred rabbit Mobian sitting across from her. "Likes, general concerns, any, er, issues you may have had with him," she elaborated. "I'm worried he's not fitting in here, and in the long run that could be problematic. I want Sorun to trust us, but he socializes so little with everybody it's hard to gauge him in any regard."

It wasn't exactly a problem, but it wasn't something she was comfortable with letting lie, either. The problem was that Sally just didn't know how to approach Sorun to solve these issues since his attitude was so... different. Alien even by human standards, and she didn't know if it was because Sorun was still acclimating to everything this zone was throwing at him or if he was just this strange naturally.

So she decided a practical solution was in order by way of discussing the issue with somebody else. Specifically, to go to her friend and fellow Freedom Fighter's house to talk to her about the odd human that had joined them.

"Well... the feller sure is different. And ah don't mean just his looks," Bunnie admitted in a southern drawl. She placed her left arm, a robotic limb, on the table. "Ah haven't spoken to him once, but there've been times ah've caught him starin' at my robot bits."

"Huh!?" There was the sound of a fridge door closing as a coyote Mobian's head poked in from the kitchen door and into the dining room. "Say it is not so! Sorun has been what!?" Antoine yelled as he looked towards Sally.

The chipmunk winced and made a lowering gesture with her hand to calm Antoine down. "It's not his fault. I've heard him mention some things here and there about where he's from. I don't think his zone has anything like cybernetics over there," she explained. "I'm sure he's just curious about them."

"Oh. Right. Of course." Antoine- for reasons that were unclear to Sally- sighed in relief and stepped into the dining room. "Eet's understandable then that Sorun would be curious."

"And what about you, Antoine?" Sally asked. "Do you have any thoughts on Sorun?"

"He iz... very difficult to talk about," he admitted. "We have talked very little, but to me he seems like the nice kind of person. Perhaps he iz just nervous?" He stopped himself and rethought his words. "But... he did go on zat mission for us, so he cannot be the fraidy-cat, unless... I don't know." His shoulder hung and he gave Sally an apologetic look.

"Ah just thought that he never looked to be in the mood to talk if you know what ah mean," Bunnie added. "What brought all this up anyhow?"

Right, they hadn't been there during the incident earlier today, Sally had to remind herself. Well, now was as good as time as any to fill them in, and it would give her a chance to air her own concerns. "Sorun apparently has a condition where he can absorb Chaos Emeralds. Earlier today Sonic took him on a mission to get one, and when he touched it the Emerald disappeared. He's fine," she assured them when they grew concerned looks, "better than fine, really. He got a, well, an ability out of the ordeal. But mentally I think he's about as upset as he was the day he came here."

Bunnie blinked her green eyes in confusion. "The feller gets a new power out of a Chaos Emerald, an' he's upset?"

"Sonic filled me in. Sorun's worried that, since the Emerald is stuck in him, that he won't be able to return home since he needs all seven. Whether that's actually true or not remains to be seen." She lowered her gaze towards the table. "Add that to the fact that he's still upset at us since we were the ones that brought him here and, well, you get the picture. I'm worried that Sorun is holding us responsible for possibly stranding him here in this zone forever because of everything that's happened."

Her words hung in the air for a few moments before both Bunnie's and Antoine's faces fell in realization. "Ah. Oh," Bunnie voiced as her large ears fell. "Ah guess, uh... he would be really sore, huh...?"

"Zat is... not the ideal sort of problem," Antoine agreed. "It is no wonder he looks so angry all of the time."

"But that's the thing. He isn't," Sally sighed out in exasperation. "Or, most of the time he isn't. Today and day one notwithstanding. I've talked to him and if anything he just sounded, I don't know... scared. But at the same he's been patient with everything going on around him. It's confusing. On one hand he's upset at all of us, but on the other hand he's been understanding towards us at his own inconvenience. It's as impressive as it is frustrating."

"If I may interject?"

The new voice sounded from the inside of Sally's vest, and drew the attention of everybody present. She immediately reached into her pocket to pull out an object and place it on the table: a small, square keyboard with a green flip-screen attached to it.

"Have you considered that perhaps it would be wisest to just talk to him?" The small computer talked in a feminine voice, and the words she said were displayed on the screen. "Would that not be the simplest course of action?"

"I'm... not really following you, Nicole," Sally admitted.

"There is little to follow. Talk to him. In my experience talking with others in concern to issues causing mental duress can be an effective treatment. It is obvious that Sorun is experiencing stress due to recent events, so if he will not approach anybody on his own, then why would you not approach him yourselves?"

Everybody blinked at the simple solution. So simple that Sally felt like kicking herself for not thinking of it earlier, and she forcibly reminded of why she confided so much to the little computer.

"That... sounds really practical actually," she agreed, and then looked up to Bunnie. "Maybe tomorrow we could try something?"

The rabbit looked uncomfortable at the idea. "Ah dunno," she muttered, "ah wouldn't really know what to lead with when it comes to him."

"Open up with the cybernetics," she suggested. "Or if you're uncomfortable with that we could just open up with something else. Anything is fine as long as it gets him to talk." She leaned back in her seat and crossed her arms. "Just... please try talking with him? About anything?"

The other two Mobians gave each other unsure looks, but eventually they turned towards Sally and gave her a nod. It offered some relief to her that maybe this issue could be fixed yet.

"Maybe you could talk to him, too, Nicole?" Sally suggested. "I feel that the more people on this the better the results would be."

There was a pause from the computer. "I'm not entirely against it," Nicole said, though the chipmunk had noticed that her volume sounded slightly lower. "That being said, from what you have told me Sorun's experience with mechanical beings has been extremely poor. I fear that this has caused a negative bias within him against anybody who can be seen as an artificial construct. Such as me."

Sally's eyes widened in realization, and she immediately shook her head. "No-no-no! Sorun's isn't... well, I don't think he... no, he wouldn't have any reason to dislike you. You're not a Badnik," she reasoned. "It'll be fine. I can even get a Power Ring and you could make your body to talk to him with! You two could, I dunno... play a video game? You like video games. I think I heard Sorun mention a couple of times he likes video games. That's already something you two have in common!"

An ellipses symbol appeared on the small computer's screen as Nicole mulled over Sally's words. "... Is he any good?" she finally asked.

"I think?" Sally shrugged. "I'm pretty sure Sonic mentioned something about him being good. But you could find out."

"That is acceptable."

And just like that, Sally saw her plan of getting Sorun to finally open up to someone actually have a decent chance of success. There'd be a bit of planning to put in, but it would be all the worth it in the end if this actually worked.

She really hoped it would work.

By now it was the middle of the night. Midnight, more accurately, as the broken moon was high in the center of the sky and was the one source of illumination for the sole human walking through the woods just outside of Knothole City's edge. With his hands firmly tucked into his pockets, the teen was mainly spending this time walking in random directions with hunched shoulder while thinking quietly to himself.

"Freakin' Emeralds and the echidna and Sonic and... egh. Everything's all screwed up," he thought as he kicked a rock away. "Maybe I should just jump off a cliff or something and cripple myself so that I'm too disabled to save the world. I'll do it just to spite Aurora." He sighed. "No, that's a stupid idea. And I like my legs."

So far he'd come up with no solutions to his current predicament, nor even a plan on moving forwards. Sorun wasn't even so sure he'd come to terms with everything yet. And despite walking for practically half a day at this point, he was still coming up blank on everything.

This lead him to this point: exhausted both physically and mentally while wandering the woods.

What to do, what to do...

"Do nothing? Take the 'wait and see' approach? Probably wouldn't end too well. Fight? If I wanna wind down into the grave, maybe. But fighting's the only way I'm getting those Emeralds. But those Emeralds will... man. What am- agh!"

He'd walked into something. Something small and metallic from the peculiar ding he'd heard upon collision. Sorun backed up a step and rubbed the spot on his forehead he'd been hit as he looked up to see what had impacted him.

Sorun didn't quite know what he was looking at.

He almost thought it was a floating golf ball at first, but the way its smooth, white surface shined implied it was made of metal, and there was red eye-like lens right on its front looking right at Sorun. Looking closer he saw that it was more oblong in shape than spherical, and there were four small ports on its underside with jets of air firing out of it.

It looked harmless enough, but Sorun had to wonder why something like this was just floating in the middle of the woods.

"Hell are you? Some kind of drone?" He wondered as he leaned his head forwards. In response, the small, white drone zipped enthusiastically around in the air and floated a fair distance away from Sorun. It stopped and turned around so the red lens was facing Sorun once again, and then shook up and down in what he assumed was an attempt at getting his attention.

Sorun rose an eyebrow at the drone's antics. "What, you want me to follow you?" he asked, though it was more to himself than the robot.

The drone shook up and down again.

"Alright, let's think this over. There's a mad scientist named Eggman trying to take over the world with robots. There's a vaguely egg-shaped robot trying to lead me somewhere. Coincidence? Who the fuck knows when it comes to this world." He sighed while deliberating with himself on what to do. "... Agh, why not? Day can't get any worse. Sure, let's follow the strange white egg drone from outta nowhere."

Was it the wisest decision for him to make? Probably not, but he was too tired to even care at this point. So he gave the drone a stiff nod and began following it as it lead him pasts trees and brush away from Knothole.

Was it Eggman? He truly, honestly didn't know. He didn't know the man outside of what Sonic had told him. Maybe it really was just somebody else trying to get his attention. But he didn't know anybody else besides the crazy robot guy terrorizing the world who would be even remotely interested in him. And yet he didn't know why Eggman would take interest in him.

He supposed he would find out when he made it to wherever the drone was leading him.

Eventually, Sorun and the drone emerged from the trees into a large, circular clearing of grass and a few large rocks. The broken moon was still shining brightly above them with few clouds in the sky, and with that lighting Sorun was able to see that there was somebody in the clearing sitting on a rock fiddling with a controller of some type in his hand.

When he walked closer to get a better look, Sorun was shocked to find it was a human. An admittedly odd-looking human, but a human. Or maybe an Overlander, now that he thought on it, but he didn't know how different they looked from normal humans. Based on his stature he looked to be shorter than even Sorun, which made him laugh once under his breath, was bald save for six individual hairs vertically aligned on his head, and had probably the longest nose he'd ever seen. His clothes were even stranger: he was wearing a short, green jacket with pointed tails and a black pair of pants that, to Sorun's bewilderment, looked to be fused with his boots.

In a word? Odd. Everything about this strange, little man was odd. But he didn't look like a maniacal tyrant at first glance, so there was that.

"Eh, hm? Oh! There you are." The little man looked up at Sorun as the white drone floated over to him and hovered in place. He waved to Sorun with an unreadable, easy smile as the teen walked closer to him. "My apologies for taking so long with the navigation. The camera on that things was a last-minute slap job. Resolution's quite poor."

As he said this, he hit a small button on the controller before setting it down. A small, pin-sized hole next to the drone's lens lit up red, which Sorun took a brief note of before focusing back on the shorter man.

"Uh... yeah," Sorun commented. "You, um, you were looking for me?"

"Well, we were using the drone to scout around Knothole so we could catch sight of you. We weren't planning on making contact this early, but you just so happened to be alone so we chose now to talk," he explained.

So far he seemed nice-ish. There was a devious undertone to his otherwise neutral voice, but Sorun didn't have any problem with him. Yet. "What happened to your face, man?" he asked. It was only know he'd noticed a rather glaring black eye over the man's right eye.

The man frowned. "I was hit," he plainly stated. "I'd prefer not to discuss it further."

"Okay. So are you Eggman or what?" Might as well get that question out of the way and go from there.

The short man chuckled and shook his head. "Oh, no. The honor of being at the head of the illustrious belongs to the brilliant Dr. Ivo Robotnik. I would be his assistant and nephew, Snively."

He blinked. The teen looked to Snively, looked around the clearing to confirm that they were alone, and then blinked again as he looked back to the other man. "... Ohhh!" Sorun pointed towards Snively and smiled in light amusement as he threw his head back in realization. "Yeah, I heard he had a nephew helping him out, hah hah."

A small stream of laughter escaped from the teen, and Snively looked at him oddly before he began chuckling along with him, though his head was tilted in confusion. This carried on for thirty seconds before they both stopped to take a breath.

"Hah... hey, Snively?"

"Yes?"

"What's stopping me from literally fucking murdering you right now?"

The shorter man's eyes widened in shock, and then his entire expression changed to abject horror after a small flash of blue light and particles appeared on Sorun's sides. Four blue swords, two at each end of the teen's body with one over the other, were floating next to him with their points aimed directly at Snively, who became rooted to the spot.

"I'm gonna be honest with you. The day I've had today? Worst day of my whole life. The week I've had? Hoo boy." The teen's expression had gone completely cold as he regarded the shorter man with utter contempt in his eyes, his hands still casually tucked in his pockets despite the swords next to him. "So here's what's gonna happen. You either give me a real solid reason why I shouldn't kill the man partly responsible for the current shitty state of the world, or I ram these things through your body and turn you into a carcass."

Because after everything that had happened today? He wasn't having it. He wasn't having any more nonsense. The fact he was considering actual murder at the moment wasn't even crossing his mind as he affixed Snively with a deadly glare. He just wanted all of these problems to be over with.

"Y-you're bluffing," Snively stuttered as he back up a step. "You wouldn't dare. Freedom Fighters don't kill!" A sword flew away from Sorun and into the ground right in front of Snively, causing him to fall onto his backside. A fifth sword appeared to replace the one Sorun had fired.

"I'm a pretty terrible Freedom Fighter." The points of the swords had moved in a way that tracked Snively's movement, who was frozen on the ground chattering in fear at the pair of cold, blue eyes locked onto him. "You know what? Forget it. You're not worth the effort-"

"Whoa-whoa-whoa! Hold your horses there!"

A new voice. older, and coming from the white drone of all all things. It slowly floated between Sorun and Snively, and the teen watched in mild interest as the top of the round drone opened up to reveal a small projector on its inside. Light spilled out from the projector and quickly warped in the air until a stunningly clear, holographic image of a man was being shown.

If Snively looked strange, than this new man was straight out of a cartoon.

He wore the same outfit as Snively, though it was red in color. A body that was impossibly round but with limbs that were so long and thin by comparison it was grotesque. A round, shining head that was bald save for a wild ginger mustache, eyes hidden behind blue-tinted glasses, goggles on his round forehead, and a smile that was almost manic to Sorun's eyes.

He'd shoot himself with a Summoned Sword if this wasn't Eggman.

"And you must be Robotnik." He looked up and down the hologram that was so clear he practically looked like he was standing there in the flesh, and the teen scoffed. "Jesus. No wonder they call you Eggman."

"Ah, yes. A childish nickname I've grown oddly fond over given the... stature of this body I've been shackled with. But I believe proper introductions are in order." He bent down and flashed Sorun a mocking smile as he held a hand out in the gesture of a handshake. "Dr. Ivo Robotnik, at your service, though these days I do indeed go by Eggman. Or Emperor Eggman if it suits your fancy."

"Sorun." The teen kept his hands in his pockets as he regarded his hand, and then looked back up to the Doctor. "Hey, Eggman, I'm gonna kill your nephew right in front of you in a hot second here if you don't stop wasting my time."

A bitter chuckle left Eggman as his image straightened its posture. "Ah, how I've missed dealing with humans and Overlanders. It's refreshing, honestly. Our kind always did have a certain bloodlust that made things all the more interesting. The frustrating part of fighting Mobians is that a majority of their kind lack this crucial drive. Ironic, really, given their ancestral heritage as common animals." He turned his head down to Snively. "Stop cowering and pick yourself up you fool," he groused. "This is why I suggested we make contact by remote drone, but nooo , you wanted to make it personal because it looked more 'professional'. Please." He looked back to Sorun. "And I'll have to ask you not skewer my nephew. As incompetent as he may be, he still has his uses, and keeps things mildly amusing from time to time. So put those things away."

Sorun watched as Snively stood up and hid behind Eggman's hologram. He rolled his eyes and shook his head. "Well, maybe I don't feel like it," he said.

"Well, maybe I feel like taking my Egg Fleet out to carpet bomb all of Knothole if you so much as scratch Snively with one of those swords. Funny how that works, huh?"

The muscles in Sorun's body tensed, and his breath hitched. "You're not gonna do that," he claimed, voice dry from the threat he'd heard. "Knothole's been there how long? You can't tell me you could have bombed them at any time you wanted and haven't yet. That doesn't make any sense."

It really didn't. He may have had the ships- Sorun had even been on one- but if Eggman could use them to do something like that, he would have. And the conflict between him and the Freedom Fighters had been going on for an absurd amount of time. There was no truth to his words.

Except, now that Sorun thought about it, he did have the ships. And fitting them to drop bombs was, admittedly, probably trivial for a mad genius like Eggman. And the fact they scouted around Knothole for Sorun meant that they knew the exact location where Knothole City was. It would have been laughably easy for him to wipe it off the map if he chose to, actually.

... Why didn't he just carpet bomb the place?

"Oh my god you're being serious," Sorun realized with widened eyes.

Eggman smirked at the teen. "Pieced it together, have you? Now be a good boy and put the swords away."

A small, frustrated growl sounded from the back of Sorun's throat, but he obeyed and had all the swords shatter and disappear. It was right after that Eggman clapped his hands together with a wide grin.

"Excellent, he listens to reason! That's more than can be said for most people on this rock," he said. "But you're not from this particular rock, are you, boy?"

"And just how do you know that?" Sorun demanded.

"I've my sources." Eggman waved his hand to the side. "You strike me as somebody who knows what they want and who is willing to get it as quickly as easily as possible. A very human trait if any, and one I can respect. The fact you were willing to kill somebody you just met mere moments ago proves that. Not only that, but you have power. I can use someone of that caliber, so I'll get right to the point: why not leave those filthy animals in Knothole behind and come join me?"

The offer was so out of left field that Sorun choked slightly in shock, and he had to hold a hand to his throat to regain his normal breathing. With wide eyes he looked to the hologram, but he couldn't tell how sincere Eggman was being. That smile he wore was just so unsettling and almost unnatural that he couldn't tell what it was. Snively was still hiding behind the hologram, and his expression, now holding nothing but contempt for Sorun, didn't help either.

Join Eggman? Of all the offers he was making, it was that? The lack of a carpet bombing didn't make sense, but this? This was downright madness. He didn't know what to expect from a mad doctor, but it surely wasn't this. He didn't understand.

"You want me to join you?" he repeated. "Let's pretend for a moment that I'm even remotely interested. Why in the world would I want to join you?"

"Oh, where to begin?" the Doctor said as he began to stroke at his mustache. "To have a place at the winning side of this conflict? You must have some sense of self-preservation, and you must know that the Freedom Fighters' days are numbered. You can't tell me you don't want an escape from that destruction."

"That... that doesn't-"

"How about the fact that you don't even like them?" Sorun stopped dead at Eggman's almost knowing words. How could he know? "Oh, poor Sorun. Ripped from his life in another zone and forced to work with his own captors. Strange animal people that took everything from you and expect to give everything in return. Don't be coy; you hate them, so why give your life for them? Come over to my side.

Humans and Overlanders may not be the exact same species, but we're kin nonetheless, regardless of what zones we are from."

He was right. That was the thing- he was right. Sorun truly didn't like any of the Mobians back at Knothole. He disliked the Freedom Fighters, and today's events had exemplified that fact. Leaving them to join somebody who was the closest thing he'd seen to a human since coming to Mobius? He was afraid to admit the idea sounded appealing.

But he was afraid. The fact that he agreed with everything Eggman was saying terrified Sorun, and he couldn't stop the slight tremors going through his body from just hearing how much he agreed with Eggman. The Doctor must have saw his reaction, too, because his smile was growing. That unnaturally wide smile on that unnaturally shaped body. The sight alone had the teen on edge.

"And if none of that hooked you, then think about this: I can get you back home."

Sorun's blood ran cold, and his felt his hands begin to tighten up as he grit his teeth. "You lie," he hissed out. "I need all seven Chaos Emeralds to return to my zone. Since one of them is stuck inside of me, I can't. There's no other way back."

"Really? Really now?" Eggman asked. "I'm capable of a great many things, Sorun. Unraveling the mystery that is your body and extracting that Emerald? Hah! Child's play. In the unlikely event such a thing is in fact impossible, then it's just a matter of finding an alternate route to your zone." He gestured at himself. "I'm Ivo Robotnik! The greatest mind to ever grace the world! Finding a way back to your zone may indeed prove to be a challenge, but it is one I would welcome with open arms if only to keep me occupied with something interesting. So what do you say, Sorun? Feel like joining the winning team?"

He wanted to. He didn't want to admit it to himself, but the offer was so enticing that he he couldn't help but desire it. A chance at getting rid of this Emerald for a chance of getting the twelve years he lost back? A chance at going home ? That alone gave him pause. The prospect of going home, of finally getting to see everybody he'd left behind when he'd gone through that portal again, of returning to his life without having to risk his life fighting a hopeless war against robots? If that were really possible, he couldn't ignore it. And the hologram right in front of him was offering it.

There was a very real possibility he would take it, too. But he had to know one single thing before he made a decision.

"Answer me one thing," Sorun asked in a subdued tone. "Why are you acting like this? Why are you still fighting the Freedom Fighters if you could end it all-" he snapped his fingers, "- just like that?"

"It's simple, Sorun. Knothole and its Freedom Fighters are the last bastion of resistance on the whole planet. Conquering them means I've conquered the world, and I refuse to have my last hurrah be won at the simple press of a button. No, my victory will be absolute. I want to watch the hope leave the eyes of every single person there as my complete and total victory finally sinks in. I don't merely wish to conquer. I wish to win , Sorun. Blowing them up at the drop of a hat just won't do."

"... What...?" He was so dumbfounded by the explanation that Sorun couldn't even speak. He went as far as to wait for Eggman to continue, to maybe add in some crucial part of his explanation that would make it all clear, but he didn't. He was simply waiting for Sorun to reply. But he couldn't, because nothing that Eggman had just said made sense to the human. "He's... he wants to personally... he's so fucked in the head that he would rather torment everybody into defeat than just bomb them?"

It was an absurd notion to him. Beyond absurd. It didn't make sense . Sorun didn't understand it because there was absolutely no sense to be found in the man's reasoning. Hell, there was no reasoning!

"Why?" The question came out of Sorun's mouth in a choked whisper. "Why... do any of this? Take over the world, ruin everybody's lives... why ? What's the point of all this!?"

Eggman's expression changed. His mouth flattened into a thin line, and to Sorun it almost looked like he was disappointed by the question. "This is why I dislike people. Everybody always asks that question, over and over again. Why? It's infuriating I have to keep answering such a simple question," he growled out with a shake of his head. "Because I can , Sorun. Because my intelligence dwarfs that of every single being in this entire zone, which automatically makes me superior to everybody else. You need proof? Take a look around at the world." As he said this, Eggman swept his arms out to the sides. "I can do whatever I want because I'm better than everybody else. I'm doing this because it's fun . I want my own empire, and I want the thrill of crushing everybody under my boot who stands in my way. I want the challenge." His hologram leaned forwards. "That's the why of it, Sorun. If I want to take the world over, I'll do it at my own pace at my own leisure."

There was something terrify about how simple the reason was. The childlike simplicity of it. "Because I can and want to" was his answer. That was it. He remembered Sonic telling him basically the same thing when he'd asked, but Sorun hadn't believed him. Hearing it for himself though was an almost surreal experience. Eye-opening.

He had to hold his head, he was so taken back by his thoughts. Images made from Eggman's words flashed through his head, causing Sorun to sharply gasp at the sudden intrusion of pictures. He saw Knothole, destroyed entirely and burned to the ground. The Freedom Fighters all chained and watching in despair as the world around them burned. Humans and Mobians enslaved.

"Oh, hell no." There was still the fact that Sorun didn't believe Eggman could remove the Emerald from him. He trusted Athair and Tails more than the thing in front of him. Could he find a way back to Earth, though? He doubted that, too, especially since all seven Emeralds were needed to get him in the first place. Then again,

Eggman did have some amount of credibility to his words. Sorun truly didn't know, but the possibility was there. What Sorun did know was that he didn't want Eggman anywhere near Earth. "No way. It's not happening. I'm not gonna work with this psycho if it means even a chance of him finding Earth."

That just wasn't happening. He wasn't going to bring this insanity to Earth. He didn't trust him not to touch it. And he wasn't going to work with somebody who wanted to ruin everybody's lives just for the fun of it.

"Alright, here's the truth, Eggman," Sorun muttered out in a haggard voice. "You're right. I don't like the Freedom Fighters. They ruined my life, but at the very least I can understand the reason they did it." He pointed a shaky finger at Eggman. "I don't like them, but I hate you. You're insane. You're wrecking the whole world just because you feel like it! You're acting like a damn cartoon villain except you're actually ruining everybody's lives with all your batshit insanity!" Eggman's face was completely impassive so far, and he seemed almost bored as he drummed his fingers against his elbows, though this went largely ignored by Sorun. "No. No way. You're a psychopath. I'd rather work with people I can barely tolerate than you."

His fears over Earth went unsaid. Sorun wouldn't even dare to so much as put the seed of that idea in the madman's head. But above that, he wouldn't work with somebody who was enslaving people for fun. Ruining and ending people's lives just because he wanted to. It was almost incomprehensible at how wrong it all was, and Sorun was almost disgusted in himself in how he understood how simple the why of what Eggman was doing was. Just because he could. He found it absolutely revolting.

He shook his head as he finished and backed up from the hologram. Eggman was giving Sorun a critical glare, and then slowly sighed while he adjusted his glasses. "Truly disappointing, Sorun. Very well. We're done here."

Sorun paused in surprise. He hadn't expected that. "Wait, what? That's it? You're gonna leave it at that?" he asked in a disbelieving tone. "You're not even gonna threaten to bomb Knothole if I don't join? You're just letting me go?"

That had been a legitimate fear of his. A fear because he didn't know how he was going to counter such a move. But it didn't happen. Instead he was just being let go, which had been the last thing Sorun had thought would happen.

"Oh, please. What do you take me for? I'm not letting go of my last bit of fun at your expense," he said. "It doesn't matter anyways. I was just going to use you to keep the Freedom Fighters at bay so they could gather strength and put up a better fight against me. If you stay and continue to oppose me? It's just another opponent for me to crush, but at the very least you have the potential to bring something to the table to make the game interesting.

"So go on, Sorun. Fight me if you so dare. Take the Emeralds back and grow in strength. Entertain me." He snapped his fingers, and the hologram began to flicker. "Either way I will gain my victory. It's your loss."

The hologram finally cut out, and Sorun gasped out the breath he'd been holding as the drone closed up. It flew into Snively's hand, who quickly placed it in his pocket before looking up at Sorun. That affronted, fearful look was still in his eyes from Sorun's earlier threat, and he didn't so much as spare the teen a word before he turned around towards a nearby rock.

He wasn't having that. "Hey, Snively. One more thing."

The shorter man stopped and turned around as Sorun stomped up behind him. He opened his mouth to asked something, but was cut short when Sorun grabbed the collar of his jacket and punched him right in his already blackened eye. Snively cried out in pain and stumbled backwards, holding a hand to his aching eye while staring up at Sorun with an infuriated expression.

Sorun's response was to flip both middle fingers at him.

"Juvenile," Snively snarled at him before turning around and marching towards the rock. He sped up with a yelp when a blue sword stabbed into the ground behind him, and he practically dived behind the rock. The low hum of an engine reached Sorun's ears, and the teen watched as a white, saucer-like vehicle floated out from behind the rock with Snively riding on the top.

"Man. That was cathartic," Sorun thought as he watched the saucer carrying Snively float up into the night sky and disappear. "Like, that felt really good. I can make a habit out of punching that guy in the face." He just might, too, because that one punch had relieved more stress than he had expected. A lot more.

"Alright. So Sonic was right. Eggman's insane." He shook his head, pushed his hands into his pocket, and began walking back in the direction of Freedom HQ. He'd underestimated just how psychotic Eggman had been from Sonic's description, but after meeting him? Sonic hadn't been exaggerating at all. If anything, he'd undersold just how unhinged Eggman was.

And Sorun couldn't even tell if he was unhinged or not. For all his talk of taking over the world just because he could, no matter how much Sorun disagreed with it, there was one thing Sorun couldn't deny: the Doctor was technically right. Because he was winning and nobody could stop him.

That truly terrified him. That a madman like that could make such a terrible philosophy a reality because of his innate genius. That'd he'd unraveled Sorun and read him like a book within two minutes of meeting him. It was no wonder the Freedom Fighters were losing against him... he was a monster. Both in ideals and ability.

How was he supposed to beat that even with powers? He wasn't so sure he could. And he wasn't going to stick around to find out.

"Fine, here's what we're gonna do. I'm gonna find those six other Emeralds and keep playing at being a Freedom Fighter in the meantime. I'm not gonna touch any of them. I'm gonna find some way to get this Emerald out of my body, and once I have all seven I'm bailing from all this." He slowed down. "But this world..."

Those images flashed through his head again. Knothole burned, every Mobian there defeated. Chained. Dead. All with those terrible expressions on their faces. The Freedom Fighters. The citizens. Children. All the Mobians he'd met. Aurora and Athair's warnings still rang in his head. That fate was what awaited everybody if he really did leave them all behind.

He shook his head and sped back up.

"Not my problem. I'm not... this isn't my fight," he thought as he disappeared into the foliage. "I'm going home. What happens to this world doesn't matter as long as I get home, but there's no way I'm working with Eggman to do it. I'll do it my way."

Despite how resolute his thoughts were, he couldn't help but notice the painful, tugging feeling in his chest that appeared when those images flashed through his head.

On the other side of the clearing, a hooded figure watched as Sorun walked into the forest. He then stood up from the stump he'd been sitting on, and then stretched his arms above his head while groaning softly.

"Ah, good on you for not being an amoral psychopath, Sorun," Rubrum thought as he finished stretching. "Just keep staying on the path and everything will work out. At least it will if I don't screw it all up."

Humming in thought, the man in the red hood crossed his arms and dipped his head down at the ground. "Did I mess up? I told the Neo-Walkers not to tell Sorun about me, but I didn't actually threaten them with anything. Maybe the fact I killed Feist serves as a good enough warning, but knowing them... eh, that's real iffy. But then again, even if they do go out of their way to talk to him they don't actually know enough about me to do any damage. Unless they describe my sword, but I don't see that coming up in a conversation. Nah, it should be fine. We're good." His head picked up to look at the empty clearing. "I forgot to tell Eggman to not tell Sorun about me," his thoughts continued, "but maybe that's a good thing. He probably would have if I asked him not to just to mess with me. And he seems like the kind of guy that doesn't want to admit I helped him, but even if he does gloat about me, he can't say anything that would reveal too much."

Rubrum groaned again, and then moved his hand past his hood's shadow to rub at his head. "This is all such a pain to keep track of. Should have wrote more details down when I copied that stupid list. Speaking of which..." His hand reached into his pocket and brought out a piece of notebook paper, which he held in front of his shadowed face and scrutinized for a few moments. "Alright, so... actually, there isn't a lot for me to do right now. Okay. Guess I'll just chill out for a bit, then."

He folded the paper up and placed it back into his pocket. It was while his hand was in his pocket that he felt something else, and then removed it to take a look. The object he held was the same tape recorder he'd played for Eggman.

His thumb briefly rubbed at the faded-over, scratched two-tailed logo on its side, and a tired sigh escaped him.

"It's all in accordance with the First's will," Rubrum reminded himself before placing the recorder back into his pocket. He stepped deeper into the woods, quickly vanished from sight amidst the trees.

A/N- So this chapter was more of a little intermission break to get a feeling for everybody's thoughts before continuing forwards, as this chapter marks the end of what is basically the "beginning exposition part" of this story. If I still did arcs this would be the end of arc one, but I elected to just go with the episode format I've been using. But yeah, thus far everything has all been foundation for the story ahead.

Everybody's a little mixed on Sorun. To be expected due to the way Sorun acts, but down the line he's gonna be spending time with everybody, so we'll see how that pans out. Sorun himself just wants to nope out of the world and go home no matter what it takes, but as much of a dreary jerk as he is, he at least has some standards. And then there's Rubrum, who's doing all his shadowy background man-behind-the-curtain things but seems worried about slipping up, because hey, everybody makes mistakes. Who is he and what is he trying to do? Who knows. I mean, I do, but I'm not telling. I'd love to hear your thoughts on it all, though.

Anyways, that's that. See ya in the next one.

Chapter 13

Recursion Error

Episode 13- I learn a new word

"Ohhh-ho-ho, man... this was such a mistake..."

Fun fact about couches, particularly about the one in Freedom HQ: they didn't feel good to sleep on. It wasn't even one of those couches that folded into a bed, either. No, it was just a normal couch, but seeing as Sorun hadn't had anywhere else to sleep that night, he was short on options.

His spat with Sonic was still ringing in his ears by the time he'd gone back to the HQ after his "dealings" with Eggman, and he had been in no mood to go back to Sonic's house at the time. That would have inevitably lead to talking with the blue hedgehog. And Sorun still didn't know what he was supposed to tell Sonic, because his feelings were still all over the place concerning literally all of his issues.

He'd actually fallen asleep trying to formulate some plan of what to say. While searching around the HQ he'd found a dictionary and had spent the night reading through it to try and find as many descriptive words as possible so he could accurately portray his feelings. This didn't work, but on the upside his vocabulary had increased by a couple of words. So there was that.

This lead him to waking up in the morning with his limbs splayed all over the couch with a open dictionary resting on his face. The first thing he noticed was that his back felt like a bolder had been dropped on it, followed by the uncomfortable stiffness in his entire body. The dictionary slid off his face as he sat up with a loud groan, and he heard all of his joints pop as he moved around before finally stepping off of the couch.

Moving away from the living room to the kitchen, Sorun saw that all the doors to the spare rooms in the HQ were all closed. Whether that meant everybody who lived in those rooms were still sleeping or were simply already out, Sorun hadn't a clue. Given his usual sleep schedule it was likely the latter, but given how he couldn't see the sun while underground, he didn't know for certain. Nor did he really care all that much as he finally stepped into the kitchen.

"Mm, breakfast. The most important- eh?" He stopped himself when he saw a digital clock on the kitchen's oven. It was five minutes until one in the afternoon. "... Lunch, the most important meal of the day," he corrected himself as he went to the nearest cabinet and began searching it for something to eat.

His searched led him to a sealed can of peaches.

"Hm. Sure." He was in the appropriate mood for the fruit. The problem, as was realized as he turned the can up and down, was that there was no tab on the lid to open the can. Nor a can opener in sight. "What am I supposed to... hey, that could work."

In a flash, a blue sword appeared floating by his side. He furrowed his brows in focus, and the sword began spinning in place so fast that the blurred blade became a solid circle. He carefully held the lid of the can out to the sword, and then winced at the loud, grinding sound that resulted from can being cut open. Thankfully, this only lasted for a few moments before the lid popped open, at which point the Summoned Sword shattered.

"Aw yeah, boy..." He held up the opened peaches to his mouth, and then stopped himself. "Wait. I ain't got a spoon."

He looked around the kitchen. There weren't any spoons in sight, and the drawers scattered around were so numerous that he wouldn't even know where to start looking around for the utensils drawer. And he was too lazy and hungry to search.

Frowning, another idea came to him and he had a Summoned Sword manifest once again. He grabbed it by the hilt and slowly dipped the point of it down into the can in an attempt to try and spoon the peaches out.

The endeavor was proving fruitless. Any of the juices scraped up fell right off of the blade and back into the can, and any peaches similarly slid off of the spectral sword and back into the can. He grunted in indignation and shattered the sword as he looked down thoughtfully at the can.

"Okay, so swords don't make good spoons." Somebody passed in front of him towards the fridge, though they were largely ignored by the teen as he continued pondering over the peaches. "Maybe I can just drink out of the can? Nah, what am I? A savage? Then again, I don't really have anything else. Ugh."

He tapped the side of the can with his finger in thought, pursed his lips, and then looked to his right when he heard the fridge open. He couldn't see who it was due to the fridge door obscuring their bent-over body, but he did notice two things sticking over the fridge's door. Two yellow, fleshy objects that looked distinctly like rabbit ears.

"... Whazzat?" Sorun's eyes narrowed in puzzlement as he bent his head forwards to get a better look at the two ears, which briefly twitched. They did indeed seem to be rabbit ears. "Huh. I think I remember somebody that looked like a- oh yeah, the one with the cyborg bits- oooooh, yeah, the one I stared at."

The fridge door closed shut, and he could see that, yes, it was the rabbit he'd been thinking about. The yellow-furred rabbit Mobian in the pink top he'd seen around on occasion. The one who seemed to have a completely mechanical lower half and left arm, for whatever reason.

He really hoped she never caught him staring at the cybernetics. He'd been too interested in them to ever look away.

Eventually, she brought what she had grabbed out of the fridge and took a bite out of it: a carrot, predictably enough. She stood back up while taking another bite, and her eyes roamed around the kitchen before passing over Sorun, and then did a double take at him before she turned her head fully in his direction.

The human was currently leaning against the counter with the can of peaches up to his mouth while he was looking at her over the can.

No words were passed between the two. An air of awkwardness began to settle in the kitchen as the rabbit slowly ate at her carrot while Sorun drank at the peaches. They eventually lowered their half-eaten items before Sorun cleared his throat and waved at her in greeting.

Suddenly he was starting to regret never learning anybody's names. Maybe he should have listened to Sally when she suggested he talk to everybody.

The rabbit Mobian blinked her eyes- Sorun rose an eyebrow when he saw the eyelids on her green eyes were purple- and then gave him a curt nod. "Howdy."

"Oh god, she's Southern. How does that even work? Southern America shoulda got blown up with the rest of the- then again the Australian accent and French language survived the Xorda. Somehow. Yeah, why wouldn't a Southern accent survive then?" He was still fuzzy on the details of how such things were even possible, but he feared on asking the details. Never knew what crazy answer would come with it. "Okay, Sorun, play it cool. She's a comrade. You gotta get to know those for the time being."

Except that he didn't know what else to say past a greeting. He had nothing- and from the way the rabbit was looking around, he could tell she was struggling to find anything to say as well. What a great start.

"... So I'm Sorun," the human began. "Er, my name, that is. Sorun. It's Sorun."

"Ah figured," she said. "Mah name's Bunnie."

Because of course it was. "... Hmh, neat." He sipped at his peaches. "So, uh..." His eyes flicked to her robotic arm, and then to the floor. "... Cyborg, huh?"

He figured it was an innocent enough question to lead with. Maybe she got asked about it a lot and would be annoyed by the question, but he had nothing else to go for. Sorun's hope was that she would understand, but he didn't like the way her body stiffened up.

"Yeah... cyborg," she confirmed in a worryingly toneless voice.

Sorun began to nervously tap his fingers on the counter he was leaning on with his free hand. "So, like, did you lose the, y'know... originals...?" He glanced at her legs. "'Cause, like... your whole lower half is-"

"Ah got tossed in a roboticizer if ya really gotta know." Bunnie took a very harsh bite from the carrot, and the loud crunch made Sorun wince. "Sonic saved me before it turned me inta a full robot."

"Oh." He should have started with something else, because the tension he was feeling was actually starting to make him lightheaded. "That's cool."

He saw her face scrunch in confusion at that. "'Cool?'" she repeated.

"Uh-uh-uh, well, I mean...!" The can was starting to shake in Sorun's hand, and he coughed to the side. "Not that you got thrown in a roboticizer, that's horrible, just the cyborg bit." He looked away. "Cyborgs are cool."

In his defense, he really did think they were. Unfortunately he hadn't put any thought into any possible social stigmas a world full of killer robots might have against people with cybernetics. Or her feelings over them since they were apparently involuntary cybernetics. And now he was regretting every single word he'd said.

Why was he so terrible at talking to people?

Bunnie's eyes widened at Sorun's words, and she mumbled something under her breath before turning her body fully to face him. "Sorun, it's okay. Ah ain't mad," she assured him, causing Sorun's shaking to stop. "Ah just... get some stares sometimes. Ya know?" She looked away. "They ain't exactly normal."

"Yeah, I can understand that." As he said this, a Summoned Sword appeared at his side. "This isn't exactly normal, either, but hey." It shattered. "Tell you the truth I probably would have taken a robot arm over the power to make swords out of nothing." Though with his luck the Chaos Emerald probably would have given him an arm that would break with overuse that he'd need to replace. Devil Breakers were even less ideal with Summoned Swords, but there was a very real possibility he only got powers from those games if his subconscious had anything to say about it.

On second thought, maybe Summoned Swords wasn't so bad a power. He didn't need to pay to refill them.

The rabbit gave him an unreadable expression, and then snorted a single laugh out. "Yer a strange one," she said as she finished off her carrot. "Why'd ya choose swords anyways if ya don't like 'em?"

"Hey, swords are cool," he defended. "And I didn't get to choose the power. The power chose me." Not technically accurate, but he didn't have a better way of phrasing it. "But it's, you know... it's serviceable. I can make it work, so it's whatever."

He hoped he could make it work. He'd be crushed if he threw a Summoned Sword at a Badnik and it just pinged off it like the baton had.

"Ah guess." Bunnie shrugged. "Ah wouldn't really know a whole lot about swords anyhow. Now Antoine, on the other hand- oh, speakin' of which. Hey, sugar."

Sorun followed her gaze just as the French-speaking Mobian entered the kitchen. He returned Bunnie's greeting with a way of his own as he turned towards Sorun with a look of... mock surprise, oddly enough. Huh.

"Ah, Sorun! How very much of a coincidence it iz seeing you here where you usually are talking to Bunnie who just happened to wander in shortly before me!" Antoine exclaimed. "How is it you are doing?"

"... Okay, that was weird." Sorun blinked, shook his head, and faced the coyote with a semi-forced smile that quickly fell back into a neutral expression. "I'm good. Just talking about swords."

Antoine's eyes picked up in interest. "Swords, you say?"

"Yeah, check this out." Sorun snapped his fingers, and a Summoned Sword appeared floating by his side. The coyote had actually jumped in fright at it, which elicited a small chuckle from Bunnie, but he quickly got over his initial shock and leaned in closer to look at the sword. "Absorbed a Chaos Emerald, got a sword power." Lost twelve years of his life, too, but that would go unsaid. Whether he liked it or not.

There was a weird gleam in Antoine's eyes that Sorun couldn't place, yet felt familiar to him. Perhaps it was the kind of glare likened to a child looking at something shiny. He certainly looked interested in it. "May I... see it, s'il vous plait?"

"That means please, right?" At Antoine's nod of affirmation, Sorun shrugged and tossed the Summoned Sword into his hands. "Sure. Just don't break it. I only have an infinite amount of them."

If Antoine even heard the joke, he didn't give any indication. His sole focus was spent giving the blue sword in his hand an appraising look. He muttered something in unintelligible French under his breath, looked up and down the blade a few times, and then gripped the sword's handle with both hands before giving it a few slow, experimental swings. He muttered some more while still looking at the blade.

"Eet iz... very light," he commented, "and very balanced for a straight sword." He tapped at the W-shaped guard. "Ze guard has a very unique shape, non?"

"I think they're supposed to represent horns," Sorun explained.

"Oh, interesting." He turned the sword upside down, but then blanched when he looked at the end of the sword. "Eh, Sorun?"

"Yeah?"

"Why iz... why iz ze pommel made of skulls?"

Sorun took a look closer, and then made an "ah" of realization when he saw what Antoine was referring to. The pommel at the bottom of the sword's hilt was indeed carved to look like four skulls fused into a spherical shape, with a small spike peaking out of the pommel's top. He supposed that would be creepy to most people here.

"Because skulls are cool? I dunno. I didn't get to choose how it looks. Its shape is based off of Force Edge." As Sorun spoke, Antoine had gently placed the sword on the ground. He jumped again when it shattered, which caused Sorun to smirk for a second. "And Summoned Swords aren't really meant to be used as swords. They're projectiles. But yeah, the shape's based off a real sword."

As real as a sword from a video game could be, at least, but those were unnecessary details.

"Ze... Force Edge?" Antoine repeated. "This is a sword from your home zone, correct?"

Technically speaking. "Yeah." Sorun nodded. "Force Edge was a... I, uh... it's special to me for certain reasons. Well, I mean, not the sword, more like the... it's complicated."

Much of the confusion stemmed from the fact that he didn't really want to explain he'd technically stole his sword power from a video game character. Half because he didn't need the embarrassment, and half because he wasn't sure they would even understand the concept when he was barely grasping at it. But Sorun had seen those discarded comics in Sonic's room, so maybe for some it wouldn't be lost on them.

Well, regardless, he still didn't feel like elaborating on it to them. Not like they could help anyways since he was the only one in this world that ever played those 'Devil May Cry' games. But boy, was it making it difficult to explain Summoned Swords' origin.

"So anyways, yeah. That's why that's that," Sorun finished. "Make sense?"

"I zink so?" Sorun's couldn't say he blamed the lost look on Antoine's face. "So you practiced swordsmanship back where you are from then?"

Sorun shook his head. "Oh, no. I never touched Force Edge. Or any other sword for that matter."

"Ah, what a shame." A thoughtful look came across Antoine's face. "Well, Sorun, since you use swords, and I use a sword, and am very skilled in the sword where you are... not so skilled, I could, perhaps, help you? With ze swordsmanship?" he suggested.

"Um... wow, wasn't expecting that," Sorun mumbled as he looked away from Antoine. "I appreciate the offer, but I don't actually swing these things. I just throw them. Not really strong enough to use a sword against robots, you know?"

It didn't make the offer any less surprising to the human. He didn't realize he was liked enough that somebody like Antoine would even offer to do something like that for him. The fact they were even having such a civil conversation was more than Sorun had expected out of pretty much anybody.

It caused a weird feeling in him he couldn't quite place.

"Oh hey, you guys!" Sorun's head picked up at the new voice, and he turned around. Sally was standing at the entrance to the kitchen, and for some reason she had a forced smile on. "Fancy seeing you all here. And Sorun! I didn't see you there."

Sorun's lips thinned. "Okay, what going on?" he asked, and the fake smile Sally was wearing fell away altogether. "Antoine was acting all weird when he came in, and now you're all weird. What gives?"

He may have been somewhat socially inept, but even this... whatever it was was so blatant that even he could spot it. And he already knew from the way Sally's face fell that something was up. He just wanted to know what.

"Look, Sorun, I can... Antoine, I thought we told you to act natural," the chipmunk scolded while rubbing the space between her eyes.

"I was!" Antoine protested. "I was acting as natural as was possible!"

"You really weren't," Sorun said with a shake of his head.

"Okay, okay. I can explain." A deep breath left Sally, and she crossed her hands in front of her. "We just wanted to, well... are you doing okay, Sorun?"

Sorun clicked his tongue, looked to the side, and looked back at Sally. "Where'd this come from?" he asked, genuinely confused.

"Well, Sonic told us about your issues with the Chaos Emerald. We wanted to make sure you were doing alright."

"And you decided that the best way of doing that would be to gang up on me in the most unsubtle group intervention ever?" Sorun asked while pointing at each Mobian surrounding him.

Sally rolled her eyes. "This isn't a group intervention. You're just not very approachable, so we planned this all out to ease you into talking." She looked down. "It didn't really work."

"Ah-huh." Sorun nodded. "Alternatively you could have just immediately went right to this without the whole song and dance. Like normal people do."

"Well, you... don't really act normal."

"Oh, I'm the weird one?" Scoffing, the teen turned towards the counter and leaned his whole upper body over it so he didn't have to face anybody. "You call me weird after setting all this up? Seriously?"

Something about being called weird when everybody around him was weird from his perspective felt wrong to him. Like everything else with Mobius. He couldn't be surprised with it at this point, but even now it was things like this that put him at a loss. Just how odd people here could be one second and then act completely normal the next. Examples of the former, such as what was happening right now, continued to throw him for a loop.

There was an uncomfortable-sounding sigh that came from Sally. "It's about your home, isn't it?"

The human found himself rolling his eyes. "When has it not been?" he asked. "Yeah. I might be stuck here. I might not. It all depends on if this Emerald is really irremovable or not." He paused, and then made a sigh of his own. "This isn't really a conversation I wanna have right now."

"I really feel that we need to talk about this, Sorun."

"You know, you say that, but do we really?" He turned around to face Sally and leaned back on the counter. The can of peaches were long forgotten by now. "Why do you even care? We're not friends. Our status as comrades is strenuous at best. Don't tell me it's guilt."

He could see that his friends comment caused Sally to be taken back slightly. There was an understanding look in her eyes, but even so she still seemed saddened by it. Antoine looked downright uncomfortable with the statement. Bunnie was less so, but there was a notable frown on her face. He supposed the truth hurt, but he wasn't going to lie at their expense. He just didn't have the energy for it.

"Be that as it may," Sally said, voice notably lower, "I just wanted to make sure there wasn't any animosity between you and the Freedom Fighters. But... yes, guilt does play a small part in it," she admitted. "We didn't mean to-"

"It feels like I've had this conversation a million times, Sally," Sorun interrupted. It really felt like he had, too, with the frequency this subject kept coming up in. Because no matter how much he tried distancing himself away from all these people, they kept bringing it up because they were all apparently so worried about his mental state. His incredibly fractured mental state he couldn't even share with anybody for fear of his heart stopping.

It was still touching, though. Enough that even Sorun felt a little moved by how much these people seemed to care, even if he couldn't understand it. So he sighed and tore his eyes away from Sally to look to the side.

"Look, I'll tell you the same thing I told Tails. I understand why you did it," Sorun said, and he could see from his peripheral vision that Sally had picked her head up. "I'm upset at being here, but I'm not upset at anybody. Mostly." He paused. "Okay, I'm still frustrated at all of you," he corrected himself, "but not so much that my ability to work and talk with you all would suffer because of it. As for the whole 'may-or-may-not be stuck here bit', I'm... still thinking that over." He crossed his arms. "So I'm fine for the most part."

"That's..." Sally struggled to find the right word. When he looked back at her, he could see that she was somewhat surprised by his words. "That's good. As long as you're doing fine and can work with us without issue, that's... acceptable." He could tell she didn't think so from how forced that word came out, but she didn't look like she wanted to press the issue.

That was fine with him. The less he had to dodge around his feelings without risk of triggering a heart attack, the better.

"Oh!" The chipmunk's eyes lit up as if she just remembered something, and immediately she began digging into her vest. "Before I forget, Nicole said that she wanted to meet you. I know you might not really be in the mood to talk with anybody else, but at the very least it wouldn't hurt to meet somebody else on the team, right?"

He couldn't tell if she was being sincere or if she was just fishing for more excuses for him to socialize, though why she would do that, he didn't have a clue. Another try at getting him to open up, maybe. It wasn't exactly underhanded, but he couldn't help but raise an eyebrow at the attempt nonetheless.

"Nicole was the AI, right?" Sorun silently wondered. "Yeah, the one who was really good at video- oh, that's the strat," he realized. Get him to meet another member of the team, and if they had common interests, maybe put him at ease. He doubted that was the case when he thought on it further; Sally was too sincere for something as underhanded at that. But if it just happened to be a happy side effect of them meeting, then it was nothing but positives. So maybe it was intentional after all.

He silently laughed through his nose. The chipmunk was sneaky, but at the very least he could respect the hustle. Well, he wouldn't say no. He was too curious as meeting an actual AI, after all, and he couldn't find an excuse to say no. He didn't exactly have much else to be doing right now, either.

"Er, hold on a second," Sally muttered as she held a small computer in one hand while continuing to root around in her vest for a second item. "She wanted to generate her body, so I... oh, here it is."

Sorun couldn't help but raise an eyebrow when he saw the second object she pulled out from a hidden pocket inside her vest: a golden ring. A really large ring that looked more like an oversized bracelet than anything else that the chipmunk was currently attempting to place into a slot at the top of the small computer's screen.

"Why's she putting a noodle in the computer?" Sorun thought to himself. The strange ring was successfully slotted into the computer. The small, green-tinted screen attached to the computer briefly flashed, prompting Sally to set it down on the kitchen table nearby. The black-haired teen continued to watch in mild interest as a green outline of a figure materialized right next to the table. The outline slowly began to fill in with more green light, and then textures and features began to take form as the figure shifted and wavered as more colors appeared.

By the end of it, the new person standing there might as well have been another Mobian from what Sorun could see. A feline-looking Mobian with dark brown fur, black triangle markings around her eyes, and covered in purple wrappings that Sorun assumed were supposed to serve as a dress of some sort.

Honestly, though, he was too busy trying to figure out how a little computer managed to generate a whole artificial body to pay much attention to any of Nicole's features.

"Sorun, correct?" He looked up from his musings. Nicole's light green eyes were affixed directly on him, and one of her large, triangular black-tipped ears flicked slightly. "It is a pleasure to finally be metaphorically meeting you in the flesh."

"Uh, yeah. Likewise." He pointed towards her body. "So you're a cat?"

"The body I chose to represent myself is actually a lynx."

A sharp inhale from Sorun. "I was on a winnin' streak there," he muttered, but he quickly picked himself back up and pointed at the computer sitting on the table. "So that little thing can seriously make a whole body?" he asked. "And it's a real body? Not like a hologram or something? How does that work?"

"Real is a rather subjective term considering the composition of this form." If Nicole minded the fact that Sorun was poking at her shoulder to test if she was solid or not, she didn't show it. "As for the actual process of me constructing this body, the method is a rather admittedly complex one. If you really wish to spend two hours learning how I-"

"I'm good," Sorun quickly said as he stepped back. "Maybe later. But I'm good on that front."

She gave him a small smile. "Perhaps for the best. Even with a Power Ring, my time in this form is unfortunately limited. It's a very power-consuming process." Her smile fell into a neutral expression, and she glanced over to Sally, who was making subtle gestures towards Sorun with her hand.

Nicole regarded the hand gestures for a single second before turning back to Sorun.

"In truth, the reason Sally deemed it necessary to bring me along was due to her being concerned for your mental state. It was her assumption that you would be more at ease around a larger group of people, though this assumption has proven to be false given your earlier statements." Sally froze, and the other two Mobians likewise grew uncomfortable. "I would like to apologize on her behalf for this rather roundabout attempt at making you more comfortable with us. She only had your best interests at heart."

The AI stopped, and then took a quick glance around the room. Sorun was staring at her blankly with an unreadable expression, Sally looked downright mortified, and Antoine and Bunnie looked like they didn't want to be there. She registered the facial expressions of everybody present, and then began to shuffle at her feet.

"Perhaps I said more than necessary," she sheepishly admitted.

"Little bit, yeah," Sorun agreed in an equally quiet voice.

Okay, so maybe he'd made too many assumptions about Sally trying to force him to open up. Everybody was just legitimately worried about him and was trying to make him feel better. And now he felt like a jerk for having acted so cold, and felt even worse upon realizing all the words he'd said were actually true and that he didn't actually regret anything.

"I wanna hate them but none of them are giving me reasons to hate them," he silently bemoaned as he ran a hand through his dark hair. "It's the opposite, actually. Ugh, man... why's it gotta be like this?"

"Well," Nicole continued, "In that case, perhaps it would be best for us to leave-"

"Actually..." Sorun interrupted. He had to take a deep breath, and then said to her, "I... heard you were pretty good at video games."

She nodded her head. "This is an accurate statement compared to the performance of the other Freedom Fighters." She missed the pout Sally threw at her.

"Ah. You... wanna play something with me?"

Part of him still felt bad at shafting Sally and the group's efforts at trying to make him feel better. Another part still felt completely justified at his actions, but he ignored those feelings in lieu of not wanting to look like a complete jerk in front of everybody. But above all that, his gaming itch had begun to return, and he wanted a partner who was at least decent.

Nicole looked to him in surprise. "I suppose that would be acceptable if Sally does not mind leaving me here to-"

"No, it's fine!" Sally actually looked relieved at the turnabout, and went as far as to almost shove Nicole away towards the living room. "There's not much happening right now anyway, so go enjoy yourselves!"

She was given an odd look by the lynx, but it was soon dropped as she made her way towards the living room. Sorun's eyes followed after her, and then drifted back towards the other three who were looking towards him with apprehension.

He sighed. Nobody ever made any of this easy.

"Everything I said earlier still holds true. With that said, I... really appreciate the effort," Sorun admitted with sincerity. "I know I'm not really making this easy for anybody. But thanks anyways."

"I understand, Sorun." Sally gave him a small nod. "I realize this isn't easy for you. But just the fact you're at least trying gives me some hope." She held her hand out to him and offered a small smile. "I hope that eventually you can become friends with everybody."

Sorun regarded the hand with a frown. Try as he might, he honestly couldn't see him ever becoming friends with anybody. This was either gonna end with him running away from this zone and leaving everybody to a ruinous future at Eggman's hands, or him running away because he didn't want to touch the rest of the Emeralds. Which would also doom everybody.

That and he was dying against his will to save the people who'd brought him here to begin with and were indirectly responsible in some part for killing him. That was all assuming he didn't even die at some point before doing either of those things.

No. He couldn't be friends with them considering all that. They didn't deserve a friend who would abandon them, and he didn't want to befriend the people who had done this to him. So he shook his head and turned away.

"I don't think so, Sally." He glanced back at her as she lowered the offered hand, and the look of sadness and disappointment written on her face made him turn away once more. Antoine's face was mostly full of disappointment, and Bunnie's expression was reminiscent of Sally's. "It was nice meeting you, Bunnie, for what it's worth."

"... Likewise," she replied in a dejected tone.

He left them behind right after. That awkward air was beginning to settle again, and he didn't want to be in the middle of that. Sorun did his best to push all of that to the back of his mind as he approached the couch that had attempted to cripple him as Nicole finished her preparations with the game console.

"This world can make little computers that can project corporeal bodies powered by noodles or whatever but can't make a wireless controller," he internally groused as he grabbed one of the console's controllers and sat down on the couch. Nicole took a seat right next to him. "Eh, I guess it's fine. Wonder what game Nicole- wait, hold on."

Sorun felt a pit grow in his stomach when he saw it was the spaceship game. The one he'd got the perfect score in just because he'd had that urge to beat Nicole. Through all of that he'd neglected to think about how she would react over it. Would she even react that strongly due to being an AI? She seem sophisticated enough so far that he was debating with himself her apparent level of self awareness but Sorun just didn't know.

"You don't wanna start with a two-player game?" Sorun asked, a nervous bead of sweat rolling down his neck.

"I wish to gauge your level of skill before proceeding forwards. I find that this game's difficulty serves as an adequate benchmark for such measurements," Nicole explained. "How did you know this is only a one-player game?"

"Uh..." Sorun's eyes darted away from Nicole and towards the screen. "Mighty showed me it. I've played it."

"I see. So you must already have a score on the leaderboard." Sorun's heart rate began to steadily climb as Nicole took the controller from his hands and navigated to the score menu. "Let me just load in the scores so I can see for myself."

"N-nah, you don't have to. Really."

"You needn't be insecure about your score if it really was that l-"

She stopped dead once the scores loaded in, and Sorun only needed a quick glance to confirm she was staring right at the top name with the perfect score. The name that was right above hers. An almost inaudible whine sounded in the back of his throat as he nervously tapped at his knees.

Nicole herself didn't speak for the longest moment, And Sorun could have sworn the black locks of hair on her head almost flattened upon seeing the scores. Her eyes merely lingered on the leaderboard, and then slowly her black-colored hands placed the controller back in Sorun's lap. "... It appears you are quite skilled. More so than I originally anticipated." There was an almost an icy edge to her otherwise friendly tone, and a small smile began to form on her lips. A smile that he recognized all too well, as he'd seen it countless times on Earth.

The smile of a competitive gamer.

"Ah, I guess I am pretty good." Any worry the teen had melted right off when he saw that smile, and he almost started to feel excited. "Gettin' that perfect was nothing. I bet you could do it, too, with a bit more practice." As he said this, he shot her an equally competitive smile. He knew she saw it when one of her ears twitched.

"Is that so?" The way she sat up off the couch was almost aggressive as she made her way towards the console. "Perhaps further testing of your skill is required. A two-player fighting game should be more than enough to suit this need."

Sorun settled further into the couch and grasped at his controller. "You're talkin' my language now."

So Nicole was good.

God , but she was good at video games.

Considering she was an AI, it was to be expected. He'd even seen it coming after seeing her score with the spaceship game, but damn , she was good. In their entire session of gaming, neither was able to get a leg up on the other. It was a back and forth game of Sorun winning, and then Nicole winning, and then the pattern would repeat over and over. At the end, Sorun was on a fifty/fifty win-lose ratio with the AI lynx.

It was more than just her being good due to being an AI, too. There was legitimate skill being displayed by her, and over time she would continually adjust her strategies to meet Sorun's own play style, who would in turn have to adapt to her. She was a great conversationalist, too, though any words between them were few and far between seeing as most of their focus was on the game. What little Sorun did get out of her though sounded so natural that he repeatedly kept forgetting that he was playing with an AI.

But all in all, he was having fun. Gaming with Mighty had been relaxing since he'd been so better compared to the armadillo, but with Nicole it was fun. Just like playing back on Earth. She was a great game partner.

It was almost enough to make him forget all the terrible things that had been happening to him. Almost.

"So your mistake here is that you chose your fighter character poorly," Sorun informed the lynx as his fingers flew over the controller. "The one I got has perfect frame advantage over yours."

Right as Sorun explained this, his pixelized character on the screen delivered the finishing blow to Nicole's character. Basking in the win, Sorun leaned back into the couch while shooting Nicole a smug glance.

Nicole, to her credit, was extremely humble when it came to losses. Winning was a different matter, as while she was infinitely better about being subtle about it, she could be as smug as him when victorious in a game. But now, right after losing, she was just giving him a small smile while setting her controller down.

"I must admit that this experience has been an unexpected one. But a very welcome one," she added as she turned her head to Sorun. "It was my expectation that this level of skill was beyond most people's capability after seeing the Freedom Fighters' performance. How did you attain this level of competency with video games?"

"An arguably unhealthy amount of practice," Sorun answered. "Video games were a big hobby of mine back home."

"I see." She gave him an understanding nod. "Your way of playing has given me... insight, as to adapting to to non-ideal situations. In terms you would understand, I believe this means I have learned from the experience." Nicole glanced at the TV, and then back to Sorun. "The likelihood of this experience proving to be valuable during operations is minimal at best, but at the same time I cannot deny the possibility exists. In the effort of being as prepared as possible in order to provide adequate support to the others, I would like to continue these sessions with you."

There were serious doubts in Sorun's mind that any of what they did would be any sort of help out in the field, but then again, she was an AI. So what did he really know? Practically nothing. But if she was offering he didn't see a reason to decline. Besides, he did have more fun playing with her than he thought he would have. A lot more.

"... Except I'm kind of planning to leave her behind to her death or worse along with everybody else, huh?" Sorun reminded himself as he looked down at his controller. Part of why it was so hard to form any kind of bond with anybody in the Freedom Fighters aside from the whole abducted bit was that. It felt almost wrong to accept anything like that considering his intentions.

Well. He did really like playing games with her on second thought. It was something he could overlook for now and reevaluate later on.

"Yeah, I wouldn't mind that. If we ever have time again I'm game." He cocked his head to the side when Nicole flickered. Her body had briefly gone transparent, and there was even a static-like sound that resulted from it. "Uh, you okay? You're kinda... glitching," he informed her.

She looked down to her hand as she flickered again, and she nodded before looking back up at Sorun. "I'm afraid my time is up," she said. "I'll be momentarily returning to my real body. If you would be so kind as to deliver me back to Sally at some point, I would much appreciate it."

He really didn't want to and figured Sally would just come back for it on her own later on anyways, but he was in a good enough mood after the gaming session to go ahead and commit to the favor. "Sure, no problem," he said.

"Thank you." Nicole's body began to fade more and more rapidly, and gave a final smile to him before disappearing. "It was very fun meeting you, Sorun."

She vanished right after saying that.

"..." Sorun didn't have anything to say in response, opting to instead just stare silently. He couldn't help but feel that the last smile gave him felt more livelier than any of the other ones.

She really was a spectacular gaming partner.

The teen continued staring at that one spot for a few more seconds, and then slowly stood up from the couch and turned around to leave. He yelled out and fell right back on the couch when he turned around to a blue hedgehog standing centimetres away from him.

"Jeez!" Sorun sputtered out as he brushed away the dark hair that fell in front of his face, then sent Sonic a scathing look. "Man, how long have you been just creepin' there!?"

"I... just got here a second ago?" Sonic tried. He held his hands out to Sorun, both of which were holding a bottle of soda. "So, I noticed you really like these. Can we talk?"

Of course he wanted to talk. Seemed like everybody wanted to talk to him today, though he actually expected this kind of thing out of Sonic, especially after what happened last night. Didn't mean he was looking forwards to it. "Ugh. Sure." He pulled himself off of the couch, grabbed one of the sodas from Sonic, and then gestured towards the HQ kitchen.

Walking to the kitchen was a journey that took seconds but felt like minutes for Sorun. He tried focusing on the cold sensation of the bottle he was holding, but it did little to distract him from the fact that this conversation was about to happen. He didn't imagine it would go so different from the one he had with Sally, but seeing as it was Sonic, he had no idea what the reaction would be. Sorun was mostly afraid he'd be a lot more stubborn over the issue rather than be accepting of it like Sally had been.

What to do in the event this was true was something Sorun had no clue on. He still didn't know what he was supposed to say.

They arrived in the kitchen, and Sorun found himself going over to lean on the exact same spot on the exact same counter as before. Sonic did the same, but on the table and facing him. They stared at each other for a few minutes with lost looks on both of their faces, at which point Sorun decided to summon a blue sword and have its tip float under the cap of his soda bottle. It wiggled around for a bit before the cap finally popped off, which Sorun had caught midair and placed on the counter as the sword shattered.

Sonic, who had watched the small displayed, gave the smallest of chuckles. "Is that really the best way to be using your power?"

"Yeah man, totally," Sorun confirmed as he took a drink from the soda. "I'll never need a bottle opener ever again thanks to these things."

"Hah, yeah. I guess." Sonic didn't even bother opening his own soda, choosing instead to set it on the table next to him. "So last night went okay?"

The hedgehog didn't waste any time apparently. "Yeah. Slept on the couch." Sorun nodded his head into the living room. "Fell asleep reading the dictionary."

"The... dictionary?" Sonic repeated. "Why?"

"I like to be as verbose as possible when I insult people so I can feel even more superior," Sorun lied. "I learned a new word, though: deracinate. Traditionally it's just a gardening term for pulling roots, but its original meaning refers to separating something from its native environment or even its culture. Kinda like if a foreigner went to a new land. Or if some random teenager, I dunno, got pulled into an alternate universe full of weird animal people he can't understand as a crazy example."

The meaning wasn't lost on Sonic in the slightest, and the hedgehog crossed his arms as a response. "What do you mean you don't understand us?"

"You're nice. I don't mean you. I mean all of you," Sorun elaborated, but then paused. "Most of you. Shadow's in this weird area for me, but you're all just so... nice ." He sputtered and pointed at his soda. "I mean, Jesus, I scream at you and throw a sword at you and your response is to get me a soda so we can try patching things up. That ain't normal where I'm from."

"What do you mean not normal?" Sonic asked, eyes scrunched in confusion. "We all just want to help you. That's what we do. It's... it's what everybody should do. Even Shadow wants to help everybody in his own weird way." He shook his head. "Why's that so hard for you to understand?"

Sorun threw his free hand up. "I don't know, man. It just is. Nobody on Earth... okay, fine, there were people like you in my zone," he admitted, "but there wasn't whole populations of people like that around. It was mixed. Everybody's personalities were super mixed."

"Then what were most people like?" Sonic asked.

"I dunno, me?" Sorun shrugged. "Kind of me but not really? Some better, some worse, everybody different in their own ways, but compared to everybody else I ever met I was pretty normal. And okay, yeah, maybe bein' the short guy in class made me a bit bitter over time, but overall that's how it was over there."

There certainly weren't many people on Earth that would bend over backwards as far as everybody here was at his expense. Hell, he wouldn't go as far. But they would, because Sorun suspected that Mobians were just so naturally nice.

"Eggman said something about them... what was it, a certain drive humans have that they don't? They can't not be vicious, though. There's wars. These people right here are fighting in one. I don't know, maybe they're just... naturally nice? Or something? I don't know." He blinked. "Eggman..."

Sorun didn't feel discussing what happened with the mad scientist was necessary. He didn't want to cause any more problems, and frankly they didn't need to know. The knowledge that the Doctor could casually just wipe out all of Knothole at any moment but wasn't because he just didn't feel like it was a sobering thought that had Sorun on edge, but there wasn't much to do on that front.

All the more reason to bail when he could.

"Well I'm not gonna pretend to understand what life was like over there, but over here we all just want to help you." He turned down to the floor. "We all really do feel terrible about what we did, but we don't want to help just because of that. We wanna help you because it's the right thing to do. But with everything else... you know." He picked his head back to up look at Sorun. "But... you said a lot of things last night. And I want to talk about it."

"I don't. We're gonna anyways since you're never gonna drop this, but for the record I really don't." Sorun took another swig of his soda and then set it down on the counter. "I'll be real. I've had this conversation with Tails and Sally already, and if I have to have it too many more times I'm gonna go crazy. So I'm only saying all this one more time." He took a deep breath before continuing. "Here's where we stand. I realize you all were desperate in bringing me here, and I understand why you did it. That doesn't mean I'm actually alright with it, just that I understand. But then yesterday got thrown at me, and now I got the possibility of being stuck here forever hanging over my head. What am I supposed to think of you all after that?"

Sonic drummed his fingers on the table. "It's still not a sure thing that you're trapped on Mobius," he reminded him in a quiet voice. "We're gonna find a way to bring you back. I don't know how, but we will. But, uh... you know, by some chance- a really small chance!" he rapidly stated. "Like, real tiny! Practically nonexistent! But, y'know, hypothetically speaking if you were actually stuck here forever-"

"Can we just cross that bridge if we get to it?" Sorun asked him. "I'm gonna have a lot of things to say if that really is the case, but I don't want to waste the emotional energy if it's not even true."

Sonic readily nodded his head, which did enough to show Sorun that he wanted to avoid that topic as much as he did. Suited him fine. The less internal turmoil he had over all of this the better, and he just wanted this conversation to be over already.

"But even still... you're still upset at all of us," Sonic said.

"Sonic, I... yeah, look, I am, there's no getting around that," Sorun admitted. "It's not just the abducting thing or the trapped on Mobius thing, though, because if it was just those things we wouldn't be having this conversation and I wouldn't be avoiding everybody. There's... other factors." His life being in peril thanks to them chief among them. His forced silence was settled right next to that. Wanting to leave them behind to Eggman's mercy or lack-there-of was also a contributing factor.

"Then what is it?" Sonic asked, and there was a desperate edge to his voice that Sorun noticed. "If it's something you want to talk about, or if there's anything we can do to help, then-"

"I can't say," Sorun interrupted with a flat tone.

"What do you mean you can't say? Why not?"

"Because reasons, okay?" Sorun said, and then held up a hand to silence the hedgehog when he opened his mouth. "Just... listen, alright? As it stands, the Freedom Fighters need help with Eggman. I have the Summoned Swords power now, so I can help. I need your help getting the Chaos Emeralds, but you can't because of Eggman. Nothing's changed at that front. We're bound to each other because of mutual need." The human placed his hands inside his pockets. "I'll still be a Freedom Fighter. I'll cooperate with everybody and serve to the best of my ability, which is still severely limited swords aside. What happens past that?" He gave half of a shrug. "Who knows, but for now... that's the deal."

"... Okay." Sonic took a deep breath, and then pushed off the table. "I wish you would just talk to me about what has you so upset, but... fine, if that's how you want it. We can work with that." He gave Sorun a hopeful smile. "But maybe eventually we could be friends? You already get along with us, so... at least consider getting over whatever is bothering you? Please?"

Sorun gave a low sigh. "Why do you keep trying?" he asked him.

"Well, I... think you're cool. That's it," Sonic answered, causing Sorun's eyes to widen slightly. "I get it's hard for you, but even if you can't see it yourself, I can see you're trying really hard. And I just think it would be really neat to be friends with somebody like you." The corners of his mouth turned downwards. "I just wished I understood why you don't want to be friends with us. Are you sure we can't?"

The same thoughts that ran through his head when Sally asked him the same thing rand through his head now with Sonic asking. The deadly effect of the Chaos Emeralds. His intentions on leaving them all behind to their doom. Everything that was bothering him that he truly did want to tell Sonic but couldn't because of this damn curse.

Frustrating. Frustrating because it was making it so that nobody understood him. Frustrating because he just wanted to tell somebody so he could get it off his chest. But he had to keep holding all these thoughts in because he had no other choice. Sonic's words didn't help, either. Something about that little confession... it almost hurt. He didn't even realize the hedgehog respected him to such a degree. How could barely even understand why he was so respected, but deep inside he was genuinely grateful for it, like everything else the hedgehog had done for Sorun. It helped to make him feel like he really wasn't alone in this strange world.

But he just couldn't return that gratitude. Not with everything else going on. Not when Sorun wanted to bail on them all to save his own life. And the worst part was that he didn't know if he was sparing himself or Sonic by distancing himself so far.

"... We're comrades. Nothing more," Sorun decided. "I can't do anything closer than that."

Sonic's face fell, but he gave the human an understanding nod before a sad-sounding chuckle left him. "Why do you have to make things so complicated, Sorun?" he asked with an empty smile.

"Good question," Sorun muttered in response. "That all said, uh... mind if I move back in with you? That couch isn't working for me."

"It's cool," Sonic assured him. "But, uh... about what you said earlier. You really don't feel like you're fitting in with everybody else? Is that what you meant by that whole dera-whatever thing?'

It was more along the lines of why being so nice was so ingrained in Mobian culture, but Sorun had already given up on figuring that out and just settled on giving Sonic a nod. "Something like that."

"Well, we can't have that if you're gonna be working with us. I know you want to avoid people for some weird reason, but that just isn't gonna fly. And the swords are nice, but, well, some extra training wouldn't hurt you." A thoughtful look crossed Sonic's face, and a grin slowly began to grow on him as he snapped his gloved fingers. "That, that can work. I'd have to run it by everybody, but yeah." He grabbed his otherwise untouched soda and headed out of the kitchen. "Things to do gotta juice seeya at home bye!"

He left in blur right after that and was gone completely from sight before Sorun could even blink. The human was left wondering the meaning of Sonic's words, but came up completely blank.

"Ah, great. What's he planning now?" he muttered to himself before reaching over to the bottle so he could down the rest of his soda.

A/N- Fun fact, during the planning stage of this story deracinate was gonna be the title of the story. It didn't make the cut and was dropped pretty earlier because A) it didn't really fit with what I was going for, and B) I thought to myself, "That's the most pretentious thing in the world, nobody's gonna know what that means. I didn't know what that word meant until I randomly happened upon it looking up words." But while it doesn't fit with the story, it sorta fits with Sorun's current plight, so it was a fun little thing I added in.

Chapter 14

Recursion Error

Episode 14- It's like boot camp but worse

Before today, Sorun had never before in his entire life been woken up by a trumpet.

He didn't recommend it.

It was still what he would consider morning when it happened. One moment he had been sleeping in the spare bed in Sonic's room, and the next moment he was being assault by the awful, blaring sound of a trumpet. He went from being in deep sleep to wide awake in an instant, and came out of his dreams screaming and flailing his limbs around in a confused panic before he and the sheets fell out of the bed.

Panting heavily with his heart beating rapidly in his chest, Sorun had picked himself up onto his knees with the bed sheets hanging off of him as he wildly looked around the room. He stopped right on Sonic, who was standing next to his bed and grinning at him. Sorun's eyes immediately locked onto the trumpet the hedgehog was holding in his hands, and then moved to a clock on the wall next to them. His eyes nearly bugged out of his skull when he saw the time.

"Man, it's six in the morning!" he yelled. "Why're you waking me up at six in the morning with a trumpet!? Where'd you even get a trumpet!?"

"It was in a box of my dad's old stuff," Sonic answered. He looked down at the trumpet, and then sheepishly turned his head towards the room's door. "You don't think that woke my parents up, do you?" he asked.

Sorun affixed the hedgehog with a deadpan expression. "You woke the whole neighborhood up with that thing. You woke all of Knothole up. Elias up in the castle is up and he's marching right over here because of you're being a public menace."

"Hah." Sonic's sheepish look turned nervous. "Wait, you're joking, right?"

"I'll let you figure that one out," Sorun grunted as he climbed back into the bed while pulling the sheets over his head. He'd only managed to close his eyes for five seconds in an attempt at going back to sleep before the trumpet was blasted at him again. "I'm gonna break that thing if you do that one more time!" Sorun threatened as he shot up into a sitting position, the sheets flying all the way to the other side of the room from the motion.

The trumpet was reflexively hidden behind Sonic's back as he took a step away from Sorun. "Hey, come on, this is my dad's," he said. "Don't take it out on my dad's things."

"Ugh..." Groaning tiredly, Sorun rubbed at his eyes before looking back at Sonic. "Dude, what gives?"

"It's training day!"

That held absolutely no meaning for Sorun, who responded with, "What? Nah, it's Wednesday. I think?" He blinked in confusion when he realized he hadn't been keeping track of the date. "Wait, what day is it?"

"It's Thursday," Sonic corrected, "and that means exactly what I meant: training day."

That phrase still didn't register to the teen, who shook his messy head in confusion at Sonic's words. "What is training day supposed to mean?"

"Well, you're a Freedom Fighter now," Sonic began. He placed the trumpet on the ground and hopped into the spare bed so that he was sitting next to Sorun. "But you don't really have any Freedom Fighter skills. You know, uh, coordination, teamwork, some other skills here and there." He lightly punched Sorun's shoulder. "You're not very fit, either."

"Sue me. I never played sports," Sorun grumbled under his breath. Playing video games and watching whatever suited his fancy at the time never left a lot of time for physical exercise. Sometimes even sparing time for food was dropped because of this. Probably the main reason he was underweight now that he thought about it, but he wasn't that bad. By normal humans standards he was below average at worst. And by Mobian standards he could have been an Olympic bodybuilder and he still would have come up short compared to the strength of a normal Mobian.

So, because of that, he didn't really see the point of ever physically training. Apparently Sonic wasn't seeing his point of view.

"Well it's still not good you're not trained," Sonic continued. "Normally we wouldn't let you go on missions right away without a lot of training, but we're... well, we just don't have the time, so you're just gonna have to learn off of practical experience. That being said, I asked around, and everybody's in agreement that we should probably teach you some basic things before going in so you're not... er, not..."

"Completely hopeless?" Sorun finished in a flat voice.

"Hey, no, I wouldn't go that far." Sonic lightly shoved Sorun's shoulder. "So I talked to everybody, and since everybody just happens to not be doing anything today, we all agreed to spend the day, y'know, getting you ready. So training day."

It was a shock and a half for Sorun, who never even dreamed most of the people in the Freedom Fighters would ever devote so much time for his sake. Especially considering he hadn't even formally talked with half of them still. He really did find it baffling how supportive they could be to what could be amounted to a complete stranger.

"I don't know, man. Sounds like a lotta work." Unfortunately for them Sorun wasn't so sure he wanted to take advantage of all that kindness. "You sure it's even gonna help?"

"Sure it will! It's better than nothing, right? And besides, you don't have anything else to be doing today."

He had him there. "Alriiight, fine," Sorun sighed out as he began to run his hands through his hair to stop it from sticking out everywhere. "I'll go to your Freedom Fighter boot camp. But can I get a shower first? It's been a couple days."

"Yeah, okay. I'm gonna go make us some toast for the road, and then we'll get going." By the time Sorun finished giving the hedgehog a nod of understanding, he'd already left the room. Sorun stared after him through the room's half-open door, slowly blinked his eyes a few times, and then settled back on the bed's pillow before falling back asleep shortly after.

Five minutes eventually passed, and the door to Sonic's room quietly squeaked open as the room's owner poked his head in to check on Sorun. He shook his head in disappointment the moment his eyes laid on the sleeping human, and then he walked in, grabbed the instrument off the ground, and held trumpet up to his lips before blowing through it a third time.

Once more, Sorun fell out of the bed into a screaming heap. By the time he whipped his head up to the door Sonic had already ran away.

"That's it!" A Summoned Sword appeared in Sorun's grasp as he ran towards the door. "Get your furry butt over here, I'm cutting that thing!"

Chasing Sonic had been a mistake. It was a foolhardy endeavor to begin with considering he could run circles around Sorun faster than he could think of the word "circles", but he'd been too sleep deprived to properly focus. Thankfully the human did have enough sense to give up chasing him two minutes in before trudging back to the house for that shower while angrily grumbling under his breath, but by then the damage had set in.

That left him here: standing in Freedom HQ, body freshly washed with a new set of clothes identical to his last, but so exhausted that he was practically swinging on his feet. Right now a single piece of toast was all that was keeping him going, but he wasn't so sure how long that would last him.

He just wanted to go back to sleep.

"Alright, so it's great that you all made it!" Sonic, who was standing just in front of him, had clapped his hands loudly enough that Sorun was roused awake for a good second, but already he could feel his eyes begin to close of their own volition again. "So I was thinking-"

Words started to blur away from Sorun's perception. The whole world and all his senses began to fade away, actually, and a small sigh of content left his mouth as he finally went back to sleep. This blissful rest only lasted for a few seconds until something began shaking him awake.

"Hrk- huh!? I'm up, I'm up!" His eyes flew around the room, and then looked to Sonic who was shaking him awake with a wry grin on his face. "I'm up, jeez," Sorun repeated as he slowly swiped Sonic's hand away.

He took that moment to quickly glance around the HQ. True to Sonic's word, all of the Freedom Fighters had chosen to spend their day helping Sorun with his deficiencies. Including Sonic, it was all seventeen of them- eighteen, he reminded himself, because Nicole was likely in her computer somewhere- that he'd seen on the first day of him coming here, and during his introduction speech. Some he knew and recognized at this point, others he'd yet to even speak a word to.

Well, by today that wasn't going to be true anymore. Sonic intended everybody to be spending some time with him to get him up to speed on the resistance side of things. He dreaded seeing what all those introductions he was due for entailed and how all these people would act towards him, but there was no way out of it now.

But, unfortunately, that's as far as Sorun's thoughts carried him before he fell asleep on his feet again. Sonic had been saying something to everybody, but Sorun wasn't even able to register it. He did register it when Sonic once again shook him awake.

"Dude, I said I'm up..." Sorun tiredly mumbled as he weakly slapped Sonic's hand away.

"You sure don't look it," the hedgehog disagreed. "We just went over today's schedule. You did catch all that, right?"

He sure didn't, but Sorun didn't want Sonic to know that for fear of making himself look even more incompetent than he already was. "What do you take me for? 'Course I got all that," he defended.

Sonic's eyes narrowed slightly, though a playful grin had grown on his face. "Repeat one thing I said."

"... One thing I said," Sorun echoed.

The blue hedgehog's response was slap his palm against his own face. "Alright, slight change of plan," he announced. "Sorun, you're with me first. We're gonna go for a little run and do a few laps around Knothole to wake you up before anything else."

"Are you serious?" Sorun groaned as Sonic. "It's workout in of itself just walking to this place, and now you wanna take me back to the city just to run around it?"

"Hey, cardio's important. I would know." Sorun didn't say anything in response, but he did groan some more under his breath as he was practically dragged up the steps by the hedgehog. "Besides," Sonic continued, "it'll get your blood flowing and wake you up."

"If that was true I'd already be up," Sorun complained, but otherwise didn't resist as he was dragged out of the HQ by Sonic.

"Okay, stop! Stop! I need- oh, man, I need a break..."

Well, Sonic hadn't been lying. His brand of training for Sorun had quite literally just been running. He hadn't been lying about running around Knothole, either, because that was all they did once they reached Knothole's outer perimeter. At the very least Sonic had purposely slowed himself down just so he could keep pace with Sorun as he jogged around the city, but the human could tell that doing such a thing was straining to the hedgehog from the antsy look on his face. He supposed that going so slow would be tough on somebody with super speed.

Well, tough. If they were doing this they were going at his pace.

In his defense, Sorun had managed three laps around Knothole City before he collapsed on the ground from exhaustion. That wasn't even factoring in the walk to and from Freedom HQ, so by Sorun's account he was doing pretty well all things considering. But now Sorun was on his back, muscles burning and lungs breathing so hard that they felt like they were going to pop in his chest. Sonic, who was leaning over him, looked no worse for wear.

Sonic was right about one thing, though. He was wide awake now. That wouldn't be the case for long if his heart gave out from all this exercise, but for now he couldn't go to sleep again if he tried.

"You know, uh, Sorun..." The hedgehog raised an eye ridge as he looked down at the human, and said, "Usually this kind of distance is something a child can manage."

"A Mobian child, maybe," Sorun retorted as he sat up. "You even... you even get tired from running?"

"Eh... not really," Sonic answered with a shrug.

"Oh, well good for you," Sorun said with a roll of his eyes. "Why are we doing this again?"

"Told ya. Cardio." Placing his hands on his hips, Sonic stepped closer so that he was right in front of the sitting human. "Gotta get that endurance up so you don't collapse like this right in the middle of a mission."

"Ah-huh." He saw the logic in that, but just knowing that didn't make it any easier on his burning muscles. He huffed out a breath and, with slight struggle, managed to pick himself back up to his feet. "Well, I got tons of other things to do today and my legs feel like they're gonna melt. Think we can call it here so I can move on to my next thing?"

Admittedly it was mostly just him being lazy, but the idea of him maybe conserving some strength for the day ahead did cross the teen's mind. The teenage hedgehog standing right in front of him probably had the same idea from the thoughtful look on his face, and to Sorun's relief, gave a nod.

"Yeah, alright," he said in agreement. "It's around the time Amy wanted to start your mobility training anyways, so let's go."

"Ah, great. Yeah, let's-"

"After one more lap," Sonic said quickly, a mischievous smirk on his face.

"MAN, WHAT!?"

Following behind the two female Mobians as they lead him towards Freedom HQ's little training ground, Sorun decided that, just maybe, he should think really hard about what he wanted to say before he formally introduced himself to the two. They'd exchanged some greetings before they started leading him, of course, but they hadn't actually talked yet. He mostly just wanted to make a good impression so that this training session wouldn't go any worse than what it was likely heading towards.

One was that pink hedgehog he'd took note of way back when. Amy, if he recalled. She seemed like a nice person at first glance, but he didn't have anything else to say about her otherwise.

The other one leading him was another echidna like Knuckles. Had more of a pinkish-purple-y fur color than he did, but what drew his eyes as he walked behind her was the single, artificial dreadlock at the front of her head, more cybernetic bits at the ends of the dreadlocks behind her head, and the cybernetic left arm. Sorun unfortunately didn't recall her name, but somewhere in his memory he did recall it starting with a "J". He figured that maybe asking her about the cybernetics would be a good opening, but after remembering what happened with Bunnie, he decided against it. Then he thought about just asking her name, but he didn't want to seem rude for having never learned it prior.

After swallowing the lump in his throat, he decided to go ahead and try his luck with Amy.

"So, Amy." It was right as the trio were crossing a small, wooden bridge leading over a small river did Sorun walk right next to the pink hedgehog to gain her attention. "I introduced myself in front of everybody, but Sonic and Sally wanted me to at least introduce myself personally to all the Freedom Fighters. So hey."

The way she turned her head towards him with such a surprised expression had Sorun wondering if he really was that bad with people. To his relief it was an expression of pleasant surprise, however, as a small smile shortly formed on her mouth as she looked at him. "O-oh! Um, right. I'm sorry if I looked surprised there, but you never really looked that talkative, you know?"

"I... yeah, I'm working on that," Sorun muttered in a stilted tone. "Anyways, I'm Sorun. You already knew that, but... yeah."

"Oh, okay. Well, Sorun, I'm Amy Rose."

The name was enough to make Sorun do a double take on Amy at how normal-sounding the name was. Compared to all the other names he heard that one had him at a loss. "Wow, really? Jeez, I think I knew somebody named Amy Rose in elementary school. Or, no, wait, was it Anthony?" He looked ahead and scratched the side of his face in thought. "It was A-something. Agh, can't remember." He looked back to Amy. "So, er, I heard from Tails you use a hammer? That right?"

"Mh-hm!" She gave him a bubbly nod. "Wanna see it?"

Sorun quirked an eyebrow, and then looked down at Amy's gloved but empty hands. "See it? But you don't- whoa!"

He wasn't really sure what happened. Amy had simply held her hands out, and in a small puff of smoke, a hammer appeared. An absurdly large hammer colored red and gold with a head that was almost as big as Amy's whole body. A hammer that looked so heavy that Sorun just knew he wouldn't even be able to lift it, and yet Amy was twirling it around like it was a baton.

It just wasn't fair sometimes. Why did he have to be so weak?

"That's neat," Sorun said, mildly dejected at the feat of strength he was seeing as he kept glancing from Amy's arms to his own. "I can kind of do that, too."

A Summoned Sword appeared in his hand right after he said that. It was more to just make him feel better than anything else, but he didn't even get that from the way that Amy was eyeing the sword with so much intrigue.

"Ohh, coool...!" she marveled as her green eyes looked up and down the sword. "You can grab a weapon out of nowhere like I do with my hammer, too!" she cocked her head to the side in confusion. "But how come yours is all... blue and glowy?"

"It's special," Sorun answered. His eyes wandered ahead and he saw the echidna in front of them had glanced back to look at the blue sword Sorun was holding, but she quickly turned her head back forwards when she saw Sorun looking.

Movement on the corner of his eyes drew Sorun's attention back to Amy, who was holding the head of the hammer out to him as they continued walking forwards. "I heard you got a strange power from a Chaos Emerald you and Sonic got, but I didn't think it'd be something like that. It's kind of cool!" she exclaimed. "Nobody else can just grab a weapon out of nowhere like I can. We can totally be weapon buddies!"

"Uh..." The pink hedgehog was acting a lot more jubilant than anybody else he'd met so far. It wasn't even that she was acting this way that was surprising, but that she was acting this way towards him. It left him somewhat surprised, but when he saw her slightly shake the hammer head at him, he decided to go ahead and bump the tip of his Summoned Sword against it. "Yeah, sure. Weapon buddies," he said, and then instantly regretted it when his words caused Amy's eyes to light up in glee.

"Sweet!" The hammer in Amy's hand disappeared in another puff of smoke, and right after she looked up ahead and pointed to the echidna leading them. "Oh, and that's Julie-Su. She-"

"I can introduce myself, you know," she called back to the two. Amy's mouth clamped shut at that, while Sorun passively looked between the two of them. Eventually he just shrugged and continued walking.

Around a single minute of the trio walking passed before he felt something softly jab into his sides. He looked to the right and saw that it was Amy, who was jabbing him with her elbow to gain his attention. She was nodding her head forwards towards the echidna and silently pointing at her.

Sorun, who had no idea what she was trying to say, shook his head at Amy's action. "What?"

"Go introduce yourself," she whispered. "You said you were trying to do that with everybody, right?"

He had indeed said that. Not that he wanted to, but at this juncture it was becoming more work to avoid people than to just talk. "Yeah, I'm goin'," he mumbled in response as he walked up ahead of Amy so he could go to the other Mobian's side.

As he was approaching her, Sorun had noticed that the echidna's pupils had been following him from the corner of her eyes, though she faced forwards again when he slowed to a walk by her side. Being too nervous to ask about the cybernetics he couldn't think of anything else to lead with, so he decided to just go ahead with introductions.

"So I'm-"

"Sorun, yeah, I know," she replied. "And you already know my name. Nice to meet you."

"... Yeah, same." That was more succinct than he was expecting, but he wasn't gonna complain over it. "Nice to meet you, Julie."

Her violet eyes flicked to his direction. "Su."

Sorun turned his head to her. "I seriously gotta say that every- alright." His head faced back forwards when she turned to him with a scowl. "Julie-Su. Understood."

The scowl being directed at him lessened when he said the name properly, and she faced back ahead. Sorun, in response, breathed out a small sigh and turned his head just slightly enough to get a better look at her.

"Kind of a weird name, but whatever. Everything here's weird." He found his eyes looking down towards her body so he could find something for them to talk about. "Man, I'm not seein' anything, though," he thought. "Teal boots, some weird black and teal top... pfft, she's got a utility belt. With a... gun clipped to it... waaaait a minute here..."

That was a gun. He knew guns, and while he didn't recognize the strange, double-barreled pistol that Julie-Su had holstered to her golden belt, he knew for sure that it was a gun. Which he thought were basically taboo to Freedom Fighters based on everything Sally said.

There better have been a good explanation for this.

"Hey, how come you get a gun?" Sorun asked her, his head fully turning to meet her again. She sent him a quizzical look in response, causing him to point down to her belt. "Your gun," he repeated.

"My photon gun?"

"Yeah, how come you get one?" he asked. "When I tried getting a gun Sally told me that they weren't allowed in the Freedom Fighters. So how come you get to have one?"

Julie-Su blinked at him, and then quickly understood his question and nodded at him. "Probably because I'm not officially a Freedom Fighter," she answered, causing Sorun to tilt his head back in confusion. "I'm with Knuckles and his group," she explained, "and it used to be we kept to ourselves and dealt with things up on Angel Island. But then Eggman became a problem for everybody, so he dragged us all down here to help." She glanced down at the gun. "But truth be told, echidna culture differs pretty greatly from the rest of Mobian culture. We're not exactly afraid of guns like everybody else. Some of us, anyways."

"I... see?" He didn't, not really, but he didn't feel all that compelled to ask further.

"So you really want a gun?" she asked him.

Sorun huffed. "Well, I did , but I have Summoned Swords now and those are arguably better than a gun." He rolled his eyes. "I still feel cheated, though." Felt like everybody got to have a gun but him. First the plane, now this? He honestly did feel cheated.

"I'm struggling to see how a sword is better than a gun," Julie-Su said.

"'Cause I can do this." To accentuate his point, a blue sword formed next to him. It pointed towards a nearby tree, and then shot forwards and embedded itself into it faster than a speeding arrow. "They don't really run out, either," he continued as the sword in the tree shattered, "so yeah. Shooting swords."

"They're decent." She looked mildly surprised at the display, and then faced back forwards with a small grin on her face. "Bet I could shoot one of those out of the air."

"You probably could, yeah."

She glanced back at him, and her features turned back to neutral as they continued walking.

The rest of the trip was spent in silence, though thankfully it had only lasted for a few more minutes until they arrived at the training ground. It wasn't much to Sorun's eyes: just a small clearing among all the trees. What did catch his eye, however, was that it was full of posts. Tall, wooden posts that were so numerous that they filled up the entire clearing.

Stepping forwards, Sorun reached a hand out and brushed his finger along one of the posts in the first row of posts filling the clearing. It felt like an ordinary piece of wood to him, which caused him to turn around and give the two Mobians a questioning look.

"So what are we doing here?" he asked. "And what's with all the posts?"

"We're here because we gotta get a sense for how mobile you can be," Julie-Su told him as she stopped right behind Sorun. She bent her knees slightly, breathed out, and then jumped up into the air. Far into the air. So far that she'd sailed over Sorun, done a backflip, and then landed on top of the wooden post Sorun had touched with her arms extended to each side. Smirking down at the gawking human, she continued with, "You gotta be limber enough on the battlefield to dodge anything coming towards you. You're no good to anybody in the hospital."

"It's more than just dodging, too. Just being able to keep yourself on your feet no matter what is a big part of any mission." As Amy said this, she as well performed a backflip onto the wooden post next to Julie-Su. "So get up here and show us what you got."

Well, he hoped they were ready to be disappointed, because he sure as hell didn't have any of that . He couldn't do a cartwheel, let alone a backflip. Or even jump ten feet into the air at that. He wasn't sure he could even balance on one of those posts without falling down.

But training was training. He wasn't so sure this kind of training was physically possible for him the further it went, but that's why they were doing it in the first place: to test his limits and prepare him more for going out on the field. He was just worried they were greatly overestimating those limits of his here.

"You know it's physically impossible for a normal human to jump up there, right?" The post itself was a good ten feet off the ground, but the two females were still staring down at him expectantly. "I'll, uh... find a way, then."

The teen stepped over to another post next to him, and then looked it up and down in thought. Jumping was out of the way. He might be able to jump up far enough to grab the top with his hands, but he wasn't sure he had the strength needed to pull himself up, and even if he did, there was barely enough surface area on top of the post to plant a single foot down, let along enough to support his body as he pulled himself up. So that was out.

"Could I climb it? Just, wrap my limbs around it and inch my way up?" he wondered. "No, not strong enough. Stab swords into it and use them as stairs? Not sure anybody will appreciate me damaging the training equipment. But that does give me an idea."

He narrowed his eyes in focus, and right after a Summoned Sword appeared, facing parallel to the ground and facing the left. Next to that sword and in a position above that sword formed another, this one pointing to the right. More and more swords appeared in this fashion until they formed a ladder leading up past the post.

So he climbed the ladder of Summoned Swords by their hilts. It was an extremely slow and cumbersome process, and there were multiple times he had nearly fallen off onto the ground, but eventually he reached the top and tentatively stuck his foot out to the top of the post. He realized with dread that it really was so small that his one foot barely fit on it, but he managed to successfully balance on it albeit with great difficulty as his sword ladder shattered.

"O-okay- whoo, alright..." Sorun mumbled, his entire body trembling as he struggled to maintain balance. He looked up at Julie-Su and Amy, who were both giving him rather unimpressed looks. "I did good, right?"

The look Julie-Su was giving him didn't make him feel like he did good. "I admire the ingenuity of climbing up," she said, "but that was way too slow."

"Yeah, but good job getting up!" Amy praised.

He knew she wasn't being patronizing, but Sorun still felt his shoulders slump from what Amy said. "Yeah, awesome. So what now?"

"Now we see just how mobile you can be." Right after saying this, Julie-Su backflipped once more and landed upside-down on a post behind her while balancing on a single hand, and then pushed up into the air with the one arm and landed on a single foot on a post behind that one. "I'm not expecting you to be that good immediately, so for now just try getting on another post and we'll go from there."

"Right. Easy." The black-haired human looked at the nearest wooden post behind him and gulped. "No sweat."

He said that, but there actually was a slight amount of sweat running down his face. That post was close enough, but for him it might as well have been miles away for how good his acrobatic skills were.

"Why does everybody here get to move like a professional gymnast but me?" he silently asked himself up. He'd be lying if he said he wasn't envious over the kind of acrobatics Julie-Su and Amy were displaying so casually, but he didn't know how much of that was just Mobian biology and how much of that was just them being trained resistance fighters. Probably both, now that he thought of it.

And here he was lacking both of those things.

"Alright, let's do it." There was a voice in the back of his mind screaming at him not to, but Sorun ignored it and bent the one knee balancing him on the post. "Aaand go," he thought as he jumped to the next post.

There was about a second and a half of time Sorun managed to register as he transitioned from one post to the next. A second and a half where he had focused on his goal and had attempted to stick his foot out to try and land on the post successfully.

He failed immediately when his foot slipped off, causing his face to smack right into the post before he tumbled down onto his back.

"Oh my gosh, Sorun! Are you okay!?"

He wasn't. He barely even managed to hear the panicked cry from Amy as he laid flat on his back staring up at the sky. He felt dazed, and his face burned and stung so much that it was almost numb. He did manage to perceive the pink blob that he assumed was Amy pull him up to his feet, at least. He was glad he was able to do that much.

"Where's the leak, ma'am...?" Sorun slurred as he was helped up into a sitting position.

"Oh no, he's delirious," Amy worriedly mumbled as she gently pulled the human up to his feet. She patted him a few times on the back, and more clarity appeared in Sorun's eyes as he blinked a couple of times and then held a hand to his head. "Are you okay, Sorun?"

"Agh... Sure..." His head was throbbing and his face was still burning, but at the very least there wasn't any blood when he pulled his hand back. And he didn't feel anything broken or out of place. "Alright." He dusted his hands off and walked of out Amy's grasp and to the nearest wood post. "Let's try again."

As the human began climbing another ladder made of Summoned Swords, the two Mobians cast each other worried glances before they focused back on Sorun. "You sure you're good?" Julie-Su asked. "We can take a break if you're not feeling up to it."

"Nah, it's- ohp, it's fine," Sorun breathed out as he nearly lost his balance upon stepping back onto the post. "Just gotta... focus and land on the target," he whispered to himself as he looked straight at the post he intended to jump onto to. "Alright, this time for sure."

He jumped again. On the bright side he hadn't hit his face, but unfortunately he still missed and landed right onto his stomach. Both Amy and Julie-Su winced at the human's misfortune, while Sorun himself loudly moaned in pain as his body slid off the post and fell back onto the ground.

"Alright," he groaned under his breath, "this may take more than a few tries..."

"Hah, what a loser," Rubrum laughed from his position hidden amidst the trees as he watched Sorun continually slam into post after post.

"Okay, Sorun, remember that you're gonna want to be mindful of your center of mass-"

Slam!

"Ooh, that isn't, ah..." Julie-Su sucked in air between her teeth as she tried her best to look away from the human that crumpled onto the ground.

"Guys... guys, listen." Sorun heaved out a long breath as he attempted to stand up, failed, and then sat back down while leaning against the post. "We've been at this for an hour. I think I gotta call it quits for now."

"I... think that's probably for the best," Amy agreed as she jumped off her own post and approached Sorun as soon as she landed on the ground. The echidna near them did the same. "Are you sure you're alright?"

He couldn't manage any words, but Sorun did manage to flash her a thumbs-up. It was more of an affirmation that he was still conscious than him actually being okay, but at the moment it was all he could care to give.

Sorun couldn't blame the two Mobians for at least trying. And they'd tried, too- every time he'd fallen in the past hour one or both of them would give him some hint or pointer and how to do anything he was doing better. Amy had mostly stuck to trying to fix his balance whereas Julie-Su had tried her best to help him actually make a landing.

But none of their advice had stuck for him. He'd tried his best at internalizing it all and implementing it, but after a whole hour of them trying to instruct him he hadn't made any progress whatsoever. And now all he had to show for it was a body riddled in throbbing bruises from smacking into those posts over and over.

"Sorry for wasting your time, you two," Sorun grunted as he slowly rose to his feet. At least the throbbing in his body had gone down enough that he could finally stand up, but now he had to look at two pairs of Mobian eyes staring right at him. "I know you both tried really hard, but I couldn't do it."

The echidna held a hand out to him. "No, Sorun-"

"Yeah, I suck, I know."

"Would you let me finish?" Julie-Su snapped, causing Sorun to shut his mouth and look right at her. "Look, your performance... yeah, it was pretty bad," she admitted, "but at least you're trying . I'd be more upset at you if you gave up after the first few tries."

"'More upset' implying that you're a bit upset?" Sorun asked with a raised eyebrow.

She backed up and shook her hands out in a disagreeing manner. "Hey, that's not what I'm... you're just not very good and it's a bit frustrating to watch." She looked to the side and began rubbing at her bionic arm. "I mean, really. This is basic stuff and I know people that are hopeless that manage to get the hang of this faster than you."

It was right after she said this that Amy jabbed her elbow into the echidna's side. "But," Amy said, "we think it's very admirable that you're putting effort in, and nobody is good at everything, so it's okay if you're not so good in some areas as long as you're better in others." She snapped her head to Julie-Su. "Isn't that right ?"

She blinked at the pink hedgehog, and then looked back to Sorun. "Yes, completely," she agreed. "And don't say that we're wasting our time with you. We're training you because we want you to be better so you don't get hurt. We wouldn't be here if this was a waste of time."

It was practically the equivalent of being handed a participation trophy. And Sorun had received one of those in the past, and the feeling he had now was about the same one he had back then. But while he was both irritated at himself and at them for the words they were saying, he at least appreciated the effort they were going through for his sake. The kind words had helped, too. They didn't make him feel any better but they at least took some of his mind off the pain.

"Thanks," Sorun mumbled as he pushed off the wood post. "So Sonic told me that after you guys that somebody named Espio was supposed to look after me next. One of you know where he is?"

Julie-Su gave him a nod. "Yeah, he and a few of the others are a bit deeper in the woods that way. They said they'd be waiting for you around this time." She pointed towards the right side of the clearing, towards a direction that lead into the forest. "Just keep walking that way a bit and you'll find them. They're pretty hard to miss."

"Got it. Thanks." He waved the two girls off, and then began limping towards the forest.

"And don't worry!" he heard Amy call out from behind him. "You'll get the hang of this eventually! It just takes time!"

He didn't have the energy to respond.

On the bright side by now the throbbing pain in his body had turned into a dull ache, so he was able to walk normally about halfway through his trek through the forest. He was still pretty sure the bruises would still be there, but those would heal away in a few days. So it'd be fine as long as the rest of the day didn't require anything too physical.

Hopefully whatever Espio had planned wasn't too physical. Or anybody else later on for that matter.

"Which one was Espio? He was the... yeah, I never bothered," Sorun thought as he ducked under a wood branch. "Damn, but who's actually left that I don't know? There was that purple guy with the horn, those two bees, that bat... oh, that short yellow squirrel guy, too. So it's gotta be one of them, right?" He made a quiet hum. "Don't even know what the name 'Espio' means. Is it the kind of thing that fits on a bee? Nah, not really... but that probably means it is one of them. Unless it isn't." He squinted his eyes when he saw a gathering of figures in the distance past all the trees. "Well, that's them up there. Might as well ask."

Once Sorun made it through the dense brush, he made it to a section of forest where the trees were more spread out to make a more open area. There were four figures there talking among themselves, but he only knew one of them, and that was just because Knuckles had mentioned him one time. The tall crocodile Mobian Knuckles had identified at Vector was hard to miss.

The other three? Sorun didn't have a clue.

Two of them were the bees he remembered seeing. Two Mobians he was relatively sure were bees based on the black and yellow abdomens they had and the small pair of wings they were flying around with. They were short, too. Shorter than he was, which made him feel moderately more confident for once. Then he saw the large, knife-like stingers they had on their abdomens and the confidence dropped back down to zero.

The last one was the purple one with the horn he remembered seeing. Like almost everybody else he was solely going with the shoes-and-gloves combo. There wasn't much else to say about him aside from that yellow horn and the weird, coiled tail he had, and any other thoughts Sorun had were cut off when he looked over in Sorun's direction. The other three followed his gaze to look at Sorun, and all at once all four began making their way towards him.

"Hey there! Wow, what happened to you!?" The first one to make contact with him was one of the bees, this one having a boyish voice. He was flying in circles around Sorun as his amber eyes looked up and down Sorun's bruised body.

"I got beat up by some stationary wood," Sorun answered with a slump of his shoulders. The bee stopped and hovered right in front of his face, and Sorun couldn't help but squint in confusion when he saw the black, helmet-like object he had on his head with a maroon rim. "I can't tell if that's a helmet or just part of his body," he thought. "Maybe it's just a weird shell thing that looks like a helmet. Like the thing Meruem had. God, I miss anime."

"You lost a fight against wood?" Sorun looked from the bee towards the purple Mobian with the yellow horn. He stopped right in front of Sorun and crossed his arms as he regarded Sorun with his own pair of yellow eyes. "How on earth did that happen?"

"They were real tough, man. Came outta nowhere. Whole legion of 'em," Sorun answered as he turned his body to face him. "Real talk though I just failed miserably at gymnastics training."

The purple Mobian chuckled under his breath and lowered his head. "Well, it happens to the best of us. Don't feel too bad about it." He lifted his head up to meet Sorun's eyes. "Pardon my rudeness, but I believe we have yet to make introductions. It's Sorun, correct? My name is Espio."

"Oh, this is Espio. But what actually is he?" Definitely something reptilian considering he was covered in scale-like skin instead of fur.

The coiled tail and black spines on his back were big hints, too, and he was fairly certain he'd seen lizards on Earth with horns. But for the life of him he couldn't remember which ones those were, so he decided to guess based on the first lizard that came to mind. "Espio the... Gecko?"

"Chameleon."

"Goddammit."

"Hah! Sorun called you a gecko," the bee Mobian laughed as he pointed at Espio.

Espio closed his eyes as a strained smile replaced the previous, easy smile. "Yes, Charmy, I heard him perfectly." He opened his eyes back to Sorun. "This one is named Charmy," he told him. "The other bee is Saffron."

"Hi!" In response, the bee gave Sorun an energetic wave. The other, more yellow bee, a female one of the same stature as Charmy, gave him a more shy wave.

"Hey." Sorun gave the two bees an unenthusiastic wave of his own and turned towards crocodile. "You're Vector, right?"

"You know it." The voice that came out of the reptile nearly had Sorun reeling. It was way rougher than he had been expecting, and loud enough to the point that he could have sworn the headphones and gold chain hanging off his neck vibrated from the volume. "What's up m'man?"

Sorun looked up at the crocodile. He was a bit taller than Sorun was. He didn't like that. "Nothin', man, nothin'," Sorun answered before turning back to Espio. "So what's in store for me today?"

There was something concerning about the way everybody's expressions had flashed from friendly and playful to almost deadly serious. The sudden change of atmosphere was so jarring, in fact, that Sorun had taken a step backwards from the sheer intensity radiating off of them all. Espio in particular.

"Yes, your training," Espio said as he reached into one of his gloves. He pulled something out that was alarmingly familiar to Sorun- a shuriken. A shuriken made of wood. "A majority of Freedom Fighters enjoy the upfront approach when it comes to enemy combatants. It's a philosophy that even many in the Chaotix share."

"Mainly Knux and Mighty," Vector mumbled under his breath.

Espio, who heard the comment, shot the crocodile a look. "Be that as it may, even they have to admit that there are times where a more stealthy approach is appropriate for the situation. They've experienced it too many times firsthand to deny it. Everybody in the Freedom Fighters has." He turned back to the human. "The point is, sometimes sneaking into the fortress full of killer machines is more advantageous than rushing in head-first. It's an approach I take a personal preference in."

"That's a shuriken," Sorun observed as he watched Espio twirl the object in his fingers. "What, you're a ninja or something?"

"It's a training shuriken," Espio corrected. "And yes, I am."

Oh. Sorun didn't have a single comeback for that except for raising his eyebrows in surprise.

"We've been made aware that your status as a human makes you more physically... limited compared to a normal Mobian," Espio continued. "There's no shame in that, but it does mean that taking the stealthy approach to operations will be extra important to somebody like you. And it's a basic skill everybody in the Freedom Fighters possesses, anyways, so all the more reason for you to learn."

"So sneaking?" Sorun summarized. "You're gonna teach me to sneak?"

"Essentially," Espio said with a nod. "We tossed around a few ideas how to go about it, but at the end we decided with..." He stopped, and then took a deep breath. "We decided to go with-"

"Hide and seek!" Charmy exclaimed as he flew between the two. "We all got to put our ideas in a hat and mine got drawn!"

Sorun blinked at the bee, and then he turned his gaze down towards Espio with a flat expression. Espio decided to look away from Sorun's glare while coughing into his gloved fist.

"It suited our purposes well enough and nobody raised any objections," he defended in a low voice. "I would have you know that my idea was much less childish."

There was a loud scoff from Vector. "Yours wasn't any better at all! You wanted to play capture the flag."

"You be quiet." He pointed at the crocodile to make him quiet, and then turned his attention back to Sorun. "So yes. Essentially we're tasking you to hide somewhere. We'll find you and, depending on how long it takes us to find you, will instruct you on how to hide better the next time around. We'll do this for the next hour."

Seemed simple enough. Hide from the Mobians. At least he wasn't getting smacked by poles this time. "Alright. Sounds easy enough. So just hide anywhere?"

"Anywhere is fine," Espio nodded. "Just don't go too far away. We'll say within two-hundred or so feet."

"Okay. What if you don't find me?"

At that, Espio smirked. "We'll find you." For whatever reason, he began to shimmer and slowly fade away. "But please try not to make it too easy for us."

And then, he disappeared. Completely. Sorun was left with his mouth hanging open wondering what just happened before he opened his mouth in clarity.

"Ohhh, because he's a chameleon and they can change colors..." he slowly mumbled. "Wow, okay, so just straight invisibility." He turned to Vector. "So can all chameleon Mobians do that?"

"As far as I know, yeah," he said with a shrug. "You're on the clock, y'know."

Sorun didn't even widen his eyes before he set off running.

"Alright. They'll never find me here."

After a bit of searching, Sorun had found a hollow log nestled between a couple of fallen trees. Just big enough for him to fit in but also hidden well enough from the other trees that the opening to the inside of the log wasn't so obvious.

So obviously he'd chosen to hide inside of the log. A content sigh whistled out from his mouth as he sat back in his spot to stare up at the canopy of leaves right above him with his hands interlocked behind his head for cushioning.

Any peace he had was interrupted when a wooden shuriken flew in from nowhere and embedded itself into the wood next to his head.

Sorun yelled out in panic, and then shot right up into a sitting position with his torso leaving the log. Immediately after a saw a shape shimmer next to him, and soon enough Espio's body was revealed to be standing on one of the fallen trees next to him. His arms were crossed and he was giving the startled human a stern look.

"Try not to choose obvious places like that when hiding from an adversary," he advised the human. "Go find somewhere else and try again."

Sighing, Sorun gave the chameleon a nod and began climbing out from the log. "Yeah, yeah..."

"Leaf man. I'll be leaf man this time."

Sorun had always been one for ghillie suits, because the idea of hiding in plain sight using a suit camouflaged to look like the surrounding nature always seemed cool in his eyes. Unfortunately he didn't have a ghillie suit on hand to use in this situation, but he did have a ton of dead branches and leaves on standby all around him.

He didn't have anything to apply much camouflage to himself, either, so he stuck as many dead branches with leave in any crevices in his clothes he could find and then crouched down in a bush full of similar leaves. It wasn't long until after he'd hidden in the bushes before he heard a small buzzing sound. Sure enough, Charmy had flown into view and was hovering right over the spot Sorun had been standing before entering the bushes.

"Hm... HM... HMM..." The human found the exaggerated hums being made by the bee strange, but he began to feel excitement well up in him despite the breath he was holding when Charmy looked in all directions, including having directly stared at his bush, before shrugging and flying off.

Slowing exhaling, Sorun allowed himself a small smile of victory in successfully hiding from Charmy. This was cut short when he felt the bush he was hiding in rustle, and he found himself looking towards the source of the rustling before stopping dead at a pair of yellow eyes staring at him through the leaves.

"Boo!"

Sorun yelled out in surprise and tumbled out of the bush, his camouflage falling off him in the process. It wasn't long after that Charmy rose out of the bush, holding his hands to his stomach and laughing at Sorun's expense as the human scowled up at him.

"Ha ha ha! Nice try, Sorun, but you made way too much noise doing that," he told him. "You gotta be quieter."

"Mh-hm, yeah," Sorun grumbled as he rose up to his feet. "Thanks for the advice."

This time he'd found a giant pile of dead leaves. A pile that, upon looking closer, Sorun realized that he could easily fit inside of. So he'd dug a small hole out of the pile with his hands- going extra carefully as to not make too much noise- and slowly crawled inside. There was still an uncomfortable amount of crinkling from the leaves he was trampling, but eventually he'd managed to fully insert himself inside the pile.

A few minutes passed, and Sorun heard footsteps slowly approach him. He couldn't see anything in the darkness of the pile, but Sorun felt his muscles tense up and heard his heart beating in his chest as he heard the footsteps stop right in front of the pile he was hiding in. His heart soon feel when all the leaves were scattered away with a quick kick, revealing that it was Espio who had found his spot.

"You left the hole you used to enter open," he told him. "Don't leave evidence of your presence next time."

Sorun's face fell into the leaves. "'Kay..."

"Okay, let's try the bush tactic again."

After some searching he'd found some more bushes. Thick, numerous bushes all bunched together all nice-like. So thick that he wouldn't even need camouflage this time as long as he hid himself well enough.

And he needed to hide himself well enough soon, because he saw Vector coming his way. The crocodile hadn't noticed him yet, but he was walking rather fast and Sorun didn't have time to find another hiding spot.

So he'd entered the bushes, going slowly as to not make too much rustling to give himself away. It was right after he finally settled in his spot that Vector appeared in his vision, stopping right in front of the bushes. He crossed his arms, looked around the area, and then settled to looking down at the spot Sorun was hiding in much to his alarm.

"Those bushes are poisonous, you know," he called out.

"AH!" Panicked, Sorun jumped right out of the bushes and began to frantically claw the leaves off of his body. He continued to do so until he heard laughter coming from the crocodile, causing Sorun to pause and slowly look towards Vector. "What!?" he yelled.

"I-I was just kidding around!" Vector laughed, pointing at Sorun with one hand while the other held his head. The human's jaw dropped in response. "I didn't actually know if you were in there! I've been making up all kinds of stuff all over the hiding spots everywhere! I didn't know you'd actually fall for it!" He sighed, and then wiped an imaginary tear away from his yellow eyes. "Seriously, though, that wasn't half-bad. Just, uh, don't fall for something like that next time around."

Fuming, Sorun gave Vector a stiff nod and stomped away from him. "I'll keep that in mind," he grumbled out through grit teeth.

He hadn't even gotten two minutes into the next round before a wooden shuriken flew into the tree next to his head. Sorun sighed, and then turned to the direction the shuriken was thrown as Espio's form materialized to reveal the chameleon clinging to the surface of a nearby tree with his limbs.

"Lower your form," he instructed the teen. "You make less noise and you won't be as noticeable."

"Yeah, but that's really rough on my knees," Sorun complained.

"Rougher than being discovered by a Badnik?"

Sorun mumbled under his breath, but otherwise didn't disagree as he watched Espio disappear once again.

"Er, uh... Sorun?"

Sighing, the human turned around from his position hidden behind the large tree he was hiding against. He didn't even react when he saw Saffron floating in the air right behind him.

"I know, I know. Too out in the open," Sorun said out as he walked past the yellow bee.

The teen about had it right there after yet another wood shuriken flew into the ground between his feet.

"Oh, come on!" Sorun exclaimed as Espio appeared standing right in front of him. "What'd I do wrong that time!?"

"Your footprints," Espio said, and then pointed behind Sorun. The teen looked behind him and then noticed the small path he'd unintentionally made when he'd trudged through a large patch of dead leaves. Face abashed, he turned back to Espio.

"Alright, I'll give you that one."

Finally, and much to Sorun's relief, they decided to call the stealth training to an end. The group of five had reconvened near where they'd originally met up, and the four Mobians decided to all turn towards the sole human of the group to give him their critique. Critique that he was sure would be very harsh and not too full of praise.

He'd never been chewed out by a bumblebee before. At the very least it would be an interesting experience.

"Well, that was kinda fun!" Charmy began, his body hovering up and down in the air as he looked to Sorun. "And you weren't too bad, Sorun! You know, near the end. All that much."

"What he's trying to say is that you have a... semi-solid grasp of the fundamentals," Espio said, shooting Charmy a glare. The bee gave him a nervous smile and floated near to Vector, causing Espio to shake his head and look back to Sorun. "You're not great. Or good by any definition of the word. I don't mean to sound demeaning in any way but I'm being perfectly honest calling you decent seems a stretch-"

"Oh, what would you know?" Vector asked with a roll of his eyes. "I don't think Mr. I'm-a-ninja-that-can-turn-invisible can judge anybody on being sneaky. What would you know, anyways?"

Espio crossed his arms in a huff. "I'd know plenty," he muttered under his breath, looking down at his shoes.

"Anyways, Sorun, don't listen to them. Ya did fine," Vector assured the human while giving him a thumbs-up. "I mean, yeah, sure, you coulda done better. Like, way better. But for your first time not so bad."

The teen exhaled. "Boy, that sure means a lot, Vector," Sorun muttered out with eyes narrowed at the crocodile. "Thanks a ton."

"No problem, pal." Whether sarcasm was lost on the crocodile or not, Sorun couldn't tell, though he suspected it was the latter given that Vector had the cheek to go and wink at him after saying that. Sorun merely scoffed while shoving his hands into his pockets.

Okay, so being a stealthy person was a million times more hard than all the movies and video games made it out to seem. He thought maybe he'd at least be decent considering he'd managed to sneak up on that Egg Pawn the one time, but living beings were evidently much harder to sneak around than robots.

It wasn't a complete failure like the mobility training, at least. It wasn't a success either since Sorun had been caught every single time and never even made it past ten minutes once he actually began hiding, but it wasn't an absolute failure. And these people were nice enough. In their own ways. Once one looked past all of their idiosyncrasies. And they'd still volunteered all this time to help him, so he felt just the tiniest bit obligated to thank them.

"Well, thanks for the help with this, you guys. Even if I am mediocre," Sorun said as he rubbed the back of his neck. "Sorry if I didn't really live up to your expectations."

"You weren't that terrible," Saffron informed him, who had chosen to float next to Charmy. "I'm sure with a little bit of practice you could be even better."

"She's not wrong," Espio said. "We need to end it here for now, but perhaps later we could work on some other things. You're not completely hopeless." He paused, and then gave Sorun a small, sincere smile. "But don't let what I said make you lose heart. You're doing fine."

"Uh... right." Sorun waved at the group of four, and then turned around to leave. "I gotta head to the next training thing, but I'll catch you guys later. I guess."

He turned around too quickly to catch all the farewells they had given them, but he heard enough to get the message. All in all, so far it could have all been worse. Could have been a million times better, too, with him actually doing well, but at least it wasn't nothing. And everybody being supportive was probably one of the only reasons he hadn't outright given up yet. But they were nice people, those Chaotix.

Sorun tried not to think too hard about the fact that he was going to abandon them all to Eggman at the end of all this.

Sitting back on the kitchen table's chair, Sorun shot Sally with an incredulous look. "Tactics? I dunno, man, tactics ain't really my thing," he admitted. "Is it really that important?"

Sally, who stood at the other end of the table, placed her hands on her hips and gave Sorun a displeased look. "Yes, Sorun, believe it or not having a plan before jumping into the fray and knowing how to react to a variety of situations can be a life saver out in the field."

He saw where she was coming from, but he wasn't too thrilled about the idea. Thinking tactically had never been his thing. Never had the mind for it. He stayed away from all those Xcom games for a reason- he just plain wasn't good at strategy, real-time or turned based. But he supposed that in real life maybe having such a skill set was at least a little important.

Didn't stop him from not wanting to learn it.

"Don't people usually just let you handle the tactical side of things, though?" Sorun asked.

"More than I'd like, yeah," Sally mumbled under her breath. "But," she continued in her normal voice, "I'd like you to at least try, so we'll go through a bunch of scenarios that are likely to happen and you tell me how you'd best deal with it."

Sorun groaned, but otherwise gave the chipmunk a nod. "Fine. Hit me."

"Alright, we'll start off easy. Just you in front of a Badnik, and the Badnik is heading right towards you with the intent to kill. What do you do?"

"I stab the robot with a Summoned Sword," Sorun answered.

"Okay." Sally nodded. "Now what if it doesn't stop?"

"I stab it with a lot of Summoned Swords." Wasn't even a question. Sword didn't work? Use more swords. Easy math.

"Sure, that works. Now let's try a different Badnik, this one with a shield. What do you do?"

"I stab it with a Summoned Sword."

Sally paused, and then gave Sorun a questioning look. "Sorun, uh... for the sake of practice let's pretend the shield blocks your swords," she tried. "What do you do then?"

Sorun rubbed his chin in thought. "Stab it with a Summoned Sword... but, like, really hard."

He got the feeling that wasn't the answer she wanted to hear when he heard Sally slap her palm against her face. "No, Sorun, that isn't-" She stopped herself and took a deep breath. "The shield is impervious to damage. No amount of stabbing will hurt it. So what do you do in response?" When Sorun gave her a blank look, she tried giving him a hint. "Try to find a different angle to your problem," she said in a helpful tone. "There's more than one ways to deal with a problem usually."

"A different ang- ohh, I get it," Sorun realized as he tilted his head back. "'Cause swords can stab at different angles, yeah. I get it. So I stab it with a Summoned Sword but differently." Simple. Why hadn't he thought of that earlier?

"That's..." A forced smile found itself on Sally's face, and she gave the human a congratulating nod. "Yes, we'll go with that. Moving on..."

"A lot of the time we encounter a lot of locked doors since, you know, we're breaking into Eggman's places all the time," Rotor said as he used a pair of pliers to move around a bundle of wires set on the lab's table. "The doors are usually electronic, but more often than not they run on a closed-circuit system that can be bypassed. The hardest part is usually just getting the panel for the door control off, but after than it's just a matter of rewiring some things here and there to close the circuit off and trick the door into opening. You get that so far?"

Scowling down at the pretend door circuit Rotor had made for him, Sorun, who was sitting next to Rotor at one of the tables in the HQ's lab, murmured something unintelligible under his breath as he moved around a wire with his own pliers. "Mm-hm, yeah." There was a small zap and the human cursed under his breath as he shook his hand.

"Great, so," Rotor continued, "you gotta be careful not to cut the power supply, because otherwise that door isn't gonna open. That said, that's not always the case: if it's something like a magnetically-locked door you either need to get to some kind of control center to open it the right way, or you really do need to cut the power to knock the magnets out. Usually you can just pry open doors like that easy enough, but like I said, that's just for magnetically-locked doors. Eight times out of ten it's the kind of door that won't open without power, so you need to bypass it. Without cutting power. Because then it won't open. Unless you're somebody like Sonic, in which cause you can just go through the door. But you're not. So you need to bypass it."

"Yeah, so... the blue wire goes to the red wire... red wire goes to the... purple... wire..."

The walrus raised his eyes ridges and looked over to Sorun. "Uh, Sorun? There is no purple wire."

"Really?" There was another zap from the circuit as it shocked Sorun again, and the human rose bleary eyes up to meet Rotor's gaze. "You sure, 'cause they all... they're all kinda lookin' purple, man..."

"How many times has that thing shocked you?"

"Ah, you know... cou-... couple..." Sorun slurred. "I can't feel anything, Rotor."

Zap!

And just like that, Sorun fell out of his chair and onto the lab's floor. Rotor stared after the fallen human, sighed, and tiredly rubbed at his face.

"This seems a bit out of my league," Sorun grunted as he lifted the weighted bar above his head. "You guys know humans aren't as strong as Mobians, right?"

It was the main reason he'd wanted to avoid strength training. It was virtually useless since everything in the world was stronger than him by default. That and he was frankly too lazy to go through the endeavor if it had such little gain in the long run. But Knuckles and Mighty hadn't seen it like that, so they'd practically forced him onto a bench press they had in the training area near the woods and started making him lift a barbell.

He was only three lifts in and he already started to feel his arms give out. And there were only five-pound weights on each end of the bar. In his defense the bar itself was heavy.

"Sounds like excuses to me, Sorun," Knuckles said while rooting around in a box of weights.

" Biology isn't a good excuse?" Sorun breathed out as he lifted the bar. "Y-you can't be serious."

He heard a loud scoff from Mighty, who was standing right behind Sorun's head and acting as a spotter. "You know, you might actually see results if you bothered to drink that protein shake I made for you."

"That thing wasn't fit for human consumption," Sorun gasped out as he lifted the bar again. He looked to the side, and then visible blanched when he saw Knuckles approaching with a large, twenty-pound weight. "Hey-hey-hey, wait, what're you thinking!?"

"Oh, come on. You're not gonna get anywhere by lifting these little things," Knuckles claimed as he began slotting the weight into the bar Sorun was holding. "Relax, you're gonna get results way faster with this one."

"Knuckles, wait-!"

Sorun's warning came out too late, as the moment Knuckles slotted the weight in the barbell fell right down onto the teens neck. With his airway constricted, the he began making loud, choking noises as his feet wildly kicked up and down the table. The Mobians were quick to lift the barbell off of Sorun, who sat gasping for breath the second the bar was lifted off of him.

"So..." Mighty hedged as he awkwardly kicked at his feet, "are me moving to the dumbbells now, or...?"

Sorun fainted on the bench press before he could formulate a sarcastic remark.

Tails was watching Sorun with a critical glare. Sorun, sitting on the pilot's seat of the Tornado, was carefully looking over the controls of the plane with an intense look of focus. Finally, he took a deep breath and looked up to the fox leaning over the plane's windshield.

"... Raw."

"It's yaw!" Tails screamed out in frustration while grabbing at his ears.

"Is this really the best way to be utilizing your time at the moment, Sorun?"

The words reached Sorun's ears, and after a few moments he paused the game, set the controller down, and looked to the holographic lynx sitting on the couch next to him. "Look, I needed a break, okay?" he said.

Nicole set down her own controller and frowned. "I believe I was supposed to be instructing you in something to broaden your skills as a Freedom Fighter."

"Hey, you didn't say anything when I came up to you and asked if you just wanted to play video games instead." When the lynx continued to frown at Sorun, he sighed, unpaused the game, and pressed a button to cause a sprite on the screen to explode. "Oh no, Nicole, your K/D ratio."

Immediately Nicole scrambled to pick her controller back up and began playing the game again. Sorun chuckled under his breath and turned back towards the screen as he began using his own controller.

Tracing the ring drawn in the ground around them in tape with his eyes, Sorun regarded the cybernetic rabbit standing across from him with an unsure expression. "Yeah, I'm not really sure hand-to-hand training's a real good fit for me," he said. "I can't really damage a robot with my bare fists. It just doesn't seem that useful."

"Sho' it's useful," Bunnie argued with a shake of her head. "What's gonna happen if ya'll ever find yerself fightin' somethin' that's not a robot, huh? Like another Mobian? Then you'll be glad I taught ya this."

"Ah, then I'll still get torn limb from limb. 'Cause I'm human." He snapped his fingers and manifested a Summon Sword that floated at his side. "And I got these things, so I don't really see the point. It's not like they run out."

"Look, ya never know when this'll become useful later on, alright?" She rose her robotic arm and made a "come hither" gesture with her finger. "Now come ovah here and try hittin' me."

With a roll of his eyes, Sorun shattered the sword and walked over towards Bunnie. "Sure, but I still have a lot of objections towards this."

When Sorun had finally walked within an arm's length of Bunnie, he attempted to hit her with his right fist. It wasn't a particularly good punch, even by his standards. He'd put practically no power behind it and barely had the willpower to even raise it to begin with. He was still shocked when, in a flash of movement, the rabbit dodged to the side and grabbed his arm, and then did something that ended up with Sorun slamming onto his back on the ground. He wasn't sure what that something was, because it had happened so fast it had all been a blur to his eyes.

"Okay, lesson... one..." Bunnie trailed off and then dropped the arm she was still holding after she looked down at Sorun's dazed face. "Uh, you alright?"

"Relatively speaking, yeah..." Sorun said with a cough. He pushed his arms on the ground to lift his body up, and then looked up at Bunnie. "What even was that?"

"Ah, uh... ah I jus' threw ya. It's a standard takedown move."

Sorun nodded in vague understanding, and then closed his eyes and flopped back onto the ground. "'Kay, gimme, like, twenty minutes here before we start again."

It was safe to say that learning CQC from a cybernetic rabbit that threw him faster than he could comprehend was a fool's errand from the get-go, because by the end of the training session he wasn't even seeing straight. But at least Bunnie had been nice enough to lead him back to the HQ and promised him she'd go slower next time.

He wasn't really sure he wanted there to be a next time.

Crick!

"Mulligan," Sorun muttered.

Crick!

"Still warming up."

Crick!

"That one was defective."

Crick!

"I'll take that one."

"I only have so many spare lockpicks, you know."

Sorun paused in his actions, and looked up from the lock he was staring at to the white bat that was sitting on the desk next to him. He didn't have much to say about her. All he learned was that her name was Rouge, and that was as far as that introduction got before she lead him into her room, gave him a set of lockpicks, and gave him some basic instructions before sitting him down at a desk to watch him unlock a lock she had on said desk for him.

She dressed weird, though. Of all the observations he had about the bat, that was probably the only one he had concerning Rouge. She had these weird high boots and pants and this weird pink and white top that only covered her front. He didn't understand how a piece of clothing could make somebody covered it fur look revealing, but it did the job of both doing that and giving Sorun a headache thinking about it. So he tried to keep his mind off it and went back to trying to pick the lock.

The lockpick he was using promptly snapped with a crick! noise, and he grumbled under his breath as he tossed the broken pick into the growing pile at his side.

"What exactly are you trying to do there?" Rouge asked. "I've never seen somebody break so many picks trying to pick a lock. And that was the simplest lock I could find, too."

Sorun slowly exhaled, and then inserted a new lockpick. "I'm trying to find the sweet spot with the lockpick and then unlock the lock with the torque wrench," he muttered. That's how it always worked in video games, and he'd broken about a million picks in those situations, too.

He really hated lockpicking.

"... What sweet spot?" Rouge asked. "It's a lock. You're supposed to lift all the tumblers into the unlock position and then use the torque wrench."

"..." That did make a ton more sense when she put it like that. "Right," Sorun muttered, and then carefully position the lockpick deeper inside the lock. "So when am I ever gonna use this again?"

Rouge rolled her eyes. "In case you ever need to open something that isn't electronically locked."

Ask a dumb question... "Ahhh, of course. And where'd you learn to do this?" he absentmindedly asked the bat as he worked the pick.

"Around. You pick up a lot of handy things in my line of work."

Sorun hummed in response. It was a somewhat vague answer, but his focus was mainly on trying not to break another lockpick before he finally managed to open the lock.

His eyes widened when he heard a series of short clicks, and when he turned the small wrench he had in the lock it twisted all the way, causing the small latch locked on top of the lock to fall away. That really was easier than finding a nonexistent sweet spot.

"Hey, I did it," Sorun announced as he removed the tools from the lock and stood up. Rouge slid off of the desk, leaned over the lock, and then gave a hum of approval while giving the human a nod.

"Hey, yeah, look at that," she said in an approving voice. "You went through five lockpicks in the process, but I'll let that slide since it's your fist time. I'll give ya a solid D."

As far as he was concerned, that was a passing grade. He'd take it. "Good enough for me. Thanks for the help."

She nodded. "Sure. Come back some other time if you want and I'll get you a lock a that isn't beginner-level." A beat passed. "But good job learning how to pick a lock. The basics of it, at least."

"Er-"

"The door's over there," she said while nodding to the door in her room.

Sorun looked to the door, back to Rouge who was looking at him with en even expression, and then the teen began to move towards the door. "Yeah. Thanks."

He left the bat's room feeling more awkward than he had entering it in the first place.

"Explosives? Seriously? You want me of all people near explosives?"

"Ah, you need not worry, Sorun. Eet is not like you are the one making ze explosifs. You are just arming zem."

Sorun's incredulous eyes flicked towards the coyote, and then flicked back to the bomb set up on the table. He'd once again been taken to a large clearing near the woods, this one full of wood panelings and tables, where Antoine had showed him what he planned on teaching the human. In this case, arming explosives.

He couldn't even believe they were letting him touch a bomb, let alone mess with one.

"Also, eet iz just a paint bomb. Not so deadly at all."

Ah, that was why.

"Okay..." Sorun stepped closer to the table so he could look at the actual bomb. It looked about what one would expect a bomb to look like: Some tubes of paint connected to one plastic brick connected to another plastic brick via a bunch of wires that were all connected via even more wires to a small, digital clock taped to the front of it all. "So we're just going over arming, right?" he questioned. "No cutting any wires or disarming or anything like that?"

"Non, we will be disarming right after ze arming." Antoine turned around and walked towards a table that held a small toolbox. "Just let me grab something before we are getting started."

"Ah-huh." While Antoine's back was turned, Sorun leaned in closer to the bomb to examine it further. "It looks simple enough," he whispered. He saw a series of three switches next to the clock's digital display, and absentmindedly flicked the topmost one in the other direction.

This was a massive mistake, as the digital display lit up to life and displayed a countdown timer going down from thirty minutes.

"Uh-oh." Alarmed, Sorun quickly flicked the switch back into its previous position. To his growing worry, the countdown wasn't affected at all, nor was it affected when he tried flicking all three of the switches in various combinations. "Uh..." He looked closer at the bomb, and then noted a blue wire going from the countdown timer to a small, plastic box taped to the rest of the bomb that had a small lightning bolt painted on it. "Okay, that's the power supply feeding the timer, and according to Rotor those are important, so... pull that to stop the bomb?"

It seemed like a logical enough bet. No power to the timer meant it couldn't count down to zero and blow up. Sorun nodded at his answered, gripped the blue wire between his thumb and index finger, and pulled the wire out from the timer.

The timer went down from twenty-nine minutes to thirty seconds.

"Ooh!" So he'd been completely wrong for some reason he couldn't fathom. He stared down at the bomb with shaking eyes, and then whirled towards Antoine who was coming back with a pair of small clippers in his hands. "Antoine, I, uh... I turned the bomb on by accident."

"Huh?" His footsteps slowed, but then the coyote shrugged and continued at his usual pace. "Eh, eet is no big issue. We will just be moving on to ze disarming right away."

"No, you don't understand-"

"Eet is fine, Sorun, I am ze expert here. I put a thirty-minute timer on ze bomb, so we are in no danger."

The human teen bit his lower lip, and then in a split-second act of self preservation turned the bomb around and walked past Antoine. "Why don't you do it first?" he suggested as he made his way towards an empty table. "I'll just watch from over here."

Antoine's eyes trailed off after him in confusion. "If you are sure," he agreed with a shrug as he stopped in front of the bomb. "Are you sure you can zee from back there?" he asked, craning his neck back look at Sorun.

"Yeah, dude! Yeah!" Sorun was in the process of turning a table on its side, flat end pointed towards Antoine and the bomb. After turning it in the correct position, Sorun crouched down behind the table and poked his head up over the top to address Antoine. "Yeah, man, it-it's fine, yeah, don't worry! Just go for it!"

"Alright, then."

Sorun grit his teeth worriedly and hid completely behind the table.

"Now Sorun, when it comes to ze disarming of explosifs, you must be mindful of all parts and which bits are connects to which bobs," Antoine instructed as he turned the bomb to face towards. "First you will want to- SACRE-!"

BOOM!

Following the explosion something wet splat against the table Sorun was using to shield himself. The human breathed out, and lifted his head up right after to survey the damage. He winced when he saw that the table, as well as the entire area around where the bomb had been, was completely drenched in pink paint. He tried searching for Antoine, and his eyes landed on a pink, Antoine-shaped form laying on the ground that was blending in completely with the paint-soaked ground.

"Uh... oh, wow," Sorun mumbled as he stepped out from the table. He sheepishly walked towards what he assumed was Antoine's body, and then stopped right in front of it as he nervously chuckled. "Welp!" he said with a clap, "that, uh... about wraps it up, I think. You okay, man?"

He got his answer when Antoine's blue eyes, the only discernible feature in the mess of pink Sorun was looking at, opened up and looked right at the human. They narrowed considerably once they locked on to Sorun's own eyes.

Sorun, flinching from the intense glare the paint-covered coyote was sending him, weakly pointed in a direction away from the paint explosion. "Yeah, I'll, uh... go get some water to clean you off," he said before quickly running off.

The last person in the whole of the Freedom Fighters that Sorun had yet to meet until now had been a shorter, golden-colored squirrel named Ray. Seemed like a nice enough guy once Sorun had met him, if not a bit jittery. They hadn't talked all that much after meeting, but Sorun suspected that was mainly due to the golden squirrel being so timid to the point he stuttered in his words. It was what he observed, anyways, so he hadn't expected a shy guy like Ray's training to be all that intensive .

He was wrong.

"You want me to climb that tree?" Sorun deadpanned as he looked up at the large oak tree the pair had stopped in front of. A very large tree. Noticeably larger than most other trees in the forest around Knothole. He couldn't even see the top. "Okay, but why?"

Ray fiddled with the small, blue jacket he had on, and then looked up at Sorun. "W-w-well, climbing's important, r-right?" he stuttered. "Y-you never know w-when you might need to climb something, and if you f-f-fell while trying or something w-worse, that would be bad."

"... Sure," Sorun agreed with a small sigh. "I've never actually climbed a tree before."

"Oh, it's e-easy!" Ray said. "Here, just do what I do."

What he did was grab onto the tree and scamper up it at a rate that Sorun would expect from a squirrel. That is to say, inhumanly fast to the point that Sorun's eyes had trouble keeping up with him before he finally stopped a quarter of the way up the tree. He hadn't even used any of the branches to climb, either. He'd just used his hands to climb up its surface.

The teen looked down at his pale, human hands. He was fairly confident his fingers couldn't cling to a tree like a squirrel's.

"Dude, I'm not a squirrel!" Sorun yelled. "I can't do that!"

"... Oh." A look of realization crossed Ray's face, and he looked down briefly before pointing to a branch close to the ground. "O-okay, just climb up one branch at a time. It's l-like a ladder."

"Ladder. Sure. A really uneven and wooden ladder." Walking forwards, Sorun looked up at the branch right above him, leaped up, and grabbed the branch with his hands. He tried pulling himself up, failed, and then planted his feet on the tree and tried pulling up while pushing against the tree and walking on its surface. This proved to be much more successful as Sorun had finally managed to make it to the top of the branch, breathing moderately heavier as he looked up at Ray.

"Hey, you're d-doing it!" The squirrel flashed him a thumbs-up. "J-just keep going a-at it like that, okay?"

Sorun nodded, and then looked towards a series of branches next to him that lead further up the tree. These branches were clustered enough together than he actually was able to use them as a ladder, and slowly but carefully his feet down on them. He pressed his weight down on them to test their integrity, and with a satisfied hum he grabbed the branches above him, and then pulled his body up while planting his feet down on any branches he passed.

"Okay. Alright, yeah, this is pretty easy," he thought as he continued climbing. "Yeah, I got this."

"That's the way!" Ray cheered as Sorun climbed past him. "Now make sure th-that you're sure of your footholds and that you don't grab any weakened or d-dead branches, because you might-"

Snap!

Ray's words were cut off when a branch snapped off the tree and fell past him. Unfortunately, said branch had been a branch Sorun had been holding on to, and following the branch was Sorun's screaming body as he fell past Ray. The squirrel looked after him in fright, but reflexively closed his eyes when he heard the human's body hit the forest ground. He slowly opened them and heavily winced when he saw Sorun lying flat on his back at the foot of the tree.

"... Sorun?" he weakly called down. "Are you okay?"

"... Ow..."

So far today he'd been battered, beaten, and electrocuted in all sorts of different ways, and while the only physical evidence of any of this was bruising all throughout his body, it still hurt. On the bright side, he only had one more training session to go through today. One more and then he was done and he could hopefully sleep all this off.

The downside was that it was with Shadow.

"Oh boy, here we go..." Sorun morosely thought as he stepped into another clearing of forest used for training. This one was was full of wooden crates stacked everywhere, though for whatever reason there were quite a few charred spots on the ground and some burned pieces of crate scattered around in some areas. In the middle of all those crates was Shadow, who had crossed his arms and was staring intensely at Sorun as he waited for him to arrive. "So how bad is this gonna get?"

He still didn't know what Shadow's deal was with him, and frankly, Sorun was too scared to ask. He couldn't hate Sorun completely- he wouldn't have made that suggestion to Sorun about a weapon otherwise. Looking back, Sorun didn't even know if there was any hate in any of the words the hedgehog has said to him. It sounded more like displeasure than anything else, and he had no idea what that meant.

It didn't help that Sorun got the impression that he was a bit of a social pariah, either. Bits and pieces of gossip he'd picked up around suggested that Shadow just wasn't a friendly guy in general, though most of this had come from Sonic. Unfriendly, but also not directly antagonistic against everybody. Kind of like Sorun himself now that he thought about it.

Well, at least they had something in common. Too bad Sorun didn't know what to make of it, or what to make of the black and red hedgehog in general.

"Hello." The greeting the dark hedgehog had given him was a lot more subdued than Sorun was expecting. He stopped right in front of Shadow, who looked Sorun's body up and down with his crimson eyes before scoffing. "You've certainly been busy."

"Yeah, it's been a rough day," Sorun agreed. "So what are we doing here in crate land? Don't tell me you're gonna have me stacking boxes or something."

Shadow shook his head. "No, nothing as inane as that." He tapped his fingers against his elbows. "You have Chaos Control."

Sorun cocked his head to the side in confusion. "I... don't know what that is." He heard it mentioned back when that Chaos Emerald had been stuck to him, but he'd never asked on what it actually was. He just knew it was something Shadow could do.

"The ability to manipulate Chaos energy."

"... I guess?" In response, Sorun made a Summoned Sword appear at his side. "I mean, if making these things counts as Chaos Control, then yeah, sure, I have Chaos Control."

Shadow cast an inquisitive look at the floating, blue sword. "Would you mind if I held that for a moment?"

Why did people keep asking to hold his sword? "Sure, here." He grabbed the sword and tossed it to Shadow, who caught it mid-air and immediately went to inspecting it. He was examining it rather thoroughly, too, with the way his eyes were scrunched in concentration as he ran a hand along the spectral sword's surface.

Finally, Shadow sighed and tossed the sword back to Sorun, who let it go so that it would float back at his side. "How did you make such a technique?" Shadow demanded. "I understand the composition of the blade, and I can even discern how much Chaos energy was used to produce it, but I can't understand how you create it."

He wasn't so sure "because I liked a certain series of video games" was going to be a satisfactory answer to Shadow, but he didn't have anything better than than the truth. The truth he really didn't want to divulge for petty, personal reasons. Vague answer it was. "I don't know what to tell you, Shadow. I absorbed a Chaos Emerald and got this power out of it. I didn't put any thought into it; it just happened." He looked to the side at the sword. "It looks like Force Edge, though, so there's that."

Shadow hummed. "And what exactly is Force Edge?"

"It's a sword from back on Earth," Sorun cryptically answered. "I always really liked it, so I guess I just... subconsciously made the power." He turned back to Shadow. "That's all I got for you."

"I see. Subconscious." Shadow closed his eyes in thought, and then opened them back to Sorun. "Well, regardless of how that power came to be, I'm the only real expert on Chaos Control around willing to help you train that power."

Sorun stiffened. He stiffened so hard that his concentration broke and the sword besides him shattered.

Oh, no. He wasn't going to have somebody walk in and tell him how to use his Summoned Swords, even if it was Shadow. It was his stolen power and he was the only one in this whole world who'd ever seen it used properly. Shadow even outright admitted he couldn't make Summoned Swords of his own, so what would he know?

"Shadow, I know how to use my Summoned Swords," Sorun told him. "I don't need help in that regard. If anything I need help in literally everything else but the Summoned Swords."

"Really?" Once again Shadow crossed his arms. "So you, a human who has never even heard of the concept of Chaos Control before today, are suddenly an expert on Chaos Control?"

"No. But I am an expert on Summoned Swords."

"How so?"

Sorun sharply inhaled. Keeping their true origins hidden really was becoming a pain for him. "Because I just know how they work, okay?" he said. "What makes you such an expert on Summoned Swords, huh? You haven't even seen them until today and you're over here tellin' me you know more about them than I do."

"I gleaned plenty from just looking at it a moment ago." After saying this, Shadow held up his right hand. Greenish-yellow energy began to crackle around his hand, and Sorun stepped back with widened eyes as a bolt of roiling green energy that was vaguely shaped like a spear formed in his hand. "This is a Chaos Spear," Shadow explained to him. "It's a basic technique of Chaos Control, and much like your Summoned Swords, it's a weapon as well as a projectile."

He turned his back to Sorun in order to face a pile of crates, and without any hesitation, Shadow threw the bolt of energy at the pile. The second it made contact the Chaos Spear exploded in a large fashion, and the whole pile of crates was practically vaporized from the release of energy.

That done, the dark hedgehog turned back to the human, who was staring wide-eyed at the spot where the crates had once been.

"Compared to my Chaos Spears, your Summoned Swords are incredibly weak. They have no power behind them," he declared.

Sorun's eyes snapped back to Shadow, affronted. "That's not true at all."

"Then prove it. Throw a sword at one of those crates and prove me wrong, human."

"Alright, I will." Right as Sorun said this a Summoned Sword appeared at his side, pointed towards a crate near the back of the training area, and shot forwards towards the crate. The sword made contact, but unlike the Chaos Spear, the sword merely embedded itself into the crate's face.

Admittedly, a sword that stabbed into things was a lot less impressive than a spear that blew up now that Sorun saw it first-hand. A practically microscopic, pleased smirk formed on Shadow's face when he saw comprehension flash through the human's features.

"As I said. No power," he said. "It's not a completely useless ability since they can still cause damage, but don't presume that they are even close to the level of a Chaos Spear."

"Hm." Sorun slowly nodded. "Yeah, I guess. Hey, how many can you make?"

"What?"

"How many Chaos Spears can you make?" Sorun repeated.

Shadow furrowed his brows in confusion, but obliged the human and made another Chaos Spear in his hand. "I can only make one at a time," he answered. "Though with a Chaos Emerald, my abilities are amplified. I could make even more at once if I had one in my possession."

Interesting bit of information, but the one-at-a-time bit really had Sorun interested. He grinned. "That so?" Four Summoned Swords appeared at his sides. "You wanna guess how many of these I can fire off?"

Understanding was slowly coming to the hedgehog's eyes, causing them to narrow. "I would assume four based on the number of swords you have floating around you."

"Hah. Nope."

Sorun began firing his swords one at a time towards the crates in front of him. As he did so, however, a new sword would reappear to take the place of one that was fired, only to shoot off again soon after once the swords around it had fired. The rate at which the Summoned Swords were flying away from Sorun at such a rapid pace was almost akin to a machine gun, and it was only after ten full seconds of a rapid onslaught of swords did Sorun stop making more.

By the end, the field of crates in front of the two was filled with hundreds of Summoned Swords stabbing into crates. A second later, the hundreds of swords had shattered, though the sheer amount of small glass pops added together made it so that all of the crates were blown to pieces from the combined small explosions. Sorun was looking at the devastation with a smug smirk while Shadow's was much more subdued yet irked from the way his eyes were so narrowed.

"Yeah, sure, ya got me beat in quality," Sorun admitted as he turned to Shadow, still grinning. "But who needs quality when you can just chuck a million swords at a dude's face?"

"... I see," Shadow breathed out, voice strained. "Well, since you're so confident in your proficiency with those swords, then why not put them to the test?"

With a eyebrow raised, Sorun watched as Shadow walked further into the training area, around twenty feet away from Sorun. He stopped, and then turned back around to face the human.

"Here's what we will do: I want you to try and hit me with at least one Summoned Sword," Shadow instructed. "If you can so much as scratch me, we'll call your training with those swords complete."

Sorun's lips flattened in suspicion. That sounded almost too good. "That's it? Just hit you?"

"That's correct," Shadow confirmed with a nod. "But don't think I'll just stand here and take it. We'll treat this as a real combat situation. That is what this training is all about, after all." His strange, metal sneakers scraped against the ground as the hedgehog's stance slightly widened. "So don't come crying to me if you get hurt."

A dry chuckle left Sorun. Fight Shadow and win by scratching him with a Summoned Sword? Honestly, part of him was terrified from the prospect, but the part of him scared of Shadow was overridden by the desire to prove to him that his Summoned Swords were just as good as his Chaos Spears, if not better. The desire to correct that insult was just too great, and the idea of cutting training short by cutting him was even more enticing.

He just couldn't resist the offer. Sorun nodded.

"Okay, Shadow. I'm game." Four Summoned Swords appeared at his side. "Wellll... I've never actually done this before. But I've got the swords. Vergil's swords. If I have his swords, then I can use his moves then, right? His Spiral Swords and Storm Swords... Blistering Swords and Heavy Rain Swords... I played with them all back on Earth enough to know how they work. Since the Chaos Emerald let me get away with stealing Summoned Swords, I'll just steal the moves, too."

Might have been a bit scummy, but pride be damned. He didn't care how lame it was as long as it worked. And it wasn't like anybody on Mobius was going to be able to call him out on it.

"Why don't I start us off, then? We'll go at- three-two-one-go!"

A single sword shot off towards Shadow with as little warning as Sorun could give. The hedgehog frowned, and then lazily stepped to the side as the sword flew past him. "I'd be worried if you're already resorting to petty tricks," he said as he affixed Sorun with an unimpressed expression.

In response, more and more swords began to fire off towards Shadow. Unfortunately for Sorun, the hedgehog was dodging all of them, and even worse still he was making it look easy. No matter how many sword flew towards him Shadow would almost fluidly dodge past each and every one, whether it be just stepping around them, dodging under them, or jumping and flipping over them. And not only was he avoiding them with ease, but with each dodge he was coming closer and closer to Sorun.

"Man, he's fast. Jesus HE'S FAST!" Sorun thought as the dark hedgehog began to rapidly approach him. Eventually, Shadow decided to dodge out of the stream of sword altogether and began running at Sorun from a different angle. The swords floating next to Sorun pointed towards him and began firing in the new direction, but this proved to be a futile effort as Shadow had dodged all the way to the other end of Sorun's vision while still moving closer. He continued to zig-zag his way towards Sorun while dodging any swords thrown at him, causing Sorun to scowl in frustration. "Alright. Let's try this."

The sword stopped firing altogether, and the four next to Sorun shattered. Shadow saw this as an opportunity to rush forwards, and with interest Sorun noticed that the bottom of his shoes began emitting flames like a jet engine. The jets at the end of his shoes propelled him forwards faster than Sorun had expected, and to his bemusement the way Shadow was moving with the shoes while moving his arms in an out was reminiscent of someone ice skating.

Well, ridiculous-looking or not it was propelling him right towards Sorun just like he wanted.

Right when Shadow was nearing Sorun, the telltale bring ! sound of the Summoned Swords appearing rang out. This time, however, it was eight swords. Eight swords that surrounded Sorun in a circle and pointed outwards as they all rapidly spun around Sorun's body. Shadow had nearly run right into the deadly ring of spinning swords, but he'd stopped right before making contact, and then backflipped a fair distance away much to the human's disappointment.

Sorun made a "tsk" sound as Shadow landed back on the ground. He'd almost had him that time, too. "I call this one Spiral Swords," he called out to Shadow before looking down at the Mobian's shoes. "You-you seriously have rocket shoes? For real?"

Shadow scowled he he straightened up to his full posture. "They substantially increase my mobility."

"Pfft, sure, if you don't mind looking like a figure skater when using them."

He actually looked genuinely insulted by that remark. So much that, in a movement so fast it was indiscernible to Sorun's eyes, he'd curled up into a ball and began spinning. Spinning so fast that he became a perfect black and red sphere in a move that was eerily familiar to Sorun.

"Hey, isn't that Sonic's...? Oh, he's pissed," the teen realized as Shadow's spinning body jumped up into the air, only to change directions midair and fly down directly towards Sorun. "He's going over the Spiral Swords. Well, let's see if he can dodge Blistering Swords while in the air."

Eight more swords, four at each of Sorun's sides and all perfectly lined up on top of each other, appeared and moved around in unison as their tips tracked Shadow's body. They all fired, going two at a time in pairs, at speeds that were even faster and more rapid that the normal swords Sorun fired. As the swords approached him, Shadow unrolled out of ball form and used the momentum he'd built up by twisting his body out of the paths of the swords. He'd dodged them just as they past by him, and then he briefly activated his sneakers so that the jet of flames would push him past the eight swords circling Sorun.

"Okay, he can," Sorun thought as Shadow rolled to a stop on the ground. "Aaaand Blistering Swords right into Storm Swords."

Once again, eight swords appeared in a circle. This time, however, they appeared circling around Shadow, and unlike Sorun's circle of swords they were all pointed inwards and towards Shadow. The hedgehog scowled, and then attempted to jump up and over the swords circling him. His scowl deepened when the circle of swords followed him and perfectly maintained their positions even as he jumped away and landed in a different spot.

"You can't outrun those ones," Sorun called out. "Hurry up and get scratched so I can go home already."

The eight swords spinning around Shadow began to slow down. The hedgehog had twitched his body slightly to the side, and his eyes slightly widened when he saw the swords hadn't twitched along with him. Right as the eight swords pulled backwards, he jumped in the air. After his feet left the ground the eight swords shot forwards and passed through the one spot he'd been standing previously before they all continued to fire outwards.

The hedgehog landed back on the ground, and then turned his head towards a surprised Sorun. "So, they stop tracking right when they fire off," he observed.

Sorun slumped his shoulders. "Yeah, I was really hoping you wouldn't figure that out." The swords circling protectively around Sorun all shattered at once, and more swords began firing away from him and towards Shadow as he began to back up. "None of this is working against him. He's too good. And the only thing I have left is Heavy Rain Swords, but there's no way that's gonna work! He figured Storm Swords out in like a second! Wait, hold on." As the continuous stream of swords continued to fire from the four positions at Sorun's sides, he manifested yet another sword into his hand. "Why am I limiting myself to just Vergil's moveset? Dang, it's my power now technically. Can't I just do whatever I want with it? I mean, jeez, Dante did some pretty creative stuff with them when he got his Summoned Swords in Five. And I kinda need creativity right now."

When it boiled down to their intended use, Summoned Swords were supposed to be a utilized as a utility, nothing more. Their original user in those games had used them as a tool for stunlocking and manipulating enemy positions so he could continue combination attacks; they weren't intended to be sole damage dealers. But Sorun didn't have a magic weapon to attack with, and even if he did he didn't have the strength, speed, agility, or even raw skill to use it. So Summoned Swords was all he had to fall back on.

But without that crucial piece, without the fact that he couldn't actively attack, they were little more than projectiles that had very limited and set patterns. That may be fine for fighting mindless foes, but against Shadow they were proving more and more useless, because he was either just dodging them or he was figuring out the patterns he was using and avoiding them thusly. He was too smart for these to work, and too fast to boot. They were too slow and too predictable.

Sorun needed to be unpredictable. The opposite of what he was doing right now.

Fortunately the fifth game in particular had a character just like that he could gank from.

While Shadow continued to slowly advance on Sorun while dodging the swords being flung at him, Sorun slowly began to back up as four more Summoned Swords appeared floating behind his back. "Okay, Dante. Don't fail me now."

The swords firing from Sorun's sides ceased. At the same time, the four blue swords floating at Sorun's back began to spin around like helicopter blades. They flew out from his back, all four spinning blades heading right towards Shadow. His crimson eyes widened slightly, but right as the spinning blades reached him he dodged and flipped over every single one.

That would have been the end of it, too, if the four rapidly rotating blades hadn't turned around and flew back towards Shadow. The hedgehog dodged the four swords again, but no matter how many times he dodged they would round back on him in an attempt to cut him over and over.

Grunting in frustration, Shadow clenched his hand around a newly-formed Chaos Spear and threw it just as two of the spinning swords approached him. They were close enough that when the Chaos Spear impacted it flew through both, destroying the pair of swords while exploding on the ground behind them. Realizing they could be broken, Shadow immediately whirled around with another spear in his grasp and threw it at a third sword, and then a third spear at the fourth sword.

He allowed himself a satisfied breath once the final sword was shattered. Afterwards, though, his ears perked up as he heard a whirling sound right behind him, and he spun around and slid to his knees just as four more spinning swords flew over him. He rose up to his feet, and then grit his teeth as the incensed hedgehog laid eyes on Sorun.

The human was sitting down in what looked like a lawn chair completely made of his Summoned Swords. His hands were interlaced behind his head, and he was grinning cheekily as the four rotating swords spun in a circle around him. "I can throw these things all day, you know!" he reminded Shadow as the spinning swords were flung towards him once again.

"C'mon..." Sorun thought as he watched Shadow destroy the swords with more Chaos Spears. "Ugh, he's getting mad like I wanted, but he's not actually losing focus."

That'd been his hope, at least. To throw Shadow off as much as possible that he would make the smallest slip and get cut by the sword, because unpredictability wasn't cutting it, either. The only reason he'd even bothered with the chair was for the hope that the mere sight of something so ridiculous would make him stumble just a single step.

Well, he was getting more mad, alright. But the problem was that, if anything, Shadow's focus was becoming even sharper for it. Because while he wasn't reading the Round Swords as well as he had all the other swords, he was still adapting to them well enough by destroying them.

Correction: had adapted to them. The swords were all shattered now, and Shadow had turned his burning gaze towards Sorun. The only warning Sorun got of his next move was the loud, grinding vreee! noise he heard before Shadow, once again in spinning ball form, launched right towards Sorun.

The teen looked worried at the approaching ball of destruction, but otherwise remained sitting in his lawn chair of swords as Shadow approached. Before the ball hit him, four blue swords crossing their blades in a diagonal pattern appeared right in Shadow's path, with the swords acting like a shield as the spinning ball ground into it. Unfortunately for Sorun, the momentum of the spinning hedgehog was so great that Shadow remained suspended in the air, spinning against those swords. Worse still was that the four swords acting as a shield were beginning to crack.

This time Sorun did jump out of the chair right as Shadow smashed through the four swords and crashed into the sword chair, destroying it. "This isn't working, either. Screw it, I'm using everything."

Before Sorun was even to pick himself up, Shadow was right on top of him as he ran out from the cloud of blue particles that had once been the lawn chair. When he was mere inches away from Sorun, a blue sword appeared by his side and jabbed forwards towards Shadow. He dodged away, but continued to eye the sword as, instead of flying away, it returned to Sorun's side. Three more swords appeared at Sorun's sides, and all four continually jabbed forwards at Shadow in random patterns. The hedgehog dodged all of the pointed jabs, though, and carefully watched the swords until he found an opening to approach Sorun.

Right as he moved to capitalize on this opening, however, the four swords swung out at Shadow. He flipped onto his hands and pushed himself away as the four floating swords followed and swung at him in random arcs and in random directions, and leapt away entirely when all fours swords lined up into a large sword and swung at him.

He landed on all fours a large distance away from the swords with a huff, but then froze when he noticed a large amount of blue light reflecting off the ground. His striped head looked up just in time to see twenty Summoned Swords suspended in the air above him, and all pointed directly down. He jumped just outside of the cloud of swords, and had done so just in time as all the swords rained down to impale the ground he'd been standing on right as he moved.

But, as he was sliding backwards after dodging away from the cloud, he noticed a tinge of blue light appear in his peripheral vision, and clenched his teeth upon realizing that he'd been forced to turn his back to Sorun to dodge away from the falling swords. But right as he attempted to correct this-

Slck!

- a single Summoned Sword flew right past his cheek, just barely nicking him. A nick made by the passing blade that had left an incredibly thin, red line on his tan muzzle. He slid to a stop and quickly touched the spot with his hand, and brought it to his eyes to examine. The small amount of red left on his white glove was immediately recognizable

"... Whoa, wait." All the Summoned Swords that had been summoned shattered away, and Sorun's eyes lit up with surprise as the elated teen jumped up to his feet. "Holy- I actually managed to cut him! Ha ha! Oh, man, I can't believe I did it!"

His expectations for himself had been low to begin, and while he had definitely wanted to win he'd gone into it knowing it was a long shot. But he'd actually managed to win, and it had sent such a great feeling through Sorun that he was lightly laughing at the sight.

Shadow, by contrast, looked anything but happy. In fact he'd clenched the stained glove, and then glared towards Sorun with an absolutely infuriated expression.

And then his disappeared.

Sorun wasn't exactly sure what happened. It wasn't that Shadow had moved; he'd simply disappeared from the spot he'd been standing in and had reappeared in the same moment in front of Sorun with his foot pressed against the human's chest. By the time Sorun even registered he'd been kicked, or that Shadow had even changed positions somehow, he was sent flying backwards and right into a crate.

The teen's body smashed right through the wooden box, and he ended up on his back and coughing due to the fact the wind had been knocked out of him. After a few seconds he managed to suck in a large gulp of air, and then held an hand to his aching chest as he looked up at Shadow, who was standing right above him. "Man, I thought we were done once I hit you," Sorun groaned out as he sat upwards.

The burning eyes aimed down at Sorun softened considerably when they saw the human coughing and wheezing on the ground. Shadow turned his head slightly, and then held out a helping hand to the teen. "My apologies. I... was not expecting that. You surprised me."

"I surprise you, so you kick me?" Despite his irritated tone, Sorun still took the offered hand and allowed the hedgehog to help pull him up to his feet. "What even was that?" he asked him. "You went from standing over there to kicking me."

Shadow looked back towards the spot where Sorun was gesturing to with his hand, and then looked back at him. "One of the benefits of Chaos Control is that I can momentarily stop time," he explained. "It's a rather strenuous ability compared to my others. But you cut me, so-"

"You can stop time?" The angered tone was gone from Sorun completely, and Shadow could only look in confusion as the teen eyed him with awe. "Dude, I thought that was just teleporting, but that's even better! Why didn't you lead with time stop if you can do that!? I never would have beat you if you used it!"

"I was... holding back for your sake," Shadow uneasily answered as he stepped back. "And I can teleport. I just chose not to."

The teen's eyes only widened even further. Time stop, teleporting... Shadow really did have a lot of amazing abilities. The kind of abilities Sorun would have taken a hundred times over for Summoned Swords. The kind of abilities he wasn't even sure were physically possible like a lot of other things he'd seen, but apparently Chaos energy worked miracles.

But even so, he had to wonder how he'd even beat Shadow. Then he registered what had been said and shot Shadow an incredulous look.

"Holding back? You flipping and spinning all over the place was holding back?" Sorun gasped out. "Man, I barely managed to nick you with all that alone! It took everything I had just to do that much!"

"Well, I didn't want to make it too easy for you. That said, it wasn't even my intention to get hit in the first place." Shadow rose his fingers to brush the wound on his cheek. There was a small, green glow that left the tip of his gloved fingers, and when he removed them the small scratch was gone entirely. "I'm truly sorry for the kick.

I was out of line. I just... I really wasn't expecting you to land a hit on me, and I reacted too rashly."

Sorun breathed out, and then shoved his hands into his pockets while looking away. "Yeah, well, I guess I didn't really help all that much," he muttered. "I, uh... I kept taunting you because I was trying to get you to make a mistake, so it's mostly my fault you were so mad."

"I still should have had more self control than that." He glanced towards Sorun. "It was a good effort, but I'd advise against such a strategy in the future, Sorun. Robots aren't ones to be affected that much by taunting, and it's a waste of energy that's better spent in the fight against anybody else." He lowered his head and sighed. "That won't stop a certain someone from trying, though."

"Sonic?" Sorun guessed.

Shadow nodded. "Yes, him."

He wasn't surprised in the slightest. "Hey, speaking of which. That Spin Dash move. Isn't that technically Sonic's move you're copying?"

Shadow's face immediately picked up from the ground, and he looked almost insulted at what the teen had said. "The Faker can claim he devised it first," he said, "but I'm still the older one. If anything, he's copying me."

"How old are you, anyways?"

"That is something you needn't worry about." Shadow blinked. "Perhaps another time."

Sorun shrugged, but otherwise didn't press the issue. Shadow's age wasn't nearly a pressing issue as what he had told Sorun.

He'd held back. Severely, if he really was handicapping himself by not using all of those abilities of his. Come to think of it he hadn't so much as thrown a Chaos Spear directly at Sorun, but he doubted Shadow had intended to grievously harm him during a single training session. He couldn't hold that against him. He could hold the kick against him, but from how Shadow looked almost embarrassed over the kick, Sorun assumed it genuinely was an accident.

But still. He was happy he won, but he didn't know how much that victory meant if Shadow had been holding back. And he wanted to know.

"So when you say you were holding back," Sorun began, "how much were you holding back?"

Shadow looked back to him with surprise. "Less than you're probably thinking," he informed him, which brightened Sorun's mood. "Just because I was holding back on my powers doesn't mean I didn't put in considerable effort into dodging all of your attacks." A beat passed, and he crossed his arms. "You're... quite adept at controlling those swords," he noticed. "More than I would have expected considering how you only acquired the ability a short time ago. I'd go as far as to say you're a natural at handling them."

Chuckling, Sorun bashfully looked to the side as he rubbed the back of his neck. It almost sounded like praise, and something like that was one of the last things he expected from somebody as stern-sounding as Shadow. "Ah, well, I had some pretty good reference material."

"I don't know if I would be so pleased over a single scratch."

Sorun's face fell as he looked back towards Shadow, though his face picked back up when he saw the small smirk on the hedgehog's face. "Yeah, yeah. Do I get the Shadow Stamp of Approval, then?"

"As far as going into live combat with those swords? You should be fine," Shadow said with a nod. "As long as you're with somebody and nothing unexpected pops up, those swords should service you well enough."

"Oh, cool." That was a relief. Sorun had been left wondering how much a single scratch really amounted to, but apparently against somebody like Shadow a single scratch went a long way. Even if he had to pour maximum effort into inflicting such a minor wound. A minor wound he apparently could heal in an instant.

Well, he never saw Egg Pawns display a level of agility even near Shadow's, so maybe he had a point in that he would be fine. At the very least Shadow sounded like he knew what he was talking about, and Sorun was more willing to trust him than trust his own logic which over the course of his stay on Mobius had been spotty at best.

"Tell me one thing, though," Shadow requested, with said request rousing Sorun from his own thoughts. "How do you manage to manipulate those swords like that?" he asked. "One pattern in particular, the one where you protected yourself by surrounding yourself in swords, caught my eye. I just wonder how you're able to move all of them without physically touching them."

How he managed to move the Summoned Swords around? Great question- Sorun wasn't so sure of it himself. "I dunno, they just kind of do what I want," he answered. "I think it and, oh, they go do it."

"I see." A look of thoughtfulness crossed Shadow's face, and he fully turned away from the human. "As agreed, I'll let you go now," he said. "You've given me much to think about, and I'm sure you'd rather be somewhere else right now. Should you ever need more help with your abilities, you know where to find me."

"Er, sure thing." Sorun almost gave a nod to Shadow, but stopped himself when he realized the hedgehog wouldn't see it. "See you later then, I guess."

Still nothing from the black and red hedgehog, who looked deep in thought. Sorun decided to leave it at that and left the training area.

Finally, it was dusk. The signal of the end of the day that also signaled the end to all this hellish training Sorun had been subjected to throughout the entire day. A day that was ending with him leaning against the cobblestone wall at the bottom on Freedom HQ's hill that the door was connected to.

It was a day that had gone about as well as he expected. That is to say, it went terribly. But his mind was less occupied on everything he failed at- because he knew he'd be terrible at all that from the get-go- and more focused on the one aspect of training he expected to go well. And while he had technically passed it, it was anything but well.

Sorun wasn't very confident about his Summoned Swords after his bout with Shadow.

They were intended for utility as opposed to direct offense, he understood that. But that was in-game logic, where he could throw dozen's of swords at an enemy's face and not have it affected in the slightest just because it barely even whittled its health bar. But this was the real world, where so much as a single sword going through somebody's face would be more than enough to deal with them. He'd hoped that difference alone made up for the fact Summoned Swords weren't designed to be a sole source of offense.

Shadow proved that woefully wrong.

Bombard him with swords? He'd been too fast.

Try to use complex but set patterns against him? Shadow had dissected them all in the heat of the moment and avoided them all.

Try to trip him up with unpredictability? Shadow was too adaptable.

Try to falter him with taunts? It wasn't exactly ineffective if the kick said anything, but the hedgehog's discipline made it so that any results of such an endeavor were practically negligible if not detrimental.

In the end, the human teen only won because Sorun had given up and had just decided to throw everything he had at Shadow all at once, and even then he probably only landed that scratch due to the sheer dumb luck of accidentally forcing Shadow to turn his back to him for a second. He hadn't even planned for that- it had been a happy accident. One he had capitalized on, sure, but that wasn't exactly a strategy he could rely on in the future.

Sorun didn't doubt that the swords would be effective against the cumbersome robots he'd seen thus far. Shadow even lead credence to the fact they'd be usable against them. Anything beyond them, though? Anything stronger than basic fodder? Sorun wasn't so sure. Not when at his absolute best Sorun had only managed a single scratch against Shadow, and that was with a Shadow that was holding back for his sake. And while he didn't know where to put Shadow when using him as a benchmark to gauge the rest of the Freedom Fighters, Sorun had enough sense to know that he likely couldn't beat any of them with just Summoned Swords, either. People like Knuckles or Mighty would probably just punch his swords away. Sonic? Sorun wouldn't even pretend at thinking he could ever hit him with a sword- he was just too damn fast. The rest of them? He was sure they'd find ways around them. So what did that say for any foes they were going up against?

They weren't enough is what it said. What happened if he ran into something and couldn't beat it with Summoned Swords alone? Sorun couldn't imagine what they could possibly be, but there had to be enemies of such power if the Freedom Fighters were at the losing front of this war. Enemies roughly equal to them in power on Eggman's side; it couldn't just be through sheer numbers the fat man was winning, Egg Fleet or no. What would happen if Sorun had to fight one of those adversaries? What if somebody wasn't there to help him? He'd likely die in a situation like that.

"Power... I need more power..."

He shook his head. That kind of thinking hadn't done Vergil any good, the game character whose power the Chaos Emerald had given him. It'd lead him to a ruinous fate, even if he did become somewhat redeemed at the dead-end of the series. It wouldn't do Sorun any good, either, seeing as every new power he got from an Emerald would cost him twelve years of life. And at that point he'd be playing right into Aurora and Athair's wishes.

No. He'd find some other way. He didn't know what way, but he'd find it.

But that was for later. He was just so done with today and wanted to go to sleep. He couldn't go just yet, though, because Sonic wanted to go home with him and Sorun was too weak to refuse. And even if he tried walking back on his own Sonic would just catch up anyways.

Soon, though. Soon he'd be able to go to sleep, forget about today, and hope it wouldn't haunt his dreams in place of all his other nightmares.

"Sorry for taking so long!" The door to the HQ burst open and Sonic walked out, closing the door behind him. "Had something to talk about with Tails. So..." He stopped in front of Sorun, and scanned his green eyes up and down the teen's body. "You had quite a day, huh?"

Rolling his eyes, Sorun pushed off the wall and began the familiar walk back to Knothole. Sonic was walking right besides him. "That's one way to describe it," Sorun replied. "My way is a lot more explicit, but we'll go with that. Yes. I've had 'quite a day', Sonic."

"So how'd it go?"

Dryly chuckling, Sorun rose his hands up to count off his fingers. "Well, I failed in just about everything everybody tried training me in. I came out of Shadow's training alright, but that was more of an outlier than anything else." He extended his fingers as he began counting. "I got no physical aptitude whatsoever compared to you guys, I can't get flying down, I can't sneak for jack, tactics are way over my head, and I'm pretty sure the electronics in the lab are conspiring to kill me for some reason. Also, I blew Antoine up. He's fine by the way." He looked away from Sonic. "Pretty sure, at least," he whispered.

"Well, you passed Shadow's training. That's a plus, right?" When Sorun looked back to the blue hedgehog, he saw a supportive smile dominating his features. "I actually overheard him tell Rouge he was impressed with you. That's the highest possible praise you could have gotten out of anybody considering how high his standards are."

"Yeah, I got one pass out of I don't even know how many fails. Woo-hoo." There'd been the lockpicking, too, now that he thought on it, but he didn't know if breaking all those picks to open a single lock even counted as a success. He remained quiet on the subject.

"You don't gotta be so hard on yourself, you know." Sonic stepped closer to Sorun and gave him a friendly jab with his elbow. "Nobody's expecting you to get any of this stuff immediately. I mean, we've all been doing this since we were kids. Of course we'd look so good when we've been doing all this practically our whole lives."

He had a point, but it wasn't enough to get Sorun spirits up. "Yeah, I know, but I don't have years to gradually learn everything like you guys with the whole Eggman problem." He looked down at his bruised body. "And I really don't think I can do another training day like this. I'm barely staying awake here."

"Look, you're trying, and while it's not great progress, it's progress. You're doing the best you can, so you shouldn't worry about it," Sonic reasoned. "Besides, we're probably not gonna be able to do something like this again anyways. There's missions we all gotta run, but most of the time there's somebody around. It'd go a long way if you could just ask somebody every once in awhile for help in something."

Sorun doubted he would unless he was bored enough at first, but as long as he didn't have to run through a literal gauntlet like today and it was just little one-off sessions, the idea sounded appealing enough. Surely it would be better on his body considering he wouldn't spend an entire day on it. And he did need the help.

"I'll think about it." They'd be brief thoughts, but they'd be sincere ones.

"Great. Any hey, you finally met everybody!" Sonic gave Sorun not just one, but two thumbs-ups. "I heard people talking, just so you know. Everybody was pretty pleased to meet you. Only had great things to say, and they're all happy you're trying."

"Mm-hm."

"So what do you think of them?"

"They're fine enough, I guess." Considering the bleak future ahead of them he was trying very hard to not grow attached to any of them, so he was void of any serious compliments towards any of the Freedom Fighters. "I don't have any problems with them."

"So... what you're saying is that you don't dislike their company..."

Oh, he saw were this was going. It was another attempt by Sonic to goad him into friendship. Sorun wasn't having it. "You think your mom'll make her pancakes tonight?" Sorun suddenly asked. "I could really go for those pancakes."

Sonic's mouth froze, and then he rose an eye-ridge in confusion. "Pancakes? At night?" he asked. "Really?"

"Come on, man, after the day I had?" He wasn't even joking; he really wanted those pancakes. He was starving for anything, really, but the pancakes made by that woman were out of this world.

Sonic blinked, and slowly made a smirk with his mouth. "Gee, I dunno, Sorun." He interlocked his fingers behind his quills. "Pancakes at night? Sounds kind of like a friend-only kind of dinner. If we were friends that'd totally be okay, buuuuut...!"

"I'll pass then."

Sonic's arms fell limply to his side, and he regarded Sorun with a frown. "Seriously, Sorun? Still? After all this?"

"I already told you. We're not friends," Sorun said. His eyes remained locked forwards, but when no response from Sonic came he looked over to him and saw an alarming mixture of a sad frown but determined eyes. "You're really not gonna give up on this, are you?"

"Not until you tell me what's bugging you so I can help."

"It's not happening, Sonic." He'd already tried, after all. It hadn't gone so well for his heart. "I just wanna focus on getting the rest of these Emeralds."

"Okay." With a huff, Sonic crossed his arms. "Be that way, then."

"I will."

"Fine."

"Fine."

"Swell."

"I'm not playing this game."

He huffed even further, but remained silent right after. Sorun allowed himself a small, victorious smirk as he looked forward to enjoying the rest of the walk home in peace. Too bad that he passed out from exhaustion halfway there, forcing Sonic to carry him the rest of the way back before he deposited him in the spare bed.

A/N- Jeez, so I planned out the whole "training chapter that also served as a little introductory to the rest of the characters" chapter to give Sorun some development and to introduce everybody who hasn't been introduced at once so I didn't have to bother with it later and move right into the development, but it ended up taking way longer than I thought it would. Well, that and to show off the limits of Summoned Swords, which basically amounts to "they're good, but in Sonic World they ain't that good".

On another note, I've decided to take on a semi-active role down here in the Author's Notes section in regards to Stardown, who's been a real big support to the story, who asked about the inclusion of the rabbit child and her weird blob pet named after coagulated milk in the story. Short answer is that they were in the OG Archie universe I'm working in, so I don't see why I wouldn't. As for the fact I'm adding Sonic characters that weren't in the OG Archie universe, I'm not naming names, but at the same time it's not really that many. There's one character from the games exclusively in particular I'm adding in that may be a bit iffy, but for what I have planned I have to put that character in. But those are long-term goals that'll be set up in the short-term.

Answering questions in the A/N isn't really something I've done before, but I'm trying new things with this story so I'm open to answer any questions I see in reviews from anybody in a non-spoiler fashion if I so choose. Just throwin' that out there.

That's all, I out.

Chapter 15

Recursion Error

Episode 15- Baby's first foiled evil scheme

The monotony was setting in.

A whole week following the "Pain Day", as Sorun liked to refer to it, absolutely nothing noteworthy happened. Were exciting things happening in the outside world? Probably: Sorun noticed a lot of the resistance fighters leaving and coming back every single day after that day. Was he involved in any of it? No, he wasn't. Which suited Sorun just fine, but damn was he bored.

Not that he hadn't been busy. Every now and then somebody would have some free time, and if they just felt like it they approached Sorun- and that was another thing starting to happen, the other Freedom Fighters approaching him of their own volition- and would ask if he wanted to brush up on the skills they were trying to teach him. He of course always said yes to avoid looking like a flake. Had he made any significant improvement during that time?

No, not really. It wasn't zero progress exactly, but it wasn't stellar progress, either. And that was just on the mental and skill side of things. Physically speaking that really was going nowhere. Except for the cardio- Sonic still had him on that hellish running regime. And Sorun would admit that maybe he was breathing just a little bit easier after each run, but it was still extremely slow progress.

But that was all then, and this was now. Chilling in the HQ's living room. Again . Because the only places in Knothole he was actually comfortable going to was here and Sonic's house, because he really doubted he was welcome at the castle and he REALLY didn't want to go back to that nightmarish boutique Honey owned. Anywhere else was completely new and foreign to him, and while going around and meeting the other people that lived in Knothole was an option, he didn't want to. That rock incident was still fresh in his memory alongside the abandonment plan.

So without anywhere else to go, he was here at the HQ once more. But these underground walls were growing dull. And almost everybody was out on missions.

"Hey, Sorun!"

"Mm, hey, Sonic," Sorun said with a wave as the hedgehog passed the couch. It wasn't as if he could do anything better with his time. Running was about the only physical exercise he could tolerate and he'd already done that for the day. He was pretty sure Tails was around, but he heard mention that he was gonna be busy doing maintenance things on something or another. Only other two people left were Sonic and Shadow. He didn't want to bother with either.

Jumping up off the couch and heading towards the kitchen, Sorun couldn't help but wonder about the sporadic pattern everybody was always deployed it. The decision of who went where to do what was usually decided by Sally, and when he asked her she had said something about rotating all the Freedom Fighters regularly because of this and that and other tactical reasons that had largely went over his head. Why-

"Hey, Sorun."

"Hey... Sonic?" Sorun mumbled as he looked away from the fridge and towards the end of the kitchen. Sonic was passing by the entrance and waved at him, and the human slowly waved back at him. "Didn't he just...? Weird." He shrugged and opened the fridge.

Why so many just happened to be gone today, though, was something he'd paid mild attention to when the matter had been brought up. Multiple attacks everywhere, low-level threats across the board, nothing anybody couldn't handle and so everybody but the three Mobians left behind went because it was their turns to get rotated out in Sally's management system that was borderline arcane in its complexity.

She took Nicole out with her, too, when Sally left with everybody else, so he didn't even have anybody decent to play games with.

"Ah, man, I dunno." He walked to the edge of the kitchen and sipped at the bottle of water he'd taken from the fridge. He idly looked towards the right when he saw some movement. "Eh? What's Sonic doing?"

The Mobian in question was walking through the door leading to the HQ's lab. Which in of itself was odd. Sorun had been in there multiple times. There wasn't anything interesting in there but all of Rotor's and Tails' science projects and the computer that the Freedom Fighters used. The thing was, for as little as Sorun actually cared to learn about Sonic, one thing he had noticed was that, while he knew how to use one, Sonic wasn't that big a computer person. And unless somebody was in there he wanted to talk to Sonic never entered that lab.

Maybe it was out of curiosity, or maybe it was out of sheer boredom, but whatever the case Sorun decided to follow the blue hedgehog into the lab.

So that's what he did. He set the water aside, walked to the lab door, opened the lab door, and walked through the lab door. His eyes immediately locked onto the back of the lab, towards where the computer was. Sonic, oddly enough, was standing there and looking around for something while clenching something in his right hand.

Strange.

"Uh, Sonic?" The hedgehog stiffened and whirled around towards Sorun, who stepped behind him with a puzzled expression on his face. "Whatcha doin', man?"

"Oh. Sorun." The human's dark blue eyes traveled down to the object he'd noticed Sonic holding prior. It was a flash drive- a black flash drive with a red something emblazoned on it, though Sorun couldn't see it fully since Sonic's gloved hand was covering it. "What are you doing here?"

Sorun continued looking at the drive, then looked back up at Sonic. "I just noticed you wander in here," he answered. "What are you doing here?"

"Hm, ah, you know. Stuff."

"Stuff, huh?" He looked back down to the drive. "What's with the flash drive?" he asked.

"... Sally asked me to copy some sensitive files we have off the computer," Sonic answered in a level tone.

"... Sally," Sorun repeated. "Sally, who left for a mission this morning."

Sonic nodded. "Yeah, she asked me before going. I'm just getting it to it now, 'cause ha, I'm so scatterbrained sometimes, you know?" He made a circling gesture with his finger near his head. "She just wants a backup of the files on this computer in case something ever happens so we don't lose everything."

That didn't sound not reasonable. Sorun couldn't imagine what kind of logistics the files on that computer held, but he knew that Sally and Nicole used it a lot. Seemed odd that she'd choose now of all times to make a backup of all those files- Sorun would have thought somebody as practical as her would have backed them up sooner. But maybe she backed them up regularly and this was just another scheduled backup. Sorun would assume it was something Nicole took care of, but then again she was out with Sally and Sonic was here. And everybody trusted Sonic.

Sounded legitimate to him.

"Alright," Sorun said with a shrug. "You need help with something? You look a little lost."

"Yeah, you know where the slot for the drive is on this thing is?" Sonic asked. "I can't find it anywhere."

"It's on the side of the keyboard there," Sorun said, and then pointed at the small, rectangular slot at the side of the keyboard installed onto the computer console.

Sonic smiled, and then held up the flash drive up as he turned around to slot it in. "Ha, great. Thanks. Been looking everywhere for this."

"Yeah, no prob-" Sorun's voice caught in his throat, and he narrowed his eyes considerably when he got a better look at the red etching put on the black flash drive.

He'd seen that symbol before. Back on that Egg Carrier when he, Sonic, and Tails had gotten that blue Emerald. It'd been stamped right on the side of the ship's hull. A red cartoon sketch of Eggman's face.

That didn't look right at all.

"Hey, Sonic, how come you're using the most evil-looking flash drive ever to get those files?" Sorun asked, the hands inside of his pockets suddenly clenching.

Sonic froze, and then slowly turned his head over his shoulder to look at Sorun. "It's just tech we salvage from the field," he said. "Lot more efficient to recycle parts already there than to make our own. Say what you will about Eggman, but his tech's top-notch."

Alright, that tore it for Sorun.

"Wow, that's probably the first time I've ever heard you compliment the man," Sorun commented. It really was, too. Sonic had a lot of things to say about the evil Doctor, and not once had Sorun ever heard any of those things be positive. A suspicion started growing in him. "I mean, last night alone when we were having those awful chili dogs you keep forcing on me for dinner you went on this whole tirade about how much you hate the guy."

"I can't hate a guy and compliment his stuff?"

Well, that was strike two and three right there. Two because they didn't have chili dogs for dinner the previous night and three because he didn't go on any sort of rant like that. Sorun was tempted to add a fourth strike just for the fact Sonic hadn't even reacted when he called chili dogs awful. He practically revered those things for some reason.

"Is this... not Sonic?" Sorun silently wondered. "Nah, that's... that's too crazy. Is it? This is Mobius." He blinked. "Ah, man, pretty much anything is fair game in this zone for how weird everything is."

But this was outlandish even by Mobian standards. Or was it, considering everything else? What was this compared to alien invasions and time-stopping talking hedgehogs? Was it actually him being paranoid or was he actually right here?

He didn't know. What he did know was that something wasn't right, but he couldn't well prove what. So he'd do the next best thing: be a bit active.

"You know, Sonic, you're not the greatest with computers," Sorun drawled as he moved his eyes from the flash drive to the computer. "You might screw something up. Why don't you just let me make those backups?"

The hand holding the flash drive protectively clenched around it. "Pretty sure Sally asked me to do it, Sorun," Sonic said with an icy edge to his tone.

Okay, second best thing, then: wait. "Theeeen... let's just wait for Sally," Sorun suggested. "She'll be back by, what, around nighttime? Maybe a bit sooner? What's gonna happen to that computer from now 'til then, really?"

Sonic rolled his eyes and turned to the computer. "Sorun, come on, I know what I'm doing," he claimed as he moved the drive towards the slot. "Don't you have anything better to do than come harass me about-"

The drive never made it to the slot, as a blue, spectral sword appeared right in front of the slot and blocked Sonic. The hedgehog sighed, and then turned around to Sorun.

"Just a few hours," he continued, eyes narrowed completely at Sonic. "What's the harm?"

"Sorun. Dispel it."

Sorun looked the the Summoned Sword, and then back to Sonic. "Nah, don't think I will," he said. "How about I just go get Tails?" he suggested. "Tails is better at computers than the both of us. He wouldn't even be bothered."

"No. Dispel the sword." He flashed the human a smile. "Come on. It's me. Don't you trust me?"

Making a "tsk" noise, the teen slowly shook his head. "Trust's a strong words. Bit stronger than what I would use." And that applied to the Freedom Fighters as a whole.

The two teens stared at each for what was possibly the longest possible minute, until eventually Sonic sighed and slumped his shoulders. "Alright, alright. I don't know what's got you so riled up, but we can wait. Fine." He raised his hands up in a surrender gesture, and in response the sword covering the slot shattered. "We'll wait for Sally. It's all good."

As he walked past Sorun, the human held a arm out to stop him. "Mind if I hold onto that drive?" he asked.

"A little, yeah," Sonic answered. When Sorun didn't lower the arm, he sighed and held the flash drive up. "But whatever, Sorun, fine. You can have it if you want it. I'll take it back later."

"Sure. Sure thing." Sorun snatched the drive out from Sonic's hand. The hedgehog didn't say anything more, and simply turned his back to Sorun and headed to the lab's door to leave. Sorun silently watched the hedgehog's spiked back as he left, humming and rolling the drive in his hand.

"Alright, where's Tails?"

Of course the first place Sorun went to look for the fox was in the most obvious place that first came to mind: on the airstrip, near the hangar working on his plane. He did find the plane, but there was no two-tailed fox in sight of it.

It seemed kind of odd to Sorun considering the young fox spent so much time around that plane.

"He's not here?" Sorun muttered under his breath. "Where else would he be? Ah, don't tell me he's at home. I don't know where his house is."

"Hey, Sorun."

The teen jumped, and then spun around. He let out a relaxed sigh when he saw it was just Tails who had seemingly inadvertently snuck up behind him.

"Ah, Tails. Scared me there," Sorun greeted.

"Heh. Sorry about that. So what's up?"

"Nothing much. You seen Sonic lately?" he asked.

Tails nodded. "About half an hour ago, yeah. Why?"

"He act, I dunno... kinda weird to you?" Sorun asked. "'Cause I just ran into him messing with the computer at HQ because Sally asked him to make some backups of the files on there."

"Yeah, she does that sometimes," Tails informed him. "Sonic didn't act so out of the way to me. He asked me for the computer's password, but that was it. I figured it was for something like that."

Sorun cocked his head to the side. "Wouldn't the password to the computer be something Sonic would already know?" He hoped Sonic would know the password. With something so important like that computer he would think that everybody in the Freedom Fighters would know the computer's password in case anybody needed to ever access it for whatever reason.

Then again, Sorun didn't know what the password was, so what did he know?

"Well, you know Sonic. Him and computers- egh. Doesn't really surprise me the password slipped his mind," Tails explained. "What did he do that was so weird?"

"He tried slotting this into the computer." Sorun held up the flash drive to Tails' eyes. "I saw the Eggman logo on the side and figured, you know, maybe we shouldn't slot something from the evil technology man into the computer. He said he was just using it because you all liked recycling tech, but-"

"That's not true at all!" Tails exclaimed, eyes widening in shock. "Sure, we'll scrap things for parts if we ever need them, but we never take anything intact past parts! You can't trust anything Eggman makes, brilliant pieces of work that they are aside."

Sorun rose an eyebrow at that last comment, but waved it off and instead handed the fox the small drive. "Well, could you take a look at it?" he requested. "I dunno, something about it seems off. Might be the fact Eggman's face is on the thing, but the way Sonic was acting with it just didn't seem right."

Because he didn't know if it really was Sonic, or some weird... Sonic impostor. Or Sonic being mind controlled by an evil flash drive or something. Hell, for all he knew the hedgehog was just having an off day and he was just being too paranoid. But something about the way he acted and the Eggman logo on that flash drive set off too many warning flags in Sorun's mind to ignore. And what was he supposed to expect from this wacky world? He needed a second opinion on this.

Tails blinked, and then blankly looked down at the flash drive that had been handed to him, almost as if he was in disbelief. He slowly closed his fist around it and let out a small chuckle before looking back to Sorun. "Sure thing! I'll go to the lab right now and go take a look. I'll get back to you when I'm done."

"Awesome, great." Sorun waved Tails away as the fox walked off towards the HQ. "That Tails. Such a dependable guy. It's almost enough to make me forget he's the one that grabbed me and pulled me through that portal." He wistfully sighed. "Almost."

He didn't know what the deal with that flash drive was, or what Sonic had to do with it or why he'd been acting so off, but maybe Tails could coax some answers out of it for him. He was good with technology after all. Way more than Sorun at least. He'd just break it if he tried. Tails, though? Kid was a genius.

"Well, now what to do?" Sorun thought as he interlocked his fingers behind his head. "Could try talking to Sonic about the lab thing. Nah, probably not the best idea. I'll wait for Sally to get her input on it. Yeah. That works. But what am I supposed to do until then?"

Skrrt!

The sound of something grinding to a halt right behind Sorun caused him to wince at the harsh sound, and he immediately turned around to see just what that noise was. But any annoyance he had was completely placated when he saw it was Shadow who stopped right behind him.

The angry scowl he had on his face was scaring Sorun.

"This is the last time I do a personal favor for you, Sorun," he said in an angry tone. "She didn't even have any clothes for me to deliver to you."

"... Huh? What favor?" He didn't remember asking Shadow a favor. He would have remembered digging up the courage to do such a thing. It would have been a memorable moment.

"You asked me to go to the owner of that clothing shop for your laundry." Shadow shuddered- actually shuddered- after saying that, and Sorun felt all his misgivings for Honey justified. "If I ever have to deal with that fiend again it'll be too soon. She tried measuring me."

"Yeah, she does that," Sorun attested, "but I never asked you to get my laundry."

Shadow paused, and a slow breath left his nose. "What?"

"Dude, I do my own laundry. And by that I mean Sonic's mom does my laundry," Sorun explained. "I only ever go to Honey when she sets up my next outfit because I made the mistake of making this weird sponsorship deal with her for clothes. Or sometimes she finds me. She does what she wants, really."

"Then why did you come to me half an hour ago and ask me to pick up your laundry from Honey because you were too busy doing something important with the Faker?" he demanded.

"Because I... didn't?" Sorun tried. "This is the first conversation I've had with you all day."

Shadow's eyes narrowed. "I thought all the injuries you sustained from last week healed. Don't tell me there was lasting brain damage affecting your memory."

Sorun opened his mouth to respond, closed it because that remark actually stung Sorun a bit, and then opened it again. "Hey, man, come on, I don't have brain damage."

"Hmph." In response, Shadow crossed his arms. "I'm finding that more and more difficult to believe." He glanced behind Sorun. "Let's just ask him what was so important you sent me on such a pointless errand."

"I don't know where you're going with this," Sorun said as he began turning around, "but I'm telling you, I didn't-"

Sonic was behind him. He seemed very puzzled and was flashing his eyes back and forth between Sorun and Shadow, but he was there. And for some reason Tails was next to him and was as equally confused as the hedgehog next to him.

That didn't seem right.

"Hey, what's going on?" Sonic asked before Sorun could get a chance to open his mouth. "Shadow, we saw you running over here. What was so important that you needed us?"

Now it was Shadow's turn to look confused, and he showed it when he regarded Sonic with furrowed features. "Excuse me?"

Tails stepped forwards. "You walked up to me about ten minutes ago while I was working on the plane and asked me to get Sonic. You said you needed to talk to us about something," he explained.

Sonic nodded. "Yeah, so what was so important you decided you needed to talk to us?"

"I never did such a thing," Shadow denied as he shook his head. "I wasn't even anywhere near Tails ten minutes ago. I was occupied dodging a deranged cat with a tape measure."

"I don't know if you noticed, Shadow, but there ain't a lot of other black hedgehogs with red stripes running around," Sonic said, "so unless you're saying Tails is colorblind or something-"

"Faker, I am telling you-!"

Any further words between the two was drowned out as the conversation devolved into a conversation unintelligible by the two bystanders idly watching them. Sorun was watching the display with a nervous look on his face while Tails looked almost bored at the heated interaction between the two hedgehogs.

"They always like this?" Sorun asked Tails.

With a sigh, Tails nodded. "They have a really competitive history," he informed him. "They never let it affect their work, but it really does feel like they spend all their time together trying to one-up each other."

"Ah." So it was one of those rivalries. Sorun supposed he could relate- he had a somewhat similar rivalry with David concerning video games. It rarely turned into yelling like this, though. "Hey, what happened with that flash drive?" Sorun asked as the thought suddenly hit him. "Did you already examine it? Because man, you work fast."

One of Tails' ears twitched in confusion. "What flash drive?"

"... 'What flash drive?'" Sorun repeated in his head. "What does... that wasn't even five minutes ago I gave him... wait, if Tails was with Sonic looking for Shadow," he thought as he looked towards the arguing pair, "and Shadow's saying he saw me when I know I didn't see- ohhhhhh I see what's going- oh, goddammit- OH SHIT THE DRIVE!"

Dammit, it all made sense. He'd seen it in so many cartoons and comics that he couldn't believe he didn't see it sooner. That weird interaction he had with Sonic twice this morning, the weird way Sonic was acting, the weird way Tails talked about Eggman and acted around the drive, the sheer confusion everybody was displaying... the only possible explanation that correlated with all these events was if something was going around pretending to be everybody.

A shapeshifter. Or something that could mimic people. A shapeshifter that was trying to access the HQ computer. Probably sent by Eggman if his logo being on the drive meant anything.

And Sorun had taken its flash drive away only to give it back twenty minutes later.

"Damn, I got played." An irritated sigh left him as he pinched the bridge of his nose. "Alright, guys! Shut up, I know what the problem is!" The arguing between the two ceased, and the two hedgehog's snapped their heads towards him while Tails continued to stare at the human with a tilted head. "We... might have a shapeshifter problem."

"A shapeshifter?" Sonic repeated. "Ha!" He barked out a single laugh. "Sorun, come on, isn't that kind of... a stretch..." He slowed down as the realization hit. "Oh wait, yeah, that actually makes sense. Uh-oh."

The revelation came to Tails and Shadow at relatively the same time, with the former growing a worried expression while the latter's face tightened to nearly a vicious glower. "Sorun. Explain," he ordered as he turned towards the human, the other two doing the same.

"Okay, look, I saw Sonic this morning. Twice. Around twenty-five minutes ago." Sorun glanced to Sonic. "You said hi to me twice."

Sonic shook his head. "I said hi once. You were on the couch!" His jaw dropped. "Oh, man, I think it really is a shapeshifter."

"And then," Sorun continued, "I saw Sonic go into the lab. I followed him, and I saw him messing with the HQ's computer." He didn't like the pit that formed in his stomach when he saw all three Mobians stiffen. "I asked what he was doing, and he said that Sally asked him to backup all the files on the computer."

"No, that isn't right," Tails said. "Nicole always handles that side of things. She wouldn't have asked Sonic." He sheepishly glanced away from Sonic. "And honestly, that's probably for the best."

A beat passed, and Sonic glanced towards Tails. "Hey, what's that supposed to mean?"

"Focus," Shadow snapped. "Sorun, what then?"

"I noticed that the flash drive he was trying to use had Eggman's logo on it. I got really suspicious afterwards when he said straight-up incorrect things," Sorun said. "I didn't let him put the drive in and took it away, convinced him to wait for Sally so we could straighten this out."

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Sonic slump his shoulders in relief. "Oh, that's good," he breathed. "You still have the drive, right?"

Sorun grimaced. "I... did until I gave it to Tails to examine..." he trailed off as he looked down at the very captivating dirt ground.

He heard Tails gasp besides him, and he could almost feel the rage roil off of Shadow. "You gave it back the flash drive!?" Shadow yelled.

"Hey, you can't say squat!" Sorun countered as he rose his head back up. "I'm the only one that even noticed there's a shapeshifter in the first place!"

The dark hedgehog didn't have a response to this, and if anything Sorun statement just made him angrier as he turned his own eyes down to the ground.

"That isn't good," he heard Tails mumble. "That computer has everything on it, guys. Our data files, notes, some of our plans and strategies, Rotor and I keep some our project files in there... if Eggman gets that-!"

"Bad, yeah, we get it," Sorun finished.

Really bad, actually. Cripplingly bad by the way everybody looked so grim. One of the things Sally kept drilling into him in those strategy lessons of hers was how the information war was just as important as the actual war, if not more so. He didn't know exactly how significant the files on that computer, but if it was so bad everybody was reacting like this, then it probably meant that Eggman getting them would be disastrous. Fatally so.

Game over if he got the files, then.

"That flash drive likely has a program Eggman wrote to steal all the files from the computer," the fox continued. "Could be a worm program, or... I dunno, I'd have to look at it, but we can't let that shapeshifting... whatever it is get those files back to him if it really is from Eggman!"

"Well isn't that computer encrypted or something?" Sorun questioned. "You can't tell me you guys have something so important without some means of defense."

"Yeah, Nicole triple-encrypts the computer constantly," Tails supplied, "but if that flash drive really does have a program written by Eggman, at best those encryptions will slow the drive down when it tries to access the computer. Unless..." Suddenly, the fox's face fell. "Oh, I was wondering why you wanted the computer's password so bad, Sorun..."

Ah, he never asked for such a thing! "Okay, we gotta get to the HQ," Sorun decided. "Faster the better, we might still have time-"

Before he could even finish Sonic and Shadow shot off towards the HQ in blurs of their respective colors. Sorun's mouth hung open as his eyes trailed after the blurs, and then he sighed and looked back to Tails.

"Hey Tails, can you carry me back? I-I'm not fast like them."

Tails couldn't fly nearly as fast as those hedgehogs could run, but even still the speed he could fly in was such a higher magnitude of speed compared to how fast Sorun could run at his best that it may as well have been the same difference between fire and water. It was fast enough that when they got to the HQ they just caught Sonic and Shadow heading in, which alone was a good enough indicator of how fast he could fly. And that was while carrying Sorun in his arms.

Sorun was pretty sure he had whiplash by the time the fox set him down on the ground. The panic of a shapeshifter breaking into the computer managed to keep his mind off it for the most part.

Surprisingly, they managed to reach the lab entrance just as Sonic and Shadowed entered. Everybody's eyes locked right onto the computer, and then widened when they saw the figure standing in front of it. Sorun's eyes probably widened the most, though, seeing as he was watching himself mess with the computer.

It was definitely him, too. Same height, same skin, same hair, and even though his back was turned to him Sorun could recognize he even had on the same clothes that Sorun did. The most alarming of all was that he was removing that Eggman flash drive from the computer.

"Thing jacked my face," Sorun angrily thought as four Summoned Swords appeared at his sides. He was halted from firing them, however, when he felt Shadow roughly shake his shoulder.

"Don't. You might miss and hit the computer," he whispered.

Sorun scoffed, but he relented and made the swords shatter. At the same time, the Sorun lookalike turned around as it made to make it out of the lab.

He, or it, froze when the he and-or it saw the four of them standing between whatever it was and the exit. The only sound that could be heard besides their own breathing was the low buzz of some of the machines around them, and the fake Sorun standing in front of them remained completely still as they all glared at him. And then he pointed an accusing finger at the true Sorun.

"... Wow, guys, you caught the impostor!" The real Sorun felt his own jaw drop when he heard the shapeshifter say that in his own voice. He was actually trying to fool them all again. "I noticed something was off with Sonic this morning when he-"

"Dude, you're not fooling anybody," Sorun interrupted. "Give us the drive."

Not-Sorun rolled his eyes. "What, so you can come back later and steal the files yourself with it? Fat chance of that." He looked towards the three Mobians around Sorun. "Guys, he's playing you all for fools. It's a mind game. He intentionally told you about himself to give himself credit so when you ran into me it makes it look like I'm the-"

With his tolerance for this nonsense reaching its absolute limit, Sorun re-summoned the Summoned Swords to his sides. "Hey, if you can make these, too, then we can play this game. How about that?"

Not-Sorun blinked in surprise. The other three Mobians continued to glare in hostility at him, and he shrugged. "Well, worth a try."

He then proceeded to melt.

It was a quick process. So quick and so unexpected that all four of them had reeled back in shock as the fake Sorun's skin and clothes dissolved almost instantly into a silvery, liquid substance that disappeared and receded into the body under all of it. And that body? A robot. A robot that was practically a stick-like skeleton with silvery limbs and a torso that was little more then a flexible tube, and a spherical head with two red lights for eyes and a circular speaker for a mouth. It rose up its flexible, needle-like fingers that was holding the flash drive, looked at the four, and then went and actually screeched at them in a horrible, metallic-sounding scream.

The scream had been loud enough that the three Mobians and sole human were forced to cover their ears, and in that one moment the machine looked up towards the leftmost wall, where there was a small grate near the ceiling. The shapeshifting robot jumped right towards the vent, clinging to the wall with its free hand while one of its legs reached up in a grotesque display of flexibility in order to rip the grate off with its foot. Shadow, who had been the first to recover from the stunning screech, shook his head clear and attempted to form a Chaos Spear, but by the time the weapon fully formed the robot had crawled out into the vent.

"It's gone," he growled as the Chaos Spear disappeared from his hand.

Groaning while rubbing a finger in his ear, Sorun stared out at the vent the robot had crawled through. "Yeah, we're not going after it through there," he said. The vent was too small for any of them to fit through. For an incredibly skinny robot like that monstrosity had been, though, apparently it was the perfect size. "Why do you guys even have ventilation down here?"

"It's to help cool all the electronic equipment off so it doesn't overheat," Tails groaned as he removed his hands from his ears. "Those vents lead outside. That's probably where that Badnik's going."

"Then we need to go right now." Without missing a beat, Shadow turned around and began stomping towards the exit. "If it makes it to Knothole, we'll never catch it."

Sorun twisted his head to Shadow. "What makes you think it's going there?"

"What would be easier for it? To try and hide in the woods where we would find it or to hide in the densely populated area full of people in can blend in with until it finds an opportunity to escape?"

"Oh, man, he's right." The other three didn't even hesitate before they began following the black and red hedgehog out. "How many people are in Knothole? We'll never be able to find that thing if it shapeshifts in the middle of all those people."

That was if it reached Knothole. And then who knows what would happen once it got away with the drive. Sorun could imagine the possibilities, but he didn't want to.

The four burst out of the HQ's door, looking around in the surrounding woods wildly for any sign of anybody. No such luck. They'd even gone as far as to follow Tails towards the vent that lead into the HQ's lab, but to their dismay when they arrived the grate was already removed. The robot was already headed towards Knothole.

"Alright, here's an idea," Sonic announced. "Me an' Shadow can go all the way to Knothole and work backwards. Sorun and Tails can work towards Knothole, and hopefully we'll manage to corner this thing somewhere along the way."

"Our enemy is a machine capable of shapeshifting into any one of us, and you wish to split us up," Shadow countered with a deadpan stare.

"Hey, we're all smart enough to tell who's who now that we know what the deal is," Sonic countered. "Besides, it can't copy abilities since it couldn't make Sorun's swords. We can figure it out easy if it tries tricking us."

"I, for one, agree with Sonic's plan and would like to quit arguing about it before it gets away!" Sorun angrily hissed at the two.

"Fine, fine!" The jets beneath Shadow's sneakers flared up. "Let's go already!"

Once more, the two hedgehogs took off in straight blurs towards Knothole. Sorun breathed out a sigh, and then looked towards a nervous Tails. "Alright, how do you wanna play this?" he asked.

"I'm thinking we both go towards Knothole, and that you should take the left side of the forest and I'll take the right," he said. "Should we make a code phrase or something so we know we are who we say we are in case we run into each other?"

"That is... a very smart and practical thing we probably should have thought of before Sonic and Shadow took off, yeah." Sorun would blame the high amount of stress the situation was putting on him for disrupting his thinking. "Okay, sure, we'll do... I dunno, apples to pineapples, there."

Tails opened his mouth, and then notched his head backwards in bewilderment at Sorun's suggestion. "Apples and pineapples? Seriously?"

"I couldn't think of- Tails, no time!" Sorun yelled, partly in embarrassment.

The fox quickly nodded, and then spun his tails up before lifting up into the air and taking off into the forest. Sorun ran three steps behind him, and then slowed to a halt when Tails' body quickly disappeared past all the brush.

"Yeah, I... still can't move that fast," the human mumbled to himself. He shook his head with a sigh, and then moved to a different part of the forest to search. "Run it off, Sorun, run it off..."

So obviously, forests were pretty large in terms of surface area to search. More than that, it was full of so many trees, bushes, rocks, and all sorts of other things to hide behind that it would take too long for Sorun to search behind every single nook and cranny.

If it was just him searching, it'd be next to impossible, especially at his speed. Tails searching on the other end of the forest improved those odds a decent bit, and with how fast Shadow and Sonic was, well, a decent chance turned into a chance high enough to be feasibly possible. It still wasn't a high enough chance that Sorun was comfortable with the odds, but they had so little time to even think of anything that Sorun wasn't complaining.

Besides, it was Sonic's plan, anyways, so if it did fail the blame could at least be shifted to him. But considering the plan failing meant their imminent doom if the files got out Sorun would still try his best to see this through. Even if he doubted his best was gonna cut it here.

"Ergh... this thing could be anywhere," Sorun thought to himself after checking behind a large rock, and then poking his head up to scan the trees all around him. "Don't even know if it's limited to turning into people or if it can turn into rocks or junk, too. Why'd Eggman even send a shapeshifting... no, the guy's insane. Sounds like something he'd do, actually. Guy uses robots, so why not send a robot to infiltrate us? Makes it easier since it's only the... four of us here and... everybody else is out because of the increase in Badniks. That he commands. Huh."

He didn't want to think that this was all some elaborate plan orchestrated by Eggman just to get the files on that computer, but it sounded crazy enough to be something he thought of, and if what he said that night meant anything, he was practically bored with the Freedom Fighters at this point. The more he thought about it the more it made sense he'd try something wacky like this just for the heck of it. Sorun could understand it; he'd done plenty of pointless things out of boredom in games he'd power leveled in until he was practically invincible.

Sorun reflexively scrunched his face when he realized he understood the madness behind what may have been a madman's evil scheme.

Well, whether this really was a convoluted scheme or not didn't really matter. What mattered was finding that damn shapeshifter.

He tensed up when he heard footsteps crunch down on some nearby leaves. Slowly flexing his hand to grab a Summoned Sword at a moment's notice, Sorun slowly moved around the rock towards the source of the noise. He took a deep breath, and then yelled out as he jumped out from the rock.

Tails, who had been the one behind the rock, jumped out and did the exact same thing. They both blinked owlishly at each other, and before anything else Tails pointed at him and yelled out, "Apples!"

Sighing, Sorun slumped his shoulders. He should have picked something better than the first thing that came to mind. "Man, are you serio- god, pineapples," he grumbled, and Tails' form relaxed. "So nothing at your end?" Sorun guessed.

"No," Tails admitted with a frustrated huff. "This thing is pretty crafty for a Badnik. I keep wondering how it's even able to shapeshift like that."

Sorun shrugged. "Eh, I've seen it before. It's a robotic endoskeleton covered in a polymimetic alloy or something similar that can change shape. The actual robot's probably so thin so the alloy can change into a lot of different builds for who it mimics."

A beat passed between the two of them, and Tails faced Sorun with an expression mixed between looking impressed and looking suspicious. "That's... an awfully specific thing for you to know, Sorun," he said with narrowed eyes. "Where'd you hear of something like that?"

"... Terminator Three?"

"..."

"I-it's a movie from where I'm from." Sorun rose his hands up when Tails continued staring. "Man, c'mon, I already said the code word! I got it from a movie, I swear!"

Tails scrutinized him for a few more seconds, and then softened his features while letting out a defeated sigh. "Sorry, Sorun, I'm just making sure," he apologized. "It will be really bad if that Badnik gets away with those files."

"Yeah, I know, but it's not gonna come to that." Probably not his best choice of words. Sorun didn't believe it himself, and from the withering look Tails gave him he didn't even sound all that convincing. "Look, maybe Sonic or Shadow-"

Boom!

Both of them reflexively ducked down when they heard the loud explosion in the distance, though Sorun's ears perked up at the peculiar sound of that explosion. That explosion with the slightly static-y sound effect following it and the strange warble the initial decibels of the explosion carried. It was the same sound Shadow's Chaos Spears made.

"That must be Shadow!" Tails had formed the same thought Sorun had, and before the human could even speak he lifted off with his tails, grabbing Sorun's arms in order to carry him off as well. A few seconds later and Tails had flown the both of them into a small clearing of forest, where they saw Shadow kneeling down on the ground.

Tails, upon seeing Shadow, immediately let Sorun go and let him fall to the ground while to fox hovered over to Shadow. Sorun landed with a small grunt, and walked over in the same direction while waving to get Shadow's attention.

"Shadow!" Tails touched down on the ground and bounded towards the hedgehog. "We heard that explosion! Are you okay?"

"Fine," he grunted, and then stood up. "That thing put up a hardier resistance than expected. It ran off before I could destroy it, but I don't know in which direction."

Tails groaned and rubbed at his forehead, while Sorun blinked blankly at Shadow. "Hey, Shadow, quick check make a Chaos Spear," he said.

Worryingly, Shadow paused, which caused Sorun to back up a step and for Tails to snap his eyes up at Shadow. The hedgehog looked between the human and the fox, and then backed up a step. "That last attack was more exhaustive than-"

Sorun narrowed his eyes. He knew for a fact Shadow didn't get tired after throwing a single spear. "It's the fake, get him!" he shouted.

Right as he said this, Shadow made a snarling face as his right arm shifted and dissolved into the same, silvery material they'd seen on the robot before. Tails was the first to react and leapt right at the shapeshifter, who hissed and waved his half-liquid arm in front of him. The arm made contact with Tails, who rolled down onto the ground from the strike.

"Ah, what the- ah!" Some of the silver material had scraped off from the arm when it made contact with Tails, and to Sorun's shock he saw the small amount of silver liquid flow around Tails' arms and legs and bind them together. "I can't move!" he cried out.

At hearing a metallic, distorted growl in front of him, Sorun looked up from the bound fox and to the Shadow lookalike, which was glaring at Sorun before it lashed its arm out again. Some of the silver fluid was flung off the limb and flew towards the teen, who yelped and held his arm up just as four Summoned Swords crossed their blades protectively in front of him. The silver fluid hit the swords, and after they shattered it fell harmlessly to the ground. Unfortunately, when Sorun looked up he saw that the shapeshifter had used the momentary distraction to flee further into the woods.

"Sorun, go after it!" Tails yelled as the young fox continued to struggle against the silver bindings.

The teen's eyes flashed towards Tails. "But you-!"

"I'll be fine, just go!"

For a single second he'd hesitated, but then he nodded at Tails before turning in the direction the shapeshifter had fled in and bolted right after it.

It was a great thing it couldn't copy abilities, because if it could go even close to Sonic's speed Sorun wouldn't have a chance at catching up with it. But, while it wasn't nearly fast enough that Sorun lost sight of it completely, it was still a rather nimble robot that couldn't become exhausted. And Sorun wasn't the best runner around. He wasn't losing the robot as he chased it past all the trees, but he wasn't gaining on it, either. And unlike it he would eventually tire out, though he didn't know if that would happen before it even reached Knothole. Then he really would lose it.

Fortunately, out of the corner of Sorun's eyes he saw a blue blur zipping past all the trees and heading straight for the half-formed Shadow. It ran right into the running robot as it neared a hill, where they began to roll down after Sonic had collided with it. Sorun cursed under his breath once the two rolled out of sight, and then ran straight for the hill. Shortly enough he'd made it to the top of the hill, looked down, and then lowered his body slightly as he carefully shuffled down the steep slope before finally making it to the bottom.

Huffing out a tired breath, Sorun looked forwards where his eyes caught a large amount of movement. There were two form wrestling with each other on the ground, and Sorun approached the two with the intent to help Sonic deal with the shapeshifter. However, his feet slid to a halt on the ground when his eyes fully registered the scene playing out before him.

"Oh, you gotta be kiddin' me..."

Sonic was grappling against Sonic. Two hedgehogs that were equally blue and whose features, shoes, and gloves were completely identical were grappling and pressing against one another as they tried to overthrow the other. They had both briefly glanced towards Sorun, though the struggle they were part of drew most of their attention as they attempted to overpower their opponent.

"Sorun, get him already!" the Sonic on the left grunted. "Hurry up before he tries something and gets away!"

"What the- Sorun, he's the fake one!" the rightmost Sonic yelled out in exertion. "He's tricking you!"

A single Summoned Sword appeared at Sorun's side, though its tip was continually aiming back and forth between the left and right Sonic as Sorun, his expression completely unsure, only mumbled out a low "Um..." as his eyes kept snapping from one Sonic to the other.

"Come on, Sorun, don't listen to him! He's just trying to psych you out!"

"I'm not trying to psych anybody out! Sorun, I'm telling you, he's not the real me!"

"Oh come on, which one is it!?" Sorun's mind raced as he tried his best to discern which one was real and which one wasn't, but their details were too similar to tell apart. Even their voices sounded too alike for him to tell. "Gah, if I don't hurry he's gonna trap Sonic with that silver gunk and then he'll get away! But what do I... wait, maybe?" An idea came to him. "Can Sonic- of course he can, it should be fine!"

As Sorun thought this, the two hedgehogs pushed away from each other by a few inches. This caused Sorun's eyes to widen, and he and his Summoned Sword faced the left Sonic who immediately caught his staring.

"Wait, Sorun," he pointed to the other Sonic, "he-!"

The Summoned Sword sailed forwards and pierced right through Sonic's forehead.

The rightmost Sonic flinched in surprise, and then gawked in surprise at Sorun. Sorun, breathing heavily, kept his eyes locked on to the Sonic whose head he just stabbed as the blue hedgehog remained completely still, his eyes slowly rolling upwards. The stabbed Sonic just continued standing still while the other Sonic kept staring on in shock, and when nothing began happening Sorun started to dread that he'd just made a horrible mistake.

When he saw blue, electric sparks begin to arc out of the wound, Sorun heaved out a large sigh of relief.

After he shattered the sword, a black, oil-like substance began to freely flow from the wound in the Sonic lookalike's forehead. At the same time, his skin, fur, shoes, and gloves began to lose color, liquidate, and quickly slough lifelessly off the robotic endoskeleton underneath as the machine tipped backwards and fell right onto its back. Both Sonic and Sorun cautiously approached the fallen machine, though the both of them exhaled the breath they had been holding when they saw its red eyes were completely dark, the wound from the Summoned Sword still in its true head.

"Oh, man. That was too intense," Sonic breathed as he swiped a hand over his forehead. He looked down at the ground after, and then made a hum when he saw something sticking out of the silver puddle surrounding the dead machine. He bent down to pick it up, and then let out a "ah-ha!" when he straightened up and held the flash drive in front of him. "Great. He didn't stash it somewhere."

Smiling, he turned his head towards Sorun, who was looking down at the robot in disbelief. "That was smooth work, Sorun!"

"Huh?" The human shook his disbelief away and looked up towards Sonic. "Er, yeah. We got him. Go team."

"You know it!" Laughing lightly, Sonic held flattened his free hand and held it towards Sorun for a high-five. After some heavy internal debate, Sorun sighed and weakly slapped the hand with his own to reciprocate the high-five. "Seriously, though, I didn't think you'd be able to figure it out that quickly! I'm really impressed!"

"Yeeeaah..." Sorun looked back down at the dead shapeshifter. "There aren't any more of these things, right?" he asked. "It's only the one?"

"Eh... I know Eggman's style. If I were a betting hog, I'd say it's only the one," Sonic answered. "Doing more than one would be too easy for him."

"Okay, then."

There was some rustling in the bushes near them, causing both teens to look towards the sound. They both grew tense, but then relaxed at the body of yellow and white fur that jumped out of the bushes.

"Sonic, Sorun!" Tails quickly ran towards them, but then slowed to a stop when he saw the wrecked machine laying behind them. "Oh, you... you guys took it out!" he exclaimed with a happy smile. "Did you get the drive!?"

"Yep!" As Sonic held up the drive to show the fox, Sorun felt a gust of wind blow past him as something running at high speeds stopped near him. He glanced behind him, and saw that Shadow was standing behind him and looking at the shapeshifter's corpse. "I managed to stop the Badnik, but when Sorun caught up it tried looking like me to trick him," Sonic explained. "And Sorun, oh man, Sorun saw right through it and took him out!"

When he felt the astonished look from Tails fall on him along with the surprised look from Shadow, Sorun chose to shyly step away from the group and give them all a quiet nod of confirmation as he continued to stare down at the Badnik's body.

"Oh, thank goodness. That's that, then. Phew!" The fox's two tails began spinning as he rose up into the air. "I'm gonna go back to the HQ and change the password on the computer for safety's sake. Gonna have to talk to Nicole about better security later, too. Could you carry that thing and the flash drive back to the lab, Sonic?" he asked. "I wanna take a look at them later."

Sonic gave Tails a thumbs up and walked over to the shapeshifter's body. "Sure thing, pal!" He crouched down, bent forwards, and then picked up the mechanical body before slinging it over his shoulder and standing up. "Oh, Sorun."

The silent teen was taken out of his musing and looked towards Sonic. The large smile on his face was hard to miss, but instead of saying anything the teen merely gave him a blink of acknowledgment.

"Great work. Seriously. We'll celebrate later on, my treat," Sonic said.

Once more Sorun just gave Sonic a silent gesture in the form of a small nod. He'd taken that as his cue to leave, and quickly disappeared with the robot corpse over his shoulder as he sprinted off. Tails wasn't that far behind him as he flew off in the same direction, leaving Sorun and Shadow alone in the clearing, the former of which went back to staring silently at the silver puddle made by the deceased robot while the latter quizzically stared at the human.

"So you really managed to take it down?" Shadow asked after a long moment of silence.

"Yeah, Summoned Sword to the head. Went down real easy." Which was a relief in of itself, seeing as a fear Sorun had was that they wouldn't have enough power to pierce robots. That along with the fact he'd actually managed to shoot the robot to begin with was leaving him in a stupefied state. "Where were you?"

"It restricted my movement in that silver substance it covered itself with," Shadow answered. "I was in the process of removing it, but suddenly it had lost all resistance and fell right off me. I assume that was in response to you disabling the shapeshifter."

"Mm. Probably."

Some more silence passed, and Sorun kept staring at the silver pile even as Shadow stepped next to him. "Out of curiosity," he began, "how did you discern which was the real Sonic and which was the fake?"

"... Huh?"

"How did you tell who was who?"

"Oh." Sorun glanced up at Shadow. "I didn't."

"... You didn't," Shadow repeated, followed by a deep breath that entered in through the hedgehog's nose. "Are you trying to tell me that you just randomly chose a Sonic and guessed right?"

That wasn't entirely true, but Sorun had gotten lucky and nailed the right one on the first try. Part of why he was so shocked it ended so fast, really. "Well I figured, you know, since Sonic is so fast he'd just dodge the sword if I shot at the real one. So then I'd just shoot the other one." He shrugged. "I managed to hit the shapeshifter first."

Shadow sharply exhaled, closed his eyes, and rubbed at his eyelids. "That was your plan?" he mumbled. "What if he hadn't dodged?"

Sorun sent him a flat look. "Dude. It's Sonic. He woulda dodged." It wasn't even unsound logic, either. Shadow dodged his Summoned Swords like they were nothing, so for somebody as fast as Sonic it shouldn't have even been an issue.

It didn't seem that Shadow was sharing the same way of thinking from the way his eyes opened to give Sorun an irritated look.

"Okay, so what if the shapeshifter had sufficient enough reflexes to dodge your Summoned Sword?" he challenged. "What were you going to do then?"

He didn't have an answer for that. "Okay, so I didn't think that far ahead," Sorun admitted. "I'm not good with plans, alright? Why are we even talking about this?" He gestured to the puddle of silver liquid. "Robot's dead, crisis averted."

"We're talking about this because you decided that the best solution for this problem, instead of waiting to see if the shapeshifter gave away any tells or testing to see which Sonic couldn't display the real one's abilities, was to simply shoot at them until you found the real one. The only reason you only had to shoot one sword was because you got lucky."

Rolling his eyes, Sorun fully turned to face Shadow and gave him an equally irritated look. "Oh, excuse me for putting a little logical faith into the abilities of my comrade. Isn't that what this whole team thing is about? Trusting each other's capabilities to get the job done?" he asked. "You're being so critical right now over nothing. It's done . It's over."

In truth, maybe he hadn't completely thought the plan through, but it was the heat of the moment and he thought he did pretty good all things considered. The results certainly spoke for themselves, and yes, maybe Sonic wouldn't have taken kindly to getting shot at if Sorun chose wrong, but he'd bet his life that he would have been able to dodge it.

But Shadow had a point now that he thought on it- Sorun didn't know if the shapeshifter could dodge. Evidently it couldn't, seeing as he hit it so easily, but he tried not to think of the grim what-ifs. What-ifs like what was he going to do if it did dodge. Though that was probably Shadow's point in that he didn't have a plan for that grim what-if. And that the shapeshifter probably would have gotten away because of that.

Sorun must have had some look of understanding in his eyes that Shadow saw, because the hedgehog's expression softened the slightest amount as he looked down at the silver puddle. "I'm not saying you didn't do good. You did, but you need to have more than one plan before you act in case it doesn't work out," he said.

"Yeah, I hear ya," Sorun mumbled, and looked down at the puddle with Shadow. "You know, it... both times I talked with it, it kept complimenting Eggman's creations. It was probably talking itself up since it was a Eggman creation, but he programmed it with emotions, so maybe I could have, I dunno, talked trash about Eggman's work and made it mad enough to slip up," he said. Probably a weak idea in hindsight, but it was something. And for he knew it probably would have worked, too.

Shadow hummed. "Maybe. It's hard to say with his creations how they'll ever react." He glanced at Sorun from the corner of his eyes. "But the idea has some merit at the very least. You should have thought of it long before you took a shot at one of the Sonics if you knew for that long, though."

"Hey, it still worked out."

"I know," Shadow agreed. "And I suppose there is some logic in assuming Sonic would have just dodged your sword. I would be severely disappointed in him if he didn't. But even if by some miracle you did hit him, I doubt your Summoned Swords could even harm him."

"... Hm?" Sorun rose an eyebrow, though kept his face down at the silver puddle. "What do you mean?"

Shadow scowled. "That hedgehog is... durable, for lack of a better term. Unnaturally so," he said. "I'm unsure of the exact details, however. You would have to ask him if you're interested."

Well, he'd been on somewhat of a happy turn about his accomplishment of being able to stab a robot to death, deep inside. But now that Sorun heard that he just felt mixed on the subject. More than that, it brought him back to the thoughts he'd had on Summoned Swords a week prior. About them being insufficient.

Those thoughts were quickly shoved to the backside of his mind; things like that didn't matter right now. What mattered was that they had won against the evil robot, and for what it was worth, at the end of the day, Sorun felt pretty good about that. So he didn't want to deal with any more negative thoughts for the rest of the day.

"Well, since the day is saved and everything," Sorun said while looking up, "you want to-"

Shadow had already left before he even started speaking.

"... Oh." Slumping his shoulders, Sorun glanced around at the forest around him, and then made the realization that he didn't recognize any of the surrounding woods. "Wait, which way is it back to town again...?"

A/N- So I realize in one of the other Sonic comics there actually is a shapeshifer (shape-shifter? Shape shifter? Everybody always spells it differently) character, and I know it might be a little weird for me to say I'll add in characters from other Sonic medias and immediately do this, but I didn't want to add a whole new character for a one-off chapter like this. So I just made a throwaway robot.

Chapter 16

Recursion Error

Episode 16- It's just like my Japanese video games

"So you're telling me... you found another one." With a small grunt, Sorun hefted himself up onto the lab's table, slung a single arm over the one knee he'd propped up on the table, and regarded the chipmunk standing in front of him with a curious expression. "But we might not be able to get it."

Waking up and opening the front door to Sonic's house to find Sally standing on the other side mid-knock hadn't been one of the things he expected to wake up to, but considering everything else that had happened lately, it was a nice enough change of pace. What was so urgent that it required his attention, though, Sorun hadn't a clue. Sally had merely told him something important had come up and that he was needed at Freedom HQ.

So he followed Sally there, where he was lead into the lab and to the computer in the back. Some files and images were already pulled up on the screens, along with a host of other pieces of information Sorun had idly glanced over, and before Sorun could even ask what the deal was she'd explained the situation to him: they'd located another Chaos Emerald. A Chaos Emerald that was out of reach, in her words.

A great interest to him for more reasons than one, but he didn't like the part where she said it was out of reach.

"It's not that we can't get it," Sally reworded, "it's that acquiring it would be extremely difficult from our end."

Rubbing the still-present sleep from his eyes, Sorun stifled the yawn that threatened to come up and said, "Okay, Sally. Why don't you tell me what the problem is?"

A new voice spoke up. "The problem is that Eggman already got his grubby mitts on the beauty."

"Ah, yeah, I guess that would be a problem" Sorun admitted as he turned towards the third person in the room. He gave the white bat that sauntered next to the table a cursory glance before greeting her. "Hey, Rouge. You're the one that found it?"

"The Chaos sensors did, and I volunteered to go retrieve it," she said. "But by the time I got there, the Doctor's forces were swarming all over the place. No chance of stealing it out from under them. Guess he learned from the last time you and Sonic stole that one from him."

"Yeah, fun times." Sorun drummed his fingers over his knee. "So the Emerald?"

"Don't worry, I tracked it down. Wasn't that hard; I just snuck on one of his ships, though I had to bail out when I saw where they were taking that Emerald." She pointed to the monitors. "He took the Emerald there."

"'There' being one of Eggman's personal storage buildings," Sally finished off. "That's why getting in there and taking the Emerald would be risky."

Sorun looked towards the structure being displayed on the monitor. It didn't look like the kind of building he'd put things in if he were a mad tyrant. He'd spring for a warehouse, not what looked like a skyscraper from what the image was showing him.

"So why'd he stash the Emerald there of all places?" he asked. "Something special about the building?"

"Eggman's a man of very questionable taste," Rouge began. "The things he stores there aren't mundane objects like resources or spare parts. He has all the warehouses he could ever need in his fortified city for that. The things he keeps in that tower are personal."

Sorun rose an eyebrow at the bat. "Personal," he echoed.

"What can I say?" Rouge said with a shrug. "He's a man who takes gratuitous amounts of satisfaction from his conquers. The whole upper floor of that building is basically a trophy room dedicated to his most proudest moments by way of all sorts of memorabilia he's collected."

"It's storage for his junk," Sorun summarized. "Why in the world is he putting the Emerald in a trophy room? Wouldn't he want to actually use the thing? The shiny rock of literal infinite power?"

He heard a loud, annoyed sigh from Sally. "It's an ego thing with that maniac. Always is," she bemoaned. "If I were to guess, I'd say that he's so confident in his victory over us that he thinks that he doesn't even need the power of the Chaos Emeralds, so he's putting it somewhere where we can't get it while he can admire it."

"Well, he wouldn't be wrong, now, would he?" Sorun thought. And it made sense, in its own twisted logic. How many times in games had Sorun collected all the rarest things that game's world had to offer only to shove them inside of storage chests and never look at them again? Was it practical? No, not at all. But what mattered was that he had it and they were tucked away in a chest no game NPC would ever be able to go into. His and his alone to admire. From a distance, of course.

That's what that tower was in Sorun's eyes. A storage chest for rare loot Eggman would never use but wanted to own by virtue of having it.

"So what's so scary about this tower?" Sorun asked Rouge.

"I've been in there on a mission before, and even back then getting in and out was dicey. The topmost floor is clear, but literally every single floor below it? Nothing but traps and security layered on top of them with even more traps mixed in," Rouge answered. "And that's a hundred-floor tower we're talking about here. It's the most inefficient use of space in the world, too, but you know how extravagant Eggman can get."

Sorun hummed. "If you've already been in there, then what's stopping you from getting in again, getting the Emerald, and getting out?"

Rouge frowned. "That was months ago. Security's probably been beefed up tenfold since I was last there. For all I know he did some renovation and changed the layout, too." She sighed, and shook her head. "It's unknown territory, and that's dangerous."

"But we need that Emerald," Sorun said as he looked back at the monitors. "I need that Emerald."

The word "need" being subjective in this case. He'd only get use out of it if he could get the Emerald in side of his body extracted and go home after collecting all seven. He had absolutely no intention of touching this new Emerald for another power. But he was sure the Freedom Fighters could find some use for it in the meantime; at the very least more use than it just sitting in storage.

Getting it was better than doing nothing, he supposed.

"So what do you want to do?" Rouge asked him. "Go steal it?"

"... Sure, why not?"

His answered must have surprised both of the Mobians from the way they did a double-take on them. He merely shrugged at the action, and then added, "It's not gonna get any less dangerous the longer we wait, right? So what's stopping us from just going there and taking it now?"

He was even surprised at himself for being so proactive in this discussion, but he really needed that Emerald.

"You do realize that building is one of the most secure locations on the whole planet thanks to Eggman's defenses," Rouge reminded him.

"Oh, yeah?" Sorun turned towards the bat. "I thought you were this super-stealthy secret spy. Here I was thinking if anybody could break in there it'd be you, but hey, if you're saying it can't be done-"

"It can definitely be done." He could see a twinge of irritation appear in the bat's features, and she went as far as to cross her arms in indignation. "It just won't be easy. Question is how bad do we want that Emerald?"

Both Sorun and Sally gave her a deadpan expression. She sighed at the sight, closed her eyes, and shrugged.

"Alright, I guess I can't blame you. I want that gem just as bad as everybody else," she admitted, and then looked towards Sally. "Well? Am I going or not?"

A thoughtful look crossed Sally's face, and her eyes glanced to the side as she mulled over the question. "It's true that acquiring that Emerald would be beneficial for us, but I don't want to commit to a risky mission like that unless you're sure you could go in there and out with that Emerald."

"That's... a very tall order considering what we're talking about here," Rouge said. "If it were any, and I do mean any, other place on Mobius other than New Megaopolis itself, I'd say yeah, I could do it easy. You're talking to someone who could sneak up to Castle Acorn and steal the king's crown right off his head without noticing." The narrowed glare sent her way from the chipmunk wasn't lost on Rouge, who grinned. "But that place?" Her expression turned serious. "It's risky."

"Then you should bring a partner with you," Sally suggested.

"A partner?" A short laugh left Rouge as she shook her head. "I appreciate you're so worried about my health, really, I am, but who exactly among us in this ragtag little resistance is stealthy enough to keep up with me? Because unless you're suggesting I bring Espio in on this-"

"No, he's with some of the Chaotix out on a different mission," Sally interrupted. "Come to think of it, half of our forces are out right now and the other half are out of rotation at the moment." Her head tilted up as an idea came to her. "Unless... you'd be willing to bring me along?"

The bat blinked, and then cupped her chin in her hand in thought. "Well... I know you. I wouldn't be uncomfortable sneaking in there with you. And if you brought Nicole with you to deal with anything electronically challenging, then... yeah." She nodded her head. "We could make that work."

"I wanna go, too."

Well now they both were really looking at him in surprise. Like he'd suddenly grown a extra head and was addressing them both with each head. Their expressions weren't that much better, either. Sally looked unsure about Sorun's decision, whereas Rouge looked like she wanted to flat-out refuse Sorun.

"Sorun, no offense, but you're still pretty green when it comes to, well, anything," Rouge told him. "I don't know if this is the kind of thing you should be doing."

"Yeah, probably not." He wasn't gonna deny that logic. He could barely believe he was even suggesting such a thing, but that Emerald was too important to him in the event he could go home. "If this was for any other reason I'd agree with you and sit this out. But I'm not gonna sideline myself when there's a Chaos Emerald on the line here."

Placing her hands on her hips, the white bat frowned at the human. "We can handle this perfectly on our own, you know."

"I'm not saying you can't. I'm just saying bringing along some extra help wouldn't hurt you." Translation for he wanted to make sure they had the biggest chance of success possible in stealing the Emerald from Eggman.

"You'll slow us down."

A cough from Sally drew the two's attention. "Normally I'd agree with Rouge, Sorun, but... you did do well during that shapeshifter incident a few days back if what Sonic said is true. And I would assume you have been steadily getting better in sneaking with Espio's help."

That was highly debatable. He still couldn't hide from Espio for more than a couple minutes. He always managed to find him somehow. But Sally didn't have to know that.

"And Shadow did say he was confident in your ability to use those swords..."

If copying all his moves off of video game characters showed proficiency, then sure, he was a master with them.

"I suppose it wouldn't be the worst idea to bring you along for some extra protection," Sally finished off. "If you're really up to it?"

"I wouldn't say I'm up for it at all," Sorun told Sally, "but that Emerald's too important. So I'm going."

She nodded. "Alright then. I'll talk it over with some of the others, try and come up with some plan. We'll hit the place tonight."

"Tonight?" Sorun repeated. "Really? You don't want to take a day or two to plan this out?"

"We already have the location, and even if a lot has changed Rouge already has somewhat of an idea for what we'll encounter inside. We can't really get much better intel than that, and you weren't wrong when you said the sooner the better." Sally walked past the table Sorun sat on and made her way towards the lab's exit. "Do yourselves a favor and get some rest before we head out tonight. You're both gonna need it."

The door closed behind her, leaving the sole human and bat behind. They glanced at each other briefly before Rouge hummed and walked towards the same exit. "Hope you're ready for this, Sorun."

"Yeah," he murmured to himself as the spy left the lab, "I really hope so, too."

The actual target building itself was on the outskirts of New Megaopolis, a few miles out from the city's outermost limits. As planned, they'd been dropped off at the dead of night, right around midnight. From a hill cresting nearby the whole group was able to get a good look at just what they would be infiltrating.

Yeah, it was a tower.

Crouching down near the foot of the hill, Sorun was able to see just what the situation was. The building itself: giant, as to be expected from a hundred-floor tower. The compound surrounding it: equally large and full of constantly-patrolling robots with enough light fixtures set up everywhere that it may as well have been daytime down there. The outer perimeter: it was a giant, twenty-foot wall with large turrets at the top of each corner with giant searchlights constantly fanning the area in repeating patterns. And from what he could see, there was no actual entrance or gate past the wall. It was solid all the way around.

Yep, it was about as fortified as Rouge had warned them, if not more. Enough at least that Sorun was already having doubts over all this.

"Can't help but notice there isn't a way past the wall," Sorun noted. He craned his head behind him, where Rouge was standing nearby and examining the area with him. Sally was leaning on a nearby tree, and somewhere in one of her vest's pockets was Nicole.

"Everything that comes in and out of this place is airlifted," Rouge informed them. "There's a landing pad in the compound around the building near the front."

"How'd you even get in the first time around?"

She gave him a flat look, and the black, leathery wings on her back momentarily flitted. "I can fly."

"... I see." He looked back towards the tower. "Isn't this place kind of removed from his city?" he asked. "You'd expect that something like his own personal museum or whatever would be somewhere deep in the city. Or, you know, in the city at all to begin with."

"I think he likes flaunting the fact that all his private things are in a building out in the sticks and we still can't touch it," Rouge said. "Makes him feel powerful."

Sorun rolled his eyes. "Everything with this guy, I swear..."

"So how are we getting in?" Sally voiced from behind them. "I'm assuming the front door's out."

"Ha! That's one way to put it." Rouge stepped to Sorun's side at the edge of the hill and pointed towards the tower. "He's got so many Badniks patrolling the compound that finding blind spots to sneak through to the front door is practically impossible. Front door itself would have so much security that it'd be too much to bother with."

"Garage?" Sally suggested.

"Mm, last time I was here the garage doors were ID-locked to identity chips installed in Eggman vehicles specifically assigned to this location. We could go and steal one, but a vehicle deviating from its usual route would raise an alert. Even if we hitched a ride on one going to the garage, I got no idea what'd be in there. Too risky."

"Windows?"

"Alarmed with pressure sensors, all of them." She glanced down at Sorun. "You wanna take a guess?"

What would Sorun do if this was a stealth mission in a video game? The classic, tried-and-true method was already thrown out the window: he couldn't mark targets on a minimap and slowly but methodically stealth kill all the robots until the area was clear so they could sneak in. Rouge implied that the routine patrols here were too strict; so much as a single Badnik out of place was gonna raise alarms, and Sally had been very clear on the ride over here that any alarms before they even got into the building called for a retreat.

So they were ghosting it, then- completing the mission without touching a single combatant or letting a single combatant even release they were there. Any entrances with any guards weren't ideal. Windows were out. What would he do if this was a stealth game and all these factors were in place?

Probably sneak in through the back.

"There a backdoor or something?" Sorun guessed.

"As it happens, there is," Rouge said with a nod. "It's a maintenance access way for, shockingly enough, Badniks programmed to conduct maintenance on the building. Electronically locked twenty-four/seven, but I'm trusting Nicole can take care of that problem."

"And the wall?"

"We'll circle around towards the back where the door is and go over it. I'm flying. Sally over there brought a grappling gun. Don't know what your plan is."

Sorun froze, and then glanced back at Sally. "Hey, how come I didn't get a grappling gun?" he asked.

"Because we're in a spare parts deficit back at HQ," she answered, though she did cast a concerned look towards Sorun. "Do you have any way over the wall?"

He shrugged. "I'll just ladder my way up with Summoned Swords."

"Huh? Oh, no." Rouge crossed her arms in a "no way" gesture. "Those glowing things are too noticeable."

Blinking up at the bat, Sorun looked back towards the tower. "There any cameras on the wall?"

She shook her head. "No, but there are cameras monitoring the outside compound and interior of the tower."

"Any exterior patrols?"

"... No."

"Then we're good!" Sorun exclaimed while clapping his hands together silently. "It'll be fine, c'mon, let's go."

As difficult if not nigh-impossible as it was going to be sneaking around once they went over the wall, going around it from the outside proved to be almost laughably easy as literally all of the security was beyond the wall. The four of them had still been cautious, of course, and maintained a healthy distance while circling around the perimeter towards the back. It proved nerve-wracking for Sorun, though, who felt his own nervousness grow more and more the closer they approached towards the back. He idly wondered if Sally or Rouge felt the same tenseness he did, but whenever he glanced at their faces he saw nothing but stone-faced expressions with razor-focused eyes.

Girls were completely in the zone. Meanwhile he was doing his best not to drop down from all the pressure.

They finally reached the back, where Rouge pointed up towards a spot at the top of the wall near the center. She, of course, simply flew up. It was with passing interest that Sorun noticed that those wings of hers barely even flapped as she rose up in the air, and to him it looked more like she had just floated up and those wings were just for show. Sally, for her part, walked to the end of the wall with Sorun, reached into her pocket, and pulled out a gun-like object with a tri-pronged hook at the end. Classic grappling gun.

"You know, I could just carry you up. It'll support both our weight," Sally offered.

"Nah, it's fine." One loud bring! later and a ladder of blue, spectral swords appeared in front of them. "I got this."

"If you say so." She aimed the gun up, fired the hook at the top of the wall, and then tugged on the wire to ensure it was secure. And then she pressed a button on the grappling gun and was carried all the way to the top of the wall in seconds.

Sorun blinked up after her, and then sighed loudly as he began to slowly scale the sword ladder. "Why the hell didn't I just let her carry me?" he quietly grumbled to himself as he climbed.

Considering it took him two minutes to fully scale his way to the top of the wall, it wasn't nearly as an impressive climb as displayed by the other two, who took mere seconds to reach the top. He couldn't tell what their faces looked like since he did his best to avoid eye contact one he made it to the top while shattering the ladder behind him, though he did let out a low groan when he walked to the wall's edge and looked down at the twenty-foot drop.

He didn't want to climb the sword ladder again.

"Rouge," he said with slumped shoulders, "can you carry me down?"

"I dunno." The human teen could feel the smug grin being beamed at him from behind. "Usually I get a please for requests like that."

"Rouge, man, come on."

"Heh, kidding, kidding. Grab on."

Grumbling under his breath, Sorun hooked his arms around one of Rouge's arm as the bat lifted off again. She carried the black-haired human all the way to the bottom of the wall on the other side, while behind them Sally had rappelled down using the grappling gun. Once Sorun had removed himself from Rouge, the group of three plus one immediately took off towards a nearby metal crate with a large Eggman logo emblazoned on its side, where they crouched down for cover.

After the group crouched down, Rouge peaked her head over the side, with Sorun doing the same over the top of the crate. By some miracle, the building wasn't completely in the center of the square wall surrounding its perimeter. While the front was a giant compound of patrolling machines, the only thing separating the back of the building was a dirt road that stretched the entire rear side. And right dead ahead of them was the most average-looking metal door imaginable with an electronic lock bolted next to it.

A large, four-wheeled rover driven by an Egg Pawn passed by them. Rouge watched the rover drive off, counted to three, and then quickly nodded her head. "Okay, go," she whispered, and the three of them sprang out from behind the crate and ran towards the door.

The first to make a move was Sorun, who formed a Summoned Sword in his hand and used it to quickly pry off the outer casing of the electronic lock to expose the electronic internals. Next was Sally, who removed Nicole from her vest, pulled an extendable cord tipped with an electronic connector at the end from the computer, and plugged the connector in to an appropriate slot on the electronic box.

"Alright, Nicole. Think you can get it open?" Sally whispered down at the computer.

"It's a simple enough lock," the computer said back, "but I will need a moment. Please hold."

Tens of seconds passed with them standing motionlessly at the door, waiting for it to unlock. Sorun began to tap his foot anxiously on the ground while Rouge was keeping her eyes behind them and on the left side of the road.

"How long's this gonna take?" she quietly hissed. "They're gonna make another round any second now."

Click!

A small whirring sound followed by a small click drew everybody's attention. At the same time, Sorun reached over to the door and pressed down on its handle. It turned all the way without resistance, and the door swung wide open.

As this happened, however, another one of the rovers had rounded past the building's corner and was approaching them. Working quickly, Sally disconnected Nicole from the lock and stashed her back in her vest, while Sorun quickly propped the case back on the lock. Rouge held the door open for them, quickly waving at them to usher them in through the door. They quickly slipped past her, with the bat quickly but quietly closing the door right behind them.

Afterwards, the three of them had pressed their backs against the walls as they heard the rover approach them. The lights from its headlights briefly shown through the crack underneath the door, but it quickly faded once the rover drove past them. Sorun in particular let out a small breath once it left.

"Man, this is stressful," he thought as he looked forwards. The door hadn't lead them to anything special- just a narrow hallway. But in was in. "So this way?" he asked while pointing in towards the hallway.

Rouge began walking down the hall with a nod. "Yeah, this way leads to a small storage area that leads to another hallway that goes into the main lobby. We'll figure out what to do from there."

The walk through the corridor had been uneventful. The amount of light was so low that Sorun could barely see his hand in front of his face, so he had to trail behind right behind Sally just so he could follow the sounds of her footsteps. They reached another door, hacked this one open like the first, and slipped through to the door into the storage room Rouge had mentioned.

At the very least, this room had a light switch Sorun had managed to find after fumbling the wall for it. A series of light bulbs hanging on the ceiling lit up, causing Sorun to wince from the sudden influx of light. The room itself wasn't all that much. It looked more like a large broom closet full of pallets of various janitorial gear and spare electronic... things and some tools stacked everywhere. The good part was that the entrance way to the next hallway was right in front of them.

The bad part was that the entrance to the next hallway was littered with dozens of red lasers.

"Oh, that's not good," Rouge worryingly murmured as she stepped closer to examine the lasers. "Yeah, that's what I thought," she sighed before turning to the other two. "These are those special sensors Eggman loves to put all over his property. Anything organic that walks through them trips them. Works fine for robots of course, but, well..."

Sorun hummed, frowning at the lasers. He looked around the storage room in deep thought, but then something out of the corner of his vision caught his eye and he began to approach it.

"Can't we just plug Nicole in to deal with the lasers?" Sally asked as Sorun walked away from her. "Or just rewire the thing to turn them off?"

Rouge shook her head. "Circuitry's all behind the walls, and the lasers are embedded too deep in the architecture to get to them. No way to mess with them unless we somehow got to the central security center."

While they continued conversing, Sorun closed in on the object that had caught the human teen's attention. The object in question was cardboard box. It was full of spare rivets, bolts, and screws, but nonetheless it was a cardboard box. And that alone gave him an idea.

"Alright, then can we just slip past the sensors?"

"Princess, are you seeing how little space there is between those beams? Even you aren't that flexible."

"Well there's no other way-"

Sally was cut off when Sorun overturned the box of metal bits, causing them all to pour onto the floor in a chorus of metal clinks. The box thankfully emptied after a few seconds, with Sorun shaking it afterwards to dislodge any spare metal bits that hadn't fallen out. After the last bolt was freed from its cardboard confines, he looked back towards Rouge and Sally, who were staring over at him with perturbed expressions.

Undeterred by the looks they were sending him, he held the cardboard box up. "You two ready to see something stupidly simple?" he asked.

Upon their silent, blank looks, he rolled his eyes and carried the cardboard box over to the wall of lasers. Tentatively, he held out the box to the lasers, and though the box did interrupt the red lines, he didn't hear any alarms go off. He pulled the box back with a satisfied hum.

"Oh my- Sorun, do not tell me you're going to try and sneak past those inside of a cardboard box," he heard Rouge groan out from behind him.

"I won't say it, but I'm still gonna do it," Sorun said as he crouched down while holding the box over him. "Unless one of you two has a better idea of course."

"Sorun, maybe you should wait-" he heard Sally begin, but by then he'd already dropped the box over him.

The chipmunk's words died in her throat, and she stepped back with a sigh as she saw the box slowly slide forwards as Sorun pushed it from the inside. Rouge had a conflicted look on her face that was crossed between wanting to rush forwards and pull Sorun back and just running right now, perhaps in fear that he was about to trip the sensors, and Sally began to fidget as she feared the same.

But nothing happened as the box Sorun was crouching inside of passed the lasers. In fact, both of the Mobian's jaws dropped open entirely when Sorun's box made it all the way to the other side of the lasers. After crouch-walking a few steps past those lasers, Sorun stood back up to his feet while removing the box from him. He turned back to the two girls, a neutral but otherwise accomplished look on his face, and then set the cardboard box on the ground only to kick it past the lasers to the two.

"I still can't believe that dumb trick worked..."

"You shouldn't underestimate the power of the cardboard box, Rouge," Sorun admonished as the trio walked down the hallway following the laser trap. "The cardboard box is the ultimate tool for stealth infiltration. Light, compact, easy to hide inside. Nobody ever expects you to hide in a cardboard box. It's unassuming to the witless and at the same time too obvious to the witted. It's perfect."

He heard an exasperated sigh from the spy walking in front of him. "Sorun. It's a box. This isn't just coming from somebody both formally and informally trained in the art of stealth and espionage. This is coming from somebody coming with common sense, too. It's just a box."

"A box that got us past those lasers."

Rouge didn't bother to deign that with a response, but she didn't need to. Sorun knew he was right.

"Speaking of which, Sorun," he heard Sally from behind him begin to ask, "why are you still carrying it?"

Well, of course he wasn't just going to abandon the perfect stealth tool back in that supply room. Not with the stakes they were playing with right now. So Sorun was currently carrying the cardboard box in front of him with both of his hands. It may have been cumbersome, but in his eyes it was worth it.

"Because I'm not gonna abandon the cardboard box to that dingy storeroom," he told Sally while craning his neck back to look at her. "It's been too good to us. It doesn't deserve that kind of treatment."

He saw Sally squint her eyes in confusion. "I think you're putting too much stock into a normal box, Sorun."

"You wouldn't understand. You were only in that box for so long," Sorun huffed as he faced back forwards. "You should spend more time in the box, Sally. Then you'll understand the magic. The magic of the box."

"I... don't think I want to understand."

"Then forever remain ignorant of the box."

They continued walking forwards for around another minute until another female voice spoke out from inside of Sally's vest. "I thought that Sorun's idea of camouflaging your biological signatures with a cardboard box was rather intuitive," Nicole said.

"Ugh, finally. Thank you , Nicole." He knew that if anybody could appreciate the teachings of Solid Snake, it would be her. His one true gamer friend amidst the rest of these uncultured people. The only person that could think on his level and that could completely relate to him in matters such as these.

There were amused smirks and eye-rolls all around the group, but their expressions turned back to serious, focused looks once they reached the end of the hallway. One hacked doorway later, and they slipped through yet another door into what Rouge had described as the building's main lobby.

The lobby looked about as one would expect a lobby to look: large, open room with a reception desk in the center and with stairs leading up to a second level near the back. There were large, square, metal pillars lining each side of the room, too, all in front of doors under the floor of the upper level leading to more rooms. The human, two Mobians, and computer came out of one of those doors, and then immediately set to moving towards and taking cover by the nearest pillar.

Peaking his head out from behind the pillar, Sorun had to suppress a groan when he looked out into the lobby. Egg Pawns were roaming around the place. More than a dozen Egg Pawns painted a navy blue with large, almost comically oversized truncheons in their robotic hands patrolled the lobby, and that was just on the first floor. If he listened closely, he could hear the thud of even more robotic footsteps on the second level of the lobby above them.

"Well, here's our new problem," Rouge whispered to them as she peaked out from the other side of the pillar. "Pretty safe to say every single door in this building is going to be locked. Nicole can bypass them all for us, sure, but there's so many Egg Pawns patrolling down here that we're not gonna have a large enough window to stand next to a door without one seeing us."

"Taking them out still not an option?" Sally questioned.

"No, too risky. Might raise an alert if they don't check in or if something notices them off patrol," Rouge said with a shake of her head. She looked up towards the second level, and a small smile grew on her face. "You know, interesting thing about elevators. People almost never lock them. And it looks like when Eggman took over and retrofitted this building he never saw fit to. Look."

Both Sally and Sorun followed Rouge's gaze. Up on the second floor was a indentation in the wall that lead to a well-lit side room, with six elevator doors on each side of the wall in that room. Every so often an Egg Pawn would patrol past that room, but none would ever so much as step foot inside of it.

"You seriously want to take the elevators up?" Sorun incredulously asked as he turned to the white bat. "There isn't a less conspicuous way up? Like the stairs?"

"If you want to go up a hundred floors worth of stairs to the top-"

"So tell me about these elevators," Sorun quickly interrupted. "Why won't we get caught using them?"

"Think of it like your precious box," Rouge reasoned as she glanced her teal eyes at the box Sorun had set down next to him. "It's so obvious that nobody would ever think to use it. And the last time I was here Eggman didn't bother putting so much as a camera in those things. Elevators are completely clear."

Sorun raised his eyebrows. "But you don't know if he changed the elevator security."

Rouge sighed, and then looked back at the elevators. "Quick lesson on tactical espionage, Sorun. Sometimes you just don't have the intel you need, and sometimes you just don't have a better alternative but to take a chance. In this case both of those are true. So we take a chance on the elevators. A chance I feel very confident about because, trust me, they never think secure the elevators."

It wasn't the most faultless logic in the world, but he wasn't the master spy that could break into anything. And Nicole and Sally weren't giving them any better alternatives. Hell, it was a kind of logic Sorun had adopted playing stealth games, but he really didn't want to bring examples like that into this very real and life-threatening mission where he didn't have quicksave.

Alright, fine, elevators it was then.

"Any suggestions on how we're getting to those elevators?" Sally asked. "Those patrols are looking a little too dense for comfort."

"Well, there's no cameras," Rouge quietly noted as her eyes scanned the lobby. "We got that going for us. I can just wait for a break in the patrolling Badniks' sight and fly up to the ceiling, and then wait for an opportunity to get to the elevators."

Sally, for her part, looked up towards the lobby's ceiling. "There's a lot of scaffolding up there," she said. "I can grapple up there and just climb across, but I don't know if Sorun's agile enough to climb if I brought him with."

"Yeah, and there's no way you're gonna be able to use those swords. Too noticeable."

Valid points from both of them, as much as it hurt Sorun to silently admit. But while he may not have had something like wings or superhuman agility, he had the next best thing sitting right next to him: a cardboard box.

"You let me worry about that," he said as he patted the box next to him. "I'll just sneak over there in the box."

Rouge snapped her head back to the teen. "Sorun, no, that's stupid. Think of something else."

Affronted eyes turned towards Rouge. "Box'll work."

"It's not gonna-"

"Rouge, Jesus, they're robots, they're patrolling in set patterns. All I gotta do is look at the patterns, go forwards, wait when a robot gets near, and keep going when it leaves," Sorun argued.

"And if they look at the suspicious box that keeps moving around for some reason?"

"They're not gonna look at the box! It's a box!"

"That is exactly what I am saying- !"

"Would both of you quit it?" Sally harshly hissed, causing the both of them to quiet down. She looked to Sorun. "Do you really think you can do this?" she asked him, tone serious. "You know what happens if you get made?"

Sorun quietly gulped. Possibly overrun, taken prisoner. Or worse. Likely so much worse. Which was why he wouldn't be offering to do this if he wasn't confident. "I'm sure," he said with a nod.

She let a slow breath, and then turned to Rouge. "Let's trust him with this," Sally said. "Let him make it to the elevators first, then we'll go down and call one."

The look on Rouge's face made it seem like she had many reservations over the plan, but she finally gave the pair a stiff nod. "Alright, fine. Don't screw it up, Sorun."

Because that didn't add any pressure on him at all.

As they had planned, Rouge had examined the patrol routes and had flown up towards the ceiling when she saw a break in the sight lines. Sally, similarly, used her grappling gun to climb all the way to the scaffolding bolted to the ceiling, where she scampered across towards the end near the elevator in yet another example of agility far superior to Sorun. All that left was Sorun. Sorun and his cardboard box.

He took a deep breath. "Okay, man. You got this. You've done it a hundred times before in a hundred different stealth games. You're even going up against AI, too. AI way smarter than video game AI, maybe, but they're nothing like Nicole. They wouldn't be going back and forth in those patterns if they were. Just examine the patterns. Find the breaks. Move forwards slowly but methodically. And don't fuck it up because we're all done for if you do."

Pale hands reached out to grab the box next to him. He could do this.

"This is never gonna work," Rouge quietly groaned as she ran a hand along her face. The white bat, floating up near the ceiling, watched the human teen below in what amounted to a mixture of dread at the impending alarm and disbelief at the levels of foolishness happening down below her. "He's not gonna last a minute sneaking around in that."

"Just give him a chance," said Sally, perched at the end of the scaffolding next to the floating bat. She, too, was nervously looking down at the teen. "It's not the worst idea in the world, and Sorun sounded confident in the idea. You know how rarely he ever sounds confident in anything?"

It was rare enough that Rouge didn't even know it was a possible occurrence, but even so, she wouldn't relent on the idiocy of using that box. "He can't even see out of that thing," she argued.

"Sure he can. There's a little handle slot on the sides for him to peek out of," Sally reasoned. "And he has a point. Those are just Egg Pawns down there, and it's not like their AI is notorious for being overly intelligent and analytical. As long as he goes slow and knows what he's doing, it should be fine."

She had a point, as much as Rouge would begrudgingly admit. She was still making plans in the back of her mind on how to escape for when the alarms were inevitably sounded.

The teen below them began moving in his box. The box would stop and press down on the ground to conceal the feet beneath it when a security Egg Pawn would walk past, but as soon as it passed the box completely Sorun continued to move.

To Rouge's complete shock, the plan was working. He'd had to stop multiple times, but no matter how many Egg Pawns saw that box, or even walked near it, not so much as a single one even appeared to pay any mind to the box. He'd even made it up to the steps to the second level without so much as an issue, and he was moving slowly towards the elevators with the same ease he had making it to the stairs in the first place.

"I can't believe it." Years of experience told her that the box was such a bad idea that it shouldn't be entertained. Years of experience told her that using a cardboard box as a disguise was a surefire way to get discovered by the enemy. Her very common sense told her that under no circumstance was hiding as a box that would move around when nobody was looking a safe and reliable means of conducting stealth behind enemy lines.

And yet, somehow, Sorun had inched his way past all those robotic guards in nothing but a cardboard box.

"What was that you were saying about the box?" The speed at which Rouge turned towards Sally was downright lethargic, and she couldn't hold in the sigh when she saw the smug look being sent at her. "Because from what I'm seeing the box is looking pretty effective. Maybe Sorun's onto something here."

Rouge's wings slowed in their flapping as the bat lowered towards the elevators. "It only worked because they're robots," she muttered under her breath, gritting her teeth when she heard the mocking giggle above her.

If there had been a stealth game out there, he'd played it to perfection. Metal Gear, Splinter Cell, Assassin's Creed, Hitman, Deus Ex, and every other stealth game under the sun. He got his hands on a game. He mastered the game. And over the years this proved to be easier and easier as he gained a deeper understanding to the mechanics and rules that were universal across stealth games and their AI.

Hiding against the Chaotix and training stealth with Espio had gone to show Sorun that these skills weren't at all that useful. The tricks he'd learned in those games simply didn't apply to real life and real people. Living people heard and noticed a lot more than those games gave people credit for, and were much more investigative and responsive towards anything out of place. Hiding in shadows didn't automatically make you invisible. Plainly speaking, stealth was much more difficult to pull off against people than what the video games he'd played showed.

But these weren't people. They were robots. Robots with AI that followed rudimentary functions that, while they may be advanced due to being made by Eggman, still had hard rules to follow concerning patrolling and keeping out for intruders. Hard rules that could be exploited for their faults if one with a trained eye looked hard enough.

And for once in his goddamned life since coming to Mobius Sorun was able to actually use that trained eye accrued from all those video games to make it to the elevators. Above all that, though, he had a cardboard box.

They never stood a chance, really.

The teen stepped out of the box, walked up to one of the elevators on the left side of the wall, and hit a button on the control panel. The elevator silently rumbled to life as it sent the elevator down, and while waiting Sorun pressed his back against the wall while crossing his arms. Right as he heard the elevator doors open he looked to the side and saw the teenage princess and spy walk right up to him, to which he pointed a thumb at the open elevator.

"Ladies first," he quipped, though he made extra sure to give Rouge a look full of as much vindication as he could muster. The bat, in response, merely rolled her eyes and stepped into the elevator with Sally. Sorun entered last, turning around and forlornly looking at the box sitting in the middle of the elevator room.

"What, you're leaving your almighty box behind?" he heard Rouge remark from behind him.

"Won't fit in the elevator," he answered back. "Give me a minute to say goodbye to it?"

Rouge regarded him for about a single second, and then reached past him to press the button for the top floor of the building. "No."

The doors closed as the elevator began to rise up, and Sorun gave the bat a dejected slump of his shoulders. "I'll never see that box again. You've forever deprived me of a heartfelt farewell with that box. That box is the only reason we've gotten so far. You..." His stone-serious face collapsed when a short laugh left him, causing Sorun to shake his head. "I'm just messin' around. 'S just a box."

Rouge made a scoff with an eye roll, but he saw the corners of her mouth pick up slightly. Sally was less subtle about her amusement with the smile she made. Sorun smirked as well, and then leaned on one of the metal bars on the elevator's side as it rose up.

Nothing was said between the group as they watched the digital number above the elevator doors slowly count upwards. At some point a slow jazz melody began to flood in from the speakers as they climbed up and up. Sally didn't show any reaction to the music. Sorun slightly cringed from the sound, and he saw that Rouge was tapping her foot to the music's beat.

The jazz cut out when the elevator stopped right on the fiftieth floor. The elevator itself stopped moving, too.

Everybody blinked their eyes in surprise, and then snapped their gazes towards the floor counter on top of the elevator doors. Before anybody could say anything, a high-pitched, electronic voice rang out from the speakers above.

"Hello!" it cheerily greeted. "You are currently on the -fiftieth floor-." Its tone grew monotonous when it said the floor number. "Please present proper identification in order to proceed to the -hundredth floor-. Thank you. Glory to the Eggman Empire."

It cut out right as a small slot just big enough for a card to fit in opened up on the elevator's button panel. While Rouge glowered down at the slot, Sorun sent her a withering glare.

"'They didn't put security on the elevators, guys, there's no way'," Sorun said in a mock tone of Rouge's voice. "'No way, no how. We're aces.'"

Rouge took a deep breath. "How about less mocking and more helping, huh, Sorun?"

Fair enough, he decided. "So there's no way to move without a card?"

"Doesn't look like it." Rouge moved closer to examine the button console, but when she hit a button, nothing happened. "Yeah, you need an ID to get to the higher floors. We're stuck here until security comes to check on us if we take too long." She hummed. "Dunno if Nicole could hack this, either. The panel in here just controls the cable winch for the elevator, and we're probably locked out. Actual door controls are on the outside."

"I could try prying the doors open with a Summoned Sword."

She shook her head. "No, doors are still powered. Even if you could get a good grip I doubt we could get them opened."

"Guys, what about this?"

The two turned towards Sally, who was pointing up at the ceiling. Their eyes traveled up from the finger to the roof of the elevator, where there was a small hatch. One thrown Summoned Sword later and the hatch was off completely, leaving a small, square hole.

A very small, square hole.

"I'm betting that there's a maintenance shaft or vent or something in the actual elevator shaft that leads to the other side," she told them. "One of us could take Nicole, get her to the other side, and have her open the door from there."

"It's a good a plan as any," Rouge admitted with a nod. "Don't think I'll be able to fit through that, though. My wings will just get caught."

Sorun gave off a contemplative hum. He was skinny enough to fit through easily, but he wasn't thrilled about the idea of climbing around an elevator shaft. And that was while holding onto Nicole. He'd rather not drop himself and/or Nicole to their respective deaths because of butter fingers.

"Looks like you're up, Sally," he said.

"Looks like it," she agreed. The chipmunk bent her knees slightly, and then jumped up towards the hole in the ceiling. She grabbed the edges with both of her hands, and then rolled her body forwards so that she flew through the hole legs-first. She landed on top of the elevator and called down to the other two, "I'll see if I can get to the other side to open the doors! Just hold on for a bit!"

So that was that. Sorun and Rouge were stuck in the elevator until Sally pulled through and freed the both of them. The remaining pair glanced at each other, and then wordlessly chose to sit down on the elevator floor as they waited.

Not one to let boredom set in, Sorun decided that he'd try talking with the bat. And not knowing where else to start, he decided to go with the elevator music as an opening.

"So... ya like jazz?"

At the topmost floor of the tower were a multitude of rooms that contained display cases and stands for various trophies and other pieces. One room was wider and more open than any of the other, but while there were multiple displays lining the room and other pedestals holding various objects littering the area, the center of this particular room was otherwise empty.

This remained true until a peculiar warbling sound of space tearing apart rang throughout the room, followed by loud footsteps as somebody carried a heavy object towards the center of the room.

"I'm never gonna understand what Shadow sees in this thing," the individual, a human covered in a red cloak, grunted as he set down the motorcycle he'd been carrying over his shoulder. Rubrum hummed, and then grabbed the motorcycle and moved it closer towards the middle of the room. "Eh, that should be close enough," he mumbled to himself. His hooded face looked down at the side of the motorcycle, and then he gasped. "Ah, shit, I forgot the sidecar. Sorun needs that."

He turned around and ran back in the direction he came from. The sound of space being torn apart rang through the room once again, and a minute later rang through a third time as Rubrum ran back to the motorcycle while holding a sidecar.

"Fuck fuck fuck, how do I put this thing on?" he heatedly muttered as he crouched down to inspect the side of the motorcycle and sidecar. "Okay, so there are four holes here at the end of the sidecar's bar, that lines up with these holes on the bike here... dammit, I'm not a mechanic." His head picked up. "Wait, there was that book on that workbench next to where I found the bike! That probably says what to do!"

Rubrum spun on his heels, and then once again ran back to where he came from.

"All I'm saying is that there's a lot of subtle intricacies to jazz that is severely underappreciated within the jazz enthusiast community."

"Huh." Sorun could safely say he knew more about jazz than he ever wanted to know. He was still internally debating with himself if he should have lead with that question or not.

Because there were all sorts of things that Sorun was interested in learning about Rouge. How she got into the spy gig, what working at G.U.N. had been like before the Eggman occupation, or even how she managed to fly when those wings she had were so small. Something to pass the time waiting for Sally to open the doors. But he had to ask about her taste in music.

Apparently she was very knowledgeable on the subject.

"Well, Rouge... that was certainly fascinating," Sorun drawled out as his head rolled in the direction of the elevator doors. "And somehow through all that Sally didn't get the doors open."

"She's doing fine. Just give her some time." He was glad Rouge could just wave away the issue like nothing, because he was getting nervous. "So. Sorun. I told you something about me. Tell me something about you."

His head rolled back to the bat. "What did you wanna know?"

"Mm, just something. How about your name? 'Sorun'. I've met a lot of humans over at G.U.N. and none of them ever had a name like that. Is it something common in your zone?"

Honestly, he was surprised this kind of question hadn't come up sooner. Everybody he met on Mobius had just gone along with his name. "Nah, it was a weird name back on Earth, too," he said with a shake of his head. "It's Latin. Latin being a dead language where I'm from," he elaborated when he saw Rouge's confused face.

"So... you're Latin?" she asked.

"Hah, no, not really. See, uh... where do I start with this?" he mumbled. "So, my mom's a doctor. And in the medical field they use Latin for a lot of the medical terminology since Latin's a dead language, meaning the words and their meanings never change so all the terminology can remain consistent. And I guess when she was learning all of this in med school it really stuck with her, 'cause for some reason whenever she names something she uses a Latin name. Including me," he said with a sigh. "I don't even know what it means other than it's Latin."

Rouge nodded in understanding. "Oh, I get it. Your mom seems like a really... interesting person."

"Yeah, she was. IS," Sorun quickly corrected. "She, she is. Really cool. I miss her a lot." His knees pressed against his chest as his head dipped downwards. "I miss everything over there."

"... Are you still worried about not being able to go back because of-?"

"I don't want to think about that right now, Rouge."

Thankfully, she got the message and tried a change of subject. "So what about your dad?"

And just like that, Sorun hopped right up to his feet. "What's taking Sally so long with those doors?"

As if the universe was just waiting for him to ask that question again, the doors opened right after Sorun complained about them yet again. As expected, Sally was on the other side and holding Nicole, who was plugged into the control panel on the other side.

"Sorry if I took a bit," Sally apologized as the other two climbed out of the elevator. "I had to climb up the elevator's cable until I found a vent, but then I got a bit turned around in the ductwork. We managed to work our way back to you, though." She turned towards Rouge. "So, let me guess. Stair time?"

For a few moments Rouge continued to eye Sorun, but eventually she shook her head and turned to address Sally. "Yeah, we're gonna have to since the elevators are out," she said. "We're gonna have to look around a bit to see if we can find a stairwell."

"You think it's through here? Past this door with the word 'stairwell' printed right above it?" The two girls turned their heads down to the end of the room full of elevator doors, where they saw Sorun standing and pointing at a door. As he said, "stairwell" was printed in block lettering above the door. "Seems out there, but what do I know?"

"Yes, Sorun, I would say that it's a safe bet that the stairs are past that door," Rouge remarked as she and Sally walked over to his position. "The door locked?"

He looked down and gripped the handle. To his surprise, it turned completely without any issue. "You guys won't believe this, but it's actually unlocked," he said with a small laugh as the door swung open. He took a step forwards, saying, "Jeez, I can't believe they leave the door-"

For some reason, gravity started to carry him downwards when he walked into the room. When he looked down, he immediately saw why: there was no floor.

Yelling out in shock and panic, Sorun flailed his limbs around wildly as he began falling forwards. Thankfully, he felt something grab onto his arm and halt him from falling right before his other foot left the ground. Panting heavily, he looked behind him to see Sally standing at the edge with him, her hands grasping at his wrist.

After being pulled back into the doorway, Sorun gave Sally a very rapid nod as he continued to gasp heavily. "Ah, ah thanks. Thanks a million, Sally."

"Anytime." She clapped him on the shoulder and gave him a playful smile. "Look down next time, huh?"

His only response was to give her a thumbs-up before he straightened back up and approached the door's edge again- making sure to grab the side of the door so that he wouldn't accidentally fall in. Sally and Rouge stepped next to him and peered down as well, with all three of them blanching when they saw the room in its entirety.

The room was so large that it looked like it encompassed nearly the entire fiftieth floor, to the point that Sorun could just barely see the left and right ends of the room. The missing floor revealed a chasm that looked like it went down five whole floors, but even with the poor lighting he could see the large, metal spikes pointing upwards that completely covered the ground all the way down there.

On the upside, they could see the door that actually lead to the stairs on the opposite wall. It was just hanging in the air since there was no flooring, but there was a window on that door that quite clearly showed part of a stairwell through it. But there was about a twenty-five foot gap between them and that door, with nothing but a bed of spike awaiting in the pit below.

"Who designs a building like this...?" Sorun muttered in wonder as he looked down at the spikes. "This is just... why ?"

"One of Eggman's traps," Sally muttered besides him. "We're actually lucky that we managed to skip most of them with the elevator. He's infamous for putting all sorts of traps in all of his structures?"

"Sure, but a spike trap? A spike trap , man?"

With a sigh, Sally nodded. "This is actually pretty tame compared to most of the traps he makes. Usually it's things like lasers, pneumatic crushers, water traps, cages... spikes. Spike traps. Spiked pneumatic crushers. You get used to this kind of thing after a while."

Sorun was starting to wonder how close he actually was when he made that cartoon analogy back when he talked with Eggman. He'd only been half-serious at the time, but now he was really starting to wonder if he actually managed to hit the mark on the head. Because this was sheer lunacy.

"It looks like this is the only door on this floor, too," Rouge mentioned as she looked back into the elevator room. "Figures. Fiftieth floor is a stopgap for people without IDs. Even if they get out of the elevator they're still trapped unless they make it to the vents like Sally did." She looked into the spike trap room and at the door. "I wouldn't be surprised if he put the entrance to the stairwell over this spike pit just to taunt somebody."

He probably did, because Sorun felt it working on him. "Well, we need to get to those stairs," he said.

"Sure, but how?" Rouge asked. "I can just fly over there, but that's not a distance you or Sally can just jump over. Nowhere to grapple to, either."

Sorun nodded, and then flashed the spy a grin as an idea came to him. "I got it covered."

"Okay, found the manual," Rubrum mumbled to himself as he stepped back next to the bike. "Ah, man, this thing's like three-hundred pages," he said as he flipped through the book. "Okay, index... sidecar... where's the- oh, here."

He made an irritable hum, flipped through some more pages, and then stopped when he found the correct page. He looked over the words, and then slightly crumpled the whole book upon learning some distressing information.

"Dammit, I need some bolts!? Ugh, okay, there was more stuff on that workbench."

Once more, he ran back.

"Sorun, are you sure these things won't break?"

"Uh... yeah," Sorun assured Sally as he did his best not to look down. "Just don't stomp on them or anything."

"Sorun!"

"Sally, they're not fragile! Much. They can break, but they're not gonna break from you stepping on them!"

It was remarkable how many problems he'd been solving with his Summoned Swords without using them for their intended purpose, i.e. stab something. Take what he had done here for instance: making a rope bridge completely out of Summoned Swords to connect the doorway to the entrance to the stairwell.

Seeing as it was completely made of spectral swords, it wasn't pretty. The floor boards were swords, the guard rope was all swords horizontally stacked against each other, and it was all held up by even more Summoned Swords. Sorun was really glad these things could float, because otherwise this would have never worked.

Insert Sally and Sorun, who were slowly walking across the bridge of swords with Sally up in front with Sorun just behind her. Rouge was floating near the door leading to the stairwell, having gotten it open and was currently waiting for the pair. Sally had elected to grip any handles she saw on the guard rails made of swords, Sorun doing the same behind her, and slowly both of them were walking with one foot in the other as they crossed on planks made of spectral swords.

Sally had looked slightly nervous at the prospect when he pitched the idea, but her expression was slowly melting into easiness as she crossed further and further. Sorun's face was perpetually nerve-wracked, and Rouge was smiling in mild amusement at the both of them as they slowly inched their way closer to the door.

"Try not to look so worried there, Sorun," Rouge advised the human as she let out a small chuckle. "It would be a real shame if you lost your concentration and all those swords just suddenly went poof, you know?"

"Rouge, shut up," Sally snapped as her grip on one the of the sword's handles tightened.

"Oh, don't worry, Sally, if you fall I'll catch you. Can't say the same for Sorun, but he's got magic swords. He'd be fine."

Sorun found himself rolling his eyes. He technically would, but he wasn't going to give her the satisfaction of admitting it. "You're enjoying this, aren't you, Rouge?"

"Me?" She held her hands to her chest in mock hurt. "Why, I would never find any enjoyment in seeing you both treacherously trod through a shoddily-built bridge made of swords right over certain death. Perish the thought."

"Yeah, I'd like to see you make a bridge out of swords just by thinking about it," Sorun shot back. "This ain't easy."

"Oh, yeah? How hard is it, then?"

Admittedly, not much. All he had really done was just make a mental picture of a bridge made of Summoned Swords while thinking about his Summoned Swords. But he wasn't going to give her more ammo to work with against him. "Ah, you know. Hard. About as hard as it looks."

She didn't look convinced in the slightest. "Uh-huh. Just try and not think about how bad Sally will feel if she falls because your swords broke. Because then they might actually break."

Sally began to grow irate. "Rouge...!"

"Or falling. Don't think about that, either."

" Rouge !"

"Sal, relax, you're at the end," Rouge said as the chipmunk reached the end of the sword bridge. She practically leapt off of it and onto the stairwell right after she reached the end, and Sorun wasn't far from doing the same thing as he stepped off the bridge right behind her.

The bridge of swords shattered right after Rouge flew into the stairwell with them, closing the door behind her. Both Sorun and Sally took a deep breath from the ordeal, and then looked at each other and gave themselves a small nod before they looked up along with Rouge. As to be expected, there was nothing but stairs. Metal stairs that lead all the way up to the top.

And unfortunately for Sorun, he was good enough at math to know what plus fifty equaled a hundred- the floor they needed to go to. "We seriously gotta climb fifty flights of stairs?" he groaned with slumped shoulders.

"It's only fifty flights," Sally said, a tinge of confusion to her voice. "That's not many at all. We'll be fine."

"Well, I know I'll be fine," Rouge informed them. "Since I'm just flying up."

Slowly but loudly exhaling out of his mouth, Sorun hung his head as he walked towards the first step. He already knew how much of a disaster this was gonna be.

Crouching down next to the motorcycle, Rubrum looked towards the sidecar, and then to the manual he held in his left hand, before finally landing on the pile of bolts in front of him.

"Okay, so... insert bolt C into intersecting holes A through D as indicated in the picture..." he read out. "Bolt C? What the hell? The only bolts I found in that garage were B-bolts!"

Groaning loudly, he looked towards the entrance of the room, which was thankfully still empty. He looked back down at the bike.

"They're gonna get here any minute," he angrily whispered. "Screw it, I don't have time to solve a damn puzzle. I'm jamming them in." He picked up a bolt and began to forcibly insert it into the holes to connect the sidecar and bike with his bare hands. "It's gonna strip the holes, but if it works it works, so I don't care. It's not my bike anyways."

"Damn athletic chipmunk and flying bat..."

These were the times he hated the most. The times where the people around him were so physically superior to him because of simple body mechanics and gene bomb tomfoolery. Maybe Chaos energy, too? He didn't know. He didn't care. He was tired.

First fifteen floors had went fine. Sixteen to twenty was bit harder. Twenty-one to thirty had been a struggle. He had to stop at forty.

He'd dropped down to all fours due to having been so exhausted by the time he'd reached fortieth flight of stairs. The familiar feeling of pained lungs and the stress of heavy breathing was greeting him once again just like it always did during one of Sonic's training runs.

"You doing alright, Sorun?" He tried to squash down that small amount of shame that rose up in him when he saw Sally kneel down in front of his fallen form. It didn't work. "You don't look so good."

She looked fine. Extremely fine. Wasn't even so much as winded. He blamed her limbs that deceptively hid her well-developed muscles.

Mobians had it all, he swore.

"I'm... I'm good," Sorun gasped out as slowly got up to his knees. "Just... all these stairs."

Sally held a hand out to him, and Sorun took it so that she could help him up to his feet. "And here I was thinking all that running Sonic is having you do was helping with your stamina."

"Oh, it is," Sorun tiredly assured her. "If this was a week ago I would have collapsed two flights earlier."

She gave him a forced smile. "That's... an improvement? I think?"

"It's more than nothing." Sorun breathed out a large sigh. "You gotta give me break. I ran off a diet of mainly french fries back on Earth."

"That doesn't sound like a very nutritious diet at all."

"You're right, it wasn't. But it got me through the day." And damn if they didn't taste great. Until his endurance became a requisite for surviving in this world it seemed like a great idea to live off that french fry diet. Even now he was still debating with himself if it was worth it or not.

Sally rolled her eyes, and then gestured for Sorun to follow her as they continued climbing steps. "You're as bad as Sonic is with food," she claimed.

"Oh, no. You don't get to lump me in with him when he keeps shoving those hate crimes in a bun down his throat," Sorun panted as he climbed the stairs right behind Sally. "French fries are an art form. Those chili dogs are... they're... they're trash... slow down, I need another minute."

Apparently he hadn't recovered as much as he thought he had from the climb up to this point, so Sorun was forced to stop halfway up another set of stairs to lean over the stair railing. He heard Sally go back to approach him, but he was too embarrassed and exhausted to turn his head to look at her.

"Are you gonna make it the rest of the way?" she asked him.

"It's like eight more flights. I can do it." He said that, but he really didn't feel like he could make that distance. He must not have looked like he could, either, when he could feel the doubtful look Sally was casting on him.

"You know, if you want I can just carry you the rest of the way," she offered. "It'd probably be smart for you to conserve energy for the rest of the mission."

"No. No-no-no, I'm fine. I can do it." That wasn't happening. He felt like everybody already had low views of him, but what were they gonna say if it got out a princess had to carry him up stairs? A princess that was way more fit than him, but still. He'd never live something like that down.

Plus Nicole was right there in her pocket. He refused to look so pathetic in front of her. He'd make it up the rest of those stairs even if it killed him.

That was the plan, at least, until he finished climbing up the flight of stairs he stopped at before collapsing at the top. He didn't even have to say anything before Sally bent down to pick him up.

"Oh my, what's this?" he heard Rouge jeer as the pair of them finally made it to the top. "I miss something while waiting for you two up here?"

Sorun couldn't hold in the embarrassed groan that left him after hearing this. Of course the first thing Rouge would think to say once she saw Sally walk up the stairs carrying Sorun bridal style would be something like that.

Why did he have to be carried bridal style? It couldn't have been something at least a little more dignified? She couldn't have just slung him over her shoulder or something like that? He would have taken her just grabbing one of his limbs and dragging him up the rest of the way compared to this, even if this way was really comfortable. But that comfort wasn't worth the embarrassment.

Fortunately, Sally let go of him right there and slowly placed him on his feet. "Guys, please don't tell anybody back at Knothole about this," he asked them.

"What, you're asking us to keep this all to ourselves and miss out on what people would say?" the bat teased him.

Sorun opened his mouth to counter her, but when he came up with nothing, he indignantly shook his head and walked towards the door leading out of the stairwell. "Whatever, let's just go." He wasn't going to press the issue. She was likely just kidding around with him, anyways.

Hopefully she was.

The door leading out of the stairwell led to a small maintenance hallway, which in of itself was barren of any noticeable features besides another door nearby. Behind that door, though, was the interesting room. Being a maintenance door, it opened right in the middle of another, more larger, hallway. And at the far end of that hallway was two of Egg Pawns painted to look like security guards standing side-by-side to large, wooden double doors that were decorated with golden filigree.

Every single gamer sense Sorun had was telling him that the large, golden doors were important.

"And with that, I think we hit bingo," Rouge whispered as she peeked out to look in the direction Sorun was staring in. She seemed to have the same idea he had by the way her eyes lit up. "Only problem I'm seeing is the two guards next to the door and the cameras."

"Cameras?" At Sorun's question, Rouge pointed up to a spot near the ceiling. Indeed, right in the middle of the hallway wall where they were was a spherical camera installed on the ceiling slowly swiveling left and right, with another camera right across from it. He hadn't even seen those.

"Okay, it looks like we're right under one of the cameras, so we can avoid that one by staying in its blind spot easy enough," Rouge began. "Alright, yeah. Sorun, Sally, when the camera across from us turns all the way to the right, hug the wall and go left towards where those big doors are. I'd bet anything that the room we're looking for is past them."

"And what about you?" Sally asked.

"Gonna go take care of the guards before you get there." Her bat wings slowly began to flap. "Not really worried about check-ins when we're this close to the goal, so we should be good. And they're the only two up here anyways. I'm gonna fly up and deal with them now. Don't get caught by the cameras."

And like that, she slinked away from their position hiding behind the door and flew up towards the ceiling right as the camera across from them passed. His head still peaking out, Sorun tried looking up to the darkened ceiling to find any sign of where Rouge had flown to, but he couldn't even so much as see any movement.

The shearing sound of metal being cleaved apart took his attention away from the ceiling and drew it back towards the gilded doors. The Egg Pawn who had been patrolling on the left side of the door was crumpled onto the ground, its body completely cut in half to reveal sparking circuitry as it went offline. Standing above the defeated robot, to Sorun's amazement, was Rouge, one hand placed on her cocked-to-the-side hip as she looked across at the other Egg Pawn.

It was right when the robot began turning to investigate the noise of its companion being cut down did Rouge leap right at it. She'd kicked out with her right leg at a speed Sorun could barely perceive and, to his even further amazement, managed to cut through the other Egg Pawn completely. Rouge paid the robot barely any mind, and by the time its two halves fell all the way to the ground she had begun to work on the door.

"She managed to kick them in half. With just her leg." Sorun was momentarily taken out of his thoughts when Sally tapped on his shoulder and pointed up at the camera across from them that was turning right. He nodded, and they both slipped out from their hiding spot by the door and pressed their backs to the wall as they began moving towards the door. "I didn't even see her get over there. She stealthed her way to the door like it was nothing." And here he'd thought that his trick with the cardboard box had been good, but he wasn't sure he could ever match that level skill. He surely didn't think he'd ever get to a point he'd be able to kick robots in half.

He guessed she wasn't some government-type agent or whatever G.U.N. classified itself as for nothing if that was the kind of stuff she could do.

"Door was locked with a good old fashioned lock. I picked it open," Rouge told them as they finally reached her position.

"Aw, what, didn't want me to handle it?" Sorun half-joked as both he and Sally peeled themselves off the wall.

Rouge shrugged. "You were taking forever to get here. And you're only halfway decent at lockpicking."

"Tch, c'mon. I don't even break the picks anymore. Most of the time."

"On the basic locks, maybe." The white bat reached forwards and pushed the doors open. "Anyway, who cares? We're in."

He couldn't argue that point. He wasn't sure he could even if he wanted to, anyways, as his voice caught in his throat once they entered the room past the doors.

The atmosphere inside this room was completely different from how the rest of the building had felt. Where the lighting in everywhere else had been low-light and rather poor, the lights hanging off the ceiling in this room illuminated everything and was almost warm in their glow. Where the walls had been cold, solid metal, here it was bright linoleum tiles lining the floor and high-quality wallpaper covering all the walls to give it an appearance of wood.

It was big, too. So big there were thin walls without any doors separating the room into multiple sections, but Sorun was paying less attention to all that and more attention to all of the items the rooms were holding.

Lining the walls all around were displays, cases, and stands holding all sorts of important-looking things. Paintings, pieces of paper and scroll-esque items being displayed in glass cases. Statues and other artistic structures on stands. Artifacts that looked like they were made from a wide variety of cultures that looked like they belonged in a museum more than some madman's tower.

And Sorun would probably appreciate it all more if he actually recognized a single thing they walked past.

"Any of you know what any of this stuff is?" Sorun asked as he stopped by a glass case containing a large, golden mask displaying a depiction of... some kind of Mobian something or other. A cat or a tiger or some other feline. He couldn't really tell.

"Hard to say. There's stuff here from various settlements and tribes all around Mobius over here, and in that room over there I'm seeing some Overlander and human things," Rouge told him as they walked into another room. This one, of course, had even more artifacts that Sorun didn't recognize. "I think I recognize some pieces. A few of these are some old, outdated weapons used during the Great War. Others are cultural pieces Eggman took from settlements he conquered just because he wanted to fill this space up and stroke his ego."

"It's disgusting," Sally angrily stated. "They're nothing but trophies to him. And I wouldn't even be surprised if he stole some of these things from the UF cities his forces occupied."

Stopping to admire a banner depicting a symbol Sorun was clueless on, Sorun asked, "You guys think there's any, you know... old world stuff here? From my time?" he asked as he turned to the two. "Not my time specifically, different zone, but I mean from before aliens bombed the planet."

"I really doubt it," Rouge told him. "One of the UF cities or Station Square might have had something like that, but that was from so long ago that I honestly don't think anything like that would survive. And besides, I think they were more focused on surviving over preserving human culture."

Sorun felt his shoulders slump in disappointment at that. It felt bad knowing a world much like his was just gone and nothing but a faded memory to the new world that had been built right on top of its body. This very, very strange world. Hard to believe that a culture that was likely identical to the one he knew could just disappear like that, but he supposed aliens bombing the planet and thousands of years of the aftershocks of that would do it.

He felt a hand press down softly on his shoulder, causing him to look behind him at Sally who had a concerned look on her face. "You doing alright?" she asked.

"Are you ?" he asked back, not wanting to answer. "It's not my culture that's being hung up all over the walls like this. My culture's a whole zone away."

She removed the hand and stepped back. "I'm not seeing anything relating to the Kingdom of Acorn here, but..." she narrowed her eyes and looked away at a nearby room. "I'm pretty sure he has a space lined up for that since he thinks he'll take us over one day."

There was, indeed, a small room off to the side full of empty display cases. The large acorn symbol over its entrance said enough.

"Still," Sally continued, "it hurts seeing what he's done to this planet and all its people. Always does," she mumbled under her breath.

"Eesh..." Sorun didn't know how to respond to that. He hoped Nicole, resting in her pocket, would offer some encouraging words in his wake, but evidently she was speechless too seeing as she remained quiet. This caused Sorun to internally sigh as he rubbed awkwardly at the back of his neck. "Well, hey, we're working on the problem, right?" he tried. "That's about the best anybody could do in this situation."

"I just keep wondering if we're enough," she morosely replied, but his words did get the barest of smiles out of her. "But thanks for that anyways."

He wasn't even sure an attempt of cheering her up as pathetic as that deserved thanks.

"Oh, what the...!?"

Both of their heads picked up at the sound of Rouge's voice, causing them to spin towards the entrance to another room and run towards it. They stopped upon entering, both looking towards Rouge and staring in confusion as they watched the bat gawk at the object sitting in the middle of the circular room.

Said object was a motorcycle.

Keeping an eyebrow quirked, Sorun slowly stepped closer to the motorcycle while Sally remained at her spot. It was, for all intents and purposes, a motorcycle. Two wheels, engine, everything, and it even had a little blue sidecar attached to it. Its color didn't match the bike itself, which was painted completely black with strange, red tribal swirls painted on its sides.

"Why in the world is Shadow's bike here?" Rouge murmured to herself as she stepped closer to inspect it.

That gave Sorun pause. "Shadow's bike?" he repeated. "Shadow owns a motorcycle?"

Rouge nodded. "Mm-hm, yeah."

Explained the paint job, at least, but that didn't explain why it existed. "Why does Shadow need a motorcycle?" he asked. "The guy can run faster than a motorcycle?"

"He says it's because of G.U.N. protocol saying the team needs a vehicle, but he put so much care into this thing in his off time I always wondered," she answered him as she ran a hand along the bike's exterior. "We had to abandon it in the garage at G.U.N. headquarters when Dr. Eggman overthrew them. Didn't have time to grab it. He wouldn't stop grumbling about it for a month straight." She shook her head in disbelief. "Can't believe Eggman went through the trouble of bringing it all the way here. Even left the keys in the ignition." Rouge tilted her head closer. "Fully charged, too? Huh. Convenient."

Sorun would have responded, but a glow off to the corner of his eye caught his attention. He turned towards it, and then had to take a step back in shock when he recognized what he was staring at.

Aligned along the back of the room were seven small pedestals, three in the front and four slightly larger pedestals in a row behind them. They were all empty of anything, save for the middle one in the front which held a yellow, glowing gem that had an extremely familiar shape. The same shape as the blue gem he'd accidentally absorbed to gain his Summoned Swords.

The Chaos Emerald.

"Yellow, huh?" Sorun thought to himself as he slowly approached the Emerald. "These things really do come in all sorts of colors. Never was a fan of yellow, though. Hmm."

"You find what we were looking for, hon?" he heard Rouge call out from behind him.

"Yep," Sorun called back as he stopped right in front of the Emerald. He looked down at his hand, frowned, and then made a Summoned Sword. "How 'bout you hold onto it, Rouge," he said as he swung the blue sword to bat the Emerald off its pedestal.

The yellow Emerald sailed briefly through the air before it was caught by a surprised Rouge. "You really want me holding it?" she asked with barely-contained shock. Behind her, Sally was giving Sorun an equally puzzled look.

"I don't think touching that would be a good idea considering what happened last time. Don't really wanna fall unconscious in a place like this." He didn't want to touch it period just so he could save as much of his life as possible and maybe get home as well, but for now he'd go with a practical excuse and make up a bunch of other ones later if they asked.

The excuse seemed good enough for the two Mobians, Rouge in particular shrugging. "If you say so. Hey, while we're at it, there were a bunch of non-Chaos but equally shiny gems back thataway, so if we're not in a rush-"

There was a fake cough from Sally. "Rouge. Focus."

"I kid, I kid." Based on the soft sigh she made, Sorun had to wonder if she really was kidding. "Alright, so we got the Chaos Emerald. Now we need to think up a way of getting out of here."

"Can't we just go back the same way we came?" Sorun asked. "Sneak back to the elevator, work backwards, simple." Best of all was that he would be reunited with his box again.

Rouge glanced at him with half-lidded eyes. "The elevator that got locked down and is waiting for an ID card?" she questioned. "The other elevators that will probably lock down the same way once we call them to the fiftieth floor?"

Oh. That did present a problem. "Don't tell me we gotta take the stairs all the way down to the first floor," he groaned out. He knew for a fact he couldn't make a trip like that. That was a hundred floors worth of stairs. He'd didn't want to have Sally carry him again.

To his immense relief- and confusion- Rouge shook her head. "No. Stairs are an option, but..." she trailed off as she turned to the black and red bike. "I want to bring Shadow's bike back along with us."

It was Sally's turn to look confused. "What? Why?"

"I got an idea for getting out of this building real fast." The bat turned to the other side of the room opposite of the seven pedestals, where there were giant, plate glass windows in place of where the wall was. Windows that lead right outside. "Fact is for all we know we tripped a silent alarm by removing the Emerald," she explained as the bat looked out of a window. "Even if we didn't, I wouldn't put it past Eggman to put some kind of sensor system in place to detect Chaos energy readings if someone tries moving it through the building. And even if this is all paranoia on my part and we really are home free, there's no telling what's waiting for us once we get down to the bottom floor." She started running her finger along the glass. "I'm thinking we take a more... direct route out."

A bad feeling was beginning to grow in Sorun's gut, and he found himself gulping. "Uh... direct route?"

"Maybe. I got a plan, but that depends on you, Sorun." Rouge turned back to the very confused teen. "How fast could you use those swords to make something in a split-second's notice? Say, oh, I don't know... a ramp for instance?"

Oh, he really didn't like where this was going...

That bad feeling of Sorun's had proven to be completely accurate when, out of the top hundredth floor of the tower, a black and red motorcycle came crashing out from one of the floor's windows. Driving the motorcycle was Rouge, who had her eyes squinted in intense focus as gravity began to carry the bike down. Sitting behind her was Sally, who had her arms wrapped rightly around the bat's midsection as she held on for dear life.

And then there was Sorun. The teen was sitting in the side car and was holding its edges with both hands in a death grip, and was letting out a shrilly scream at the top of his lungs as the bike fell down.

In an act that Sorun was dead-certain defied gravity, the wheels of the bike touched down on the wall of the tower. Rouge, in turn, revved the bike's engine, and it was all Sorun could do to not pass out as the bat drove the motorcycle down the wall of the tower.

"Oh my god! Oh my god we're gonna die what the fuck were you thinking Rouge!?" Sorun's mind screamed as he watched the ground grow closer and closer at an extremely uncomfortable rate. "This doesn't even make any fucking sense how the hell is she driving like this!?"

Was driving at an impossible angle like this just something that Mobians could innately do on top of everything else? Could one actually drive down the side of a building with sufficient training? Sorun truly didn't know. There was probably some rule of gravity that said such a thing was impossible, but there were a lot of things he thought were impossible before coming here. So what did he know? Really, a white bat driving a motorcycle down the side of a tower was one of the less stranger things he'd seen.

It didn't help that Sorun was terrified out of his mind because that ground was getting real close-

"Sorun!" Rouge shouted over the engine of the bike, the wind rapidly rushing past them, and the human's screaming. "Now would be the time to do your thing!"

He didn't even bother trying to formulate a response as the teen, his hair whipping wildly passed his face, focused on the approaching ground. He didn't think he could say anything past all the screaming if he tried.

Down on the ground they were all heading towards, there was a loud bring! sound and a flash of light and blue particles as a ramp that curved downwards into the ground appeared from nowhere. The patrolling Egg Pawns, of course, became extremely confused upon seeing a bridge made completely from blue swords appear out of thin air, and when a motorcycle came screaming down from the tower's surface only to hit the ramp and curve smoothly onto flat ground, they became highly alert.

There wasn't much to be done, though, as the speed of the bike combined with the momentum picked up from riding downwards like that had given motorcycle enough speed that all Rouge had to do was drive forwards before they began to approach the wall. Like before, another blue ramp made of swords appeared in front of them, this one curving upwards.

The throttle on the bike was revved again, and the motorcycle roared up the blue ramp before making it to the top and jumping right over the wall.

It felt like the bike had maintained airtime for minutes. The moon was shining brightly down on them, and though they'd just cleared the wall Sorun was still screaming while holding onto the edges of the sidecar. Everybody save Nicole, still in Sally's pocket, grunted loudly when they were jostled upon the bike hitting the ground, though it remained in one piece as the bike drove away from Eggman's tower.

"Aaah! Oh no! Ah! AH! We're gonna die! We're- we- uh..." Sorun's screaming slowly tapered off when he didn't feel his bones and internal organs be torn apart by a sudden impact or explosion, and then slowly opened his eyes up. They snapped right open when he saw the bike driving on an old, cracked road with trees whipping past them, and then slowly looked to his left to see both Rouge and Sally giving him blank looks.

He couldn't care less about the looks they were sending him. He was too busy registering the fact that they'd even survived that crazy stunt. And once it did hit him, he began smiling widely as the euphoria hit.

"We made it!" he cheered as he threw his hands up. "Oh, jeez, I can't believe we just-!"

A yellow laser went past his head.

"Oh man we're gonna die!" he screamed as he ducked back down into the sidecar. He picked his head up to peek over the edge of the side car, and then visibly paled even further when he saw multiple saucer-like flying vehicles chasing after him, all of them piloted by Egg Pawns and all of them firing yellow lasers out of turrets at the front of those saucers.

"Ah, great!" Rouge shouted as she veered the bike to the side to dodge a laser shot. "Sally, how long 'til they come to pick us up!?"

"They should be homing in on our position, but it's gonna take a minute or two!" Sally shouted back.

More yellow lasers flew past them as Rouge continued driving forwards. "Sorun!" she yelled. "You think maybe you can use those swords of yours to do something about this!?"

Sorun's head rose up higher. Yeah, he supposed he should make sure they don't get shot.

He focused on the nearest saucer and focused a ring of Storm Swords on the Egg Pawn piloting it. A ring of eight swords appeared spinning around the robot, who looked up in confusion right before all eight swords stopped, and then shot forwards to impale the robot. It went offline immediately after eight impalements, and without a pilot the saucer crashed into the ground behind them and exploded.

This would be the routine Sorun had set up for himself. More saucers would close in uncomfortably close, and he'd shoot at their exposed pilots with Summoned Swords. The robots would die and the saucers would hit the ground and explode in a spectacular fashion. It was all well and good for making sure they weren't being shot at anymore, but there was seemingly no end to the amount of saucers chasing after them. It seemed like a new one would approach from the distance every time Sorun down one.

"They just keep coming and coming!" Sorun shouted over the roar of the motorcycle. "When's it getting here, Sally!?"

"I don't know! It should be- wait! There!"

Right as Rouge drove the bike around a curve, they'd hit a part of the road where the right side of the ground gave out to a large, steep cliff. And from that cliff rose up something that covered the moonlight and cast a shadow on the entire road Rouge was driving on. It was a long, silver ship that looked like a cross between a jet and a spaceship, though with its size Sorun had immediately mistaken it for a spaceship when he'd first seen it.

He'd had a lot of questions when he'd first seen that thing in Knothole's hangar.

"You guys seriously have a spaceship?" Sorun said in awe as he looked up at the large, sleek ship parked inside of the hangar. Tails' plane, which was parked right next to it, was practically dwarfed by the giant aircraft.

"Ah, well, it can achieve suborbital altitude, but I wouldn't go as far as to say it's a spaceship," Rotor said as he tapped away at a small tablet he had that was connected to the bottom of the ship via a few cables. "The Freedom Fighter Special sure is something, huh?"

"Cool, that's cool..." Sorun bounced on his feet. "Can I look inside it?"

Rotor lowered the diagnostics device and shot Sorun a smirk. "Oh, did I finally find something that excites you?"

"Man I don't- s-so what if I do? Space stuff is cool, okay?" Giddy and practically bursting with poorly-contained enthusiasm, Sorun ran towards the ramp so he could go explore inside of the ship. Rotor stared after the human, and then lightly chuckled as he brought his terminal back up to his face.

He thought spaceships and space things were cool. And the Freedom Fighter Special may not have been a spaceship, but it was close enough that he didn't care at all. It was big and it looked cool. That was more than enough for Sorun.

And to think he'd been riding around in Tails' dinky little biplane when they had this thing the whole time.

It'd been chosen for this mission on the grounds that it had been the only aircraft they had available at the time. It suited them all fine, as it was the only thing they had on hand that could fit a whole motorcycle inside of it. This was a function they desperately needed as these saucers chasing them were relentless.

The large ship flew alongside the motorcycle, and from the back a large hangar door began to open as a long ramp extended out from the interior of the ship. Lasers began flying past them all again, but Rouge paid them no mind as she focused in on the ramp extended out to them.

In a single move, she twisted the handlebars of the bike and caused it to veer right. It careened right off the road, and all the occupants experienced a couple more seconds of airtime as the bike flew towards the ramp. With a loud squeal wheels touched down on the metal platform, the bike having slid sideways from the momentum. Sorun's sidecar was unfortunately in a position that it had dangled off the edge of the ramp for a bit, making the human scream again, especially when a few bolts flew away and the sidecar began to jostle. Rouge was quick to orient the bike so that it pointed into the ship's hangar and gunned it forwards. Seconds later and the bike was safely if not a bit haphazardly driven into the hangar, with the ramp and door rapidly beginning to close behind them.

Finally, the door was sealed completely shut. There was the sound of laser shots pinging off the outer surface of the ship, but there was a sudden lurch as the Freedom Fighter Special sped off into the sky, and soon all that was heard was the sound of the motorcycle's engine and the heavy breathing of three of its occupants.

Everybody remained motionless for the longest minute until Rouge gingerly reached out to shut the bike off. It died instantly once she turned the ignition, and the white bat let out a loud sigh before slumping forwards.

Sally, who was still behind Rouge, slowly leaned back to look at the ceiling. Her hair was disheveled from the high-speed chase and here eyes were still wide open from all the excitement, but at the very least her breathing was beginning to level out. "Thanks for patching us into the Freedom Fighter Special's comms, Nicole," she quietly muttered.

"You are very welcome," the voice in her vest said in response.

Sorun's appearance was about in the same condition as Sally's. Hair that was disheveled and wild from the motorcycle ride, and skin that had an even lighter pallor than its usual light tone. He'd become so winded from the experience that he couldn't even speak, and had to settle for leaning over the side of the sidecar he was sitting in.

"Ah... so." Tiredly leaning against the bike's handlebars, Rouge turned her head towards Sorun. "That was a fun ride, huh?"

With a loud groan, Sorun's body slid completely out of the sidecar and collapsed onto the ship's floor.

"Well, everybody, it was a fun little adventure we all had, but I think we should call it a night here."

It was right as Sorun's hand touched the door leading into Freedom HQ that the bat's words reached his ears. With an rueful chuckle, he turned around to face the bat.

"Rouge, I worry for you if you consider anything we did there at that tower fun," he said in a flat tone. "That was the most stressful thing I've done in my entire life. I don't know how you manage to do that stuff for a living."

"Ah, come on. You need to loosen up, Sorun. We just snuck into one of the most highly secure buildings on the planet and managed get away with the loot. Did we get shot at?" Rouge shrugged. "Sure, but that kind of thing is normal at this point. Plus we had some laughs, didn't we?"

Sorun opened his mouth to respond, paused, laughed once, and turned back to the door. "Okay, yeah, maybe it was a little fun. A little

The laughs they shared at the very least were fun. Everything else had been a nightmare. Getting shot at and driving down the side of a tower had been a nightmare. And he wasn't going to forget about what happened on those stairs anytime soon.

But, other than all that... it did have its good moments. It wasn't enough to make Sorun ever want to do something like that again, but at least he had those memories. For whatever those were worth, at least.

And just when he thought he could end the night on a high note, the door to the HQ flung right open and sent Sorun sprawling to the ground. With a groan, he sat up onto his rear and looked up to see a very livid black and red hedgehog standing right in front of Rouge.

"Where is it?" he demanded.

"Really, Shadow? You're gonna do this now?" Rouge asked him with an innocent smile on her face. "A girl comes back from such a stressful mission like that-"

"They radioed ahead and told me about my bike. Rouge, I swear if you ruined the suspensions by driving it down the side of a building... !"

Laughing lightly, Rouge held up her hands in a sign of surrender. "Shadow, relax. Your bike is fine. I left it in the hangar. We can go get it now if you want."

Shadow didn't even give do so much as her a response. All Shadow had done was angrily huff and stomp past her towards the direction where the hangar was. Rouge stared off after him, scoffed, and then gave a little shrug before looking back at Sorun.

"Well, I gotta go do some damage control now." She winked at the still-sitting human. "It was fun working with ya, See you again some other time."

"Ahem. Rouge?"

Smiling innocently, Rouge held up the yellow Emerald she had been holding on to. "What? I was gonna give it back," she claimed as she tossed the Emerald to Sally, who was standing nearby. "Seeya around, princess."

Sorun silently watched the bat walk off after the hedgehog, and then shook his head with a low sigh as he heard another set of footsteps approach him. "I want a vacation," he said as he looked up at Sally. "Freedom Fighters get some of those, right? Vacation days? I wanna cash a few in."

Chuckling in amusement, Sally shook her head. "We'll see what we can do." She bent down and helped him to his feet. "Come on. Let's get you back inside."

There weren't any arguments from Sorun, who gladly followed the princess back into the HQ. He didn't care what happened next as long as at least he got to relax for the rest of the night. And Nicole was right there. Maybe she'd be up to play something with him.

As great an idea as it was, though, Sorun saw the likelihood of that idea plummet when he descended the stairs into the HQ's living room with Sally and saw a red form and a blue form already on the couch playing something. He didn't know how likely they were going to give up a spot, but if the scores he saw said anything, Sonic had some skill. Maybe he'd get Knuckles to ragequit and let Sorun play with him. Then Sorun could crush him at whatever game they were playing and he could cap the night out on that high note he wanted so bad.

Yeah. That was a great plan.

"Aw, come on!" The plan was already coming together when Knuckles looked ready to throw his controller while Sonic quietly chortled right besides him. He almost did throw it, too, but when he turned around to chuck it he saw Sorun and Sally standing right him and staring. "Oh, hey. You two are back. How'd it go?" Knuckles asked as he set the controller down on the couch's arm.

In response to his question, Sorun hopped over the couch to sit down between Knuckles and Sonic. "You know how it is," he said. "We came, we saw, we plundered. Some other stuff happened, too, but we don't talk about that."

"You mean like how you were screaming the whole time while on the bike?" he heard Sally teasingly ask from behind the couch.

Without even looking back, Sorun lifted his arm up and pointed back at her. "Yeah, that. Among other things."

"Oh, you mean with the sta-"

"Zip it with the stairs!"

"Right, of course." With a large smirk on her face, Sally stepped besides the couch, and Sorun caught the yellow shine of the Chaos Emerald as she removed it from the inside of her vest and handed it off to Knuckles. "It wasn't easy, but we got what we went there for."

"Yeah, it was super perilous and everything, hey, Sonic," Sorun quickly said as he leaned back in the couch and looked to the right at Sonic, "what game're you two playing?"

Sonic blinked at the unexpected question. "Er, it's a racing-"

"Cool, great, room for one more?"

Wanting to get away from the stair topic was a factor, but more than anything else, his attempt at drawing attention towards the game was an effort to get everybody's mind off that Chaos Emerald. His own mind so he didn't have to think about it, and everybody else's minds so they didn't get any ideas. Ideas like what would happen if he touched it. It was a conversation that would come up eventually, but the hope was that he could stall them for tonight and wind down from the mission and then think of something tomorrow-

"Hey, Sorun," he heard Knuckles from besides him ask.

Oh no.

"... Yeah?" he hesitantly answered as he looked to the left. He felt his heartbeat increased when he saw the echidna fondle at the yellow Emerald, and then pass a thoughtful look at Sorun.

"The last time you touched a Chaos Emerald... you got those weird swords, right?" He held the Emerald up for the human to see. "You think that would happen again if you touched another one?"

No, no, no...

"Hey, that's a great idea!" To his utter dismay Sonic seemed completely onboard with the idea. "What do you think, Sorun? Wanna give it a try?"

He most certainly did not. "Okay, think fast," he quickly thought to himself. "Uh, y'know guys, I... I'm pretty sure that first time was a one-time deal," he said. "You know. One and done. That's the feeling I got, at least. Sounds like a waste of time trying to get more powers. Probably won't even work."

Nothing but absolute lies, but lies were all he had. But unfortunately, they weren't good lies. Looking around, he saw that absolutely nobody looked at all convinced by what he said. It wasn't hard for him to see why considering all they had to do to check was have him touch it. And he knew it would work, too. The problem was that he'd lose another twelve years of life.

He'd hoped that Sally would bring something up, but she was just watching on in interest. He silently cursed and tried to scooch away from Knuckles.

"You sure? Here, just come touch it." Almost as if he was voicing his fears, Knuckles leaned towards Sorun while holding the yellow Emerald out to him. "Worst case nothing happens. What've you got to lose?"

Twelve years of his life, for one. "Y-yeah, sure, but-but what if this one get stuck in me, too?" Sorun stuttered as he continued scooching back from Knuckles and the Emerald. "Getting home's already gonna be hard enough with-"

"Well, you already got one stuck inside of you, right?" Sorun had to hold back from snarling at him when Sonic pushed him further towards the Emerald. "Nothing's gonna change by you taking one more in. Just try it."

It would most certainly hurt, but that wasn't the problem. Desperately, Sorun tried worming his way out of Sonic's push without seeming too worried, but it wasn't working. "Can't we just do this in the morning?" he asked, voice slightly higher. "Guys, come on, this can wait for a bit-!"

Knuckles had tossed the Chaos Emerald in Sorun's lap. He hadn't meant to touch it, he really didn't, but in an unconscious response Sorun had reflexively tried to shove it off of him with his hands. His fear of the thing had just been too great, so he'd done it without any thought.

Because he'd used his hands to try and shove it, though, he'd made contact with both palms. And unlike the first time with the blue Emerald, much to his subdued horror, this second Emerald had adhered to him almost instantly upon making contact. And as he held the stuck Emerald up to his face, he could already see yellow sparks of power arc out of the gem and onto his arms, and he could already feel his muscles seizing up from the raw power coursing through them.

Taking in a large, slow breath, both to calm himself and brace him for the coming pain, Sorun sent Knuckles a searing glare. "Knuckles, you son of a-"

The overwhelming surge of energy that ran through him from the Emerald had cut Sorun off, and just as soon as the pain hit him he'd gone unconscious.

Chapter 17

Recursion Error

Episode 17- Knuckles Buster

It was with a multitude of bad feelings running through him, both mental and physical, that Sorun opened his eyes up.

Once again, he'd been knocked out by a glowing rock. And once again he'd woken up on his back staring up at the ceiling. If there was an upside it was that there weren't any strange visions he couldn't remember and he didn't feel like he was going to pass out again, but the aches and lingering pains of being shocked unconscious was still present.

The first thing he noticed as his vision cleared, though, was the red blur hovering over his form that slowly became more clear as Sorun blinked focus back into his eyes. Eventually he came to realize that the person looking down at him was Knuckles. And any of the physical pains his body was experiencing was overridden with the mental ones. The mental ones that were screaming at him that he'd just lost another twelve years of life because the echidna had forced that Emerald on him.

He wanted to punch Knuckles right in the face.

So he did.

It wasn't one of Sorun's arms that punched Knuckles, though. He hadn't even gotten up to make the motion. The only thoughts that had been running through the teen's mind were ones saying they wanted to punch Knuckles, so something shot out and punched him. A large, blue, spectral arm to be specific had shot right out of Sorun's body and punched Knuckles right in the face.

The force of the punch had been so great that Knuckles had flown all the way clear across the living room and into the wall. He'd bounced off the wall, but mid-bounce the spectral arm had shot forwards, wrapped its clawed fingers around his head, and slammed him back into the wall.

"Knuckles, you...!" By now Sorun had risen up to his feet, his face completely livid and teeth bared as he stared at the pinned echidna. The blue arm holding him against the wall trailed all the way to the lower back of Sorun's right shoulder, and on his left side jutted another feathered, blue arm that was hovering protectively over Sorun. "You... why did you do that...!?"

Again. It had happened again. Another Emerald inside of him, and another twelve years of his whole life lost. And he'd tried, tried , to avoid it, but even when he was trying to get away what did Knuckles go and do? He practically shoved the thing right into Sorun's hands! And now his life was cut that much shorter all because Knuckles hadn't listened !

It was so rage-inducing that Sorun couldn't help the growl that came out of him as the arm holding Knuckles cocked backwards before shooting forwards and slamming Knuckles into the wall again and again.

"Sorun, stop it!" He felt somebody shake his arm roughly, and he whipped his head to the side to see Sonic was the one shaking him. He looked extremely concerned, but there was something in his eyes that was giving Sorun pause. An angered edge accentuated by the way his lids were slightly narrowed. For whatever reason it was enough to send a small twinge of fear through Sorun, and that was enough to snap him out of his blind rage.

The blue hand holding Knuckles' face opened and let him go, and the echidna fell down off the wall and onto his knees. He coughed a few times, and then shakily got up to his feet as he cast his violet eyes towards Sorun. The anger in them was a lot less subtle than the anger in Sonic's eyes.

"What was that!?" an angered Knuckles yelled as he stomped towards Sorun. "I check to see if you're alright and you slam me into a wall like that!?"

Sorun roughly shook Sonic's hands off his arm and matched Knuckles' stomping as he approached the echidna. "Why did I do that!? Why did you give that thing to me when I didn't want it!? You couldn't have warned me!? You know how much that hurts!?"

Sonic had zoomed forwards in a blur and was attempting to push Sorun back. Sally, who had still been in the room, was doing the same to Knuckles. Their efforts proved to be successful, and eventually the two angered teens were pushed to a complete stop. Knuckles' gloves were still dangerously flexing while the spectral arms behind Sorun were flared out, but under the harsh and stern glares of both Sonic and Sally the two eventually sighed.

"Don't. Do that. Again," Sorun slowly told Knuckles as the blue arms lowered. "Seriously. I meant it when I said I didn't want to touch it."

Knuckles exhaled heavily through his nose, but relaxed his fists and gave Sorun a small nod. "I'm sorry. I'll ask next time."

All Sorun gave in response was a single blink and a shake of his head before he turned away from the trio of Mobians. At his will, he made the two spectral arms stretch forwards so he could examine them.

Upon closer inspection, they were less arms and more feathered wings that were in the shape of arms given the wing-like plumage of blue, spectral feathers attached to the elbows of the arms. The two feathered arms ended in spectral hands, each one tipped in five long, opposable talons in place of fingers.

Sorun only needed a second's glance to recognize them.

"What the... aren't... aren't these Nero's Bringer Claws?" he thought to himself before promptly frowning. "Aw, you gotta be... what, is every single power I get from an Emerald gonna be from 'Devil May Cry'? And they're not even gonna stick with Vergil? They're just gonna give me powers from whoever? Shit ain't even consistent."

He'd suspected that perhaps him getting powers exclusively from 'Devil May Cry' was a possibility, a strong one at that, but he had really been hoping that wasn't the case. There were so many other powers from other games, movies, and anime he'd seen that were so world-breaking that, if he really was going to be saddled with powers, he could at least get something along those lines to make life easier on himself. But now there was a pattern with this second power. Likely just because he liked that series so much and played it last shortly before coming here, the same reason Aurora had alluded to.

"So much for getting Rinnegan eyes," he silently lamented. "I could have gotten up to some real shit with those eyes. Or, fuck, literally ANY Stand from 'Jojo'. Electric powers from 'InFamous' would have been nice seeing as I'm fighting robots that run on electricity here. Infinity Gauntlet. Could have had any of those things, but noooo , they all get locked out because apparently I'm stuck with 'Devil May Cry' stuff."

Why the Bringer Claws though, he had to wonder. Getting the swords from Vergil made sense- he'd been his favorite character. He'd played him the most out of everybody. Nero was a close second for sure, but why not another power from Vergil? Why, out of everything else, a power from Nero?

"Is it just because Nero was Vergil's son? Is that a close enough relationship that... agh, but this doesn't work using genes from fake video game characters! It works because my stupid subconscious wants it!" he internally groused. "I mean yeah, sure, Nero was great since he was the only character in the whole series that could do command grabs, but-"

He stopped himself right there. He looked down at the arms, and then blinked in realization as the two spectral hands slowly flexed their talons.

"... Oh yeah. Command grabs. Inescapable command grabs that interrupt enemy attacks and do a shit ton of damage. That's why I liked Nero so much." He looked up from the arms. "Nah, I can run with this."

There would be a lot of thinking about these arms, but that was for later. For now he needed to process it all. And for that he needed sleep. It had already been a long enough day from the heist he just committed. His tolerance for the day was done.

The Bringer Claws folded into Sorun's back, with the talons resting over Sorun's shoulder as the feathered elbows hung off his back, giving the appearance that he had two blue, spectral wings hanging off of him. He slid his hands into his pockets with a sigh, and turned back around to face the three Mobians he turned his back to.

At the very least, the tenseness that had permeated the whole room had subsided. The slight anger was still present in Sonic's eyes, and now he looked worried on top of it. Sally mostly just looked worried. Much of the anger had faded from Knuckles, and while there were still some vestiges of rage left on his features, he looked more confused than anything else.

"... I'm going to bed," Sorun told them as he turned towards the stairs. "I'm tired."

He was surprised he even made it halfway to the stairs before he heard Sonic call out to him. "Sorun-?"

"Sonic. I'm tired. Later." Really tired, actually. More than he'd initially thought he was, now that he thought on it. He rubbed at his sleepy eyes, and then shook it off. "We'll talk later."

Sorun ascended the stairs and, too tired to even remove his hand from his pocket, willed his right Bringer Claw to remove itself from his shoulder, reach out, and open the door for him. He walked through the door, and once he made it through the other side the Bringer Claw reached behind him and slammed the door hard enough to cause the three Mobians to flinch.

It was right after Sorun stomped out of the HQ that Sonic let out a frustrated sigh while he began to pace. "I can't believe he did that," he grumbled in an irritated tone. "What was he thinking!? I just- I think I finally start to get him and he pulls something like this! Do any of you guys have any idea what Sorun's problem is?" he asked as he turned to the other two. "He acted just as bad when he got the sword things."

And try as he might, he couldn't fathom why. He would readily admit it and say that they should have held off when he said he didn't want to touch it yet, that was their bad, but even so! Even if they did make a mistake it didn't warrant beating Knuckles against the wall with those... arm-things that had come out of his shoulders! He couldn't even place that look Sorun had given the arms once he got a good look at them, only that he seemed much more calm afterwards. Calm and tired.

It didn't make any sense at all. Like a lot of things about Sorun.

"I don't know," Knuckles groaned as he rubbed the back of his head. "Those arm-wing-whatever things he got sure pack a punch though. Ow." He winced, and then slowly removed his hand. "What even were those?"

"His new power, I guess." Sonic gave a shrug. "I'm so fed up with trying to figure out what makes him upset." He started tapping his foot in thought. "The first time was after he found out the Emerald might be stuck in him, that I got, but this time it happened so quick. So what happened this time!?" He looked towards Sally. "Was he acting like that during the mission?"

To the hedgehog's greater confusion, she shook her head. "No, not at all. If anything he was more collected than normal." She reached into her vest and opened Nicole's computer body up. "Nicole, you heard all that. What do you think?"

"His aggression levels did seem to spike to abnormally high level following his contact with the Emerald," she answered. A beat passed, and she added, "I'm worried for his mental state."

"I'm more worried about Knux's head!" Sonic exclaimed. "Where does Sorun get off on doing something like that!? I get he's upset for some reason that's way beyond me, but that's no excuse to go attacking people!"

"Sonic, I'm fine," Knuckles grumbled out as he rubbed at his head. "You ever try talking-?"

"No, that's the thing! That's the thing with him!" Groaning in frustration, Sonic thrust his arms up in the air while he began pacing again. "He's got some internal issues he absolutely refuses to talk about, and I know it for a fact because he told me to my face he's keeping things from us, and he just will not open up because... I don't know, ah, because he's Sorun!"

His arms and shoulders went slack with an exhausted sigh, and he flopped right onto the couch behind them with his feet dangling over the edge. He stayed motionless for a few moments, and then slowly turned his head to the side when he saw Sally walk up next to the couch.

"I seriously don't get him, Sal," he admitted to her. "One minute he's fine, another minute he isn't, and I don't... I don't know if it's a human thing, or if people just act like he does normally in his zone, or if Sorun's just weird... I don't know. Might not even be any of those things." He slapped a hand on his face. "It'd be so much easier figuring this all out if he'd just talk!"

"I know how you feel," she said. "He can be unusually reserved at times."

Which was odd, because Sorun never gave off the impression that he liked hiding stuff. He'd had a lot of conversations with the human, and not just him, but all the other Freedom Fighters. It was never much, but he always talked about little things from his previous life on his zone if somebody asked him out of curiosity. It was always little, inconsequential things, but he always seemed fine talking about it.

He didn't even go as far as to hide the fact he didn't want to befriend them. He'd seemed uncomfortable when he'd said it, too- Sonic had seen it in his eyes. Uncomfortable to the point that he seemed like he wanted to keep it to himself, but he hadn't. Because he knew Sonic was going to press the issue over and over, so Sorun had decided it would take less effort being straight with him than being secretive.

So why was this the exception to that experience? Why wouldn't he tell them why he was so touchy around the subject of Chaos Emeralds? What was the problem he had that was so important that he was going so far out of his way to keep it from all of them? And for that matter why did he seem so familiar with these powers he kept receiving? There was confusion among all the Freedom Fighters over the abilities and why they were manifesting the way they were, and if anybody should have been questioning it the most, it should have been Sorun. But, just like with those wings, he seemed almost intimately familiar with them.

None of it made sense, and Sonic knew it would if Sorun just explained himself, but he wouldn't. "Because reasons" he had said. He hated that excuse so much.

"I don't even care if it's with me," Sonic said after a long moment. "I wish he'd just talk about this with somebody so he could just deal with his issues. But he never even goes out of his way to talk to anybody."

"That statement is false," the computer being held in Sally's hand said. "There have been multiple occurrences where Sorun has actively sought me out specifically."

Sonic's head shot right up off the couch at that. Sally looked down at the computer she was holding in muted shock, and even Knuckles near the back was looking towards them oddly.

"... We're talking about the same Sorun here, right?" Sonic asked. "Sorun? The human guy?"

"Who else would I be referring to?" Nicole asked. "Sorun often desires to play video games with somebody, so he seeks me out. I always accept when I can. He is very skilled and offers an interesting experience every time we play together, so I find myself making time available for whenever he asks."

"Well yeah he's good, I saw the score that night, but why doesn't Sorun ever ask anybody else to play with him?" the hedgehog questioned.

There was a pause from Nicole before she answered. "... I believe it is because I am the only one among us that can actually keep up with him. Sorun does not like easy challenges when it comes to video games."

Sonic took offense to that, and wrinkled his face in displeasure. "Hey, I'm plenty good-!"

"Not compared to him you aren't," Nicole interrupted. "I've seen both of you demonstrate your skills. You don't come close to Sorun, I'm afraid."

He opened his mouth to object, but with a small grumble he closed it in silent acceptance. So Sorun was amazing at video games. Sonic had seen it for himself; he wouldn't argue the point. Especially if Nicole was vouching for his skill. But he was more interested in Sorun's frequent interaction with the AI over anything else. He didn't frequently interact with anybody on a regular basis as far as Sonic knew.

"So... you and Sorun talk a lot?" he pressed.

"Sometimes," Nicole answered. "Most times we are more focused on playing more than anything, though we do take time to converse with each other between sessions. Sometimes it will be him giving me advice, and other times it will be casual chatter. Why do you ask?"

The thought of Sorun going out of his way to casually chat with anybody was a foreign concept to Sonic, but it made sense once he realized that Nicole was probably the only one among them who could have gotten through to Sorun through video games. It was practically the only thing he liked as far as Sonic knew. It was a pleasant surprise, but more than that it gave him a spark of hope for the human along with an idea.

"You think that maybe you could get Sorun to talk?" Sonic finally asked her. "I know this sounds a bit weird coming from me, but I wouldn't be asking if there was any other way."

Because there wasn't any other way. Not at the rate they were going and with how closed off Sorun was to everybody. But if unlike everybody else he had somewhat of a good rapport with Nicole, then maybe there was a way.

Unfortunately, the answer that Nicole gave wasn't too encouraging to that idea.

"I... believe that if Sorun wishes to keep certain thoughts to himself, he then must have a reason for doing so," Nicole answered, causing Sonic's mood to deflate. "I do not wish to pry into an issue he is taking active steps to keep to himself."

"Nicole, I know, but-"

"He has the same right to his own privacy as everybody else," she said. "If he wishes to divulge whatever it is that is unsettling him, then I trust that he will come forwards with it on his own when he is ready. But I do not want to stress the trust he has in me by attempting to force a confession out of him. I'm sorry."

Sonic held his hands up. "Hey, nobody was saying you had to go that far, but... yeah, I get what you're saying," he sighed out as he rubbed a hand through his quills. It was probably for the best, anyways. The last thing Sonic wanted to do was jeopardize the biggest step Sorun had taken towards befriending anybody just so he could get his answers. And he respected Nicole's choice enough to call it good.

But he still wasn't going to let the physical assault against Knuckles slide without a conversation.

"I'm still gonna talk to him tomorrow about what happened with Knuckles," he finally said to them as he crashed back down onto the couch. "That wasn't cool. He can't go around slamming people into walls just because he feels like it."

"That's probably for the best," Sally agreed as she closed Nicole and placed her back inside her vest. "I'm going to call it for a night here. Good luck with tomorrow."

"Yeah, same," Knuckles called out to them.

Sonic waved them off, and then softly sighed as he interlaced his fingers behind his head and looked up at the ceiling in thought.

The next morning for Sorun was just that. Another morning.

Sonic hadn't been in his race car bed when Sorun woke up. Whether that meant the hedgehog had both came in and left while Sorun was sleeping or he'd never returned to begin with, Sorun didn't know, nor did he really care all that much. After what happened last night he needed some distance away from the blue hedgehog.

So where did that leave him? In the house's kitchen, seeking breakfast. But unfortunately, it seemed he'd woken up way earlier than he usually did, and because of that the other occupants to the house, Sonic's parents, weren't up. Which meant Sonic's mother Bernadette couldn't make him her pancakes.

Damn.

"Damn." Grumbling incoherently, Sorun stomped over to a nearby cabinet and opened it up. After a quick search he'd found a package of bread. "Sandwich it is, then. Ugh."

It was a great that the concept of stacking stuff between bread wasn't lost on him, because that and throwing french fries in an oven to bake, and the use of microwaves and toasters were about all his cooking skills amounted to. A good thing those were all the skills he needed, then, since all he'd done was toast two pieces of bread and make a peanut butter and jelly sandwich.

All one needed to get the day started was a sandwich. Pancakes were preferable, but he'd make do.

He hadn't bothered to egress all the way to the dining room to eat his sandwich, so Sorun had just elected to lean on the kitchen's counter as he nibbled at his cobbled-together meal. His eyes slowly roamed over the kitchen until they landed on the kitchen sink. A kitchen sink that was full to the brim in dirty dishes that needed to be washed.

"Hm. Somebody better get on that," Sorun thought to himself as he ate the sandwich. "For all that praise people always give Sonic, he sure is a terrible son. Leaving all this work to his poor mother. Woman's a saint. She doesn't deserve this mess."

A hum of slight irritation left him, and at the same time a flash of blue light lit from his back as his Bringer Claws appeared, hovering over his shoulders. "How much dexterity can I get out of these things, anyways?" he thought. "I'm like, what, a quarter of the way through this sandwich? I got the time. And I gotta test out the fine motor control on these things. Sure, let's go for it."

So the Bringer Claws were amazing apparently.

It was to be expected, Sorun supposed, that being able to manifest two arms that could reach out however far they could go- he had yet to test that distance- and grab/punch things with unworldly strength- which by this world's standards was probably normal, but again, testing- was pretty great in of itself, but as he'd discovered they were capable of finer things, too.

Thing was, he didn't control the Bringer Claws like he would control an arm. It was much the same way he controlled the Summoned Swords: he just thought of what he wanted them to do, and they followed his will. They were somewhat autonomous in that regard, though they moved so naturally to his thoughts that Sorun himself could barely tell the difference. It was a lot easier to have the spectral arms do things as opposed to his normal arms, though, as he didn't feel any physical exertion from them.

So washing dishes? Easiest task in the world for the Bringer Claws. All he'd done was lean back and continue to eat his sandwich while he watched the Bringer Claws go to work at the dishes at what was a dizzying, almost supernatural speed. Those blue, clawed hands had been scrubbing those plates so fast that he was worried they were going to get scratched or broken, but even though the hands were working at breakneck speeds they'd efficiently cleaned each and every dish without leaving so much as a single mark.

All in all, they managed to do a half hour's worth of dishes in about three or four minutes. He'd barely even finished his sandwich by the time they'd finished.

"Wow, these things just trivialize everything," Sorun thought in wonder as the feathered arms retracted back onto his back while grasping at his shoulders. "They'd be the best thing in the world if I didn't have to spend another twelve years of life for them."

And that was the real kicker right there. His plan of not touching another Emerald after the first was completely shattered thanks to Sonic and Knuckles, and because of that he had two inside of him now. Twenty-four years of life taken from him in total, and with the sixteen he'd already spent living normally before being dragged to Mobius that added all the way up to forty.

Forty years. In terms of lifespan he was already forty. He sure didn't look it, because he'd checked extensively in the mirror this morning. Aside from all the stress he'd endured making it look like he hadn't slept in a billion or so years, he still looked as youthful as the day he came to Mobius. He sure didn't feel it, though. His movements felt more lethargic than he would have liked, and he suspected the reason he'd woken up so early was because his natural sleep schedule was being interrupted.

"This sucks." About the only conclusion he could draw, really. "How'd I already hit forty years? Friggin' math." He ran a hand over his face. "All because fuckin' Knuckles went and... it's fine, he didn't know, it wasn't his fault, it's fine, it's not fine, AGH!"

His right hand had balled up and almost struck the counter he was leaning on, but after a deep, calming breath he lowered it back to his side. He sighed, but with his mood it came out as more of a high-pitched, saddened whine.

"What am I gonna do now? Keep collecting the Emeralds?" he wondered. "I don't have to touch any of the others, but now with two in me, I... I haven't even gotten any closer to figuring out if there's a way to get them out or not. Everybody keeps saying they can't, and the longer this goes on the more likely it looks..."

"O-oh my. Sorun?"

The teen was snapped from his terrible thoughts when he heard a female voice say his name. He looked towards the kitchen's entrance and saw Bernadette standing there, looking back and forth between the kitchen sink and rack full of dishes, Sorun, and the Bringer Claws folded into wings on Sorun's back. Bringer Claws that quickly disappeared completely when Sorun grew self-conscious of them.

"Er, hey, Mrs. Sonic's Mom the Hedgehog ma'am," Sorun shyly greeted.

The hedgehog woman warmly giggled at him. "Sorun, I keep telling you that it's alright if you just use my first name."

"I... it just seems kind of rude, y'know? Doing. That." He averted his eyes away from her. "You just get up?"

"Yes. I was surprised to find you up already at this hour." Bernadette stepped into the kitchen and made her way towards the sink and dishes. "I had planned on cleaning all these dishes later in the afternoon." She looked to the human. "Sorun, did you...?"

No denying this one, he supposed. "I, uh... saw them all and figured I'd just do them to save you the trouble," he quietly murmured.

"Oh, dear, you didn't have to do that!" She stepped closer to him, and a very meek Sorun tried to take a step away. He was too nervous, though, and remained rooted to the spot. "You're a guest as long as you stay here, so you don't-"

"It's fine," Sorun interrupted. "It was no trouble. Really. Your life must be stressful enough since you're a mom and everything, Sonic's mom especially, so I thought you deserved a break."

If it was almost anybody else, he wouldn't have bothered. But he'd always had a soft spot for mothers, and Bernadette had grown on him somewhat. Particularly because of the pancakes. The fact that he needed something to test the Bringer Claws out on had just been a convenient enough excuse for himself.

Though he really didn't know what to feel when the motherly hedgehog leaned in and gave him a chaste peck on his cheek. He'd practically seized up, actually.

"Well, dear, thank you for giving this hedgehog the afternoon off. Maybe I can finally catch back up on some of my reading," she said with a wishful sigh. "Do you at least want me to make you something before you head out? It's the least I-"

"No I'm fine really no problem!" Sorun quickly shook his head in denial, and reflexively tried hiding his face behind his dark hair when he felt his cheeks burning red in embarrassment. "Bye Mrs. Bernadette."

He walked away too quickly to catch her reaction, but he felt his cheeks burn even hotter when he heard her giggle again from behind him. "Have a safe day, dearie! I'll make you something special for dinner tonight when you and Sonic come home!"

The pale human couldn't have gotten out of that kitchen fast enough. One of his greater vulnerabilities that was even more devastating than mothers: nice mothers like her. Sorun blamed his own mother. The fact that Bernadette kind of reminded him of her wasn't helping matters at all.

But even still, she was a nice woman. Hard to believe someone like Sonic was born from her, but Sorun supposed all those heroic traits had to come from somewhere. But thoughts of the other, teenage blue hedgehog slowed Sorun's tracks as he made it past the kitchen and dining room.

"Ah, man... Sonic... he's probably gonna want to talk about what happened last night." And that was a fun conversation waiting for him. He didn't have any justifiable reason to give them for being upset enough at Knuckles to slam him like that. Not any he could say without stopping his heart, at least, and even then he still felt a little justified over it. Somehow he didn't think Sonic would see it that way. "I got not idea what I'm supposed to say to him. Guess I'll just play it by ear. Because that strategy's had such a great record so far..."

"Going already?"

Sorun stopped himself at hearing the male, synthesized voice, and turned towards the living room. His eyes were drawn towards a lone figure sitting in a chair with his head facing towards Sorun. It was Jules.

"... I'm not in a rush or anything," Sorun hesitantly answered as he moved his hand away from the front door he'd been reaching for.

"Ah. Good." Jules leaned forwards in his chair. "So you have time to have a chat with me, then."

"... Sure," Sorun said as he slowly walked into the living room. He felt something brush by his leg, and looked down to see the small family dog rubbing against him. He softly pushed Muttski away with his boot, and the dog whined a little before going towards its bed in the corner. "Hey, Mr. Jules," the teen greeted as he looked back up at the metallic hedgehog.

Whereas Sonic's mother always made Sorun nervous due to her motherly nature, Jules was just intimidating. Sorun knew he didn't mean it; the older hedgehog seemed like a normal person and talked normally enough during the dinners Sorun had participated in with the hedgehog family. Part of that intimidation may have stemmed from the fact he looked like a deadly robot, but there was something more to it.

It was possibly because, underneath that steely exterior, metaphorically and literally speaking, there was a war veteran from what Sonic had told him at one point. A war veteran that fought, and very possibly if not for certain, killed Overlanders. That might have had something to do with it. He was always friendly enough around Sorun, but even still, that intimidating aura was still there.

"So Sonic told me about what transpired last night." Apparently he was going right into it. "You really went and attacked his friend Knuckles?"

Sorun took a deep breath. "I had what you would call a momentary lapse in judgement," he informed the robotic hedgehog. "Absorbing mystical rocks of unlimited Chaos energy will do that. I'm not exactly used to it."

The red sensors that were Jules' eyes regarded Sorun silently for a few moments before his metallic fingers interlocked. "I saw what you did in the kitchen for my wife," he added.

"Well, your wife is a very wonderful person. You're a lucky guy."

"You don't know the half of it." Jules briefly looked down at his metallic exterior before focusing back on Sorun. "You've lived under my roof for a while now, Sorun, and I've gotten to know you a bit. I will admit I had some... reservations at first about having a human sleep in the same home as my family." An awkward pause hung between them. "I realize that every individual regardless of who and what they are deserves a chance, but I won't lie and say the war didn't implant some small bias within me regarding your kind. But at the time we met you didn't seem like an overly malicious boy, and my own son vouched for you. So I gave you a chance and let you stay here."

Sorun darted his eyes to the left and right of the metallic hedgehog. "This is kind of coming out of nowhere. What did-?"

"We're having this conversation because of what you did to Knuckles. I'm getting there."

"... Oh." He hadn't realized what he did would be this significant. He wouldn't have decked Knuckles across the face with a Bringer Claw if he had known.

... No, he was mad enough at the time that he probably still would have, anyways.

"And over time, you proved that Sonic was right to put his trust in you. You began to seriously embed yourself into the resistance, and my son has been talking of you fondly over it." Jules slowly started to get up off his chair. "Of course you haven't been all that friendly, but I'd chalked that up to your unusual circumstances. But then this incident with Knuckles happens, and I begin to worry my initial, biased assumptions were correct after all. And right when I begin to worry I turn my back and you decide to go out of your way and save my wife an afternoon by doing dishes for her." A low, tinny sigh came out of his mouth speaker. "I'm just very confused Sorun. And I just want to know what's going on through your head to make sure you're not a danger."

The statement rose a chuckle out of Sorun. "Me? A danger?" He made a light scoff. "Jules, even with the arms and swords pretty much any one of the Freedom Fighters would beat me in a straight fight. I couldn't be a danger to anybody if I wanted to."

"That wasn't what I was referring to," Jules corrected him. "I sincerely believe you're beginning to worry some of the others with the way you've been acting. Sonic in particular voiced a lot of his frustrations about your attitude at me last night. I'm only telling you so you can understand how the way you have been acting has been affecting those you've been working with in the resistance."

So that was the issue, then. Sorun somewhat saw where the older male was coming from, especially considering his perspective. Sorun himself still wasn't completely used to the way most Mobians were so friendly and open. He wasn't surprised they found him and his mannerisms weird in turn, but what was he supposed to do about that? He couldn't say anything. Which was the crux of the issue.

And now here he was. Attacking people without explaining himself adequately. Maybe people were right to start worrying about him like this.

He found himself sighing. The most practical and easiest solution, talking, was out of the picture due to the gag curse. So what options did that leave him? Ignore it? They sure weren't going to. Really all he could do was roll with it and hope he could string something together so that they would at least drop it for the time being.

"I have issues," Sorun finally said to Jules. "It's not that I don't want to talk to someone about them. It's that I can't. For various reasons." He looked down. "I didn't mean to lash out at the guy like that. I'm not a violent person. But all this stuff just keeps adding up and I slipped. That's all."

Probably a really pathetic excuse, but it was literally all he had.

"I know that it has been extremely challenging for you. But these types of problems... I will tell you from firsthand experience that keeping it all to yourself isn't going to help you down the line," Jules said. "I don't understand why you refuse to discuss it even though it sounds like you know you need to talk to someone, but... I would assume you have your reasons if you are that aware of the problem. You do plan on eventually doing something about it, correct?"

"... Yeah, of course," Sorun lied.

Jules hummed in response, and stepped closer to Sorun. The teen flinched back when he rose his right hand up, but went still when he felt the artificial appendage softly touch down on his shoulder.

"You're a good boy, Sorun. Rough around the edges by a large margin, but I can see you're at least trying. Just... please try not to get violent anymore. I'm sure everything will work out fine if you keep working at it." His mouth turned up into a small smile. "And don't tell Bernie I said this, but I wouldn't mind if you continued giving her a break like that every now and then. I don't want to think about what she'd do if she found out I asked a guest to do some of the chores around the house, even if it's for her sake."

"Eh-heh. I can imagine." Sorun stepped back and pointed his thumb at the door. "I gotta go." He turned to open it, but paused when his hand grasped the doorknob. "... Thanks."

"Anytime, Sorun," Jules said as he returned to his chair. "Just be safe and remember that everybody is there for when you're ready to finally talk."

The little grin that had grown on Sorun's face lowered moderately. "Right," he whispered under his breathed as he stepped through the front door, closing it behind him after he left.

He collapsed right back on the door after closing it.

"And now we're lying to robot dad. Robot dad that I thought didn't like me but is actually cool with me. Gah..." He ran a tired hand along his face. "I don't know how much longer I can keep doing this. I feel awful." He pushed himself off the door. "To the HQ, I guess. Ugh, I really don't feel like walking... unless."

A thought came to him, and in a flash of blue his Bringer Claws appeared. They stretched out past his back, and Sorun gazed thoughtfully at the wing-arms.

"... Can I fly with these things?" he silently asked himself. "In the game the most Nero ever did with them was do extra jumps and glide, but he did fly in that one cutscene when he first got them. Dunno if that means they were limited for gameplay purposes or because that was when he got his Devil Trigger." He looked up to the sky in thought. "Man, I wonder if one of the Emeralds will give me a Devil Trigger? That'd be nice. I could actually keep up with everyone with that." He looked back at the Bringer Claws. "Well, I can already do stuff with Summoned Swords that weren't in the games. Makin' chairs and ramps and stuff. Flying should be in the realm of possibility, right? They're wings. Sort of."

With a deep breath, he furrowed his brows as the Bringer Claws stretched above his head. "Yeah, I got this."

"I-don't-got-this-I-don't-got-this!"

Flying, evidently, was really hard. Could he get air? Yes, he could. The Bringer Claws were strong enough to get him into the air. Maintaining altitude and maneuvering with them, though? He didn't have any idea how that worked.

Birds made it look so easy.

By some miracle he had made it to the hill Freedom HQ was under, but the ride there was less him flying and more him zipping and jittering randomly in the air as he attempted to figure out the subtle intricacies of how flying worked. So far all he figured out was "flap the wings occasionally to maintain or gain altitude", but the more advanced things like steering were beyond him. In fact he was pretty sure he only managed to make it to Freedom HQ because he'd started out facing its direction, because he hadn't sussed out turning.

Another important thing he had yet to figure out? Landing. Which was why the human teen had turned into a screaming human missile as he tumbled through the air towards the ground. Right when he was nearing it the Bringer Claws reached out to grab at tree branches to try and slow him down, but his momentum was so great that anything they grabbed snapped off. It did slow him down some, though. Enough that he landed with a roll and tumbled head over feet for a fair distance before Sorun stopped on his back with a loud gasp.

"... Man." A loud, heavy breath left his lungs as the panting teen slowly sat up. "That's really hard. Ow."

"Nice landing there, pal."

Sorun turned his head towards the voice, and then rolled his eyes when he saw the speaker while the Bringer Claws on his back disappeared. It was Sonic, who was sitting on a nearby stump with his elbows resting on his knees.

He didn't look particularly happy. The hedgehog was frowning at Sorun with creased eye ridges. Sorun recognized the unhappy demeanor, and then sighed as he got up to his feet.

"You don't look very glad to see me," the human noticed as he turned towards Sonic.

"Really?" Sonic sarcastically remarked as he jumped off the stump he was sitting on. "Gee, Sorun, what do you think has me so down?"

"Ah, I don't know, you're usually such a cheery guy. Could be a multitude of reasons you're so sour right now," Sorun, his tone completely dry, said as the two teens stood face-to-face. "If I had to guess I'd say it's about Knuckles."

A calm breeze blew between the two. Sorun's expression remained calm for the most part while Sonic's maintained an unsettling air of frustration that was unfamiliar to the human teen.

"That thing with Knuckles isn't going to happen again, Sorun." The way he said it was almost commanding, and Sorun was taken back by the amount of raw seriousness to Sonic's words. "You do not go around hitting people like that. Especially using your powers."

"It's not gonna happen again." He meant it, too. Relieving a minute amount of stress by punching somebody wasn't worth it if this was the fallout he had to deal with afterwards. Even if it was a thoughtless punch done in the heat of the moment.

Sonic crossed his arms. "Are you sure?" he asked him. "You said that you wouldn't have a problem working with the Freedom Fighters. That this whatever-issue of yours wasn't going to affect anything. It sure looks like it's affecting things to me, Sorun."

"Sonic, it was a one-time slip-"

"Was it, Sorun? 'Cause I don't know if it was." Throwing his arms out the side the side, Sonic irritably stepped past Sorun before turning back to him. "You know, we wouldn't be having this problem if you just talked. I wouldn't be over here worrying about you if you just talked ." He roughly shook his head. "Why won't you just tell us what's the matter with you?"

Sorun didn't answer Sonic. Instead, he simply closed his eyes with a sigh, looked down, and slipped his hands into his pockets as he tried thinking up a solution.

"You really screwed yourself here, Sorun. Now Sonic thinks my issues are becoming a serious problem. He's not wrong at all, but I still can't talk to them about anything because of what Aurora did. But I can't even tell them about that. Ugh, he's not letting it go, either..."

He'd been fine with keeping it all under wraps and just ignoring it. It hadn't been an issue until he'd freaked out so much about the Emerald and reacted like that to Knuckles. Now Sonic wanted answers. Answers Sorun couldn't give without his heart stopping. So what was he to do? Lie? Or try stalling for more time? He hadn't thought up of a good lie yet, so stalling was his only solution. But how to go about doing that?

Well, Sorun had one idea. It had some risk involved, but it would buy time. Hopefully enough time that he could plan out his next escape from this subject the next time around.

"Look, Sonic, my issues with the Emeralds is something I really don't want to talk about." Sonic opened his mouth to argue, but Sorun held up a hand to stop him. "Just listen. I know what I did to Knuckles was wrong. I shouldn't have attacked him. I shouldn't attack anybody. I'll be the bigger man and say that it was my bad. But I know that isn't enough for you. Right?"

Sonic shook his head. "I wasn't happy you were keeping things to yourself, but I was fine with dealing with it as long as it didn't cause problems. Well, now it's causing problems." The expression in his green eyes hardened. "I'm not going to ignore it if it's going to put my friends at risk. And believe it or not that includes you."

Sorun's eyes widened the slightest amount. Sonic saw the movement in the human's eyes, and then sighed out loud.

"I know you don't consider us friends for some reason, reasons you won't talk about like everything else, but that just doesn't go both ways." He blinked, and then sent Sorun a pleading look. "Please just tell me what's wrong, Sorun. I just want to help you."

Sorun bit the corner of his lip. Something inside of him was twisting terribly, but he just didn't know what it was. "I won't," he said. "But," he added, "I'll tell you what. This isn't going to become an issue ever again, but if for whatever reason it does, Sonic, I'll lay it all out. Everything. That's the only thing that'll get me to give up everything going on inside of my head. Is that okay with you?"

It was a total lie, of course. He couldn't even if that happened because of the restriction put on him. But as long as he watched himself and didn't react too violently again, he wouldn't have to have this discussion again. All he had to do was keep himself clean if Sonic agreed.

Sonic, in response, narrowed his eyes. "You promise?" he asked. "You promise that if this issue comes up again, you'll fess up everything that's been bothering you so we can actually talk it out?"

"Yeah, I promise." And now he just felt like he was shearing off pieces of his soul.

The blue Mobian's eyes narrowed even further, but eventually he let a breath out and gave an agreeing nod much to Sorun's relief. "Alright. But I'm gonna hold you to that."

Sorun didn't doubt it in the slightest. That's what he was so scared of.

Both teens wordlessly turned towards the HQ door right after and began to walk towards it. They passed through the door, and then began making their way down the short hallways towards the actual HQ.

"Hey," Sonic had said while they were walking, "you're gonna apologize to Knuckles for what you did."

"Yeah, yeah, I will," Sorun muttered in response.

"I'm serious, Sorun."

"Dude, I said I would." They emerged through a door and began walking down the steps towards the living room.

The place was unusually packed compared to how it was most days; Sorun saw that around half of the Freedom Fighters were already here. He reasoned that maybe there weren't any missions going on today, so most of everybody was down here socializing.

Most of everybody included Knuckles, who was off to the side of the living room talking with Julie-Su. Sorun tried backpedaling away from the pair, but Sonic stood in his way and was actively pushing him towards the pair. The human shot him a look, but eventually relented and trudged towards Knuckles.

Knuckles must have seen Sorun approach from the corner of his eyes, as he said some parting words to the other echidna before he turned towards Sorun and began approaching him. They stopped a arm's distance away from each other, both holding off on saying anything.

If anything, Knuckles didn't look nearly as upset as he did last night. As far as Sorun was concerned that was the best possible start to this thing.

"Hey... Knuckles," Sorun awkwardly greeted. "So... what happened last night with the whole arm thing shouldn't have happened, but it did happen, so... yeeeah..." He began to rapidly scratch at the back of his head. "I'm super sorry, man. I shouldn't have hit you."

The long silence that passed after his apology was having Sorun fear that his lackluster sorry wasn't nearly convincing enough. Eventually, though, Knuckles barked out a short laugh and gave him a small grin, which made Sorun's upper body slump forwards in relief.

"Ah, don't worry about it, man. It happens." Knuckles held one of his open, spiked fists out to Sorun. "We're cool, right?"

Sorun blinked down at the hand in surprise. He hadn't expected forgiveness that easily. In fact he expected to jump through a lot more hoops than just saying he was sorry before any kind of apology was accepted, so seeing the hand being outstretched to him with that genuine grin on Knuckles face had Sorun completely flummoxed.

He was so flummoxed, in fact, that while he willed something to reach out and reciprocate the handshake, he couldn't actually move his arms. So instead a third, blue and spectral arm appeared and reached out to grab the hand. Knuckles' eyes had widened slightly when the clawed hand grasped his own, but he still held it firmly and gave it a shake.

"Yeah," Sorun mumbled as the Bringer Claw squeezed Knuckles' hand in return. "We're cool."

"Great, then there's no problem." Knuckles let go of the spectral hand, wincing while shaking his own hand. "That thing is pretty strong, huh?" he pointed out. "What is that, anyways?"

The blue glow of the sole Bringer Claw was beginning to attract the attention of everybody around, and they began to eye the arm curiously as much as Knuckles was. This did not go unnoticed by Sorun, who shyly folded the arm back onto his shoulder before addressing Knuckles again.

"It's the new power I got. My Bringer Claws," Sorun quietly answered.

"... Bringer Claws, huh?" There was a pause as Knuckles scrutinized the spectral hand resting on Sorun's shoulder, and the blue feathers jutting out of the arm connected to the hand. "Why'd you name it that?"

Sorun narrowed his eyes in irritation. "Because it's a cool name," he hotly defended. "When you start eating Chaos Emeralds for powers then you can name them whatever you want, but it's my power, so I'm calling it whatever I want. They're Bringer Claws." Plus he had too much respect for the things to name them anything differently then their proper names. It was the principle, dammit.

"Hey, just asking," Knuckles rose his hands up in defense. "Still, though... these powers of yours keep on getting weirder and weirder. The swords I kind of got because of Chaos Spears, but hands? I've never seen anything like that."

"Mm, couldn't tell ya," Sorun airily replied. "All this Chaos stuff is still new to me, and I don't get to choose the powers."

"Fair enough," Knuckles said with a shrug. "But seriously, how strong are those things?" he asked Sorun as he held his gloved hand up to examine it. "The grip on them is real strong."

A great question. Sorun truly didn't know. They were stronger than his real arms, he knew that much. A lot stronger. How much stronger was anybody's guess, and he didn't know if that strength was proportional to his actual strength or not. All he knew was that they could grab things, throw things, punch things, claw things, and do menial labor for when he couldn't be bothered to do it himself. Fly, too, but that was a work in progress.

"I haven't actually tested how strong the arms are," Sorun answered Knuckles as the single Bringer Claw extended outwards. "I can tell ya for free they're way stronger than I am, though."

"Is that right?" The grin on Knuckles' face grew a bit wider. "Well, why don't we test it out right now?"

In response, Sorun tilted his head to the side. "I'm not following," he said. "What, do you wanna... arm wrestle the Bringer Claw?"

"That wasn't what I had in mind, but sure, why not? That works." Knuckles nodded at him. "You gotta test its limits, right? And I'm pretty interested myself to see how strong they are."

Sorun continued looking into Knuckle's eyes, but no matter how long he looked the echidna seemed completely sincere in the suggestion. His eyes moved from him to the right Bringer Claw, and after a few moments of consideration Sorun came to a decision.

"Yeah, alright. I'll play that game." The teen looked towards the kitchen, and in the blink of an eye the Bringer Claw shot across the living room to the kitchen, grabbed the circular table, and pulled it all the way back. Knuckles and everybody else around had blinked in surprise at how rapidly the table had been away, though Sorun paid them no mind as he set the table down in the middle of the living room.

As he was grabbing two chairs from the kitchen with his Bringer Claw, Sorun heard a rapid pair of footsteps stop next to him. "What's going on, Sorun?" he heard Sonic ask. All around everybody else slowly began to approach in growing interest at the display.

"Knuckles wants to arm wrestle my Bringer Claw," Sorun answered as he set down the chairs. "I gotta school him."

"Oh, that's how it's gonna be, huh?" Knuckles sat down in one of the chairs that Sorun had provided, his grin growing competitive.

"Alright, bring it," he said as he slammed his right elbow down on the table.

Sorun sat down at the chair next to him, and then crossed his real arms as the Bringer Claw set itself down on the table. After the human and echidna nodded at each other, the two arms grabbed each others' fists. They both counted to three silently in their heads, and then at once began to push against the other to try and bring their competitor's hand down on the table.

Funnily enough, Sorun didn't feel any exertion from wrestling with the sole Bringer Claw. He felt resistance, though saying he sensed it might have been a more accurate term. Something in his mind was telling him that something was pushing against his Bringer Claw, but otherwise it wasn't tiring at all exerting the thing against Knuckles. The same couldn't be said for Knuckles, whose tan muzzle began to grow red from the effort he was putting in trying to push the spectral claw down. Sorun merely continued to calmly sit in his chair with his arms crossed.

"Come on, Knuckles!" There were cheers for them, of course, but for the most part they were directed towards Knuckles' favor. Likely because the only people cheering in addition to spectating was the Chaotix. And likely because the only one among them actively cheering was Charmy, who was flying his small body around them in circles. "You could beat a weird blue arm wing thing any day of the week!"

"Yeah, you got this, Knux," Vector called out. "Hey, Espio," he half-whispered to the purple chameleon next to him while bumping him with his elbow, "between you and me, who do you think's gonna win?"

Espio rolled his eyes. "Do not tell me you wanna bet on this."

"I wasn't saying that at all! Buy hey, if you wanna put a little down on this-"

"Vector..."

"Lay off, I'm jokin' with you."

The small conversation went largely unnoticed by either Sorun or Knuckles, though Sorun did frown at the fact people were cheering Knuckles on and not him. He turned to his left, where he saw Sonic and Tails standing nearby. "Where's my cheers?" he asked.

"You look like you're doing fine on your own," Sonic told him with a small grin.

Sorun gave him a flat look, and then turned to Tails. The fox gave him a small smile and an encouraging thumbs-up, which caused Sorun to laugh with a small shake of his head as he turned back to Knuckles.

"Man, Knuckles, all these people cheering you on. You're so lucky." At Sorun's will, the Bringer Claw began to slowly push Knuckles' hand back. "Be a shame if you lost or something," Sorun continued. "Like this."

"What the...!?" Knuckles grunted as his hand slowly began to be pushed down from the Bringer Claw. He grunted with exertion and tried pushing back against it, but not only did he not make a single budge, but the rate at which his hand was being pushed down wasn't decreasing in the slightest. "You were holding out on me!?"

The human teen shrugged. "Mm, maybe," he admitted. He hadn't wanted to risk accidentally hurting Knuckles by going at it with a hundred percent strength with the arm out the gate. Even so, he could feel the spectral arm struggling against Knuckles. Not much, but it was there, and by now he was making the arm give it all it had against Knuckles.

"Oh, come on, Knuckles. Don't tell me you're gonna let the newbie beat you." This tease had come from from Julie-Su, who was standing behind Knuckles. "I don't think I could ever let you live it down if you let it come to that."

For reasons that were beyond Sorun, the words seemed to have given Knuckles a new sense of invigoration. He'd stood up from his chair and was now using his body weight in addition to his muscles to try and reverse the pin the Bringer Claw was exerting on his arm. Alas, it was for naught.

"You know, if I really wanted to I could call you out on using your weight like that." As Sorun said this, the Bringer Claw finally pinned Knuckles' hand onto the table. "Don't really think it matters, though," he said with a smirk.

There were collective groans and sounds or surprises all around, though the one who looked most surprised was Knuckles. Even after Sorun had removed his Bringer Claw the echidna had continued to stare down at his hand in muted shock, his eyes periodically flicking from his hand to Sorun. The pale teen had begun to worry before Knuckles made a smile, reached out, and patted Sorun on the shoulder.

"Nice win. Those things are really strong after all," Knuckles congratulated before he sat back in his chair. "Wanna go with the real arm now?"

Reflexively, Sorun held his real right arm close to his chest. "No way, man. You'd beat me in a second with the real one. I'm quitting while I'm ahead."

This earned a laugh out of Knuckles, as well as some other chuckles from those around the room. Sorun had joined in on the light laughter, but his quickly tapered off as he glanced thoughtfully at the Bringer Claw.

He hadn't expected for it to have been physically strong enough to beat Knuckles, but now that he knew it did and had enough witnesses to its feat to last him a lifetime, he felt good. Winning against Knuckles and proving that, at the very least, his Bringer Claws were stronger felt good.

And he wanted more.

"So..." Sorun called out as the Bringer Claw raised itself into the air with a slight shake. "Anybody else want a go?"

He was always going to dislike these powers of his due to the fact that the Chaos Emeralds were sapping the life out of him in exchange for them. That was a fact that just wasn't going to change for Sorun. But it was the little things like this that were making the ordeal all the easier and making him feel, amazingly enough, positive. And the only time he ever felt positive on Mobius was when he was playing video games. Preferably with Nicole.

Using the Bringer Claws to beat everybody in arm wrestling, though? Close second. Because Sorun was feeling great.

"Feel free to give up at any time, Amy," Sorun said as he leaned back in his chair, Bringer Claw slowly but surely pressing the pink hedgehog's hand down to the table. "There's no shame whatsoever in admitting defeat."

Eventually the word that Sorun was challenging people to arm wrestling with his weird new arm power had gotten around, so more Freedom Fighters who weren't already at the HQ had come to spectate and participate. All in good sport and fun, of course, as today was an off day for them all. Which so far was going amazing for Sorun, because nobody he'd arm wrestled thus far was actually as strong as Knuckles. And the Bringer Claws just didn't grow tired. So he was blowing his way through all the competitors like it was nothing.

Most had abstained from participating entirely when they saw him beat Knuckles, while those that still tried had been laughably easy when using the Bringer Claw to beat them. A couple were more resistant- those bionic arms Bunnie and Julie-Su had were for sure stronger than organic Mobian arms from what he felt, but again, still didn't compare to Knuckles. Sonic, surprisingly, had been unusually strong, too, compared to everybody else. But he lost all the same.

Right now he was on Amy, and in terms of raw arm strength at least, Sorun was struggling to decide whether he should place her below or above Sonic. Mostly due to the fact that it was hard to gauge strength since he was sensing with the Bringer Claw and not actually feeling. But he supposed she had to have more than just above average strength to twirl that giant hammer of hers around like it was nothing.

Still wasn't enough to beat a Bringer Claw, though.

"Don't listen to him, Amy-girl, ya got this now!" Bunnie had cheered from the sidelines. She looked down at her robotic arm right after. "Golly, but that new arm a' Sorun's really does pack a wallop. Ah hope he didn't jostle nothin' important."

"It should be fine. He didn't go that hard on it. And it's gone through worse than that anyways," Sally, who stood besides her, said while rubbing at her wrist.

Amy was relentless in trying to pin the Bringer Claw to the table, Sorun would give her that much. With teeth grit in exertion, she'd given up entirely on playing fair and was attempting to pin the spectral hand with both of her arms at once while using her feet to push against it. It was a vain effort as Sorun was slowly pushing her hands down to the table, but she was trying. He could respect that much.

And then he pinned her hands and won.

As he removed the Bringer Claw, Amy let out an exhausted sigh as her arms limply slid off the table. "Ah, gee. They weren't kidding when they said that thing was strong," Amy gasped out.

"Tell me about it." Interlacing his hands behind his head, Sorun let out an easy sigh as he closed his eyes. Felt kind of good to finally be marginally good at something. Fulfilling, almost. He might have even gone as far to say he enjoyed it if he hadn't had to spend twelve years of life for it.

He heard a new set of footprints approach him, and at the same time everybody quieted down. It almost felt like the air around chilled slightly, too, and Sorun didn't even have to think hard to guess who it was. So he wasn't surprised at all when he cracked an eye open and saw Shadow standing in front of him.

Shadow didn't even so much as nod as he looked around at everybody gathered and then back to Sorun. "I'd heard there was some commotion back at the base, but I didn't think it'd be because of you," he said. "What is all this?"

"I needed help testing some stuff with the power I got from the Emerald last night, so I've been arm wrestling everybody that's been willing."

The dark hedgehog paused for a moment. "... Why arm wrestling?"

"'Cause of the arms." Sorun demonstrated the ability by making the Bringer Claws appear. "I got arms from the Emerald."

If he was at all taken back by the sudden appeared of the Bringer Claws, he didn't show it. "Arms," Shadow repeated. He scrutinized the blue arms extending out from Sorun's back, but he slowly furrowed his eye ridges in confusion at the sight. "The power you gained was arms?"

Sorun shrugged. "They double as wings, too."

"Why of all...?" Shadow shook his head and refocused on Sorun. "Why did you gain arms? How did it even-?"

"Shadow, I have absolutely no idea," Sorun half-lied. "Powers I get from the Emeralds are practically a lottery. Sort of."

"'Sort of?'"

The human teen tensed up. "Yeah, you know how it is. Probably better than I do. You're the Chaos expert," he said as he leaned further into his chair. "I don't really know how it works, but as long as it works, I don't care. Too much." He glanced at the spectral arms. "Woulda liked some choice, though," he grumbled.

"Right..." Sorun didn't like the way Shadow trailed off on that word, or that way his eyes were slightly narrowed. Almost in suspicion. But after a second they widened back into their neutral expression, and his form relaxed. "So you decided that the best way to test your arms out is by arm wrestling everybody."

"Ah, come on, man, don't be like that. Nobody had anything else to do so we all decided to have a bit of fun with it. Besides, I already know how the arms work. I'm just testing the strength limits."

Shadow folded his arms. "You seem to be rather confident in those arms despite the fact you haven't even had them for a day."

"... Dude, they're arms," Sorun deadpanned. "Not a lot of complexities there."

"I suppose not." With that, Shadow turned a away. "Well, you all have fun with that."

He started to walk away, but he only made it three steps before Sorun spoke up again. "You don't want a round with the arm? Y'sure?"

"I've better things to do than waste time messing around with your new arm."

"Oh, wow, Shads. Didn't know a spooky blue arm was all it took to scare you off." This comment had come from Sonic, who was standing off to the side with the rest of the small crowd. "Ah, but hey, it's a free world. Who am I to judge?"

Sorun saw that the darker hedgehog's body tensed up at the blue one's words, and he slowly exhaled before turning right around and stomping back towards the table. "I'm only doing this because I'm slightly curious as to the physical capabilities of those arms," he informed the human as he sat down and propped his elbow up on the table. "Hurry up so we can get this over with."

"Sure thing." Sorun's Bringer Claw propped its own elbow onto the table and grasped Shadow's hand. "Since you're so impatient, we'll go on go. Go."

And once more, he felt the pressure of something pushing against his Bringer Claw as Sorun calmly sat in his chair. It wasn't enough to overcome it, and like all the others Sorun began to slowly press Shadow's hand downwards. "I guess even he's not as strong as Knuckles," he thought, "but... yeah, I think he's doing better than everybody else besides him did. Wow. This guy's really strong."

It was still hard to tell exactly how strong due to the fact Sorun got almost no sensory input from the Bringer Claw, but he could recognize the pressure pushing against it, and it was heavy. Not Knuckles heavy, but definitely up there. It was enough to make Sorun let out an interested hum, but that was about it.

For his part, Shadow was doing his best to not actually show he was exerting all his effort on the arm. His face was kept straight and his breathing was barely above normal, but even so he was still slowly losing. Even as Sorun finally pinned his hand and won, the most he did was let out a soft grunt. Sorun removed the blue claw, and Shadow regarded his own hand with slightly widened eyes. He looked up to the spectral hand after, and then sighed as he got up from the chair.

"They're certainly strong," he said. His tone seemed slightly clipped, but otherwise he maintained a level tone. "You know where I'll be if you ever want more practice."

"Uh, yeah. Sure." Sorun had barely even finished his sentence before the striped hedgehog had went back towards the steps leading out of the HQ. After he left, Sorun turned towards the other with a questioning look on his face. "What was all that about?"

Everybody present mostly had looks of confusion on their faces too, though it was Sonic who took the initiative to answer Sorun. "Eh, don't worry about it, Sorun. Shadow's just being Shadow."

"If you say so." He hoped that was all it was. Something about the way Shadow had been looking at his new arms made him uneasy. The questions he asked over them and the way he remarked over Sorun being so familiar with them.

Though, perhaps he was being paranoid. He'd been the same way about the Summoned Swords. Probably just curious since he was apparently into that Chaos stuff for whatever reason. But Sorun was still kicking himself for that "sort of" comment he'd accidentally let slip. If anything had set something off in Shadow, that had probably been it.

Ah, well. Worst came to worse if it ever came up he'd just lie and weasel out of it like always, but Sorun doubted it was anything that serious.

"Hm. Well, anyways, can I put the table back in the kitchen?" Sorun asked them. "I think I've gotten enough testing out of these things short of throwing boulders, so-"

"Er, actually, wait." There was a small shuffling in the crowd of Mobians as someone stepped forwards. Sorun had recognized the voice immediately, though the black fur and the shine of a red shell on his back was enough to confirm him as Mighty. "I wanted to try it, too," he requested.

"Oh, Mighty." He'd almost forgotten about the armadillo. He was somewhat surprised he hadn't come up sooner, too, but Sorun thought nothing of it as he gestured to the empty chair next to him. "Yeah, sure, come on. We'll get this last one in and I'll put the table back."

Almost eagerly, Mighty stepped towards the chair and planted himself in it. He'd practically slammed his elbow onto the table, though despite this he was giving Sorun a gentle smile as he flexed his fingers. "Hey, good luck, Sorun," he told the human.

"Um, thanks." The Bringer Claw got into position and grasped Mighty's hand. "You can start us off."

"Oh, okay." Mighty licked his lips and rapped his fingers across the blue hands claws before firmly gripping it. "Alright, let's go."

They both began pushing against each other. Immediately Sorun felt something different from Mighty, much to his surprise. The pressure being exerted on his Bringer Claw was more than even Knuckles' pressure. Much more. So much, in fact, that he had to immediately begin pushing back against Mighty with as much strength as the Bringer Claw had.

But then something peculiar began to happen. Unlike with Knuckles, or Shadow, or anybody else, Mighty's hand wasn't being pushed back. They weren't even deadlocked. No, instead it was Sorun's spectral hand that was slowly being pushed towards the table.

"... Wait." He narrowed his eyes in focus and tried willing the Bringer Claw to push more, but nothing was happening. He could see it from the slight trembles in the spectral arm's feathered forearm that it was already giving it its all. And yet, somehow, Mighty was still pushing it back. "Wait, no, this is bullshit. He can't be- there's no way he's that strong!"

He remembered Mighty describing to him he'd had abnormally high strength compared to even other Mobians, but at the time Sorun had just compared it to strength on Knuckles' level. That was the kind of resistance he'd expected when they'd initiated the arm wrestle. He didn't expect strength that would equal the Bringer Claw's, and he sure didn't expect strength that would exceed it. But here Mighty was. Exceeding his Bringer Claw.

And everybody else was noticing, too.

"Yeah, Mighty!" This cheer came from Knuckles, who proceeded to pump one of his fists in the air. "Keep going, you're almost there!"

Along with him the rest of the Chaotix began cheering for their teammate, and everybody else began leaning forwards in great interest as Sorun continued to be pushed further towards the table. And as he looked at Mighty, he couldn't help but notice the severe lack of a look of effort on Mighty's face. It wasn't like with Shadow, who had been actively trying to conceal his exertion. Sorun could see just from the way the muscles in Mighty's face were halfway relaxed. There was effort being put it, but it wasn't all of it.

This wasn't even that difficult for him. It was right after Sorun realized this that Mighty pinned the Bringer Claw to the table.

There were victorious cheers all around the moment Sorun's spectral hand hit the table. All the Chaotix practically rushed him, Vector having rubbed the top of his head with the knuckles on his fist. Sorun just continued to stare silently at the Bringer Claw, which had yet to move from its spot laying on the table.

"... He beat my Bringer Claw," he thought. "He's stronger than the Bringer Claws."

And all of a sudden, that great feeling he'd had when he displayed the arms' strength by winning all those arm wrestles went away just like that. He'd felt so accomplished, too, especially after he beat Knuckles. But it had been taken away just like that, and now he was left with a somewhat empty feeling.

"Ha ha ha! Guys, come on," Mighty pleaded as he gently pushed his teammates away to give him some space. "Hey, Sorun!" the human looked up from the hand to Mighty. "Those arms of yours are really strong, Sorun! I'm really impressed! Thanks for the match!"

A forced half-smile found its way onto Sorun's face as he got up from his own chair. "Yeah. Anytime. Thanks for the help with testing the arms out."

Mighty gave him a nod, and then turned back to the rest of the Chaotix while everybody else began to scatter. Sorun didn't pay them any mind, and instead began using his Bringer Claws to bring the kitchen furniture back into the kitchen.

"Yeah, of course Mighty's gotta be so nice and humble about the win, too. Ugh... alright, maybe it's not the worst thing in the world," he tried reasoning with himself as he placed the table and chairs back. "Yeah, Mighty beat them, but he's freakishly strong the same way Sonic is freakishly fast for some reason. And they beat Shadow and Knuckles, right? That's gotta count for something."

That's what he told himself, at least, but going from thinking the arms were infallible in strength to knowing they could be beaten with raw strength was unsettling to Sorun. Mostly because the same thoughts he'd had with the Summoned Swords after that small spar with Shadow were popping up again. They were still good powers, but up to what point? How did Mighty compare to some of the serious threats out there?

Probably not as strong, he wanted to say, but it's not like he knew. And not knowing worried him.

"Nah, nah I'm overthinking this," Sorun thought as, after placing the furniture back, he walked towards the TV and game console to turn it on. "It's still good enough to work. It's two extra arms that are way stronger than mine that can extend and fly and stuff. It's not nothing, but... ugh. Why'd Mighty have to go and beat me?"

He wasn't sure what he thought of them now. What he did know was that he needed a confidence booster stat. Fortunately there was still one thing he was good at that only one other person in the whole of the Freedom Fighters could claim to be his equal in.

"Yo, anybody want a round of games with me?" Sorun asked as he sat down on the couch and waved a controller up in the air.

"I'll take ya on!" In a blink blue momentarily passed Sorun's vision before he felt the couch compress next to him. He looked to the side and saw Sonic sitting there with a controller.

"Your funeral," Sorun said with a shrug as he and Sonic bother turned towards the TV.

Suffice it to say he went home that day having completely defeated Sonic and everybody else that had felt like playing with him after the fact. But even still, all the victories couldn't take his mind off of the Bringer Claws as he walked all the way back to Sonic's house.

A/N- I'll assuage all your fears now: no, Sorun's not gonna get super eyeballs that give him a stupid amount of broken powers or an invincible punch ghost or anything world breaking like that. He's firmly locked into DMC stuff for reasons that will become more clear as the story goes on, if it isn't already. Assuming he gets more powers, of course. I know it's a bit spoiler-y saying this but I only say this because I put the little bit in about powers Sorun does want in, and then people begin worrying because it can be construed as a form of foreshadowing for future stuff. Which may or may not be something I do sometimes, but in this case I'm saying no, it wasn't.

Chapter 18

A/N- You guys remember way back when I said 2k-word chapters could be a thing? Yeah, me neither.

Recursion Error

Episode 18- Objective: Survive

"Okay, let's try it. The- AGH, DAMMIT!"

The stabbing pain running through Sorun's chest caused him to toss the notebook and pencil to the ground as he clutched at the area over his heart. After a few seconds he felt his heartbeat return, and then let out a sigh of relief as he sat back against the cobblestone wall of the HQ entrance.

"Well," Sorun glumly thought as he looked down at the dropped implements, "that didn't work."

With his life on the line, Sorun would be remiss to not at least try and find a way of preserving his own life through means other than the shaky plan he had currently, which was "just do what I can as I go and hope for the best", because so far that plan had netted him twenty-four years off his life with two Emeralds in him. He'd set goals for himself, but he neglected to make an actual plan for achieving those goals.

The problem, of course, was that there was very little which he could use to make a plan. Getting the Emeralds out of him? If such a thing was possible, nothing on Mobius had presented itself to Sorun yet, so as far as he was concerned that goal was on the back burner. Cut all his losses and run? Easy enough that he wasn't too worried about it at the moment. Find a way of telling the Freedom Fighters that the Chaos Emeralds were slowly killing him? Not strictly necessary, but if he could convey this message to them, it'd make his life easier. And out of everything, maybe he could accomplish that last one right now.

But then he had the gag curse to worry about, and apparently Aurora had been serious when she meant "convey through any means". Sorun had found a notebook and pencil and had attempted writing a note about the affliction, but he'd felt his heart stop before the pencil even hit the page. Suffice to say she covered her bases. Great for her, not so great for Sorun.

"Geez, what, is raw intent enough to set this thing off?" Sorun wondered as he stroked at his chest. "The hell else am I supposed to do if that's the case? Hook myself up to a heart monitor and just give myself a heart attack in front of everybody? Where would I even get a heart monitor? Probably at a hospital somewhere in Knothole, but I don't think they'll let me walk away with it. And even if I do manage to snag a heart monitor my own heart'll probably stop before I even hook it up if intent's really all it takes."

So much for that charades idea he'd been entertaining. If something as meager as intent was really enough to set the gag curse off, then he didn't know if there actually was anything he could do to tell them about his ailment. Which, of course, meant that if and when they acquired more Emeralds they'd likely want him to power up more. Which would shorten his life even more. And even though it had been a few days since the incident around the second Emerald with his Bringer Claws he had yet to think of any justifiable excuse not to touch any more Emeralds.

"What am I supposed to say? 'Ah, I dunno, guys. That shit hurts real bad. But Summoned Swords and Bringer Claws are enough, right? I don't need any more power than that.' Pfft, I don't even buy that. And if I raise enough of a fit Sonic's gonna want to know what the deal is, and thanks to that promise I made he's not gonna let it go." He tilted his head up at the bright morning sky. "I can't think of anything. I'm so cooked."

He really should have thought further ahead with his "just weasel out of it plan" when he'd actively set things up in advance so that it was nearly impossible to weasel out of it next time around.

Whoops.

The door leading into the HQ swung open, though despite sitting next to it, Sorun hadn't bothered to looks towards it. He did notice out from the corner of his eye that the figure walking out of the doorway was Sally, though he hoped she had something important to do and would just ignore him so he could continue contemplating his bleak future.

"Sorun?" No such luck, as she'd noticed him immediately and turned towards him. "What are you doing here?"

The human teen took a deep breath, exhaled, and then rolled his head towards Sally. "So it all started when I went go buy orange juice," he began.

A wry grin spread across the princess's face. "No, I mean why are you sitting here?" She gestured to the notebook and pencil. "And what's with the writing stuff?"

"Oh, that." Sorun leaned forwards to pick the implements up. "I thought about maybe starting a journal or something to help me keep a grip on my sanity," he lied, "but, I dunno, when I actually tried writing I just didn't feel like doing it. It's hard to articulate my thoughts on paper when there's so much on my mind all the time." It was equally hard when attempting to write those thoughts stopped his heart.

Sally tilted her head. "I would think that having a lot on your mind would make for easy writing in something like a journal."

"Yeah, you'd think." With a soft groan Sorun stood up to his feet. "So what are you up to?"

"I was actually just about to go and get you," she answered him. "You feel up for another mission?"

Usually Sorun would have said no at this point, and oh, did he want to, but with all the worrying he'd done over Chaos Emeralds and trying and failing to find solutions to his problems he figured that some distraction was in order. And working a mission to get further into everybody's good graces never hurt. "Sure, I guess," he said with a nod. "What's going on?"

"Come with me to the hangar. I'll explain along the way."

She began walking off in the direction of the hangar, gesturing for Sorun to follow her. He shrugged, and then lightly jogged for a bit before slowing to a walk once he'd made it to her side.

Walking to and from the HQ to Knothole over time was beginning to become easier for Sorun at the very least. Perhaps that was just his body becoming accustomed to it all, but there was something oddly peaceful about the land encompassing Knothole. All the trees and greenery. The vibrancy of it all. The way the air always smelled so fresh and the occasional sound of some small non-Mobian bird or other animal.

Maybe it was because he didn't have anything to listen to since all his music had been lost with his phone, but after a while the infrequent noises and lush scenery was beginning to become somewhat calming to Sorun. A kind of natural, ambient white noise he could get lost in. He'd still always prefer huddling up in a room to play a video game, but walking through this scenery all the time was growing on him.

"You know, before coming here I'd never been in a forest before," Sorun told Sally as the pair walked down the path towards Knothole.

"Really?" Sally turned her head to acknowledge him. "Why is that?"

"I lived in a city. Detroit," he reminded her. "Most greenery I was ever around was this little park near my house, but otherwise I mostly just grew up around concrete. I never traveled, either."

"So what do you think of the forest?" she asked him.

He hummed in contemplation for a moment. "It's... nice," he decided. "I don't know, something about all the plants and nature is... it's weird. But in a nice way. The air's great, all the forest looks nice, the colors here are way sharper than on Earth, and I'm still trying to figure out what the deal with that is." He looked up towards the sky. "You can even see stars here at night. I'd barely ever seen stars before."

The first night he'd been here the sight of the night sky had mainly went over his head, both because of what had been going on inside his head and because of the broken state of the moon distracting him. Some days later, though, he'd ventured to take another look up and was completely taken back by the sheer amount of light in the night sky. The countless dots of white and the hues of purples and dark blues illuminating an otherwise inky black sky. It was the kind of sight he'd seen in pictures online and in video games, but he'd never expected to see such a thing in reality.

He liked the sky here.

"Why couldn't you see stars where you're from?" Sally asked.

"Eh, too much light pollution from the city lights. Or smog from the normal pollution," he answered. "Sometimes you saw some really bright ones, but it wasn't usually that many. And then you think you spot a really big one but it starts moving across the sky and you realize that it was a plane or a weather balloon or something." He sighed. "You have no idea how many times that happened to me." He glanced at Sally. "But here I can actually see the sky at night. It's real neat-looking."

"I think I can understand," Sally said. "There were a lot of times back in the day we would run recon missions at night in Robotropolis, which was... the former capital city of the Kingdom of Acorn, though back then it had a different name. Before the original Dr. Robotnik took it over at the beginning of all this. I remember looking up at the sky and wondering why it looked so dark and lifeless all the time there, but between all the lights and the pollution he created, I can see why. Even to this day some of Eggman's factories and refineries blot the nearby skies out." She sighed. "I don't want to imagine living your whole life under a sky like that."

"Nah, it's real easy. You just do what I did and cover all the windows in your room with curtains so you never have to look outside."

For a few seconds they continued walking in silence while Sally's head perked up as she registered the sentence Sorun said. Afterwards a small laugh left her, and with a shake of her head she gently shoved Sorun's shoulder. "I was being serious there," she laughed.

"Hey, so was I. Why do you think my skin's so pale? Barely ever got any sun." He casually tucked his hands into his pockets. "So, what's this mission about?"

The mirthful grin was still present on Sally's face, though an air of seriousness had taken over her features. "It's a medical relief effort," she explained. "Supply lines and trade routes are pretty much all annihilated thanks to the war with Eggman, and traveling these days is too dangerous. Most of the villages and settlements in the eastern portion of Northamer are self-sufficient in terms of foods and other supplies, but in terms of modern medicine they all lack the means of production." A soft sigh left her. "Nobody wanted to see all the Mobians out there so close to the kingdom suffer because of the war. It took some pressuring from me, but eventually my brother agreed to send out medical transports to them whenever we could."

Sorun nodded in understanding. "So you want me running meds?" he summarized. "Couldn't you just load Tails' plane up or something and just fly them all out?"

Sally shook her head. "No, the Tornado's too small for all the cargo, and the Special's out on a different mission. That's why we're using the train."

"... Train?" Sorun repeated. "What train?"

"There's an old track back from when the Overlanders had a presence in Northamer." Sally held a hand up in the air and began tracing an invisible shape with her finger. "It runs a full circuit over the whole eastern portion of the upper continent. A long while back a bunch of engineers got the train that was attached to it up and running. Some people from the kingdom already loaded the supplies onto the train, and messengers were sent out to all the recipient settlements. The plan is for them to send their people out to certain stops along the track where you'll unload the medicine onto them before continuing on and then finally circling back."

That... didn't sound that bad at all, especially compared to all the other missions Sorun had done before. No sneaking into buildings? No fighting killer robots? Just cruise around the country in a train, see the sights along the way, and unload some boxes? Sounded like a vacation to Sorun's ears.

Yeah, he'd do that. It'd be a nice distraction from everything else happening to him. He needed the break.

"Gee, I dunno, Sally." A faux yawn left Sorun's mouth as he removed his hands from his pockets and stretched his arms over his head. "Kinda sounds like you just want the guy with the cool new arms to carry around a bunch of heavy boxes."

The light tone to his voice was enough to clue her in to his teasing, causing Sally to grin as she crossed her arms and rolled her eyes away from Sorun. "No, that's not it at all. But I'm sure all those poor Mobians will get by just fine without their medicine if you're really so against it."

"Well, it does sound pretty horrible when you say it like that." Sorun's arms flopped back down to his sides. "Alright, I'll go from being Sorun the Freedom Fighter to Sorun the Mailman for a bit. Sorun the Courier." He held his hands up in front of him and slowly started to spread them outwards. "Sorun the Great Deliverer. How does that sound?"

Light laughter from Sally. "Weirdly enough, it suits you," she said, before giving him a grateful smile. "Thanks for taking this on, Sorun. I wouldn't be asking you if it wasn't important."

"Yeah, sure thing." The teen's hands went back into his pockets. It wasn't like he was going to turn down such a nice-sounding change of pace. "So am I going on the train alone, or...?"

"No," Sally said with a shake of her head, "I'm sending two others to come along with you."

"Aw, come on, Sally. I know it's me we're talking about here, but I'm not that bad anymore." Sorun's walking speed slightly increased so that he was in front of the princess, at which point he turned to face her while walking backwards. "All I gotta do is ride around in a train and drop off the meds. You're seriously saddling me with two other Freedom Fighters for something as easy as that?"

The chipmunk sent him a challenging smirk. "Well, if you're saying you can operate a highly sophisticated train on your own and want to ride all around the upper continent on your lonesome..."

She had a point. "Hah, okay, I get it." Sorun blew a lock of black hair away from his face. "So who're you sending along with me?"

"Oh, Antoine and Bunnie."

After hearing the two names, Sorun's footsteps completely halted, with Sally walking past the human blissfully unaware of his frozen state.

"Bonjour, Sorun!"

"Ah, great. This chucklefuck..."

That was the one sole thought that went through Sorun's head as he saw the French coyote wave at him while quickly approaching. He quietly sighed at the sight Antoine, and then looked behind him at the sky to the biplane that was quickly disappearing towards the horizon. A small part of him wished Tails would fly back to take him back to Knothole.

It wasn't that Sorun had any personal animosity towards Antoine, aside, of course, from him being one of the ones that voted to use the coordinates on that wooden tablet to bring him here. If anything he was a fairly decent guy. Even forgave Sorun for blowing him up with that paint bomb. The French accent and broken English even stopped bothering Sorun after a while.

But there were still some things about him that bugged Sorun. Like how he couldn't take a damn hint. He was there right along Sally and Bunnie when Sorun flat-out stated he didn't want to become friends with anybody, and of course he was acting like Sorun had never even said it like everybody else was. But he was just as bad as Sonic in that he acted like they really were friends on those rare occasions they talked.

Maybe it was the language barrier not letting the message get through. Or Sorun barely doing anything to back up that statement he'd made. He kept neglecting to do that.

Other than that, it was the little things. Small, inconsequential things that added up. Little quirks in his personality. The way he'd exaggerate things about himself sometimes when telling stories, which others were quick to correct for Sorun's sake. That damn haircut of his.

... Sorun's jealousy over the fact he could so expertly handle that saber he carried around when Sorun's own swordsmanship skills amounted to the equivalent of swinging a baseball bat.

All that aside, he was still a loyal person who was as bizarrely friendly as almost the rest of the Freedom Fighters. It was mostly just Sorun nitpicking on the smallest, most insignificant flaws, which the teen himself was aware he was doing. But he'd ignore all that for now in light of the fact they had a job to do.

"Hi, Antoine," Sorun greeted back as the human took a look around at the surroundings. He'd been dropped off in a small clearing that was largely unremarkable. Save, of course, for the train tracks a short distance behind Antoine and the train on top of it. A black, old-timey-looking train with six boxcars connected to the engine.

A train if Sorun ever saw one.

"Sorun, mon ami, you are just being on time! We were worried we would have to leaved without you!"

"Yeah, there was some turbulence on the way here." Right when Antoine reached out to pat him on the shoulder, Sorun reached his right leg out and did a large sidestep to avoid him. "So that's the train?" he asked as he began to walk towards the train.

"Er, oui, le train iz over zere," Antoine confirmed as he began following Sorun. "We are just getting ready to depart."

Sorun hummed, and crouched down next to the train. Curiously, he couldn't see any wheels under the train. It seemed more that the train itself was directly connected to the tracks. "No wheels, huh?" He craned his neck behind him at Antoine. "Is this like some kind of bullet train or something?"

The question seemed to cause great confusion to Antoine. "Non, Sorun, eet iz a train, not a bul-let." He shook his head in amusement. "I am having ze very hard time imagining ze train fitting inside of a gun."

"No man, I- ugh." Sorun palmed his face in irritation. "The rails, dude. There's no wheels on the train. Is it magnetic or what?"

"... Je vois, oui, ze train runs on ze magnet railz," Antoine said with a slightly embarrassed smile.

Humming in acknowledgment, the human teen looked towards the front engine of the train and saw a small step ladder on his left. He walked over to climb it, and quickly found the door leading into the engine compartment on the top. He reached out and casually opened and stepped through the door.

From his limited experience with trains due to only ever having seen them in movies and games, the actual train part of the train looked about what Sorun had expected of a train. In front of him was a small staircase that lead up to what he assumed was the control room, as from this position he could see a console chock full of knobs and diodes at the end of the small room.

Under the stairs was a different story. There was a large, mechanical something embedded into the wall. Tubes and other cables spread out from it towards the floor, and based on all the gauges and levers installed in it, Sorun had immediately assumed it was the generator that powered the train. What it ran on, though, was outside of his knowledge. He couldn't even see a port to open in order to insert whatever fuel it used. It looked rather strange to him the longer Sorun looked at it.

His ears perked up when he heard the door squeak open behind him, and he looked behind him to see Antoine entering the engine compartment behind Sorun. The teen felt compelled to ask him about the train out of sheer curiosity, so he turned around to address him.

"So you're the one driving this thing, right, Antoine?" he asked him.

"Oui, of course." He gave a nod. "Why do you ask?"

"Just wondering what this thing runs on." Sorun turned back towards the train's engine. "Is it coal, or oil... some mystical something or other...?"

"Non, ze train iz running on electric power," Antoine explained. "Ze engine right over zere uses Power Rings as a fuel source. We were fueled up when ze train was loaded, zo we should be good for ze delivery today."

"Right, those weird golden noodles..." He still had yet to ask what those golden rings he'd seen here and there were. The most he'd ever actually seen them used for was on Nicole's computer body so she could generate her lynx body, but from pieces of conversation he'd picked up here and there he reckoned that those rings served as a universal power source.

He still didn't know what the rings actually were. Or why one of the mains sources of energy in this world was rings. He'd probably get a straight answer if he asked somebody, but if it followed the same trend as every other answer he'd ever gotten for anything he asked, it would be something so convoluted that he'd regret asking in the first place. So until it became a relevant topic in a conversation he'd settle for rings powering everything. For some reason.

"... Wait, did Antoine just say a day?" Both eyebrows raising in confusion, Sorun turned back to the coyote. "Did you just say a day?" he asked. "We're doing this run in day ?"

Antoine slowly nodded, his own confusion taking over his features. "Why would we not be taking a day for ze deliverance of ze medical supplies?"

"I thought we were looping over the whole eastern portion of Northamer!" That was running a circle through the eastern half of what was once America and Canada combined. He didn't know exactly how long a trip like that was going to take, but he was expecting a lot more than just a single day considering a distance like that. "How fast does this thing go, anyways!?"

"Well, ze amount of time to make a full lap of ze track eez about... twenty-seven or twenty-eight hours, I believe," Antoine said, "and if we add in some hours to give out ze medicines, around... perhaps thirty hours? Zat sounds about right."

"Oh. Okay. Wow." So apparently the train was really, really fast, then. He understood how absurd trains on magnetic rails could get in terms of speed, but he didn't imagine speeds this ludicrous, especially for a train. Technology on Mobius really was something else.

And yet he still couldn't find a goddamned wireless game controller. He knew the technology existed, too. Everything else practically did.

The door leading to the engine compartment rattled again, drawing the pair's attention. Before the door even opened Sorun had seen a long pair of yellow rabbit ears through the door's window, and chose to lean back against the wall as the third occupant entered. As expected, he immediately heard a female Southern accent speak out.

"Antoine, Sugah, any idea when we're- oh, Sorun, yer here."

Tilting his head up, Sorun turned his head slightly to glance at the yellow rabbit from the corner of his eyes. He raised up two fingers and greeting, and then lowered his head back down.

"Tails dropped Sorun off just some minutes ago," Antoine explained. "I believe that is meaning we are good to go now?"

"Not waiting for anything else," Sorun agreed as he shuffled in his position leaning on the wall. "I'm good to go when you two are."

Bunnie nodded. "Same here," she said.

"Alright, zen." Antoine walked past Sorun and began ascending the steps towards the train's control room. "I will get us all moving along after-haste."

Sorun's eyes followed the coyote up the stairs, and he softly groaned when his words reached his ears. "It's post-haste!" he called up.

"Oui, merci, Sorun! Post-haste!" Antoine called back.

Rolling his eyes, Sorun suppressed the slight smirk that threatened to form as he crossed his arms. A deep, whirring sound was emitted from the train's generator, and almost immediately afterwards the train lurched forwards as it began moving. It began accelerating at an extremely rapid pace, too, as Sorun could see from a window that the forest next to the train tracks was already starting to quickly whiz past them.

"So how many stops are we making?" Sorun asked as he turned to address Bunnie.

"'Round five, if ah recall," she told him.

He hummed in acknowledgement. "That's kinda low, isn't it?"

Bunnie shook her head. "All the settlements nearby a stop send their people tah collect, so we're supplyin' multiple settlements at once each stop. But... you're right, it is a might bit low," she agreed in a quiet voice. "Ain't too many left out there 'cause a' Eggman. Ya know how it is."

"... Right," he mumbled out.

"Hey, hey, what iz it with ze frownie faces?" Both of their heads turned back to the stairs, where they saw Antoine descending back towards them. "This iz a time of happiness given le contexte to our mission, non?"

Sorun quirked an eyebrow at the coyote. "Antoine, shouldn't... shouldn't you be driving?"

"Aw, eet iz all automatic, Sorun. I just need to be zere to start and stop ze train," he explained, "and we have some hours yet until ze first stop."

"Oh." Made complete sense when he said it like that. "So... what do you two wanna do in the meantime?"

"Any fours, Antoine?"

Playing cards hadn't exactly been what Sorun had in mind, but the two Mobians had been thoughtful enough to bring a set with them and there wasn't much else to do, so he wasn't complaining. So they decided to go ahead and play some cards. The name of the game? Go Fish. Because as it turned out between the three of them they all didn't know that many card games, and Sorun had always strayed away from the gambling side of games due to a lack of interest.

It beat Bunnie's suggestion of Texas Hold 'Em, a game that was apparently still alive and going strong in the post-apocalypse. Blackjack was one thing Sorun knew, but straight poker was a game outside of his purview. Antoine had denied it as well. Vehemently at that, with a wildly blushing face for whatever reason that was beyond Sorun, though Bunnie had been subtly teasing him about it.

Yeah, he didn't know what the deal there was.

So they'd all agreed on Go Fish and crammed themselves into one of the train's boxcars. It was vacant of furniture since it was mainly used to store boxes of medical supplies, but there was enough space in one of the ones further back that they could all comfortably sit around in a circle to play some cards.

"Non, Sorun, go fishing," Antoine mumbled from behind the deck of cards he was holding against his face.

Frowning, Sorun peeked up from his own deck and narrowed his eyes at the coyote sitting cross-legged in front of him. "You didn't have any tens, you didn't have any fives, you didn't have any threes, and now you're telling me you don't have any fours," he said. "We're all drowning in cards here and there's barely any in the pile, Antoine, so unless you're telling me Bunnie's holding the rest of the fours or they just happen to be in the pile, I don't believe you. The math says you have the cards."

"Implying you are holding few of ze fours?" Antoine noted with a smirk from behind his cards.

"Uhhhhhh..." Sorun quickly held his deck closer to his blushing face. "Nah, man, don't know what you're talking about." He quickly swiped a card from the pile.

"Oui, I am zo sure." Antoine turned to Bunnie. "Twos?"

"Nope."

"Ah." He drew a card from the pile.

The rabbit turned to the slightly fuming teen. "Any eights, Sorun?"

"Yeah, I got eights. I got almost every number in the universe in my hand right now," he hissed as he handed her his three eights.

"Ah'm sure. Aces?"

Sorun shook his head, causing her to reach for a card in the pile. "I said almost." He turned to the coyote. "Antoine, six. Gimme."

"I have no sixes to give you, mon ami."

It took great mental effort to not strangle his cards as Sorun reached to draw one from the pile.

"Now then, Bunnie," Antoine began, "Would Sorun's earlier implication of you possessing many of ze fours be true?"

Grumbling, the rabbit removed two cards from her deck and quickly handed them off to a grinning Antoine. She shot Sorun a dirty glare afterwards. "Thanks a lot, pardner," she grumbled at him.

Sighing, Sorun dropped his deck into his lap. "Really wish I would have taken the time to learn more card games before getting sucked here," he complained. "Or brought an Uno deck."

"That a game where yer from?" Bunnie asked.

"Mm-hm. The friendship ender," Sorun said as he picked his cards back up. "It was a simple enough game, but there were a bunch of zany house rules you could do that would make some of those games go on for hours." He was pretty sure he remembered going on a five-hour stretch of the game playing the online version. How brutal of a session that had been. He barely even remembered the last hour of that game as Sorun had been foaming at the mouth in anger at that point.

Good times.

Antoine chuckled in amusement. "I fail to see how a simple card game could go on for zo long."

"You don't know, man. You just don't know. Maybe that's something I can do. Introduce this world to the most evil card game ever devised," Sorun mused. "Give me something to do in my off time other than play games with Nicole and hide from Sonic whenever he wants me to do more 'endurance training'."

"Mm." Humming in agreement, Antoine looked down at his deck. "Give me your four, Sorun."

With a harsh sigh, Sorun practically tore the card out from his deck and gave it to Antoine. He hummed happily, and put down the full set of fours next to him on the floor.

"Now that ze fours are out of ze way, Sorun, do you have any sevens?" he asked.

The human shook his head. "Nah, go fish."

Antoine pouted, and reached for the top card in the pile. He turned it around, and immediately his features lit up in glee. "Oh, tres bon, ze last seven!"

The deck of cards in Sorun's hand were promptly thrown against the nearest crate of medicine following a frustrated yell from the teen.

True to Antoine's word, they'd arrived at their first stop after a few hours after they'd departed from their starting point. There wasn't much special about the stop itself; there weren't any structures or anything of the like around, it was just that the clearing of forest the tracks ran through was significantly less dense with trees. But the giant crowd of Mobians waiting for them all was a pretty big indicator along with a map full of marks Antoine had in his possession.

They'd stopped in the middle of the crowd waiting around the tracks in short notice. While Antoine's job had been driving the train, Bunnie's had been to go outside to organize the crowd based on what settlements they were from so they could get by with the delivery as smoothly as possible. Soon enough at her direction everybody was lined up at one of the train's magnetically-propelled boxcars.

Sorun's job? The illustrious position of handing boxes off.

"Okay, we got anti-inflammatories, antibiotics, pain killers, isa... something-zonium... sulfate... this, this one. Man, I wish mom was here to pronounce some of this stuff for me." Bringer Claws had appeared and extended out from Sorun's form to gather up the boxes of medicine as he stood in front of the opened boxcar in front of the lines of waiting Mobians. Spectral armloads of boxes that would have been a challenge for four people proved easy with the Bringer Claws, which returned to Sorun's sides carrying an inordinate amount of boxes.

It was quite a large crowd in front of him, too. Mobians of all sizes, shapes, species, and colors all standing right there. Squirrels, deer, various birds, wolves, foxes, and dozens of other species Sorun couldn't place. A large part of him had been somewhat afraid of them when the train had stopped, actually, and he had to take a few deep breaths before coming out of the train to open the boxcar up and hand off the medicine.

That incident way at the beginning of all this was still plaguing his mind, after all. That rock. That and the knowledge that humans, or Overlanders at the very least as there was a large distinction to be made there, were responsible for a lot of terrible wars. Eggman really wasn't helping with their image. And people in Knothole knew him at this point, sure, but these were complete strangers out in the sticks. And he'd been extremely paranoid over the fact that all these Mobians probably wouldn't appreciate his mere presence even with Antoine and Bunnie with him. He'd expected the worst: name calling, things being thrown, maybe even a mob rushing him. It was bad enough to the point that his shoulders had constantly been tensed while he waited for a confrontation.

None of that ever happened.

In fact, it was the dead-opposite of his expectations. Everybody was so... happy and overjoyed to see him. Cheerful. Him, some random human who'd come in on a train. Albeit to hand out life-saving medicine, so the gratefulness was to be expected, but he hadn't expected how friendly everybody was being with him. Friendly and thankful, some almost to the point of tears, which really put Sorun off. None of them were even batting an eye at the spectral, winged claws he had coming out of his shoulders. If anything, they were all treating it like normal.

All of this made Sorun confused and bewildered beyond his belief. So much so that, as he was handing off the boxes of medicine to these incredibly grateful Mobians, he couldn't so much as speak or emote properly. His features were mainly marred in confused, unsure creases mixed with rapid blinking, though like the Bringer Claws this, too, was ignored by everybody he was handing the medicine off to.

He didn't know what to think of any of this.

"Thank you thank you thank you so much!" He didn't even get a chance to hand anything off before a brown-furred rabbit Mobian had crashed into him while mumbling more thanks into his sleeveless hoodie. "Everybody at my village was so worried we didn't know what to do and-"

"Yeah, I get it, I get it," Sorun quickly muttered. Alarmed from the unwanted contact, he used his real arms to pry the rabbit girl off of him. "Just take this stuff back there, okay?"

She wiped away a tear- people actually crying for him, he couldn't believe it- as she took the boxes from his spectral arms that she didn't even flinch at before walking away with the rest of the Mobians that had already received their medicine.

Sorun stared after her and the rest, still incredibly perplexed by the events even as the Bringer Claws continued to rummage around in the boxcar behind him for more medicine. A beige colored Mobian- squirrel, mongoose, something, Sorun couldn't tell- approached him with just as wide a smile as everybody else had.

"Seriously, what the hell is going on?"

"Here," Sorun tonelessly said as the blue claws extended towards the Mobian with the boxes.

"Oh, man, this is such a huge relief," the Mobian sighed out as he took the boxes. "We ran out of this stuff at my village, and my sister's illness came back, seriously, you're a lifesaver!"

"Yeah, dude, just go."

Over and over and over again this would happen. With everybody. So much unexpected kindness that to Sorun, who hadn't expected or even ever experienced this treatment in his life, it was suffocating. Almost literally. It was just such an overwhelming amount of happiness and smiles and thanks that he didn't know what to do with it, or how to respond to any of it. And it made him feel something , too. This strange, alien feeling in his chest that had been slowly growing throughout this whole process that welled up particularly whenever he handed off boxes.

He didn't know what it was, nor did he even understand this feeling. Or why everybody was acting like this. It frightened him.

"Fuckin' finally." He breathed out a large sigh of relief when he was finally allowed to close up the boxcar once everybody had received their medicine. "Ugh, man, this is the exact opposite of what I expected to happen. What the hell... I don't get any of this."

"All set, Sorun?" He nearly jumped out of his boots when he heard the voice addressing him. His neck snapped to his right, and he breathed out a sigh of relief when he saw it was just Bunnie. "You doin' alright?"

No, he was never doing alright, but at this particular moment he was doing worse than normal. "When's the train leaving?" he almost demanded in a ragged voice.

"Er... Antoine's up an' at the controls right now-"

"Great, can we go?" Sorun hadn't even waited for a response before he began climbing up the stairs to the train. "I wanna go. I wanna go now."

She looked confused at his statement, but not nearly as confused as he was. He was pretty sure that was impossible. "You don't wanna stick around for a bit-?"

"Nope, nope-nope-nope." Sorun rapidly shook his head. "We got four more stops, right? Can't leave all those people hanging. Clock's tickin'- ANTOINE, HURRY UP!" he yelled out towards the front of the train.

A window at the head engine car opened. "I am going, I am going! Start having some patience!" Antoine yelled back.

"I'm plenty patient," an impatient Sorun hissed out as he turned back to Bunnie. "Hurry up, we're going."

He'd made his way inside the train before she could get another response in. He walked in through the door of the engine car, slammed the door behind him, and then crashed his back against it while breathing out heavily. He heard a door to one of the boxcars open and close as Bunnie entered, and soon after Sorun felt the train lurch forwards again as they began moving back forwards.

That should have been the end to the anxiety right there, but Sorun had made the mistake of peeking his head towards the window to look outside. All the Mobians were still there, holding all the boxes he'd given them but all still smiling and doing their best to wave the train off with any free appendages they had. He saw that a majority of them were making eye contact with him, too, which caused Sorun to slink away from the window and slide down into a sitting position on the train floor.

He'd needed some time to himself after all that happened. He'd gotten it, fortunately, when he'd expressed a desire to stay in the control cabin for a bit when Antoine had made to leave. Antoine being Antoine hadn't even questioned it and left towards the back end of the train where Bunnie was.

Some time passed. Tens of minutes or maybe an hour- he wasn't so sure. He'd mainly spent it leaning against the train's wall in the control cabin while he stared out of a window and at the country rapidly passing by. Most of his focus was more on his own thoughts as opposed to looking out at the view, though.

"I just... they were all just so... nice. Not a single one so much as gave me a bad look. They didn't even question my Bringer Claws. That's just not normal. Maybe it's normal to them? Is the problem me?" He looked down at his hand. "Am I seriously so socially inept that I got a panic attack out of doing something like that? No, I... they're the weird ones. Goddammit, why can't anybody act normal?"

There had never been a point in his entire life when he'd been showered with so much affection by total strangers like that. He knew Mobians were nice, but he just hadn't seen something like that coming. Especially to him. Some stranger. Some random-ass human they'd never seen before. A random-ass human with weird magic arms. He couldn't handle all that positive attention.

"Is that- is that just how they act? All the smiles, the hugging- ugh, the hugging. And that group of girls kept giggling at me. Fuck was up with that?" He sighed. "I'm not a Mobian. So why would...? Maaaan, I don't know... "

Sorun just didn't understand. Anything. Like usual. Eventually in a thoughtless movement he'd gone to open the window to get some fresh air in the room to maybe help his thoughts, but due to the speed of the train it'd nearly felt like he'd been punched in the face by the wind ripping past the fast-moving train. He quickly closed the window back up, panting heavily as he tried to smooth out the locks of black hair that had been completely blown back from the wind.

He'd idly noted the door to the train car opening and closing after he'd fixed his hair as best he could, though largely ignored the footsteps coming up. His eye briefly flicked to the window where he saw Bunnie's reflection, but then he looked back out the window without offering a greeting.

"Penny for your thoughts?" he suddenly heard the rabbit behind him ask.

"Pennies don't even exist anymore, so how do you- ugh, forget it." Sorun turned around and flopped his back onto the wall so that he was facing Bunnie. "Whaddya want?"

The rabbit girl reached up to adjust the brown had sitting on top of her head. "Just checkin' up on ya." Bunnie walked over to Sorun's wall and pressed her own back against it so that they were side-by-side, facing the windows on the wall opposite of them. "Ya looked pretty rattled back there," she began.

Somehow he knew she was going to ask about his behavior eventually. He found himself sighing and rolling his eyes. "Whatever. She's here and I gotta get this stuff of my chest. Maybe get some answer over what all that was."

Who knew? Maybe talking about this would help. Sonic sure kept vouching for its effectiveness, and this wasn't the kind of conversation that would give him a heart attack.

"The first day I came here, some kids threw a rock at me," Sorun started. "Called me a bunch of names. Kept wondering why until Sally gave me a history lesson the next day, and after that I figured, yeah, no wonder there's a prejudice against humans and Overlanders after all the war and Eggman and all that. So I assumed that anybody outside of the Freedom Fighters, so pretty much everybody, would be... adverse towards me." He paused. "I've mainly been avoiding Knothole and its population this whole time because I'm scared of them."

A long moment of contemplation passed before Bunnie addressed him again. "That why you've been holin' up in Freedom HQ all this time? Even when nobody's there?"

"... Pretty much, yeah," he truthfully admitted. "I mean, what do you want from me? I get shoved in an alien world and one of the first things I learn is that 'oh, my sort-of kind attempted to commit genocide against your kind. Multiple times. And there's a madman robot guy still doing it.' What was I supposed to think?"

Bunnie slowly nodded, and after a long sigh she brushed some of her blonde hair over her shoulder and turned her head to Sorun.

"Sugar, I get where you're comin' from, but ya need tah relax. Nobody's prejudiced against humans."

He didn't believe that for a second. "There would be a gash on my forehead that would disagree with you if it didn't heal over," he stated.

"Sorun, that was just a buncha idjit kids," she said. "Ya can't expect them to make the best a' choices given everythin' that's happened."

"I mean... I mean yeah, sure, but-"

"Let me ask you this," she interrupted, green eyes affixing to his blue. "Has anyone, anyone at all in Knothole besides those kids, ever give you any gruff 'bout what ya are?"

"... No?"

"Alright. Have we ?"

Sorun scoffed. "Oh, come on. You guys don't count."

"And why not?"

"Because... because..." Well, now that he thought about it, he didn't really have a good answer for her. They were all Mobians just like everybody else. He wanted to say that maybe it was the guilt for bringing him here, but nobody ever even brought such a thing up anymore. And they kept approaching him. Offering him hands of friendship that he kept turning down. Because he was what? One of them? A comrade? Somebody helping out that they thought was cool enough to try and befriend?

Was the fact he was even a human a factor in their eyes? Because the more he looked back on his memories with everybody, outside of his physical limits, nobody ever even brought attention to it.

"... Well, no, none of you ever treat me weirdly for being a human," Sorun finally admitted, "but people outside of the Freedom Fighters-"

"Honey," Bunnie challenged.

"She's crazy," Sorun snapped.

"Sally said you and her brother got along pretty well when you two met."

"Okay, that was... so we had a thing or two in common, so what? Guy's the king. Pretty sure he has to be all courteous and stuff."

Bunnie rolled her eyes. "You don't really know him too well, 'cause that ain't it. Sonic's parents?"

"You're going for the low blows now," Sorun muttered. "Fine, no, they treat me really nice. Even Sonic's dad now."

"Oooh, well, that's real interestin'. Sonic's dad, a war veteran from the Great War, who would have the most reason outta anybody to not like humans an' Overlanders, likes you." She sent him a flat look. "Ya know the war wounds he got that keep him from turnin' back to a normal Mobian came from Overlanders, right?"

"The implication was pretty strong, yeah..." The human teen sighed out and hung his head so that his hanging hair hid his face away from Bunnie's eyes. "So you're saying... that I've been wrong this whole time in assuming Mobians would be racially discriminate against me? And that when you and Sonic said the thing with the kids was a fluke it really was just a fluke and not you guys trying to make me feel better? You all really don't care about race?"

"Sugah, have you seen how many different species of Mobians live in Knothole alone? Darn near nobody would ever be able to get along if people actually cared about something like that. Now I can't speak for every single Mobian out there-" her eyes quickly flicked to her arm and back to Sorun, "- but for the most part? It really don't matter to Mobians." A small chuckle left her. "Ah mean, shoot, nobody freaked out when we all went tah Station Square for the first time an' saw all them humans walkin' around. First time any of us evah even saw humans an' nobody raised a fuss."

"I wasn't there when you guys went to Station Square..." Sorun quietly reminded her.

She waved a hand. "Well, I'm jus' sayin'. I can tell ya that the only thing on my mind back then was wonderin' why they was all so tall." She paused. "Speakin' a' which, ain't it kinda strange yer around Mobian size when yer a-?"

A few specks of blue light briefly shined behind Sorun's back as the Bringer Claws threatened to manifest. "Change the subject," he demanded.

She blinked at his response, and then wryly grinned while rolling her eyes. "Anyways, if what happened back there with all them people you gave the medicine to don't say nothin', then I dunno what to tell ya."

Blowing a quiet breath past his lips, Sorun tilted his head up at the train's ceiling. "Alright, so maybe I was wrong the whole time and Mobians are actually super progressive in terms of race." Thinking about it in a purely objective manner, he realized he'd seen more evidence supporting this as opposed. And that other than the rock and the slight bias Jules had against him that he'd eventually dropped, there really was no evidence towards Mobians disliking him due to his humanity. And he wasn't even sure if he could count the rock, since it'd been by kids. And kids did stupid things all the time- he sure couldn't say he'd done any less stupid things as a kid.

So then, all the hiding around and avoiding Mobians was for nothing? Every single person in the Freedom Fighters had been supportive towards him, even Shadow in his own special way, but that would extend outside the group? Everybody would just treat him like a normal person? Sure, Honey had, but he didn't think that basket case was a good example. Except for the fact she'd openly admitted caring about him as a friend. A fact he detested but had to acknowledge.

Perhaps in hindsight he shouldn't have made so many assumptions. Half of him argued that they were logical assumptions, but then the other half argued he never actually went out to Knothole to interact with the populace and confirm it. He'd always just hidden himself away in the HQ for being too afraid.

Maybe, he would admit to himself, that had been a mistake.

"Fine," he sighed out. "You... raise a lot of really good points, Bunnie."

She gave him a satisfied nod, which caused him to groan and turn his head away from her again. "I can tell ya for a fact, Sorun, that everyone in Knothole knows ya've been contributin' tah the Freedom Fighters an' that ya've helped out. If anythin', ya got nothin' but positives goin' for ya."

"Ugh, I get it..." he groaned out. "Fine, I'll... I'll try it out. Walk around town. See what happens," he said. "Later. When I got some free time and none of the other Freedom Fighters are around."

"That's all ah'm askin' for," Bunnie said. "Now why don't ya tell me why ya'll freaked out so bad back there with all them people."

"Oh, that." Sorun ran a hand across his face. "I don't know what to say, Bunnie. Because of my... apparent misconceptions we'll call it... of Mobian views on humans, I thought I was gonna have to end up throwing medicine at an angry mob." He quickly shot up into a straight posture while still leaning on the wall. "But man, oh man, they were all just... it was all too much."

Bunnie tilted her head, causing her ears to loll to the side. "What was too much?" she asked.

"All the friendliness, the affection, the-the... people have never acted that way towards me before," he told her, "and I didn't know how to feel or react to any of that. And what I did feel was just weird. So yeah, I freaked out."

The yellow rabbit just looked more confused at Sorun's explanation. "Er, yeah. People tend tah be nice like that."

"I'm not used to it," Sorun said with a shake of his head. "Nobody ever acted like that towards me before. My own mother and friends never acted that... cheery and happy. It was all just so weird."

Giving out a long hum, Bunnie scratched the underside of her cheek with her robotic hand for a few seconds. She perked up as a dawning realization hit her, and at the same time she pointed a robotic digit at the human. "Oh, I get it. Yer shy."

Sorun's knee-jerk reaction was to violently push himself off the the wall, turn back to a smirking Bunnie, and point a finger at her. "I am NOT," he hotly defended. "I just... lived a kind of closed-off life and never got that much social interaction outside of school."

"It's nothin' ya'll should be 'shamed of," she said. "I get it, yer not used to these kinds of things. A bit weird, fer sho', but ya jus' gotta learn tah ease into it."

"Ease into it," he repeated with a shake of his head. "It's not that easy, Bunnie. It just felt so weird." That overwhelming, suffocating feeling. That strange emotion that had welled up he couldn't place. All of it was too strange.

"Oh, brother," Bunnie muttered as she pushed herself off the wall. "Alright. Ah'll give ya some advice."

Sorun quirked an irritated eyebrow. "Advice?"

"Ah can't claim tah know exactly what's goin' on in yer noggin', but I can give ya a few pointers to help with yer... nervousness. Ah live with Antoine. Ya pick up a few things livin' with someone as nervous as him." She walked in a half-circle around Sorun, who was slowly turning his body to follow her. "Just breath."

"... Breath." That wasn't exactly the sage wisdom he'd been hoping for. Sounded more like something he'd read on a self-help website back on Earth. "Are you joking? Seriously?"

"It helps more than ya think, Sugah," Bunnie claimed. "I really don't see how havin' a bunch of people happy tah see ya makes ya nervous, but Antoine has the same thing with crowds sometimes. And a lotta other things. Ya'd be amazed how much breathin' helps with the nerves." She stopped to hum. "An' maybe try actin' a bit friendly with them all yerself," she suggested. "Nothin' that huge. Maybe a just a smile or somethin'."

"A smile," Sorun deadpanned. "You think breathing and a smile will help with my problem."

Bunnie flashed him an affirmative grin. "Maybe if ya calm yerself down and try tah be as friendly tah them as they are tah ya it'll give ya a bit a' perspective. Maybe then ya'll will undahstand an' stop bein' so confused and worried ovah nothin'."

He couldn't give her a response to that. He couldn't because, as Sorun mulled over Bunnie's words, he realized that what the rabbit was saying might actually make sense. Try a different perspective in order to gain better understanding? It seemed practical enough to work. He didn't know about smiling, or trying to be as overly friendly as them because he just couldn't do something like that , but... it was certainly an idea. A good one, even. And one more idea than all the ones he had, which were zero.

"... Sure. I'll try it out. Can't promise you a smile but I'll try it out." He was starting to see Bunnie in a new light now, and gave her a very appreciative nod. He'd been so skeptical at first, but her suggestion was just... it was good. "Thanks a lot, Bunnie. You're really smart, you know that?"

She gave out a bashful chuckle in response. "Well, ah wouldn't go that far now. Ah just got a lotta experience." She turned towards the stairs leading out of the control room. "Well, ah'll get outta yer hair fer now." She made her way towards the stairs, but then paused halfway and turned her head back Sorun. "Also, Sorun, just wonderin', were ya gonna stay here much longer?"

"I guess?" Sorun shrugged. "Just wanted some time to myself to think while looking outside. Why?"

"Oh, no reason." She turned back to the stairs. "If it ain't too much to ask, ya mind doin' that for a while longer so me and Antoine could get some privacy tah ourselves?" She unconsciously began adjusting her hat for whatever reason. "Just askin'."

"Sure...?" His voice trailed off to match his confusion. "I, uh... I was actually just gonna stay here until the next stop."

Bunnie looked extremely relieved at that. "Oh, great! Ah mean, good. Yeah." She began descending the stairs while heading to the next train car, holding her bionic arm up to wave at Sorun. "Seeya in a bit, Sugah!"

"Er, yeah. 'Til then. The hell was that all about...?" he murmured to himself as soon as Bunnie had exited the car. He thought hard for a long moment, but after coming up with nothing but blank thoughts, he shrugged. "Eh, whatever." He turned back to the windows to watch the trees rushing past outside.

"Perspective, huh?"

The second stop was going about exactly the same as the first. Stop in a small clearing in front of a large crowd of Mobians, and have Bunnie organize the crowds into lines while Sorun handed off all the boxes.

There was one main difference, though, in that Sorun didn't look like he wanted to jump out of his skin and run away with each and every single Mobian that walked up to him. In fact, from her position near the front of the train, Bunnie could see a marked improvement in the human's mood at a distance compared to the last time. He wasn't shaking, for instance. She knew that had to be a good sign.

He was even speaking with a few of them, too. Actual small little conversations, and not the clipped little goodbyes he'd said previously. And while he didn't look completely at ease, it was still better.

It made her glad to know that at least some things she said got through to Sorun.

"Ze train is being ready to go soon, ma cherie." She smiled at the voice behind her, and turned around to greet the voice. She of course saw Antoine stepping up behind him. "And what would you be doing?" he asked.

"Mm, watchin' Sorun," she answered. "Feller was havin' some nervous issues, but ah think he's got a handle on it."

"Ah, I see. He was very much acting ze peculiar way before leaving ze last time if I recall," Antoine said with a nod. "Do you zink he has been becoming more, as Sonic would say, 'chilled'?"

Letting out a light chuckle, Bunnie shook her head. "It's 'chill', darlin', but... with him, hard tah say." She looked back towards Sorun. "Ah think he's gettin' tah be a bit more open, but ah don't know."

"Oui, it iz hard for me to see as well," Antoine admitted, "zo I am not remembering zat ze Sorun I knew from all zose weeks ago would be volunteering to be going out into ze country to handed out medicine like zis."

"Yeah. He's sho' changed since first comin' here," Bunnie said as she crossed her arms. "Still barely won't talk to no-one, though, but ah'm thinkin' now he's just way more shy than we ever gave 'im credit for."

"Ah, in time, in time. He will open up when he iz ready, I am sure," Antoine assured her. "These zings just take ze gathering of the nerves before finally being prepared."

She smirked at the other Mobian. "You'd know all 'bout that, huh, hon?"

Antoine doing a double-take on her before sputtering and moving back to the train was all the confirmation she needed. She made another chuckle, and then began following him.

"Yeah, Honey, she's the tailor I go to for all my clothes." Sorun's Bringer Claws, carrying medical boxes, moved in front of him and deposited said boxes into the awaiting gray bird Mobian's hands. "Anyways, here ya go. And, uh..." He rose up his hand in an unsure manner, and went through about a dozen different hand gestures before finally settling on a thumbs-up. "Good, uh, good-good job. Y'know. Comin' out here and every- just, good on you. You're great."

"Haha, thanks! Bye now!" The avian Mobian turned around and walked off towards the rest of the Mobian settlers waiting for her. Sorun breathed out a sigh, and turned around to close up the train's boxcar.

So that hadn't turned into a complete internal disaster like last time. He'd taken Bunnie's advice and tried breathing, and though he just couldn't get any smiles out, he did try being moderately kinder to everybody walking up to him. The result of this effort mostly resulted in a softer tone of voice and a lot of "your welcomes", but he thought it got the point across.

He still didn't do hugs, though. He went to great lengths avoiding those as much as possible and tried to dodge them by shoving the boxes of medicine into the arms of anybody that tried. But otherwise it had gone extremely well, and he didn't feel afraid of all these people this time around. More at ease than anything else. It was rather relieving.

"This was... nice. Nice?" He kept trying to pin down that warm feeling that bloomed in his chest every time he handed off those boxes to somebody and they gave them those warm smiles and heartfelt thanks, and while he still couldn't quite identify it, he found the warm feeling... pleasant. Slightly. He was still unsure, but he was pretty confident in saying he liked it. "Yeah, this was... it was nice. Helping people. Huh."

It wasn't like he'd ever done anything like this before. He'd never even so much as done volunteer or community work back home on Earth. It was either school or video games with the occasional friend, i.e. David, thrown in. Maybe lunch with somebody if he felt up to it. And personally he'd never understood why people would bother to go through the effort of volunteering free time to help others. Still didn't, actually, but on Mobius at least he could understand since the circumstances were different and they were all trying to save the world by doing as much as they could.

Well, all the Freedom Fighters were, at least. He was just along for the ride until he bailed.

He turned away from the boxcar and towards the front of the train. He saw a flustered Antoine heading in with a smirking Bunnie right behind him. Her eyes briefly met his, and he gave her a thankful smile. She smiled back before continuing to follow Antoine into the train.

The smile on his face quickly left as soon as she was out of sight. He turned his eyes towards the train, towards the crowd of Mobians holding the medical supplies he'd given them, and then down at his own hand. He frowned, and then turned around completely to board the train.

Passing time quickly was becoming a means of survival, as there wasn't much to do on such a small train like this one. There wasn't much they could do on this front: eating the small amount of rations Antoine brought didn't pass any time, cards grew old, and talking grew exhausting. So exhausting that Bunnie was choosing to spend her time until the next stop taking a nap in one of the train's boxcars.

And Sorun couldn't slow down on eating those rations to spend as much time as possible if he tried. For field rations it was some of the best food he'd ever eaten, and when he'd asked Antoine about them the coyote admitted to having homemade them just for the mission. The idea of the Frenchman being a good cook had made Sorun snort in amusement, but there was no denying that, yes, Antoine was a pretty phenomenal cook.

As a consequence, though, they still had a boatload of time to chew through.

Where did that leave Sorun and Antoine? In another boxcar, both of them sitting down and pressing their backs against a wooden crate as they stared aimlessly ahead at the dimly-lit wall of the boxcar with the quiet rumble of the train under their feet.

"... And I kid you not, Antoine. He turned himself into a pickle. Funniest sh- I mean funniest thing I've ever seen."

"Mon dieu," Antoine gasped out from besides him. "What happened next?"

Sorun shrugged. "I dunno. I didn't care enough to remember the rest." He ignored the disappointed huff from Antoine and looked up at the ceiling. "We ain't even halfway done and I'm already bored outta my mind."

"We can always have another round of Twenty Questions," Antoine proposed. "You are quite fond of zis game, non?"

"I was. Until I started playing with you," Sorun dryly stated as his head rolled to face Antoine. "Every single time we play you pick the most obvious things. What's it gonna be this time, man? 'Le tree', or 'le sword', or something else that probably took you about a microsecond of thought to think up?"

"You are no better at all!" Antoine claimed. "How in ze world was I supposed to guess 'ze second step from ze bottom of ze Freedom HQ's stairs'!?"

"Somebody's not asking specific enough questions," Sorun breathed out. "Alright, Antoine, level with me. What's going on between you and Bunnie?" he suddenly asked. "You both kind of give each other these looks and act differently around each other, so I'm just, y'know, just wonderin' what's going on there."

He may have had exactly zero romantic experience to fall back on, and while he may have been the equivalent of a social neanderthal, even he could see the signs. Likely not all of them- definitely not all of them, actually, but even he could see the real obvious stuff. The warm, almost melting smiles they sent each other. The way they got so happily lost in their eyes. The hand holding. The fact they lived together. The hugging. The kissing, that last one was probably a big hint.

Granted Sorun had only seen the kissing when he'd been spying on them when he was bored once, so they'd likely only done those things when they thought they were alone, but they still acted extremely affectionate of each other regardless.

Did he care if they were in a relationship or not? No, not really. But he was desperate to talk about anything to alleviate the boredom.

"Oh, Bunnie." A happy smile spread across Antoine's face. "Mon amour. Ze light of my life. My very dear-"

"Okay, dude, I get it," Sorun interrupted. "You two a thing or not?"

The interruption had ruined whatever moment Antoine was having that second, causing him to briefly frown at the human, but the smile came back soon after as he began speaking. "Oui, we are very much together. In fact, I am engaged to her."

"My man!" Sorun flashed two fingers guns at Antoine, who grew very confused at the gesture. "I'm-I'm genuinely shocked! How did you manage to land that !?" Because while he couldn't talk, Antoine didn't seem like a ladies man at all. Bunnie even implied that he was a bit socially awkward like Sorun was. So he managed to land a wife of all things with Bunnie of all people mystified him.

"I ask myself ze very same question often, mon ami," Antoine sighed out. "Eet was something zat bloomed over ze years of fighting Robotneek since we were ze le petite little children. She would save my life, I would save her life, we would grow closer as friends over time, and I strongly believe me nevair having even flinched away from her cybernetic parts spoke to her. One thing lead to ze other, and while zere were a few hiccups here and zere..." His face grew dark. "A hiccup lasting half a year in one case..." He brightened back up. "We grew very happy, and so I proposed after weeks and weeks of building ze mental preparedness."

"So love can bloom on the battlefield after all, huh?" Sorun said, smirking at himself for the inside joke.

The blonde-haired Mobian laughed a little at that. "Zat iz a very poetic way of saying it, oui." A look of contemplation briefly passed over him. "You know, zat... actually speaks to moi." He smiled. "Perhaps I may be using it for when it comes time to say vows, non? 'Love blooming on ze battlefield'. It sounds like something out of ze storybooks. I am thinking ma cherie would be finding ze charm in it."

Sorun snorted. "I don't know if you should be using a 'Metal Gear' quote for- actually, nobody knows what that is, huh?" he asked himself, ignoring the questioning look Antoine was giving him. "I take it back, go for it. She'll love it." He looked back to Antoine. "Hey, what was that half a year thing you muttered?"

Antoine's face soured again. "Zone trouble," he grumbled out.

"Ah." Sorun was a little surprised at how angry he looked at the answer. He didn't think he'd ever seen Antoine genuinely angry. Even when he'd paint bombed him he looked irritated at most. "Been there," he said.

"I... hah, I suppose you would, non?" Antoine said with a small smile. "Forgive my upsetedness, but to have been pulled away from zose you love for zo much time... er, no offense, Sorun, and have your relationships almost ruined by an impostor, to lose... certain zings. It was a very dark time, and I am very fortunate ma cherie stayed with moi through it all."

Sorun gave him an understanding nod. "Sounds heavy. But impostor? What was the deal with that?"

"From an alternate zone, eet iz a long story." Antoine waved a hand aside. "You would not be interested."

He was incredibly interested, but he could very well see that Antoine wasn't. In fact, the brown coyote looked very uncomfortable with the subject altogether, and his ears along with his eyelids were drooping down. Sorun, feeling a bit bad for bringing the mood down, tried changing the conversation topic.

"So, um, no rings?" The human had noticed upon looking at Antoine's hands that there was no ring, nor did he remember seeing one on Bunnie. And he knew marriage rings were a thing. He'd seen a set on Sonic's parents' fingers. "What's up with that?"

Sorun wasn't sure if Antoine looking from depressed to irritated was that good an improvement. "Ze rings are only supposed to be worn after ze wedding ceremony. We had plan-ned one, but shortly beforefoot Eggman had gotten hiz hands on ze seven Chaos Emeralds. We just nevair had time afterwards," he mumbled out. "My dear Bunnie was crushed for weeks over it."

The teen winced. "That sucks, man."

"I do not see what suction has to do with eet, but oui. Eet does indeed."

A few moments passed, and Sorun had pulled up one of his knees to his chest while mulling over another question. "So the fact that you're a coyote and she's a rabbit," he began, "that isn't- it isn't weird? One species of Mobian marrying another?"

"Huh? Non, non," Antoine denied with a shake of his head. "Anybody is free to be with whoever they love, no matter who or what zey are. I love Bunnie, cyber bip-bops and all. Why would her being a rabbit be important?"

"No reason." Wow, Bunnie hadn't been kidding. Mobians really didn't care about what species other people were. "So, uh... how, uh..." With his left hand he made a circle with his thumb and index finger, and with his other hand he slowly began moving his right index finger in and out the makeshift hole. "So how does... how does that work?"

Antoine tilted his head to the side. "I am not understanding, Sorun."

"Well I'm just askin' 'cause, 'cause you know, her... her whole lower half's robotic, so, like, how do you two...?" When he saw that Antoine wasn't catching on to his implications, he sighed and lowered his hands down. "Ah, forget it," he said with a huff.

"Alrighty." Antoine blinked his blue eyes and shifted his body so that his shoulder was leaning against the crate, with his front facing Sorun. "Why did you wonder about relationships between different species?"

Sorun shrugged. "I'm just a curious human from another world tryin' to kill time, man," he replied.

His answer caused some reaction in Antoine, who started to smirk at him much to Sorun's puzzlement. "Oh, I see. I see." A knowing laugh escaped him. "So, Sorun, tell me, would it be zat you happened to be having your eye on somebody?"

"My eye on- oh, no." Sorun's disagreement over the question was so intense that he'd risen up to his feet, with Antoine's amused eyes following him up. "Nuh-uh, nope, not interested in anybody. No way. I don't even wanna have this conversation."

There were so many things wrong with something like that. He could barely even count them. Never mind the species gate, which alone was a good enough reason for him to never even consider the idea, but he barely even got along with anybody in the Freedom Fighters because of them having forced him onto this planet. That wasn't something that was ever going to go away, and he barely knew anybody outside the resistance group. Nor did he feel like meeting anybody new. And even if there were some he did get along with he was planning on leaving/abandoning them all at the best given opportunity.

He just plain couldn't like anybody that way.

"You do not seem zo sure of yourself," Antoine said in a teasing tone. "Zere iz no shame in admitting you have ze feelings for-"

"I super do not," Sorun denied as he spun towards Antoine while pointing a finger at him. "Antoine, I haven't even been here for a month. Or, wait, have- no, but it's close." He shook his head. "Ugh, not important. Look, barely anybody knows me past the superficial stuff, and I don't know anybody past all the Freedom Fighter stuff. I don't even wanna try to get to know people past that. And even if I did I got a bunch of reasons I can't, half of which I can't even tell you."

Antoine didn't look convinced at all, and kept up that same smirk on his face. "Oh? Name one."

"For the- urgh." Sorun pinched the bridge of his nose in frustration. "Antoine, man, I'm not gonna be around forever. I gotta go home back to my world eventually. That is a serious long-distance relationship I'm not willing to commit to." He shook his head and waved his hand. "It wouldn't work with anybody. And again, I'm not interested in anybody. Totally not."

"Zo you say, and yet I am not convinced at all." Though he was still wearing that smirk that was beginning to irritate Sorun, the coyote had tilted his head to the side in confusion. "But I thought zat you were stuck in zis zone forevair? Because ze Emeralds-"

"That's not a confirmed thing," Sorun mumbled out. The fact he'd said it in such an unsure tone was not lost on either of them.

Antoine blinked, and then awkwardly coughed into a closed fist. "Er, oui, right, of course," he agreed with a stiff nod, "but if we pretended that you did remain here on Mobius, would you still-?"

"Still wouldn't be interested in anybody, and I don't want to be interested in anybody," Sorun said.

"Not even with-?"

"Antoine, read my lips: no ." In a motion that the human teen hoped would signal his finality with the subject, he crossed his arms in front of his chest. "It's never gonna happen. Not like anybody'd ever be interested in me, anyways. Geez, would never have brought your thing with Bunnie up if I knew it was gonna lead to this..."

Finally giving Sorun some reprieve from the topic, Antoine gave off a small chuckle while moving so that his back was against the crate again. "Alright, I can take ze hint." He pulled his knees up and draped his arms over them. "I only bring it up because ze Sorun I see right now iz much more differen' and approachable than ze Sorun from a long bit ago."

That gave Sorun pause, and then caused him to turn away from Antoine while still looking at him from the corner of his eye. "Dunno what you're talking about."

"Oh, do not be ze coy type with moi. Ze way you acted with all ze people and other Freedom Fighters is saying enough. You are being the very friendly person for someone who said zey did not want to be friends with anybody. I believe Bunnie was right when she said you were ze shy type."

Sorun found himself groaning and rubbing his eyes. He already got enough of this from Sonic, and he didn't have the energy to argue the point with Antoine. "You're seein' things, Antoine. You're seein' things," he claimed as he walked towards the end of the boxcar, slightly bristling at the small chuckle he heard from behind him.

"Alright, so maybe I haven't been hammering the point home that well," Sorun began to think to himself, "but why does everybody keep trying-?"

Knock.

The pale teen's head picked right up when he heard it. A knock, right outside the boxcar door he was standing next to. Which should have been impossible considering they were on a very high-speed train right at this second. He thought he was hearing things for a second until he heard another knock come in from the other side of the door, causing him to flinch back.

"The hell?" Sorun looked back towards Antoine. It seemed that he had heard it, too, as he was looking towards the boxcar in great alarm and confusion. He shifted his gaze to Sorun, who could only give him a confused shrug. "Uh... guess I'll open the door..."

Slowly, he reached out and grasped the handle of the boxcar door. It took great effort due to the wind rushing past the train, but Sorun managed to open the door partly to look outside. And even with his dark hair whipping wildly around his face, he was able to clearly see what was right next to the train and knocking on the door.

He'd almost thought it was Sonic. The shape and color was there, and he was about the only other hedgehog he knew besides Shadow that could keep up with a train going this fast. But it immediately stood out to Sorun that the figure's blue body had a metallic sheen as opposed to fur. And it wasn't running next to the train- it was flying. Flying with what looked like a torso made into a turbine.

Sorun didn't know what to think about what he was looking at until the robot turned its metallic, mouthless head towards him. Black, screen-like eyes with glowing red irises stared right back at the teen, and silvery, metal claws in place of fingers began to flex, but otherwise the Sonic-like machine simply stayed in pace of the train's opened door.

In a flash of blue, a Summoned Sword appeared at Sorun's side, and immediately afterwards it fired into the flying robot. For whatever reason the machine hadn't even made to move, and the sword had collided directly with it. To Sorun's dismay, he saw why it hadn't bothered moving: the Summoned Sword had completely shattered against its metallic chassis. There wasn't even a scratch left from where it impacted its face.

"... Well then." In an act of eerie calmness, Sorun ducked his head back inside the boxcar, gingerly took the handle to the door, and closed it back shut. He took a deep breath, and then slowly backed away before turning towards Antoine, who was staring at him expectantly. "Hey, so-"

The boxcar rattled. Roughly. Roughly enough that Sorun was sent sprawling to all fours while Antoine had been knocked flat on his front. The screeching sound of metal cutting across metal soon reached their ears from somewhere else on the train, and at the same time as the noise reached them the train began rattling even harder.

"Argh!" The boxcar had jostled so hard that Antoine had been thrown against the wall. "Sorun, what iz happening out zere!?" he yelled at the human.

"There was- agh!" The boxcar shook again, forcing Sorun to grab onto the door to steady himself. "There was some, some weird Sonic-looking robot or something, I don't know!"

"Sonic-looking...? Oh." Antoine's irises shrunk, seemingly in fear. "Mon dieu, non, not zat..."

"Antoine!?" The fear-ridden look on the coyote's face did not bode well to Sorun, who was struggling to stay on his feet. "Antoine, what's- whoa!"

Something blue- it was too fast for Sorun to perceive properly- smashed right through one side of the boxcar between Antoine and Sorun and punched right through the other end. It appeared again less than a second later, going right through the ceiling before smashing all the way through the front of the boxcar.

With the front of the boxcar having been completely destroyed by the blue robot, Sorun and Antoine were clearly able to see the train in front of them. And, much to their collective horror, the blue Sonic-like robot was buzzing around at dizzying speeds, going through different parts of the train over and over in what seemed like an effort to destroy it.

And then, too fast for the both of the to react, the blue robot smashed its way through the bottom of the front train. The resulting screeching sound was loud enough that the Mobian and human had to cover their ears while wincing, but more than that the train's alignment with the tracks began to become more and more loose as the train's engine and all the boxcars began to rattle.

Eventually, though, the front train had derailed completely from the tracks. Worse still, it began to dangerously tip to the side before rolling over entirely. This, combined with the fact the whole train was still carrying heavy forwards momentum, meant that all the boxcars in front of the pair were quickly derailing and rolling end over end as the train crashed. Antoine and Sorun's eyes met briefly, but holding onto something and screaming was all they could accomplish as their own boxcar began to start rolling and crashing.

At the time, the train had been traveling through a rather desolate piece of land compared to most other places in eastern Northamer it had traveled to beforehand. Not a single tree was in sight, for all the way to the horizon was nothing but a continuous, flat stretch of dry, cracked land that lacked even so much as grass with the sun beating down heavily on it. The only break to this dry land was the train track that cut right through it, with the newest addition being the crashed train on top.

The damage sustained by the train due to the robot had, of course, caused it to derail. After separating from the tracks entirely the train and all its segments had kept crashing and rolling forwards for a large distance, but eventually their momentum had ended and all of the train settled. Almost miraculously, they had all stopped practically right on top of the tracks, though due to the state of the train it did it little good.

The train engine and all of its boxcars had become completely separated in the crash and were all scattered around the track and on their sides, though the train engine had sustained the most damage as it had been the focus of the robot's attack. It had been riddled and shredded by its body so much that, combined with the actual crash, it barely resembled a train anymore and more like a giant hunk of smoking metal laying on its sides. The boxcars scattered around had sustained significantly less damage, though their contents laid scattered around on the ground in the form of completely smashed crates and boxes.

Some distance away, on the right side of the crash, was Antoine, who had been thrown away from the boxcar he had been in from the crash. He slowly stood up with a groan, running a hand through his hair as he looked down at himself. His blue jacket was heavily scuffed and torn in some places, but otherwise he seemed to be without any serious injuries.

He would have sighed in relief if a blue object hadn't zoomed past him before landing on the ground in front of him and came sliding to a halt.

Terrified eyes looked up and met red, mechanical eyes staring coldly back at him. The robot resembling Sonic had slightly hunched itself over in its landing, but soon rose up to its full height as it kept its eyes locked onto Antoine.

Swallowing the lump in his throat, Antoine reached down with a shaky hand towards the sword tied to his waist. His hand met empty air, though, and when he looked down he saw that his sword wasn't even attached to him anymore. The sound of an engine heating up drew his attention back up to the robot, and he didn't even have time to scream before the blue robot came rocketing towards him with its metal claws outstretched.

It never reached him, though. Because he'd been frozen stiff with fright, Antoine hadn't been able to close his eyes to avoid seeing his own demise, which was why he was clearly able to see the four blue swords that appeared in front of him, their blades crossing one another and shielding him. The robot ran right into the shield of swords, and bounced right off and skidded backwards.

Back at the site of the train crash, there was a raspy cough as one of the tipped boxcars rose up slightly. Underneath the boxcar was Sorun- pinned down from the boxcar's weight, but avoiding being crushed entirely from the two spectral arms holding up the boxcar. His head and right arm were free from the boxcar's weight, though, with his head spun towards the sight of Antoine and the robot with his right arm outstretched towards them.

"Sorun... c-comin' in with the clutch assist..." he gasped out, though with how far away they were he doubted they heard him. He groaned, and then turned his head up towards the boxcar pinning him down. There was a shadow covering half of his face, and he looked to the left towards it and realized that there was another boxcar leaning on the one threatening to crush him, adding its weight. "Aw, that ain't good..."

With a grunt, he tried to will the Bringer Claws to lift the boxcar off of him. The weight proved too much, though, and even worse he felt his concentration slip multiple times which resulted in the Bringer Claws flickering and dimming sporadically. His head was still ringing and vision still swimming from how much he'd been tossed around during the crash, but fortunately he had enough mental strength to not pass out on the spot right there. Most of his mental fortitude was split between staying awake, the blue arms holding the boxcar off him and the four swords hovering in front of Antoine, though, and Sorun couldn't summon up any more strength to do more no matter how hard he tried.

Soon, though, he heard the sound of small jet engines, and looked up at the sound. He couldn't help the small laugh that left him when he saw Bunnie flying up in the sky, jets on the soles of her feet keeping her propelled in the air. The jets cut out and she landed with a small huff next to Sorun.

She didn't look as shaken as Sorun or Antoine did, at least. The most he could see were some slight scratches on her body along with the fact she was heavily breathing, but otherwise she seemed alright. She seemed incredibly worried, though, from the way her widened eyes were snapping from Antoine and the blue robot in front of him to Sorun.

"Hey, Bunnie...?" Sorun weakly called out. "Don't know if... if you got some way to get me out of here... but I can't do this forever." To accentuate his point, the Bringer Claws flickered and the boxcar lowered slightly. "I'd really appreciate it if you helped me out here..."

"S-Sorun, ah..." She tilted her face down at Sorun, and then looked back towards Antoine. "But... but Antoine's out there. He ain't even got his sword, he can't-!"

"I'm... not gonna let that thing touch him..." Right as Sorun said this, the four swords in front of Antoine disappeared. In their place flashed eight swords spinning around a bewildered Antoine, all pointing outwards. "We can both help him, but you gotta get me out first... I'll defend him with the swords until then."

With confliction clearly written on her face, Bunnie looked out towards Antoine one last time. Her eyes particularly lingered on the blue robot, though her features grew more resolved as she ran towards Sorun and crouched down by his side. "I'm trustin' you to keep him safe," she whispered as she began fiddling with her left arm.

A sardonic chuckle escaped Sorun. "A terrible choice, really..." His pupils shrunk when he saw the hand on Bunnie's artificial left arm morph and shift into a vaguely nozzle-based shape, out of which came a stream of blue flame. "H-hey, wait-"

"Gotta cut you out," Bunnie mumbled in response as she positioned the torch onto the boxcar pinning Sorun down. "Don't move too much. Ah don't wanna burn ya."

"Yeah, got it." Sorun turned his head back towards the distance. Antoine and the robot were still standing still and apart from one another, with the coyote having looked back towards Sorun and Bunnie. Sorun saw him eye the boxcar on top of Sorun and the torch Bunnie was using to cut him out, and as his eyes dipped down to the swords spinning around him a look of understanding flashed across his eyes.

The robot, for its part, was still silently standing its ground, though its red eye-like sensors were fixed down on the swords spinning around Antoine. A sight that made Sorun grow worried; he'd shot it with a Summoned Sword point-blank and it hadn't done anything. He didn't know how long he'd actually be able to defend Antoine with just Summoned Swords.

"What is that thing, anyways?" Sorun asked as he saw the Sonic-like robot hunch down in a ready stance. "Why does it look like Sonic?"

Bunnie continued to cut away at the steel trapping Sorun, though she did tear her attention away for a moment to look towards the robot. "It's Metal Sonic," she informed him with an incredible amount of disdain lacing her voice. "One a' Eggman's Badniks. It's a robot modeled after Sonic." She turned back to her work on the boxcar. "I got jostled around a bunch from the crash, but the communicator ah had on me managed tah survive," she said. "Ah managed to call fer help. Sally said the Special had just come back and they're roundin' up everyone, but-"

"But we need to wait, yeah," Sorun finished for her. "Alright, we can work with that. Just focus on getting me out." His eyes narrowed in concentration. "I'll worry about Antoine."

Obeying some invisible start, Metal blasted towards Antoine with its metal claws flared to the side. The coyote ducked out of the way, and while the Spiral Swords spinning around him managed to rake across the robot's body, they did no damage. Further still, its claws had shredded through and shattered three of the swords protecting Antoine, leaving a noticeable gap in the ring of swords spinning around him.

"The guy went and made a robot after Sonic? What the hell... and it's... it's fast, too. Too fast. My eyes can't keep up and he's tearing right through the Summoned Swords."

The five remaining swords spinning around Antoine stopped and closed in further towards him. He looked down in worry, and then flinched when the five swords shot straight forwards in the directions they'd been facing. One of the swords had sailed straight towards Metal Sonic, though the robot merely swiped one of its hands at it and shattered the sword. As it did this, though, twenty more swords appeared right above it pointed downwards, and as soon as it swiped at the sword the twenty above rained down on it.

The Heavy Rain Swords technique may as well have been that, though: rain. Because, while the swords were landing tip-first on the robot, its exterior shell was so sturdy that they were shattering on contact. Metal Sonic had stood completely still during the ordeal, almost tauntingly, but when the last sword struck it the engine making up its torso flared back up to life.

"What the fuck is this thing made of, anyways!?" Sorun's thoughts screamed as he saw the engine light up hotter and hotter. "Alright, offense ain't working! Just focus on defending Antoine!"

He had to will more swords crossed into shields to appear in the path Sorun predicted Metal would go in, and as dozens of sets of four crossed swords appeared between it and Antoine he was glad for making the decision, as the robot had taken off at nearly the same time. In a blurry, blue line that was all but imperceptible to Sorun's eyes due to its sheer speed, it smashed through shield after shield in its relentless pursuit of Antoine, who was trying his best to maintain his distance away from the thing. It seemed, much to Sorun's panic, that Metal had realized that actively striking the swords was more effective than bouncing off of them. Even attempting to just block with the swords was becoming more and more useless.

Thoughts wondering to what Antoine was thinking about all this briefly danced through Sorun's mind as he encircled the coyote with dozens and dozens of swords crossed into shields in a desperate effort to slow down Metal as much as possible. He had to at least somewhat realize what it was he and Bunnie was trying to do since he wasn't running towards them, and for that much Sorun was grateful. He looked worse for wear, though. His eyes were intensely focused, but there was no denying the fear-laden look embedded in his features. But despite that, he was keeping cool. Adapting to the Summoned Swords Sorun was placing around him and not moving around too much away from their protection.

Sorun had to wonder how much good that would do him, though, as Metal tore its way through dozens of swords in a matter of a few seconds.

Antoine tried backing up as Metal rapidly approached through the veritable wall of swords Sorun had made, but both he and Sorun knew it was in vain due to the robot's speed. Four swords, two at each side, appeared at Antoine's sides and repeatedly fired off swords at the approaching robot with more swords appearing to refill vacant positions, but not even these were so much as slowing the robot down. The wall, though, was. Not by much; a negligible amount, really, but it was slow enough that Sorun could actually perceive its movement. And that was enough for him to accurately place four Summoned Swords behind Metal, which all reared back and, in a movement where each sword mimicked the swings of the one in front, swept upwards and knocked the robot into the air.

The four swords at Antoine's sides turned to eight, and the Blistering Swords rapidly shot off in pairs at the robot flailing in the air. Surprisingly, all eight swords managed to hit the airborne robot. As expected, they all shattered and did no damage.

Curiously, however, each and every single sword that had struck the robot propelled it high enough that it made up from the amount it dropped down before the swords hit it. Even as the eight swords hit Metal, it was still the same place in the air as it had been before the swords hit it due to the small amount of lift afforded by being struck by the swords.

"... Huh?" Sorun scrunched his brows in confusion. "The swords, they... the air. Air! Gotta..." He winced as a sharp pain from the mental toll raced through his head. "Keep it in the air. It's all I can do."

He didn't understand how the swords were keeping it in the air, but Sorun didn't question it. Instead he focused more intensely as four spinning swords appeared around Metal. The Round Swords flew towards it, and over and over the spinning swords would pass by it in definitive hit before flying away, only to turn around and strike it again along with the other three swords. The Round Swords were doing no damage, but they were keeping Metal Sonic up in the air.

Up there and away from Antoine, who was still trying to back up away from in with that unreadable, panicked yet focused look.

The assumption that Metal was helpless in the air, however, proved false. To Sorun's dread it curled into itself and began spinning into a perfect, blue sphere. The Spin Dash proved too much for the Round Swords, all of which shattered upon contact with it. Fearing it would move too fast towards Antoine and that he wouldn't be able to defend him, Sorun willed four more swords to appear right in front of Metal. These four swords were arranged in a cross shape with their pommels all pressed together, and instantly began rapidly spinning against Metal's Spin Dash as a deadly, blue wheel. The Prop Shredder Swords technique, miraculously, did as Sorun had hoped for and knocked Metal out of the Spin Dash so that it was once again flailing in the air. Eight Summoned Swords appeared below Metal, all aimed diagonally up towards the robot. They fired off one after another, with another sword appearing to replace any sword fired, and under the combined rapid onslaught of the swords Metal was kept juggled in the air.

Snap!

Sorun had barely even heard the loud, metal snap of the boxcar above him before a section of cut metal fell down around him. The dust of the metal hitting the ground hadn't barely even risen before he felt a cold hand roughly grip his shoulder, and with a loud heave Bunnie threw him out from the underside of the boxcar before it collapsed entirely on the ground.

The human teen rolled on the ground a few times, and then came to a stop on his front. He quickly got up to his feet, and then looked up at Bunnie who gave him a quick nod. He nodded back, and then turned around towards Antoine and the blue robot still being juggled in the air by the Summoned Swords. He nearly began moving forwards, but as he moved he felt his foot hit something and cause it to rattle against the ground. He looked down, and felt his eyes widen when he saw a sword with a curved blade still nestled in its sheath lying on the ground in front of him. Antoine's sword.

"There you are," the teen huffed as he bent down to scoop the sword up. He looked up ahead at the mess of swords keeping Metal Sonic aloft in the air and Antoine, and then took a large breath as the Bringer Claws flared up behind him.

A final Summoned Sword shot up to keep Metal Sonic in the air, and afterwards it began to fall back down to the ground once the swords ceased. Antoine, who had kept his eyes glued to the robot, began to grit his teeth in worry as the robot began to approach the ground. He saw a blue glow approach from the corner of his eye, though, and turned his head just in time to see Sorun fly towards Metal, the Bringer Claws on his back flapping madly to propel him forwards. When he was close enough to Metal the wings ceased flapping, with the right Bringer Claw rearing back and scratching upwards. The five talons moved fast enough that blue lines of power were left in their wake, and they successfully managed to claw across Metal Sonic's face, sending it careening backwards.

Seeing Metal fly backwards from being clawed, Sorun flapped his Bringer Claws once to send him backwards. He dropped down right next to Antoine with a grunt, panting as the Bringer Claws folded onto his shoulders. He watched in extreme irritation as Metal backflipped in the air and landed perfectly on its feet, slowly bringing its head up to face Sorun and Antoine.

Being directly clawed in the face from Sorun's Bringer Claw had done absolutely no damage whatsoever. The blue paint hadn't even been scratched.

"Oh, come the fuck on," Sorun mentally sighed as he stood up straight. He looked to his left at Antoine, the coyote looking towards the human in great surprise. "You dropped this," Sorun said, and wasted no time in tossing the curved sword in his grasp to Antoine.

Deftly catching the saber out from the air, Antoine gave the human an appreciative nod. "Merci, Sorun," he mumbled out as the two turned towards Metal. "Although I fear one more sword will not be enough of a difference."

"Yeah, tell me about it," Sorun replied. "So listen. I'm pretty sure we don't have anything that can actually hurt this thing, and it's moving too fast for me to see." He glanced towards Bunnie, who was still near the crashed train but hovering slightly above the ground with the jets beneath her feet. "But Bunnie called for help," he continued, "so we don't gotta beat it. We just gotta survive for a bit."

"Oui, oui, I understand." A soft scraping sound reached Sorun's ears as Antoine slowly unsheathed his sword. "And what would be your plan for doing that?" he asked.

"... I was really hoping you had one."

The turbine on Metal Sonic flared to life and cut out the conversation between the two. It zoomed towards the pair, and then began circling around them so fast that it may as well have been a solid, blue ring going around them. Wordlessly, Antoine and Sorun pressed their backs together, though as much as Sorun tried his eyes just couldn't follow the blue form spinning around them.

"Sorun, zis iz not ze good time to be joking," Antoine said as he rose his sword up defensively.

"I'm tellin' ya I'm tapped," Sorun grunted in response, his eyes furrowing in concentration at the blue ring around them. "Actually, I got one idea..."

"Oui?" Antoine pressed, voice growing slightly higher as the circle began to slowly enclose on them.

Sorun didn't say anything further, and instead dipped his head down as thoughts rapidly began to run through his head. "If I could just get a Bringer Claw on that thing then MAYBE I could do something, but it's going way too fast for me to catch it. If I stunned it for a second though... agh, but with what!? The Summoned Swords can't... but they can, can't they? That first time it ran into them when it was going for Antoine. They didn't break. What was different then?" Sorun's head picked up in realization. "It didn't attack the swords that time. It just ran into them while flying. Like the way it's flying around right now. So...!"

Eager to test the theory, Sorun willed a crossed set of four Summoned Swords to appear in Metal's path. To the teen's excitement, the robot's face had collided directly with it, though instead of it smashing through, Metal's body had just stopped and bounced back slightly. The small reprieve was all Sorun needed, though, and in the next instant one of his Bringer Claws stretched out and wrapped its claws around Metal's torso.

Wasting no time, Sorun used the Bringer Claw to raise Metal's body into the air and slam in back into the ground. This was done three consecutive times, with the third one making a noticeable crater in the ground, though like with everything else it appeared that Metal's body had sustained no damage at all. Widening his eyes in anger, Sorun willed the second Bringer Claw to reach out and grab onto Metal's left arm. It began pulling the metal limb back in an attempt to tear the arm off while the other Bringer Claw continued to hold Metal down, though the robot appeared to catch onto the plan when it turned its head towards the arms. Its engine-torso fired up again and, despite the spectral arms holding it down, it began to fly forwards towards the train wreck.

Sorun had endeavored to maintain the Bringer Claws' grip on Metal Sonic, but this had quickly proven to be a mistake. The teen's body we jerked forwards and dragged quickly across the ground as Metal pulled him away. He had the sense to let go amidst all the sputtering and grunting from behind dragged, though even after the Bringer Claws let go of Metal the momentum he'd gathered kept rolling him forwards until, eventually, his back had slammed right into one of the overturned boxcars.

His body jarred from the sudden stop, Sorun made a soft groan as he slowly slid down onto the ground. He just barely saw a blue shape whizzing around from his winced-shut eyes, and almost subconsciously his Bringer Claws slammed onto the ground and pushed Sorun far up into the air. The second he left the ground a metal, blue sphere Spin Dashed a hole through the boxcar, and milliseconds later it smashed through the roof. A Summoned Sword appeared above Sorun and shot downwards, with the teen reaching out and grabbing the sword's hilt so that he would be pulled downwards with it. Metal's spinning form pierced the air where his body had been, missing Sorun's head by millimetres.

With another grunt Sorun crashed into the ground. He'd conveniently enough rolled onto his front at the very least, and with shaky legs he slowly started to stand back up. He coughed once, and then felt a wave of exhaustion mixed with pain briefly wash over him as the Bringer Claws on his shoulder flickered. He looked up, though almost regretted it when he saw a blue ball of death shooting down from the air towards him. He'd wanted to move his Bringer Claws to defend himself, but the blue object was moving too fast and he couldn't think in time-

A yellow form jumped up in front of Sorun and held its artificial arm out. He only needed a second's glance to tell that it was Bunnie. What he didn't recognize was the pink, circular shield made of raw, crackling energy that formed out of her bionic left arm, though he had no time to even mentally question it before Metal Sonic had crashed right into it. The shield, surprisingly, held firm, though Sorun had briefly noted a worrying creaking sound from Bunnie's arm before the force of Metal's attack pushed Bunnie back into Sorun. It was then the shield broke as the two of them rolled over each other repeatedly about ten feet back, ending as they slid to a stop with their bodies tangled together.

They had tried to undo themselves so they could get back up, but by the time the pair even attempted to move Metal Sonic was flying towards them with outstretched claws. Sorun had attempted to form a Summoned Sword to defend them, but after another wave of exhaustion hit him the sword shattered in the air before it could do anything. By the time Sorun had blinked in surprise, Metal was almost on top of them before he'd even fully opened his eyes from the blink.

Clang!

There was a flash of steel as something swung in front of Metal's path. The object, a curved sword, scraped across Metal's frame and carried enough force behind it that the robot was knocked backwards away from Sorun and Bunnie, who were quickly untangling themselves and standing up on the ground.

As soon as they had gotten themselves in order, the pair looked towards the sword and the person holding it. Of course it had been Antoine, who was heavily panting while standing his ground in front of the blue robot slowly rising up to its own feet. Sorun and Bunnie were quick to run to his side, though they were faring little better from the way their forms were hunched in exhaustion.

Drip.

The sound of something wet faintly hitting the dry ground below him was heard by Sorun's ears, causing his eyes to snap down to the ground. He saw a small dot of red on the cracked dirt beneath his feet, and he felt something warm and moist trailing down his nose. He touched a hand to the spot, and when he brought it back to examine he found spots of blood left on his hand. The growing worry in him furthered when he saw the Bringer Claws flicker again.

"Using all these powers... it's wearing me out," he somberly realized as he lowered his hand. "Dunno if it was the train crash or if it's because I'm using powers that're killing me, but I can't do this for much longer." He looked towards the two Mobians next to them. Antoine was still panting heavily, and Bunnie looked about as exhausted as he was. "The're almost done, too." He looked back ahead at Metal Sonic. "What am I supposed... huh?"

Another sound reached his ears. The distant, roaring sound of engine turbines that were very different from the sounds of Metal's engine. A sound familiar to Sorun. Antoine and Bunnie had heard it, too, and looked towards the sky at the source of the noise, and even Metal Sonic seemed to have picked it up as its head turned to look as well. It only took a second's examination to confirm what was making that sound: a large, silvery ship that Sorun had become intimately familiar with in the short time he'd come to know it.

"About time... they finally got here..." Sorun's tired mind thought. Besides him, could see the two Mobians' shoulders slump in relief.

The Freedom Fighter Special ship had rapidly come into view and even more quickly flown over them, though it didn't lower itself or even move to stop. What it did do was open the hangar door on its back, and before it had even opened all the way two forms had jumped out. A black and red ball and a solid blue ball, both spinning aggressively and leaving a blurred line of speed in their wake as they rapidly dropped towards the ground.

Once again, Sorun heard the sound of Metal's turbine engine begin to fire up. He looked towards the robot, and then widened his eyes when he saw the machine turn away from them. The jet of flame coming out of its back was steadily increasing in size as it hunched down and pointed its body forwards at the empty horizone.

It was making to try and run away.

"No ya don't!" The left Bringer Claw shot forwards and grabbed Metal Sonic's torso right before it took off. It still began flying, and like before Sorun was dragged along with it, but this time he willed his right Bringer Claw to reach out and dig its talons into the ground behind them. Successfully anchored, Sorun's boots ground to a halt on the ground as he looked towards Metal, flying in place due to the Bringer Claw holding it. The two spinning forms of Sonic and Shadow had hit the ground and they were quickly speeding towards them.

Yet another painful wave of exhaustion hit Sorun, and the Bringer Claws began flickering. He looked towards the two approaching hedgehogs, and then back to Metal. "Just a second. Just gimme a second or two here..."

He began concentrating intensely on the spectral arms holding the ground and the robot. Their blue glow flared dramatically as the spectral arms re-solidified, though Sorun felt more blood spurt out of his nose right after, and the exhaustion that he felt almost made him collapse. Almost a second later, though, it happened: the two spinning balls had finally reached them, and then split up before they converged on Metal Sonic, held in place by the Bringer Claw. A loud, grinding sound was heard as the two spinning hedgehogs began grinding into either side of its neck, and in almost no time at all there was a loud, metallic snap! sound. The two hedgehogs passed each other right as they cut through, and as a result Metal Sonic's severed head hit the dirt below it. The red lights it had for eyes rapidly dimmed to a solid black, and the turbine in its torso cut out completely.

Sighing loudly, Sorun dismissed the Bringer Claws. They disappeared immediately, Metal's limp body falling to the ground as a result. With his own body waving on his feet, Sorun turned back around towards the two Mobians he'd been dragged away from. He saw Antoine and Bunnie standing back there and staring at him with shocked eyes, and nearby he saw that Sonic and Shadow had finally stopped to stand still near the pair. They were giving him similar looks.

He managed to muster the strength to give the four of them a thumbs-up, and then collapsed into unconsciousness.

Awakening wasn't the most pleasant experience for Sorun. Mostly due to the fact that his back felt so stiff, and after a second of groggily feeling his hands around, he understood why: he was in a sitting-up position. Against a metal wall.

Groaning lightly, he opened his eyes and blinked multiple times to clear the blurriness in his vision. The lighting wasn't the best, but he recognized enough of the surroundings to conclude that it was the hangar of the Freedom Fighter Special. From the small hum he heard outside and the subtle vibration of the ship, he figured that they were still airborne and flying. He must not have been out long, then.

He looked to the right, towards the end of the hangar where the door was. He saw multiple shapes converged over there and talking, Shadow and Sonic's colors standing out the most in the crowd. He sighed at the sight, and tried to stand up, but found himself too exhausted and sat back down against the metal wall.

"H-hey, Sorun, Sorun don't move around too much." He heard the voice, and through great exertion he lifted his head up at the speaker. He lowered it back down when he saw it was just Sally. "Are you doing okay?"

"I'm fine, I'm fine. Just tired," he mumbled out as he watched Sally crouch down next to him. His eyes looked towards the group near the back. "Antoine and Bunnie, they're-?"

"They're fine, yes." She reached forwards to brush locks of hair out of Sorun's face. "They... told us what happened down there. What you did."

He didn't make any outward reaction, though the inside was a different matter. "Ah, great. Just great." Sorun huffed out a breath and tried moving his head away from Sally's hand. "Now everybody's gonna like me for saving Antoine's life. I don't have any reinforcement for my 'let's not be friends anymore' claim. Why am I even bothering?"

Time after time he continued to try and distance himself from them all, but not matter what he did nothing worked. Now he was going around saving lives. Maybe he could just ignore them and eventually it would die down and they'd go back to barely acknowledging him. No, that wouldn't work at all because everybody was already interacting with him. And they'd probably do it more now. All because he'd gone and saved the damn coyote's life.

He didn't regret doing it, but he did not like how this was going make him look in front of everybody. Ironic, considering it was going to make him look great.

"Are you sure you're al- quit moving," she snapped while holding his head still with her hand.

"Leggo of my face, I'm fine." He wanted her to go away, but he didn't even have the energy to push the hand away.

Sally made a "tsk" sound. "Your nose was bleeding a lot," she noted. "What was up with that?"

"Mf. Powers went... wonky," he said. "I got knocked around from that train crash and hit my head a bunch. And using all my powers so much on top of all that took a lot out of me." He tried raising his hand up, but it flopped down on the ground. "Seriously, I'm fine. I'm just wiped."

He still found it curious, though, the way his powers had acted. Even back during that spar with Shadow he hadn't felt anything like that- that painful exhaustion. Never did. He had to wonder if it really was just him getting knocked around by the train that did it, because even while under that boxcar he'd been fighting not to pass out due to all the hits to the head he took. More worryingly, there was also the fact that, according to Aurora and Athair, Chaos energy was basically poison to his body. And he had that stuff running through him all the time now.

So had that been it? Spamming his powers in an injured body weakened it further? Possibly. Made sense, but he didn't know for certain. What he did know was that, besides the exhaustion, he felt fine. Given that, he was a bit worried, but not too much so.

A dissatisfied hum left Sally. "Are you feeling any nausea? Distorted vision?" she questioned him.

Sorun groaned in annoyance, and this time he found the strength to successfully raise his hand up to brush her hand away. "I don't have a concussion, man." She finally relented and took her hand away, much to his relief. "Hey, so... the train..." he started.

Sally gave him a sad nod. "Yeah, it... it's gone." Her mouth lowered into a deep frown. "Right now our best guess is that Eggman knew we were using the train to deliver medical supplies and sent Metal Sonic to disrupt it. We're gonna send a team back later to salvage what we can, but... the crash looked really bad. A lot of the medicine looked like it was lost in the crash, and I don't know what we're gonna do about the train." She shook her head along with letting out a frustrated sigh. "We came as fast as we could when we got the call from Bunnie- Tails and Rotor practically melted the Special's engines- but it was gonna be too late no matter how fast we got there. I'm just glad you, Bunnie, and Antoine made it out."

"Yeah," Sorun quietly agreed. "So... the rest of those people waiting for the medicine...?" He looked back up at Sally, but when he saw the somber look she gave him, he immediately understood and lowered his head back down.

So they just weren't going to get it, then. Couldn't. Not when the delivery system was shot and all if not most of the medicine was destroyed. He didn't doubt Knothole would be fine, they wouldn't be donating those supplies if they couldn't spare them even at Sally's request, but the rest of the settlements they hadn't manage to deliver to simply couldn't get them now.

"All because one guy sent a robot... damn it all." He kept seeing them- the faces of all those Mobians they delivered that medicine to. All those smiles and gratefulness that they had all given Sorun that, he began to realize, had felt nice. They'd only made two out of the five deliveries. Not even half. So many more Mobians than the ones he'd seen that wouldn't be getting those medical supplies they'd been depending on. "Damn Eggman... that guy really is screwed in the head. Messing up all those people's lives... for what? For his damn 'win'? Fuckin' maniac."

The more he thought on it, the more he realized how bad he felt over all of it. It surprised him, but it did. It surprised him because he didn't think he'd ever feel so bad over them like this.

"... Well, anyways, I need to go." Sally rose up to her feet. "Please try not to strain yourself too much. You're getting checked out by a doctor when we get back to Knothole."

"Aw, what?" Sorun looked up at Sally in protest. "Come on, Sally, I don't-"

"Doctor. That's an order." She didn't even let him argue the point before turning around and walking off. Sorun huffed in outrage, but otherwise just sat back against the wall while closing his eyes.

He didn't even get thirty seconds of peace before he heard two sets of footsteps approach, with one set clanking against the metal flooring. He slowly opening his eyes, and look up to his right. It was Antoine and Bunnie, both looking down at him in concern.

"... I'm never going on a train with you two again," he said in a blank tone. They both tiredly grinned at that, with Antoine in particular chuckling a bit.

"Eet iz good seeing you well, mon ami," the coyote said to him. He saw Sorun try to get up on his feet, and he reached down to offer the human a hand. Sorun stared at it for a full five seconds before sighing and accepting it. "We were all being worried something was seriously hurted when you collapsed like zat," Antoine continued as he pulled the him up.

"Nah, I'm fine," Sorun assured them, steadying himself as he finally got up on his feet. "Just, you know, train crash and fighting the super killer robot. Really took it out of me. Heh." He looked into Antoine's eyes. "Are you fine?" he asked. "You had a bunch of close calls with the... the Sonic robot. Thing. You good?"

"Oui, I am fine, thank you for ze concern," Antoine assured him with a nod of his head. "It was quite ze showing, though, non? All of ze swords appearing left and right around me, I was practically in a daze from it all! And when I saw you trapped under ze train car and Bunnie cutting you out, I understood what it was you were doing, but I will admit zere were some moments you were having me worried!"

"Yeah, I know, I cut it close a lot," Sorun muttered. "I didn't mean to scare you. I was just trying to keep you in one piece." He glanced towards Bunnie and gave the tiniest of grins. "I mean, come on. You know how bad Bunnie would have messed me up if I let her fiance die out there? I was throwing those swords like a madman because I was more scared of her than the robot." A total lie, but he would rather they think that than know he legitimately didn't want Antoine to die.

Unfortunately, he was pretty sure that they saw through the lie. Because Bunnie was giving him a knowing smile, and Antoine was leaning in close. Dangerously close to physical contact level.

"Hey, man, come on, you don't- and he's doing it," Sorun whispered to himself when he felt Antoine wrap one of his arms over his shoulder in a one-armed hug. He tried squirming out of it, but he was too exhausted, so with a sigh he just gave into it.

"I must be thanking you from ze bottom of my heart, mon ami. I would not be being here if it were not for you," Antoine said in the most sincerest tone Sorun had ever heard from the coyote. It made Sorun turn his eyes away from him. "You are a true Freedom Fighter now, what with ze fighting of ze robots and ze saving of lives-"

"Yeah, cool, can you get off please?" Sorun asked in a clipped voice. Chuckling sheepishly, Antoine obliged him and stepped back.

"Ah, pardon moi," he apologized. "I am forgetting you are ze shy type. But we will be working on that, non?"

Sorun inhaled deeply to calm himself, but otherwise said nothing.

"But even zo," Antoine continued, "would it, perhaps, be too much in inviting you to le dinner with me and Bunnie tonight? I am thinking that after today-"

"Can't. Sally's making me see a doctor," he interrupted. Which alone probably wasn't a good reason, as he doubted a little doctor visit would lead all the way into the night, but he didn't want to reinforce the friendship perception that was slowly building up outside of Sorun's control. Which was really unfortunate seeing as how Antoine was probably the one making that dinner. So it would probably be amazing if those rations he'd had said anything.

Antoine's shoulders slumped in disappointment at that. "Ah, I see. It iz fine." He turned around. "Well, if you are changing your mind you are welcome to visit any time! I must be going back now- monsier Shadow was very interest in ze part of you being dragged around, and I was saying..."

The coyote trailed off as he continued walking away until Sorun could no longer hear his voice. He scoffed with a roll of his eyes, and then turned towards Bunnie. "Ah man, that guy's a handful. I don't know how in the world you-"

He was cut off when Bunnie rushed forwards and wrapped him in a bone-crushing hug, making Sorun go rigid immediately.

"Get off. Get off get off get- eh?" He was about ready to try and likely fail to push her off of him, but he stopped when he noticed her body was shaking. He understood why almost immediately, and stopped himself from getting ready to push her. "Oh, for the... come on, why do I gotta deal with all this emotional junk...?"

"Thank you." The weight behind the thanks carried more gratefulness than Sorun had ever heard out of anybody else, and it was spoken with more clarity than he'd ever heard Bunnie speak in, which made him pause in muted surprise. She slowly removed herself from him, and he felt even more awkward when he saw that her green eyes were slightly glistening with moistness. "Ah'm sorry, it's just... Antoine was out there, and I couldn't get there in time, an' if you hadn't gone and defended him like that-"

"Yeah, I got it, it's fine," Sorun quickly said as he waved his hands down. "Please don't cry, man, your arm might rust."

He'd hope that terrible joke would be enough to lighten the mood, and to his immense relief it did, as it caused Bunnie to chuckle and rub the water away from her eyes. "It's all waterproof, but thanks for the concern," she said. "Just... thank you for savin' his life, Sorun. I don't know what I woulda done if he..."

"Y-yeah, look, don't worry about it, Bunnie. Really. I saved his life, you saved mine twice, he saved ours, we all saved each other." He started sounding desperate. "Can we please, please just call it good?"

Bunnie looked at him in surprise for a moment, but then she scoffed and rolled her eyes. "Oh, alright. Only since yer such a shy guy."

"I told you I'm not- man, whatever," Sorun sighed. "Seriously though, your arm fine? It took a hit back there."

He pointed towards the robotic appendage in question. It looked fine for the most part, though it appeared there was a metal plate or two slightly out of place. Bunnie rose it up to inspect it, though she didn't look all that concerned.

"Pshaw, this ain't nothin'," she assured Sorun. "Ah've dinged out more dents than this, but if it starts actin' up ah'll have Tails look at it. Don't you worry none."

"Worried? I wasn't worried. Just asking." He crossed his arms and turned his head away, but when he glanced back at Bunnie out of the corner of his eyes he could see that smirk she was sending him. "Don't you have a fiance to go console or something?" he bitterly asked.

She laughed, and then tipped her hat at him. "Right ya are. Seeya 'round, Sorun."

The human teen waved her off as she left to rejoin Antoine, and once she was out of eyesight he looked down towards the side. A Summoned Sword flashed to life besides him, and Sorun frowned as he scrutinized the blade.

"Why did the Summoned Swords juggle the Sonic robot like that?" he internally asked himself, eyes boring into the translucent, blue sword. "That thing was way heavier than the swords, and they didn't have enough power to pierce it. They just kept breaking. So how-?"

"Sorun? You holding up alright?"

"Not a single moment of peace..."

He couldn't help the groan that left him when he heard the question, and willed the sword to shatter as he turned to face the voice that addressed him. "It's the question of the hour, Sonic," he said to the blue hedgehog. "Physically, yes, I'm fine. It's not stopping Sally from sending me to a doctor even though I'm fine !" he yelled out in the direction towards where Sally had walked off. "Mentally," he continued, "well... I don't know. Still getting over the fact that we failed the mission."

In response, Sonic blinked and shook his head. "Failed the- Sorun, what are you talking about? You didn't fail anything."

An unbelieving chuckle rumbled out of Sorun. "The train got destroyed and probably all the medicine got lost before we could deliver it all," he said. "Sounds like critical mission failure to me considering we were supposed to deliver all that stuff."

"Maybe, yeah, but you saved Antoine's life," Sonic reminded him. "You can't call the mission a failure when you saved him. And we'll figure out something with the medicine. Don't worry."

Sorun regarded Sonic for a second, and then scoffed while turning his head to the side. "Shouldn't have had to save his life to begin with," Sorun grunted. "Shouldn't have let the train get destroyed. If I'd just managed to destroy that robot when I first saw it-"

"Hey, nobody's expecting you to be able to keep up with something like Metal Sonic," the hedgehog interrupted. "Eggman built that thing to keep up with me . Sally wouldn't have sent you three out there at all if she knew there was a chance of you running into it." He stepped closer to Sorun. "Don't beat yourself up. You all made it out alive, and you kept Bunnie and Antoine alive and held that thing down while me and Shadow finished it. You did more than enough."

The pale teen wasn't convinced at all by Sorun's words, and it showed on his face from the downcast look he had. "Right. Sonic, I need some time alone. Could you tell everybody else not to bug me for a bit?" He started to rub at his head. "I'm too tired to deal with any more people right now."

"Yeah, sure. Get all the rest you need." He turned to leave, but then stopped and spun his torso back to Sorun while pointing at him. "And listen to Sally about that doctor if you're not feeling well, okay?"

Sorun didn't say anything in response, though he did give Sonic a nod. That proved enough for the hedgehog, who turned back around and went to rejoin the rest of the group in the back of the hanger. Sorun, seeing him leave, had crumpled back against the ship's wall.

"I should be fine with this result? Shut the hell up, Sonic. I'm not fine with this at all." He looked down at his hands, frustration clear on his face. "My powers couldn't even touch that thing. Summoned Swords couldn't hurt it. Bringer Claws couldn't hurt it. I was helpless out there..."

And that's what frustrated him most. Frustration that he tried to bury down until Sonic had brought the mission up, and now it was all he could think about. For so long he'd kept wondering and worrying if his powers were strong enough or not, and after today his fears that they weren't were finally confirmed. Fears that were already confirmed by Shadow that he'd desperately tried to ignore.

His powers weren't nearly enough if that fight with Metal Sonic said anything. He couldn't even kill it properly and had to wait for Sonic and Shadow to finish it. What was he supposed to do if Bunnie hadn't managed to call for help? What was he supposed to do if Bunnie and Antoine weren't even there to defend him? How many times did he almost die just because he couldn't do anything against it?

What would have happen to them if Sonic and Shadow hadn't been there? He wouldn't have been able to protect them at all if they'd taken even a second longer. Or even himself, for that matter.

Too many. Too many times he almost died. Too little power. Even now in a more calmed down state he couldn't think of a way he could have gotten out of that situation alive if he were just alone. He almost died because he had too little power. Antoine and Bunnie had almost died. People probably would die because he hadn't been strong enough to stop Metal from destroying the train and the medicine it had been carrying.

None of it was enough. He needed more.

"Power. I need more power." His eyes widened at his own thoughts, and Sorun roughly shook his head. "No, no I don't! I don't need more powers when they'll just keep killing me more and more! B-but all those people, they... egh!" He gripped his own hair in frustration and anger as images of all those happy Mobians flashed through his mind again. "It's because I was so weak they... I don't care, this isn't my world! I don't... I don't need more..." His other hand gripped his hair, and he began shaking. "I don't want to see people hurt- no, shut up. Just shut up. I don't need more power. Antoine and Bunnie almost died because I didn't have enough- SHUT UP! I don't... I need more... I don't want more power... don't wanna die..."

Sorun peered out between his locks of hair towards the back of the hangar, where he saw Antoine and Bunnie amidst the small group there. He felt happy over the fact that he saved their lives. He hated himself for feeling happy over them. The dread over his mounting situation and the curse that was keeping him silent frustrated him to no end and the longer it went on the more hopeless he felt. More conflicting thoughts continued to whirl through his mind, and he continued suffering through the ordeal until he grew tired enough to fall back asleep.

A/N- So there I was writing the first half of the chapter when I start getting reviews pointing out Sorun hasn't actually tried circumventing the gag curse yet. In fact it was literally hours after I write in the heart monitor bit I get a new review from Speedhunter talking about a heart monitor. And then I'm just looking from the review to my laptop screen going, "What the- how...?"

At that point I realized that I probably waited a bit too long to have Sorun try and cheat the curse so he could tell everybody everything. Mostly because I had other things I wanted to get out of the way, but then I look back and realize at this point he's had it for weeks almost and I start to see it looks a little weird he only tried now. Hindsight and all that.

Chapter 19

Recursion Error

Episode 19- A trip down cyber lane

So a day had passed since the incident with the train.

The first thing that had happened upon them landing back in Knothole, of course, was that Sorun had to go to the hospital. And he had to have been escorted there by Sonic, half because he didn't know where it was, and half because Sally had caught him trying to sneak away back to Sonic's house. It hadn't been that impressive on an affair; he hadn't even been checked out by the actual doctor that ran that hospital, just a nurse. The hospital itself had been impressive to Sorun. He'd went as far as to say it was more modern than hospitals back on Earth, mostly because he'd seen medical instruments there he'd never even seen before.

As for his injuries, like he'd said, they hadn't been anything to worry about. Just some scrapes and cuts, which itself was amazing considering everything that had happened. So a ton of bandages and an order to take it easy a few days it was.

Suited him just fine. He needed a rest after the small mental breakdown he had that hadn't gone away until he went to sleep last night.

But that was yesterday, and this was today. And today everybody was out salvaging the situation that was the mess that was yesterday. Organizing everything, saving what supplies they could, running and flying whatever they had to all the settlements that hadn't received the medicine- it was going to be a great effort from what Sorun had heard, and they were going to try and do as much as they could, so they'd needed everybody on board. There were four exceptions, though: Bunnie and Antoine, who were also benched for light injuries and recovering in their own home, and Sorun, hanging out in the HQ for lack of anywhere better to chill.

As for the fourth, that was Nicole. The only Freedom Fighter who chose to stay behind besides those that were injured. She'd claimed it was due to her wanting to work on file compression for some of her personal projects, but now that Sorun was in the lab and actually watching her work, he was starting to have serious doubts.

"What the heck did Eggman make this thing out of, anyways?" Sorun asked as he tossed the heavy, metal head up and down in his hands. He was currently sitting on a metal table in the HQ's lab, legs freely dangling off the edge as he caught the blue head in his hands. He rolled it around to look at the face, and cringed back slightly when he saw the dark, lifeless black eyes of Metal Sonic staring back. "I threw a million swords at this thing and it didn't even flinch."

He didn't know what possessed the others to keep the thing, but they had. Probably hoping to find something out from the robot's body, and he knew Tails wanted to get a look at it eventually. He still felt uncomfortable around it, though, seeing as the day prior it had almost cut his head off. In fact the only reason he could even stand to toss its head around so casually was because Metal was the one that ended up being decapitated. He really liked how that worked out.

In front of him, the monitors on the lab's computer and the small, miniaturized computer connected to it began to flicker. Digital, cube-like textures began to manifest and swirl around until an outline began to form, the digital cubes gathering and coalescing to give the body substance until a familiar brown and black lynx appeared.

"A million swords? Really now?" Nicole looked down and made a showing of dusting off the purple cloth wrapping around her torso. "I was unaware you were capable of producing such an amount."

Sorun rolled his eyes. "Okay, it was more like one-or-two-hundred-ish swords, but I was too busy trying to keep us all alive to count."

She grinned. "Merely a jest, Sorun. In answer to your question, I believe Dr. Eggman outfitted that particular model with a tungsten-carbide alloy specifically designed by him, though I am unsure of the alloy's actual physical limits."

"Yeah, didn't stop Sonic and Shadow from cutting through it," Sorun bitterly muttered. He heard footsteps approach, and looked up as Nicole walked in front of him. "I seriously don't think this is a good idea, Nicole," he said. "Just throwin' that out there."

"I am well aware of your concerns, but I am confident in my own abilities. You have nothing to fear." She held her hands out. "May I please have the head?"

After a moment's consideration, he gently handed her Metal's head. He almost immediately regretted it. "It's just, y'know, it took a lot for us to bring that thing down," Sorun began as Nicole walked the head over to a smaller table near the computer. "And now you wanna plug the thing's head into the computer so you can go rooting around in its brain case. Hard drive. Whatever the robot equivalent of a brain is."

"It's not as if I am completely reactivating Metal Sonic entirely. I am simply supplying it with enough power to enable its basic functions and connecting it into the HQ's computer to give me direct access to its systems." She set the head down on the table. "I would have connected my own body to it, but it's safer to use the computer as a stopgap between me and Metal Sonic as opposed to directly plugging in."

"Wai-wait, safer? Implying there's danger?" Sorun hopped off the table and began approaching Nicole. "Nicole, you said this was gonna be safe!"

"It is safe," the lynx assured him as she began attaching cables from the computer into the head. "As I said, I am not supplying it with enough power for anything beyond basic functions. Even if by some chance its defensive software becomes active, I am more than capable of isolating any harmful elements so that I may work in peace." She stopped working on the cables and turned her head towards Sorun. "I am starting to think you do not trust that my own abilities are superior to that of some Badnik AI."

Sorun stopped walking and raised his palms up. "Hold on, I wasn't saying that," he said. "I just... did you even clear this with Sally? You said you were just going to work on file compression for your projects!"

"Yes, I did. And I finished. So now I am working on this." She turned back to the head and began fiddling with the cables. "You didn't raise any objections when I asked you to bring the head back to the lab for me."

Groaning, mostly in annoyance at himself, the teen began running his hand through his dark hair. "That was before I knew you were plugging into the thing, man. I- you- I just- what am I supposed to do if you get hurt or something?" It'd be doubly bad for him seeing as he was the one that had delivered the head to her. He severely wished he'd just said no.

Nicole stopped adjusting the cables momentarily, her green eyes briefly flicking to the teen before going back to the head. "I really do appreciate the concern," she began, "but as I've said, it will be fine."

With a huff, Sorun leaned his back on the wall next the table while crossing his arms. He still wasn't convinced, and made it evident by the way his eyes were widened the slightest amount as he looked at Nicole. "It this really so important?" he asked her. "Important enough to risk you being hurt? Or something happening to the computer?"

"I am just planning on examining its memory and data storage banks so that I may copy any files I find for later analysis," she explained.

"Metal Sonic is one of Dr. Eggman's more favored creations, so he kept him relatively close by at all times. It is not outside the realm of possibility that it may have overheard some of his plans, or even that it had missions files and objectives for any future attacks planned by the Doctor programmed in. Even if there isn't, I'm still curious as to what I will find inside." She glanced up at Sorun. "It is for the good of the Freedom Fighters. Sally won't mind."

"You say that now..." He still didn't agree with this at all. It just seemed so risky, plugging the murder robot in and giving it power. All to search around in its memory for information and data that might be there so they could gain intel on any future attacks that it might know about so they could all possibly prepare for an attack that may happen. He understood why Nicole would pursue something like that, but something about the way she was going about it was making his skin itch.

Then again, he wasn't the expert in these matters. Despite being a video game virtuoso, he wasn't exactly a technological guru. Building a PC, working around files and programs, and taking a single coding class in high school was about all the computer experience he had. And compared to Nicole, a literal AI genius, that difference may as well have been as wide as the distance from Mobius to the sun. So he supposed he had no choice but to trust her word when she said it was safe.

It didn't help the fact he was feeling extremely nervous over Nicole and the fact she was plugging into a murder bot's brain.

Sorun's head tilted back and softly hit the wall, and a long, drawn-out sigh left him. "Alright," he said, "I'll help."

His words caused Nicole to pause, and slowly she removed her hands from the head's electronic innards. "You will?" she asked, surprise lacing her voice.

The teen mumbled something unintelligible under his breath, and then sharply tilted his head downwards to obscure his face with his hair. "I know, it's shocking me, too. But... I've come to realize that it feels... nice helping others," he quietly murmured. "I'm only doing this because it's you. If it was anybody else I wouldn't bother."

He didn't like how he saw that Nicole was remaining motionless from beyond the gaps in his hair. "And why would that be?" she asked him in a curious tone.

Biting his lower lip, Sorun dipped his head down even further. "'Cause... you're my gamer pal," he finally answered as he pushed off the wall. "I can't just leave my gamer pal hanging. That ain't cool. Common gamer etiquette says I gotta help my gamer pal out. It's the rules." He pointed at Nicole. "Speaking of which, you owe me so-oh-oh much time together with the game console for this. I'm talkin' hours here. Maybe all night if I can get enough of those Power Rings together."

Sorun brushed some of his hair out of his face to look at Nicole. Upon seeing the small, bright smile she was giving him, he softly groaned and brushed the hair back over his eyes and face.

"It would truly mean a lot to me if you helped with this," Nicole said, and Sorun had noted her tone took on a more happy note, "but would your injuries not-?"

"Injuries? Pffft, what injuries?" The human teen gestured down to his body. "It's all a bunch of surface stuff, nothin' serious. I'm fine, really."

"In that case, I suppose it would be-"

Nicole would have continued further, though she was cut off when her body began flickering before disappearing entirely mid-sentence.

Upon the lynx disappearing, Sorun sputtered an intelligible noise and took a step back. A second later one of the monitors on the computer flickered to a green screen. A small sprite of Nicole's face appeared in the lower left of the screen, causing the teen to tilt his head.

"My apologies, Sorun. There was not enough power for me to maintain that body." Her voice was coming in clearly through the computer's small speakers, though at the same time her words appeared as text on the computer monitor's green screen. "Could you be so kind as to finish the connections for me?"

The text on the green screen morphed into a white, wireframe diagram of Metal Sonic's head. A digital, 2-D layout of the cables connected to the computer that had yet to be attached to Metal followed this, and some small arrows indicating where the cables had to be plugged in appeared as well. Sorun studied the diagram for a few moments, and then gave a nod.

"Yeah, sure. Man, don't freak me out like that..." Sorun quietly muttered as he walked back to the table. "So what am I actually doing here to help you besides plugging a bunch of wires in?" he asked as he picked up the few cables left unconnected to the head, looking back at the diagram briefly before leaning in towards the head's opening. "You want me to just, like, sit at the computer and press a few buttons when you need me to or what?"

"I had assumed you were volunteering to venture into the digital world along with me," the computer behind him said.

The pale human hummed as he continued rummaging around inside of the robotic head. "Where's the stupid port... wait, what?" He stopped, and then turned his head around to look at the computer. "Digital world? What?"

"We possess a device capable of digitizing living beings so that they may be transported to and interact with the digital world," Nicole elaborated. "It was one of my side projects, actually. Tails helped me build it. I only need a few minutes to set up the proper calibrations and you can join me shortly."

"Uhhh..." The wires being held in Sorun's hand dropped when an overhead light near the back of the lab flipped on. Directly under that light was a large, rectangular server box that was almost as tall as Sorun was. On top of the box was a small satellite dish pointed forwards. Looking down he could see cables running from the device to the computer, and as he continued to observe all of the diodes and displays began flickering as the machine started to hum to life.

Sorun still needed a minute to process the fact that Nicole was offering to digitize him.

"Wait wait wait, slow down. That's a thing?" He incredulously asked as he pointed at the dish on top of the server box. "You can just- I mean it's not the most crazy thing I've heard here, but really?"

"Of course," Nicole answered him. "You... sound hesitant. If you are uncomfortable with-"

"Nah, nah, it's... it's fine," Sorun hesitantly answered as he turned back to his work on the head. "Always wanted to be jacked into the Matrix. Or ported to Tron. Or some other analogue for going to a digital world." He snapped his fingers. "Oh yeah, Lyoko. That was a thing, too."

There was a pause from Nicole. "Sorun, I have no idea what any of these things you are referencing are."

"Ah, I'd rather not talk about it." With those words, the teen plugged the last wire into the severed head. "Okay, that's the last one. We good?"

"I believe so, yes." There was an electronic hum from the computer, and a second later a hand in a white glove appeared on a screen giving a thumbs-up. At the same time, the satellite dish on top of the server box swiveled towards Sorun. "I have prepared the proper calibrations. Please step in front of the dish so that I may transfer you."

So they were going through with it after all. The way she sounded so casual about performing such a miracle was stunning Sorun more than the actual prospect of being digitized, but that was yet another thing that was a norm here, he supposed.

Another zany day on Mobius like any other. It's not what he woke up in the morning expecting, or ever expected really, but he was starting to get used to such surprises. Steadily, at least.

Swallowing nervously, Sorun nodded to himself and began to slowly approaching the dish. Getting beamed into the digital world- he'd always fantasized about such a thing growing up, but now that it was about to happen he felt a great amount of trepidation towards the process for fear of something going wrong. But it had to be safe if Nicole was being so casual with it.

He really hoped it was safe.

"So, uh... is this gonna hurt?" Sorun asked as he stopped in front of the dish, wincing slightly when he saw yellow lines of electricity begin converging on its center. "'Cause I really don't-"

Flash!

Flash!

"- think this is healthy for- oh, hey, I'm here."

That had been quicker than he'd anticipated. A lot quicker, actually. All he'd managed to perceive was a yellow flash going off mid-sentence, and immediately after the flash ended he was somewhere else entirely. Somewhere really different than anywhere else he'd seen.

He thought that he was outside. Maybe. He couldn't see any walls and the ceiling was so high that it looked like a greenish void leading on forever with no sun, stars, or moon to light it, so he supposed it was likely outside. The ground was even more bizarre: completely flat and glowing in a neon green color, with white lines running in a checkered pattern throughout it all giving it a wireframe texture. There were large, box-like buildings all around too, some close by while others were far away, and all varying in size from a few stories to being so high they breached the dark green sky, and all with that same green, wireframe texture.

It certainly looked like what he assumed a virtual world would look like.

"Neato," Sorun murmured to himself as he looked around at the virtual landscape around him, a small amount of awe flowing through his mind. "Wow, this is really crazy. Going inside a virtual world. Heh heh. Man, the guys at home woulda flipped if- huh, what the- WHAT THE!?"

He saw his hand go past his vision, and then immediately brought his hand back to look at it as awe gave way to panic. It was definitely his hand. Probably. The color and shape was vaguely there, but his hand, and the rest of his body when he looked down, was formed at such a low resolution that his entire form looked like a blurry, misshapen mess. He wasn't even sure he could call the hand a hand when he looked at it a second time; it looked more like a sharpened appendage that had lines going through it to give the hand the appearance of having fingers.

"Why do I look like I came out of a video game from the nineties...?" He heard a small flash of light next to him, prompting Sorun to turn his pixelated head towards the source. He saw Nicole standing there with a perturbed expression on her face as she looked at Sorun. "Nicole, what is this?!" Sorun demanded as he waved his arms at her.

"I am unsure." She was still staring wide-eyed at him, though at the same time two blue rectangles with text flooding across their surfaces appeared in the air to either side of the lynx. "Please don't panic. I'm looking at the issue now."

"Don't panic? Nicole, my hand's a single polygon!"

"I am sure you are perfectly capable of moving with that hand regardless of your pixel count." A small hum left her as she focused her gaze down at the screens. "Ah, I see. The digitizer was calibrated towards a Mobian's physiology. It's a good thing you have a mammalian body and are relatively close to Mobian biology. I could have accidentally turned you inside-out."

Sorun made a small "eep" sound and backed up a step. "You couldn't have thought to check that beforehand?"

She stopped typing on the screens momentarily, and then looked up at Sorun. He didn't know what to think when he saw a small smirk appear on her face.

"It's just a little bit of humor, Sorun. I wouldn't have digitized you if there was a chance of something going horribly wrong like that." She continued typing. "Although that said, it does seem the digitizer needed to be recalibrated due to your biology. We had never digitized a human before, so I was unaware such an adjustment was needed. I'm making the proper changes now."

A winded breath left Sorun. "Kinda a morbid joke for you, isn't it?" he asked as rings of blue light began to surround him.

"Humor is still a new concept for me. Talking with you during our sessions has helped me further my knowledge of the concept." She frowned. "Did I not do it well?"

"N-nah, nah, it was fine. I just didn't see it coming." Sorun looked down as a pillar of blue light engulfed him, ending seconds later as the blue rings that had surrounded him vanished. "Oh, thanks," he said as he examined his hand. Just enough resolution to look like the real thing.

He didn't remember wearing something with sleeves, though.

Cocking his head to the side, Sorun looked down at himself. His clothes below the torso were the same as those in reality, though above his waist was a different story: the blue shirt was still there, but the sleeveless blue hoodie Honey had made for him was absent. In its place was a thin, blue coat with a long coattail cut into three segments that reached all the way to his ankles. An opened, blue coat with light blue, almost white patterns going down each side of the coat's breasts, the left ending at the collar and the right going all the way to the waist. Patterns that resembled a double helix made from thorny vines with a third, straight line piercing directly down helixes' centers.

Sorun knew what the coat was immediately. He was intimately familiar with the coat and those patterns, having controlled the video game character who'd worn it for such an obscene amount of time. He just couldn't understand why he was wearing it.

"Vergil's coat? Huh?" He looked down at the coat for a few more moments, and then looked up to Nicole with a questioning look on his face. "What happened with my clothes?" he asked her.

Nicole lowered her hands from the floating screens, causing them to disappear. She stepped closer to Sorun afterwards while giving the coat a scrutinizing look. "Part of the process of digitization is your mind being reformatted to interpret the digital world in a way you can comprehend. From your perspective, this would mean that the appearance of some things could be... fluid, depending on your state of mind. Your personal appearance can very possibly be affected by your subconscious, though for what reason it formed that coat is beyond me."

"Mm. I'm not too worried about it, then." More shenanigans from his subconscious. He should have expected it, but as long as it was just a coat, he wouldn't think twice about it. "Okay," Sorun continued, "so where are we going?"

The AI nodded to him, and then turned to the side while pointing off in the distance. "Currently we are located in the digital representation of the HQ computer's mainframe. Our objective is the software located inside of the internals of the Badnik's head we connected to the computer. We will have to make our way to those connections and traverse the cables in order to reach the head. It should be easy from there."

"Oookay..." It sounded simple enough to his ears. Get to the cables and ride through the cables to the head. "So where're the cables?"

"Where I'm pointing."

Sorun stopped glanced at Nicole, and then rolled his eyes as he peered out towards the green, digital horizon. He could vaguely make out large, black tunnels that he supposed may be giant cables. Or digital representations of cables, at the very least. But they looked miles and miles away.

"Ugh, man, those look super far away," Sorun complained as he looked back to Nicole. "We seriously gotta walk all the way over there?"

"That will not be necessary. I will be providing a vehicle for the both of us."

"Huh, what? Vehicle?" He turned back to Nicole, but she had already left his side. He turned around, and saw she had retreated a few steps and was holding her hand out towards the ground.

Some of the green, wireframe ground began to fragment into small, cubed pieces underneath Nicole's hand. They began to lift up and flow around, the sides of the cubes snapping and forming together into a vague, saucer-like shape. As soon as all of the cubes came together, the lines and seams of the connections began to fade while the sharp edges began to round out and morph along with the colors of the shape Nicole made.

Eventually, what had once been a conglomeration of green cubes turned into a small, floating metal saucer with two seats on its top. Nicole hopped up the saucer into the right seat, and then looked down expectantly at Sorun. The human blinked up at the saucer, and then sighed as he climbed up towards the seat next to her.

"Okay, I get it. AIs get to do cool AI stuff in the digital world," Sorun thought as he climbed to the top of the saucer. "Cool ride," he commented as he sat down in the seat next to her, leaning back into the seat while interlacing his fingers behind his head. "So how far to the cables?" he asked.

Nicole regarded Sorun for a second, and then reached forwards to grasp at a small steering wheel in front of her seat. She turned it, and by extension, the entire floating saucer turned towards the direction where she had pointed to prior. "At the speed this vehicle goes, approximately ten minutes and forty-six seconds," she informed him as she pressed forwards on the wheel. The saucer began flying forwards, fast enough that Sorun felt his body press slightly into the chair. "The time it will take to traverse the cables is another matter entirely, though we will reach that point soon enough."

"If you say so." Feeling his fingers going numb from being forcibly pressed into the seat, Sorun removed his fingers and, with some effort, sat back forwards. He then turned to the side, where he soon rested his arms at the edge of the saucer while leaning forwards into them to gaze out into the passing landscape.

He wanted to say it was a nice view, but quite honestly with how fast they were going combined with everything having that same green, wireframe texture, it was all beginning to blur together for him. Enough to the point that all the green whizzing past him was starting to make Sorun feel unwell, so after a couple of minutes of staring out into the digital world he pushed his body back into the saucer and leaned back into his seat. Afterwards he glanced at Nicole, who seemed half-focused on driving. Even so, he could tell from the way her eyes were half-lidded that she seemed as bored as he was. Wasn't hard to see why considering she was driving them in a straight line.

"I guess I should start a conversation. But man, I don't know what to lead in with," Sorun absentmindedly gazed upwards at the empty, green sky in thought. "Geez, what does she actually like? Every time we talk over video games it's always just over a bunch of random stuff on our minds. I don't actually know what she likes." He glanced at her from the corner of his eyes, pursed his lips, and looked back forwards. "Damn, does it even matter? It's just talking. Start with something, anything." Impatiently, he began tapping at his knees. "I got nothin'."

"So," he heard the lynx from besides him begin, "what is your impression of the digital world?"

"Oh thank god, she started it," Sorun internally cheered before turning his head to give her his attention. "It's a lot more green than I thought it would be," he told her, and then immediately had to resist the urge to slap himself. "'A lot more green than-' man, what the fuck kinda answer is that?"

To his utter disbelief, the answer brought a small smile to Nicole's face. "I found myself saying the exact same thing when I first witnessed the real world with my own eyes," she said.

"Run with it, Sorun, run with it." Coughing lightly into his fist, the teen turned his whole body slightly to more face Nicole's. "What made you want to make that body, anyways?" he asked.

"You could say I had a... different perspective on things," she answered him. "I remember a time where all my experiences were nothing but raw data and information provided to me by the voices of everybody else, mainly Sally, who almost always carries my handheld body, as well as any digital data I had to sift through whenever I was plugged into something. Through my experiences with everybody, over time my computational matrix grew and learned and I evolved what you would perceive as a personality." The little smile she'd had on her face fell to a neutral expression. "But it... wasn't a full experience, as you would probably say. I never experienced what everybody else experienced in the real world. True sights, sounds, colors... among other things. But that had ended when there was an incident where me and Sally briefly switched bodies."

Sorun continued to silently listen to Nicole, though he tilted his head at that last statement. "Eh? How'd that happen?"

"Rotor was running an experiment with Chaos energy with me and Sally stepped on a loose wire," she quickly answered. It elicited a disbelieving scoff from Sorun. "Walking around in her body proved to be a... enlightening experience for me. At the time it had seemed like I had stepped into a completely different world which, I suppose, wasn't entirely inaccurate. The sheer amount of sensations was almost overwhelming. The sights, the sounds, the feeling of touch, the wind blowing on my face... I'd even felt true emotions for the first time," she quietly added. "It did not last long; Sally and I were placed back into our proper bodies shortly afterwards, though some things remained with me. The emotions I had experienced were imprinted into my computational matrix, and as a result I was able to form my own emotions. Learning to feel as others felt was wonderful on its own, but simply put, I wanted more. I wanted to experience the real world again. So I began developing my own body." She sighed, and picked one of her hands up from the wheel to look at it.

"For the most part, my efforts were a success," Nicole continued, "though the power requirements needed to maintain this body of mine in the real world are impractical. There was a time where my handheld body only had enough power to support it for a few minutes on a weekly basis. A few weeks before you arrived on Mobius, actually, I had created the blueprints for the modification to my body to utilize Power Rings and had Tails build and install it for me, and while it has assuredly been a marked improvement, I can't help but long for something more." She put her hand back on the wheel, and then fully turned to Sorun while smiling again. "But otherwise, I have been incredibly grateful for the experiences afforded to me thus far. I must especially thank you, Sorun. Nobody else has endeavored to spend as much time with my physical form as you, even if it is just to play games. I know gathering all of those Power Rings must be a hassle."

Sorun shook his head while giving a polite smile. "No, it's fine. To be honest you're the only fun one I can play games with. Not to demean everybody else, but they're all pretty terrible at games compared to us." He coughed into his hand again. "But yeah, don't worry about the rings. It's not a problem at all."

A total lie. Those rings were incredibly hard to come by, and sometimes when he asked Sally for some she outright refused because they didn't have any to spare. Apparently, though, Power Rings spawned out of a lake for some reason. He didn't know why, but after asking around he'd found the lake and managed to roughly nail down the times they rose up so he could snatch a ring if he was really hankering for a session with Nicole.

It was a pain in the ass getting those things, really, but it was more than worth it.

"Well, regardless, I appreciate all the time you have spent with me," Nicole finished.

Well. That had certainly been more than what he'd been expecting when he'd asked such a simple question. He'd meant something completely different when he asked, so she didn't really answer anything he asked, but that was still a lot of perspective she'd given him. And he found himself appreciating the story, oddly enough. Being moved by the simple fact she'd shared so much with him. It was oddly touching.

It still didn't answer his original question, though.

"Uh, Nicole..." Sorun began to nervously drum his fingers together. "When I asked what made you want to make that body, I meant, like... why you chose a lynx body," he elaborated.

"... Oh." Almost looking embarrassed, Nicole turned her head back forwards. "I apologize. I didn't mean to bore you with-"

"No no no! I wasn't bored at all!" Sorun denied, quickly leaning closer while shaking his head as panic shot through him. "Ah, jeez, that isn't what I meant at- look, I really enjoyed all that and I'm glad you shared it with- oh, man, please don't take what I said the wrong way."

Nicole looked back towards Sorun, and when she saw the incredibly flustered and desperate look he had on his face, she made an amused smile with a hint of relief mixed in. "Do not worry. I understand," she assured him. "It is alright."

"Ooooh, thank goodness." Sighing, Sorun collapsed back into his seat while covering his face with his hand. "So, lynx?" he asked again, voice muffled by his palm while he looked at the AI from between his fingers.

"I simply chose a form that was most pleasing to me," she answered. "Why do you ask? Do you find this form unappealing to look at?"

Crossing his arms, Sorun faced back forwards away from her. "I didn't say that," he said. "And I don't think that."

"Hm." Sorun's foot began to tap on the saucer's floor when she turned towards him more. "Do you know why your subconscious created that coat you are wearing?" she suddenly asked him.

Some of the tension released from Sorun's shoulders, and rather shyly he turned his head in the opposite direction of Nicole. "Don't laugh, but it's from a video game character I really like from back home," he answered.

She actually did laugh a single time at that, and when his head snapped back to shoot her a glare, she laughed a second time. "Forgive me. I did not realize it was such a sensitive subject for you," she said with a teasing smile while facing back forwards. "You must really have liked this character if your subconscious is basing your mental attire off of theirs."

"It's basing a lot more than clothes off Vergil," Sorun thought with an audible sigh. "Yeah, I guess." He held up one of his arms and tugged on the coat's sleeve with the other. "Hey, think this'll come back into the real world along with the rest of me?"

To his great disappointment, Nicole shook her head. "It is simply a digital representation of your mental image of yourself. Your real clothes will be returned along with the rest of you when you go back to the real world."

"Aw, man." Sorun made a pout. "That's a shame. I really like this coat."

In response to this, Nicole turned her green eyes towards the coat. She only studied it and the designs on the coat for a single second, after which she turned back forwards and at the same time began pulling the wheel back. "We've arrived," she announced.

The saucer began slowing down rapidly, and then halted entirely. The pair immediately stood up and hopped out of the saucer afterwards, with the vehicle disassembling back into green cubes which fell down and dissolved back into the ground. Sorun watched a small spectacle for a few moments, and then turned around and began following closely behind Nicole.

They'd stopped in front of, in essence, a large, black, tubular tunnel that lead right into the ground. The inside was completely dark, though occasionally Sorun could see arcs of blue electricity spark off in the interior, and in those brief flashes of light he could see a myriad of wires lining the tunnel's walls.

"So we gotta take this to reach Metal Sonic's head?" Sorun asked as he traced a finger along the tunnel's edge. He looked forwards, and saw that a short distance into the dark tunnel it curved downwards into a straight drop. "So, uh... how does this work?"

Nicole stepped besides him. "We simply drop in," she explained. "We'll be funneled into Metal's systems and we'll be able to work in from there."

"... Drop in... right..." Slowly putting one foot in front of the other, Sorun slowly began entering the tunnel while keeping one hand running along the wall. "There isn't a less, I don't know, extreme way of going in?" he asked her as he neared the edge of the tunnel's drop. "We seriously gotta drop in?"

"The only thing connecting the head to the computer is the cables we inserted, but this specific cable is the only hardline we can use to reach the head's system." Right as Sorun stopped at the edge of the drop, Nicole halted right at his backside. "I assure you it is completely safe, Sorun."

Gulping, Sorun peered down into the hole. The completely black, seemingly bottomless hole that had every instinct in him screaming that he shouldn't jump down it and that it would mean death. He was so afraid of jumping down into the bottomless hole that Nicole's words were lost on him.

Shaking his head, Sorun took a step back. "Y-yeah, you know, I think I'm good." He'd inadvertently backed into Nicole, who stopped him by pressing both of her palms against his back. "I mean, you said it was safe anyways, right? I'll just wait here for you to come back and-"

"Sorun, it's not dangerous. You'll be fine," Nicole stated in a flat tone. "From your perspective the fall won't even take a second. We're already here, so just go in."

"I-I would, you know, seriously, but-but I really don't think-"

He'd heard a small sigh from behind him, and he could of sworn he felt Nicole roll her eyes at him. Then she'd pushed him.

He didn't even have time to register the betrayal before he fell in.

"Uuuugh..."

Well, Nicole had been right about one thing: the fall had taken less than a second. He'd fell in, and then he hit solid ground relatively pain-free. The problem was that, during that half-second, he'd felt his body being propelled at a speed so fast that, despite how short it had been, he felt like his eyeballs were spinning, his stomach had been wrung out, and his brain had been shaken. The nausea he was experiencing wasn't helping, either.

With another groan he rolled onto his back, looking up to see a tall, dark wall with the hole of the other end of the cable sticking out from it. Nicole's body dropped out of the hole right after, though she didn't look nearly as worse for wear as he did.

"Ugh, why'd you shove me...?" he moaned out as he sat upwards. "Agh, jeez I feel like I just got squeezed through a drinking straw..."

Nicole grimaced, and then looked to the side to avoid eye contact with Sorun. "You were being difficult, and Sally often says that helping others only requires a shove in the right direction. As for the nausea, your mind did just travel at sub-light speeds through the cable into the head's systems. It should pass momentarily."

He actually was starting to feel better now that she mentioned it, but it was still with some difficulty that Sorun rose up to his feet. "So there's these things called idioms," Sorun muttered to her as she reached down to help him up. "Dunno if you've ever heard of them, Nicole, but they're not meant to be taken literally."

"I'm perfectly aware of what an idiom... I see." Expression turning sheepish, Nicole placed her hands behind her back after helping Sorun up and stepped back. "I apologize. It was not my intention to cause stress to-"

"It's fine, don't worry about it." Truthfully he was a little upset, but it was rapidly starting to fade from his mind as he began to take a look around at the surroundings. "More importantly, is this it?"

Nicole looked back at him, and then nodded. "Yes. This would be the digital representation of Metal Sonic's internal systems."

It was a lot more dreary than the inside of the HQ computer's mainframe, Sorun would say that much. The overall structure was the same- wireframe floors and structures everywhere, though the structures were much more shorter, numerous, and clumped together in some half-baked representation of a cityscape. And gray, too. The floors and structures were all a dark gray color while the sky was a deep, endless dark blue.

Even something as subtle as the general mood of the place felt different. Sorun hadn't felt anything inside the mainframe other than his own wonder at stepping into a virtual world, but here there was something else. A sinister undertone to the atmosphere that had Sorun on edge.

Such was the mind of a killer robot, he supposed.

"You're absolutely sure this place is safe?" Sorun asked once more as Nicole walked past him, prompting the human to fall closely behind. "I don't mean to second-guess you or anything, but something about this place..."

"It does seem rather off, doesn't it?" Nicole muttered in agreement as the two rounded the corner of a large, block-like structure. "I understand your concerns, but just as I said, there is nothing to fear. I'm not feeding enough power into Metal Sonic's head to even power its subroutines, never mind its primary drivers. It shouldn't even be conscious at the moment, so we don't need to fear any anti-software protection programs being activated." She pointed to the structure they'd just passed. "For example, the building back there is the primary driver for Metal's optical systems. They're currently inert due to lack of power."

Sorun looked behind him and at the building Nicole was gesturing to. It looked like just another wireframe, featureless block like everything else around. "I'll... take your word for it." He looked back to Nicole. "So we're just going after his memory centers, right?" he questioned. "Quick in and out?"

"It shouldn't take too long, yes." She looked back ahead. "Actually, I believe that is it over there."

The lynx's walking speed increased, forcing Sorun to speed up his own pace just to keep up with her. He looked ahead towards the structure in question, though there wasn't much he could say about it: a square, flat wireframe building pressed up against dozens of identical squares to form a rectangular, segmented building that was sitting in the open at the edge of a small plaza.

"Er... cool," Sorun commented as the pair slowed to a stop once approaching the structure. "So these are the memory banks?"

"Yes." Nicole rose her hands up to her sides, and the floating computer screens appeared once more. "All of the security countermeasures are offline as expected due to the low influx of power, though the files themselves seem to be locked behind a password," she mumbled as she began typing. "I imagine the files are encrypted, too, though I can get to work on that later. For now I just wish to make a copy of all the data I can and bring it back to the HQ for further analysis."

"Choice, choice." The human teen crossed his arms, nervously tapping his foot while looking around at the gray, maze-like structures surrounding them. The only sounds to break up the eerie environment was the tapping of his foot and the tapping sounds of Nicole typing, though even this was beginning to wear on him. "Is the password going to be a problem for-?"

"I've bypassed it."

The curt response caught Sorun off guard, who sputtered slightly and turned his back to Nicole fully to continue to observe the surrounding, bleak area. "Great," he said. "Don't wanna rush you or anything, Nicole, but I'm not gonna lie, this place is giving me the creeps."

"It should just be a few more moments... hm?" Nicole's typing paused as she focused in on the floating screen to her left. "What is... oh no-!"

The sky turned from blue to red.

Sorun, who was oblivious towards the reason for the change in color, gazed up at the sky with a simple, perturbed look on his face. Nicole looked much more panicked as she began to rapidly tap away at her screens, and when Sorun looked over to her direction, he began to grow more worried himself as a result of seeing Nicole's expression.

"Er, Nicole?" he called. "Everything ok-?"

"There was a trap in the files. A program that detects unauthorized- why would it only activate in conjunction with low power levels!?" The lynx's typing grew to furious speeds. "Don't tell me when Eggman programmed this thing he actually anticipated... he designed something that specific!?"

"Alright, everything's not okay, then." Sorun's worry began to increase tenfold when one of the blocky buildings on the other side of the plaza began to shift from a gray color to a blue color. "Hey, that building over there is lighting up." He backed up so that he was next to Nicole. "Nicole, what's the problem here?"

"There's a program that detects unauthorized access to Metal's memory banks, but it only triggers if it detects low levels of power within Metal Sonic's systems," Nicole rapidly explained as she continued typing. "It must be a failsafe countermeasure in the event we would try something like this, but I can't see what good that program will do unless-" Her fingers snapped to a halt for a quarter of a second, after which Nicole's eyes widened dramatically as her fingers began typing again. "It's to activate a backup power supply," she realized.

The blue building across the way began shifting to red. "So that's bad?" Sorun guessed.

"He put a backup power supply unit in Metal's head just in case somebody tried accessing the files while it was disconnected from its main power supply located in its body." She didn't even look towards Sorun as she explained, as the AI's green eyes were completely affixed to her screens. "The program I tripped is attempting to activate it in response to my intrusion. I'm trying to head it off, but it's so hardwired into the system-!"

Zap!

Both the AI's and the human's head perked up at the crackling, zapping sound of electricity. They slowly turned towards the center of the plaza where the source of the noise originated, though both had varying reactions. Nicole's irises had shrunken a small amount, while Sorun's face went even paler than normal.

Metal Sonic was standing there. Or something that looked like it at least, as all of its body including the metal bits were glowing a bright, neon blue color. The only exception to the blue coloring was the two red irises, both glowing so brightly they were practically flaming. And to Sorun's rapidly increasing fright they were locked onto him.

The first thing that came to Sorun's mind was to shoot a sword at it, so naturally Sorun formed a Summoned Sword at his side. He noticed from the corner of his eye there was something amiss with the sword's shape, and he did a double-take when he saw that the blue sword had taken on a blocky, pixelized texture. He shook his head at the virtual Summoned Sword, uncaring of its appearance, and willed it to fire at Metal Sonic.

Somehow, he wasn't surprised that the sword never hit. Metal Sonic's claws had reached up to snatch the sword out of the air right before it impacted. Once it grabbed the sword, it squeezed down and caused the sword to shatter into a cloud of disappearing pixels.

"Why do I even bother?" Sorun growled under his breath as he took a step back. "What am I looking at here, Nicole?"

"It's Metal Sonic's anti-intrusion software program," she responded in a low voice. "The backup power supply activated by the program I tripped turned it on. Sorun, stand back."

He didn't have any issues complying with that order, and began to rapidly backpedal right behind Nicole. As he did this, green pixels began to swirl around the lynx's hands, who then clapped the two appendages together as the digital Metal Sonic shot forwards.

A great, green wall completely made of transparent, green cubes formed right in front of the virtual robot, which it slammed against. The wall expanded and grew into a dome that soon encapsulated the entire plaza, trapping the program within. Nicole lowered her hands afterwards, face slightly exerted as she took a step backwards.

"I partitioned him away behind that wall," she explained to Sorun. "I don't know how long it's going to hold it, but it should be long enough for us to go back and remove the connections from the head."

Blinking cautiously, Sorun kept near to Nicole as he continued to examine the Metal Sonic program and the green dome it was trapped behind. The program was banging its claw against the green wall in a seemingly angry manner, but from what he saw the wall of green cubes wasn't sustaining any damage. "How long do you need to extract the files?" he slowly asked.

"Just a bit longer," the lynx muttered back as she refocused on her screens. "Why?"

Worryingly, the Metal Sonic program began glowing a brighter blue color. Sorun noticed this immediately, and began pointing towards it. "'Cause it's doing that."

Nicole looked up from the screens just in time to see the program resembling Metal Sonic's form distort and warble, and then watched as its body split in two. The two halves distorted even more for a brief moment, and then began to reshape themselves and become more clear. Soon enough, there were two Metal Sonics standing behind that dome, staring at the pair with angry, red eyes. And right afterwards they began to split apart to divide themselves again.

With a hint of frustration in her eyes, Nicole closed the two screens floating next to her. "It's attempting circumvent the partition barrier I made by running a recursion protocol to-"

"It's making copies of itself to get past the green thing, got it!" His patience thoroughly thinned, he stomped forwards while gently but firmly shaking Nicole's shoulder. "Look, we gotta get outta here pretty quick."

"I'm aware of this. I just now finished copying the files I found." Nicole glanced back towards the dome. By now there were dozens of glowing Metal Sonics inside of the green dome, pounding away at the walls. And they were making progress, too, as small cracks were beginning to form along the dome's wall. "Come on. We'll depart the same way we came in."

Sorun's face fell slightly. "Aw man, we gotta go back through that- alright!" His face picked back up when Nicole shot him a glare. "Alright, let's go!"

The pair wasted no further time, the both of them turning around and taking off. Or Nicole had taken off, at least- evidently being an AI in the digital world came with more perks than just being able to build stuff out of nothing and manipulate the environment by typing stuff. She could fly, too. Just float a few inches off of the ground and fly away. Sorun hadn't even been able to say anything in response before she grabbed his wrist and dragged him away along with her as she flew back towards the access cable they had used to travel into Metal's head.

At any other given time with anybody else Sorun would have raised a lot of objections to this, but with an army of killer robots at their back that he couldn't even touch, he couldn't find it in himself to raise any argument towards it. So he'd let Nicole take his wrist without any fuss so they could fly away.

But, right as they saw the cable-tunnel and began to approach it, something had stretched out in front of their path. A large, red, transparent wall made of cubes, not unlike the dome Nicole had used to trap the Metal Sonic programs. They touched down on the ground right in front of it, Nicole still tightly holding onto Sorun's wrist as she glared up at the red wall blocking their path.

The destructive sound of a wall shattering nearby behind them was not doing Sorun's nerves any favors.

"Metal Sonic's security systems input a firewall on our exit. It must have noticed the foreign intrusion." Nicole lifted up her free hand as a blue screen appeared in front of it. "I can get past it, but it will take some time."

Looking down at the digital pathway they had just flown down from, Sorun's eyes widened. "Nicole, we ain't got time."

"I just need-"

Crash!

The loud crashing sound had jarred Nicole's concentration, and forced her to look away from her screen towards the source of the noise. Her eyes widened when she saw a wall of digital Summoned Swords filling up the street behind them, with multiple clawed, robotic appendages reached out from the gaps between the swords and handles towards them. Sorun, standing there with his free hand outstretched towards the wall, looked back towards Nicole.

"That's only gonna hold them for a few seconds," he said, "so we gotta go now."

"Sorun-" A portion of the wall disintegrated in a flash of blue cubes, and when the AI saw multiple Metal Sonics beginning to squeeze through, she sighed while closing the computer screen. "Very well..."

She waved her hand in front of them right as the wall of swords collapsed entirely. Her own makeshift wall, green and made of cubes just like the red one in front of them, manifested and spread out to separate the dozens of Metal Sonics from the pair. Already, though, the dozens of copies were pounding away at the wall, making it crack. Nicole's grip on Sorun's wrist tightened, and the teen felt his body be pulled away as Nicole took flight away from the programs once more.

It had taken tens of minutes- though to Sorun it had felt like hours- but they'd finally evaded the mob of Metal Sonics hunting them down. Minutes upon minutes of Nicole flying them all over the virtual, cityscape-like design of the virtual world inside of Metal Sonic's programming, diving and weaving through the maze-like structures as either Sorun or Nicole occasionally constructed a wall behind them to momentarily slow down the horde chasing them.

It had been highly stressful, but somehow, through some combination of using the walls and Nicole's navigation, they seemed to have gotten away. He'd attribute a large part of it to the fact that she could fly fast while in the virtual world, too. Faster than those Metal Sonics had been going. Sorun chalked it up to her AI nature, but he was less about questioning that and more about being thankful that all the sharp turns she'd made hadn't given him whiplash and snapped his neck at some point.

But they'd gotten away. For the moment, at least. It was likely the software security programs were still searching around, but for now the two of them were in the clear, having taken cover in a narrow, alley-like alcove between the blocky structures underneath the approximation of a large street. Sorun was standing just outside the alley, hunched over with his hands resting on his knees as he gulped in large breathes of air. Or whatever the virtual equivalent of air was in the virtual world.

He had to wonder if he even needed to breath here, but his mind was on too many other things to care to find out.

"Whew, ah man... that was a wild ride." He straightened his back up and looked back into the alley. "So, what's next for... uh, Nicole?"

The pale human wasn't surprised in the least that Nicole didn't look winded at all; he'd expected that much. He didn't expect to find her sitting in the alley with her back against the wall, knees pulled up and held to her chest with her head dipped downwards. She didn't even seem responsive towards him, and didn't do much as stir when he called her name a second time.

"... Ah, geez. Gimme a break." Sorun continued staring for a few more moments, and then sighed as a ran a hand along his face. "Alright, let's figure out what's wrong."

He stepped into the alley, pressed his back against the same wall Nicole was sitting against, and then slowly slid down until he was sitting right besides her. He picked his left knee up, slung his left elbow over it, and then looked to his right at Nicole. "Hey." He lifted his right hand up and gently nudged her shoulder. "Hey, say words."

"... I have made a myriad of mistakes..." Nicole quietly murmured.

"..." Sorun nudged her again. "Say more words."

"I only endeavored to try and breach Metal Sonic's memory archives because I thought it would be completely safe. I took every single precaution necessary and made all the correct calculations, and even after all that I... I underestimated how meticulous Dr. Eggman was in his security programming," Nicole admitted. "Even if it was such a cleverly hidden failsafe, I failed to account for it. I failed to secure us a direct exit route because I did not account for how powerful Metal Sonic's defensive systems would be. I failed to bring this matter to Sally, who most likely would have denied such a mission knowing the risks." She glanced towards Sorun, her black hair brushing past her shoulders. "... I've failed to keep you safe after you volunteered to follow me here," she continued. "I likely will not be able to penetrate the firewall blocking our escape in time with all of those programs patrolling and searching around. I wouldn't doubt that the exit point is guarded, even. Being destroyed here would be the equivalent of being destroyed in reality, and I fear that... I'm worried," she finished as she faced back forwards into her knees.

"... Ah." Yeah, he could see why she'd be so down after all that. And he figured that a "die in the virtual world, die in reality" mechanic was in place, but hearing it out of Nicole's mouth was a bit more sobering to Sorun, and now he was really worried. But he was less focused on that and more on the sad lynx he was sitting right next to- mainly because he wanted to shake her out of this so they could put their heads together and figure out a solution so they could continue living. And a small part of him didn't like seeing her sad.

"Okay." The teen took a deep breath, and then slowly exhaled. "I got nothing, so let's just wing it and say what's on my mind. That's more honest anyways, right? Ugh. Hope this works."

"Well, yeah, you're not wrong." Sorun paused, and then looked up at the bottom of the street above them. "You know, all this diving into the virtual world and computer stuff... it's really cool. In my zone this kind of stuff is science-fiction. The kind of things they base video games and movies off of. Actually sorta reminds me of this one old show back where I'm from, Earth. I only watched a few episodes, never saw the full thing and I didn't care much for it, but I got the gist of it. It was about a space crew that road around in a spaceship doing space things. They even had a AI crew member. Kinda like you." By now Nicole had decided to turn her entire head to give him her full attention. "I'm gonna impart something I heard from the show that I can tell you from personal experience is completely true." Sorun turned his head so that the pair's eyes would lock. "It's possible to do literally every single thing right, not make a single mistake, and still lose. That's not failure. That's life. It happens."

Nicole's ears, having practically been flattened against her head, picked up halfway but still appeared to be drooping. Her face didn't look all that convinced, either. "Sorun, that isn't... that doesn't make sense-"

"Nicole, this isn't math." Sorun stopped, and then took a quick look around. "Okay, in this instance this is kinda math, but even in math you don't get a perfect answer all the time. Life is just like that, but worse. Like, way worse. Things happen all the time because of all sorts of crazy variables. The important thing isn't that you failed, it's that you get up after failing and keep going." He was pulling all of the moral lessons he'd seen in a myriad of video games and comics at this point, but he felt himself going on a roll, so Sorun gestured to himself. "I mean, look at me," he said. "I've been a major screw-up since day one of being dragged on Mobius, and I'm still here. I was practically falling on my face and getting gut-punched by the universe every day in the beginning, and to be honest with you that's kinda still happening, but by some cosmic stroke of luck I've made it this far without having a mental shutdown. Did I want to stay down every time I got knocked down?" Sorun breathed out a listless laugh. "Yeah, I did. I really, really did. But self-preservation is a really amazing thing that's been keeping me going, along with..." he turned to the side and coughed, "along with a couple other things.

"Look, what... what I'm trying to say is that, yeah, we screwed up. You probably shouldn't have tried break into Metal Sonic's head, and I probably shouldn't have given you the head or at least tried talking you out of it. But people make mistakes, Nicole. And guess what, we're people."

Throughout the entire speech, Nicole's eyes had been steadily widening the more and more Sorun spoke. Her eyes fell near the end, though, and when it was her turn to speak she had a disbelieving tone in her voice. "People... you referred to both of us as people," she muttered. "You really see me as a person?"

Sorun just looked confuse at that. "Yeah, why wouldn't I? Doesn't everybody?"

"In the Freedom Fighters, yes," she confirmed with a nod, "but I've been resisting Eggman alongside them all for years. You've scarcely been here a month. I just... find it surprising that even after all the time we spent playing those games you-"

"You're really gonna make me go through with this?" Sorun interrupted with a roll of his eyes. "Of course you're a real person. Geez, you sound more real than some of the people I know on Earth. You look real, you talk real, you even emote like a real person. Lifeless machines don't sit down in alleys acting all sad like you're doing right now. You told me you learned how to have your own emotions. The fact you can even do that proves you're sapient," he said while lightly shoving Nicole.

It wasn't even him posturing to try and make her feel better at this point. It was how he genuinely felt, even if the excessive amount of games and movies he'd experienced whose plot dealt with this exact same issue was slightly biasing his way of thinking on the matter. And the amount of embarrassment flowing through him wanted to make him hide his face behind his dark hair again, but his gamer pal was being sad in an alley. He wasn't gonna have that, even at his own expense.

"That's... not incorrect," Nicole conceded as she looked down at her hands, "but I'm not sure the word 'real' is something I can-"

"Nicole, how much more real could you be? Literally, how much more real?" he asked her. "You're already a sapient being that can feel emotions. You went as far as to make a body for yourself to interact with reality, so you've got a real body, even if you can't maintain it for long. Your mind's real, your body's real, seriously, you couldn't be more real." He leaned back into the wall, threw his hand up, and let it fall into his lap. "Okay, sure, you're an AI, but artificial intelligence is still intelligence. I mean if you really think about there isn't really much difference between your mind and mine. It's all electrical impulses and signals at the end of the day. I'm just made of a lot more carbon and have hormones and stuff, and you're made of... whatever the body you make is made of. That stuff. And yeah, you think a lot faster than me and you have, like, two or three-hundred IQ points over me, but that doesn't change anything." He waved his arm over himself. "You even went and digitized me so I could walk around the virtual, not real world. Pretty sure going from being real to not real goes both ways if you get what I'm saying."

With his piece said, Sorun stood up to his feet and walked towards the entrance to the alley, Nicole staring after his back. "But all that's just what I think," he finished. "At the end of the day you're your own person, so you decide what you are and aren't. But the Nicole I know never got all mopey even when I beat her in a video game. She got better and beat me the next time around. And then I'd pull a gamer trick outta my sleeve and beat her again. Then we'd keep doing that until the Power Ring ran out." He looked back at her. "I'm pulling at straws at this point, so please feel better."

He finished the speech with a small breath. His brain felt exhausted just from saying that speech, but it was everything he had that he could pull. He just hoped that enough of it got through to Nicole that she would begin to understand what he was trying to say.

To his immense relief, it looked like a lot of what he had said had gotten through to Nicole after all. Her ears were practically standing up straight, her eyes seemed widened to the max, and though her mouth was closed he was pretty sure her jaw was slack. For the longest time she wasn't moving, either. She just continued to sit there while staring up at him wide-eyed with that deep, unreadable expression, and for a moment Sorun was worried he'd said something that broke her.

Eventually, though, her head lowered again, and any concern Sorun had washed away when he saw a small smile grow on her face. "I suppose you raise many valid points," she said at last. "And I also suppose that life as a real person would include all the bad in life as well as the good."

"Hey, look at that. I actually got through." Sorun walked over to her and held a hand out. She grasped it, and Sorun helped her up to her feet. "We tripped and fell down. So what? Everybody trips," he said. "Even genius AI people don't get to be exempt from falling over."

She smiled a little at that. "Yes, I see that now." She paused, and then looked down at the pale hand grasping hers. "But that's why we have friends to help us with all that falling, correct?" she asked as she looked back up at Sorun.

And then, for Sorun at least, the mood was instantly brought down a few notches.

"... Friends, huh?" In a move that caused Nicole some confusion, Sorun adopted a gloomy look on his face as he pulled his hand away from the lynx.

He turned his back to Nicole and bit his lower lip. He'd done it again. Accidentally closed in on people when he was supposed to be distancing himself away from all the people he was planning on abandoning. First it was saving lives, and now it was giving motivational speeches to sad AI. And she had to go and use the "friend" word. Is that what they were now? Friends? He so desperately wanted to deny it, but he also just didn't have the heart to do it. Because he actually did value all the time he spent with her, probably more than the others since those video game sessions with her was one of the only things keeping him together besides his desire to live.

What was even the point in trying anymore when things like this kept happening? He wasn't even bothering to fight it. He wasn't even sure fighting it would do any good for how far he'd gone for some people.

"... So we gotta find a way out of this mess," Sorun said, trying to get away from his own thoughts. "I got a theory I wanna test."

In a flash of blue, the Bringer Claws appeared hanging off of his shoulders. They had a digital texture to them like the Summoned Swords had, but the power itself seemed to remain the same. The right claw removed itself from Sorun's shoulder, curled into a fist, and punched forwards at the corner of one of the wireframe buildings they were standing next to. The small corner he'd punched crumbled apart from the Bringer Claw's fist, the pieces and pixels removed slowly disappearing into nothing. The hole made on the corner remained.

"Theory proven, I got an idea," Sorun announced as the Bringer Claw folded back onto his shoulder. "That one building that lit up before Metal appeared. What was that?" he asked as he turned back to Nicole.

Still regarding him with some confusion behind her eyes mixed with that wonder from earlier, Nicole held her hand out so that the blue computer screen appeared. "That building was a virtual representation of the coding to the core processing system to the anti-software security program inside Metal Sonic's coding," she answered. "It was activated in response to the backup supply unit I inadvertently triggered. Why do you ask?"

"Would the Metal Sonics go away if that building was destroyed?"

A thoughtful look crossed her face as she looked down at the blue screen. "As I said, that building is a virtual representation to a piece of Metal Sonic's programming. Destroying it would essentially be the same as deleting lines of code in his digital makeup, specifically the lines of code responsible for his security system. So... yes. It would."

The screen disappeared, and she looked up at Sorun. "What is your plan, Sorun?"

"The plan is a simple one, Nicole." The right Bringer Claw removed itself from Sorun's shoulder, and once again clenched into a fist. "These things are strong enough to damage the environment. So my plan is I'm gonna punch the building. Really hard."

A beat passed between the two. They both continued to stare at each other silently for the longest of moments, though it was broken when Nicole began to slowly shake her head.

"... I should have expected something so simple from you," Nicole said as a grin spread over her face. "I doubt such a thing will be so easy with all of those security programs out hunting for us, and as your swords demonstrated, you are physically no match for a single one."

"Eh, well, I've never been good at strategy. That's why I got you," Sorun said as the Bringer Claw folded back onto his shoulder. "If I can get back to that place and destroy the building, the Metal Sonics disappear and you'll have all the time in the world to get rid of that firewall so we can leave." He sighed. "But, yeah, the murder programs runnin' around gunning for us is a pretty big problem. I'm open to suggestions here."

Nicole crossed her arms, and only had to think for a second before looking into Sorun's eyes. "The method Metal Sonic used to split itself up into all those iterations of itself was a recursion protocol. While it's true there are numerous amounts of those Metal Sonics running around, a majority of the limited processing power being provided to its system is being dispersed among those copies to coordinate them. It won't weaken them in any way, but it seems to have slowed them down at least. I'm don't think that we would have been able to successfully evade them otherwise. And those programs will have to remain split in order to avoid me simply partitioning them off again."

"Okay... where are you going with this?"

"... Do you remember that 'kiting' strategy you showed me once?" she asked him. "When we were playing that one game? You used a method in which you gained the attention of the game's enemy AI and continued to run around them until they'd all grouped together and you defeated them all at once with that special power-up you'd saved."

"You mean kiting? 'Course I remember." Learning enemy draw distance to manipulate their positions to suit a gamer's purpose was a staple strategy. It helped that the character he'd been playing as had a slightly higher movement speed than the enemy AIs'. "Why, what are- ohhhh, you wanna lead them all, huh?"

Nicole smiled at Sorun's understanding. "I have a great deal of control here in the virtual world, even if it is inside of Metal Sonic's systems. I can outpace the security programs, as we've already seen. I will draw the attention of all of the programs hunting us, and while they are all distracted chasing me you will go and destroy the security system's core processor. If all goes according to plan we should succeed with a relatively low risk of injury."

Sorun turned his head away, holding a hand to his chin in deep contemplation. It was definitely a better plan than his "just punch it" plan. He was glad "punch it" was still part of the plan, though, because it gave him something to do without feeling inadequate. And if he couldn't punch Metal Sonic, he could at least get the satisfaction of punching a piece of its brain away. Him and Nicole escaping with their lives was just the cherry on top.

"Alright. Sounds like a plan to me." He turned his back to Nicole once again and stepped further out of the alley. "Let's say I give you about five minutes to go around and kite all the Metal Sonics together. I'll go and hit the building right after." He turned his head back to Nicole. "That work for you?"

He saw when he looked back that Nicole had been looking at him with that wide-eyed look again, particularly focusing on the digital wings hanging off his back. She looked up to his eyes and gave him a really quick nod when she caught him looking, though. "Yes, that is acceptable." She began floating off of the ground. "I will do my best to draw them all away from you. Good luck, Sorun."

Watching the brown and black lynx fly off, Sorun couldn't help the loud sigh that left him. "This is what I get for playing 'NieR: Automata'. Making me sympathize with AI people. Ugh... but I really meant everything I said to her." He looked down at his right hand. "I still don't want to get along with anybody because of what they did to me. But it's... it's getting harder to do that. And now I want to make an exception for Nicole. She's really been a big help to me." He lowered his hand back to his side with a defeated sigh. "But how am I supposed to do that knowing I'm gonna abandon her along with everybody else just to save my own life?

"... Whatever." He turned to the left and began to slowly walk down the digital streets. "Let's just get through this first. I can deal with all that nonsense later."

The plan created by the pair was quickly enacted, and as it stood, so far it was coming together perfectly. Nicole's part had been easy enough: she'd appeared in front of one of the patrolling Metal Sonic programs, and had flown away with the program giving her chase. More and more programs would join in the chase, with the lynx making sure to draw as many Metal Sonic programs as possible while not flying too fast as to not lose any of them.

And so, by a few minutes in virtually all of the Metal Sonic programs were following Nicole around the digital landscape, weaving past and through all of the blocky buildings. They never caught her, of course, nor did they never even get close to her. But due to Nicole's efforts they'd never lost her, either.

None of this went by in the sight of Sorun, of course, with Nicole having deliberately kited all the Metal Sonic programs towards the other end of the digital space. Because of this he'd walked all the way back to the plaza they'd fled from originally, the teen slowly sauntering towards the sole, red building at the end of the empty, circular space with the wings of his digital Bringer Claws freely waving behind him.

"Best plan ever, Nicole," Sorun said to himself as he came to a stop in front of the glowing, wireframe building that only towered above Sorun by about a two stories. "Alright, so... just punch it?" The two digital claws let go of his shoulder and curled into fists. "I like it. Short, simple, to the point, and cathartic to boot. Seriously, Nicole, awesome plan."

He had a lot of frustration to vent towards Metal Sonic, too. His frustration over what that robot had done to the train and all that medicine. Almost having killed him and his comrades. Being all but immune to all of his abilities he was dying for. Not to mention what he and Nicole were dealing with at the moment. And while he would have loved nothing more than to punch that damn robot right in the face and dent it into an unrecognizable mess, he'd settle for deleting pieces of its mind as a substitute.

So when one of the Bringer Claws shot forwards and impacted the side of the building, it was done with just a bit more speed and gusto than Sorun was accustomed to the Bringer Claws releasing. They'd did their job, though, as that one single punch had destroyed a fist-sized chunk of the blocky building. True damage for sure, but not an overwhelming amount considering it was just a single punch.

Factor in the fact that the two Bringer Claws were pistoning back and forth at rapid speeds as they delivered a relentless assault of punches to the building, though? The small amount of damage was more than enough considering the speed it was being delivered at. So much so that even only after around twenty seconds of nonstop punching a whole quarter of the building had been smashed away from the punches. Eventually the damage became so severe that the red light of the structure began blinking on and off wildly, which only encouraged Sorun to will the Bringer Claws to punch the building even harder.

"Well, this is working fantastically." While the Bringer Claws continued to demolish the building, Sorun turned his body around to look out in the distance. "I hope Nicole's holding up okay."

It was when all the Metal Sonics suddenly froze that Nicole stopped flying away.

Without any warning whatsoever, all of the programs that had been chasing her had seized up. When she stopped flying and turned around to observe, she saw that all the Metal Sonic programs had gone from being frozen to convulsing and spasming wildly. Furthermore, their very forms were fluctuating between appearing transparent and solid, and one by one they all began to explode in a shower of blue pixels that quickly disappeared completely once the fragments dispersed.

A relieved smile grew across the lynx's face as she saw the programs in front of her be deleted one by one. Though the process itself was a bit more visceral than she'd anticipated, she wasn't at all surprised to see it happening. The coding responsible for maintaining the core processing unit of Metal Sonic's anti-intrusion software being deleted was the only thing that could cause a reaction, after all, and such a phenomenon was the goal of the plan she and Sorun had concocted.

And it seemed that the human had succeeded in his objective, as the very last Metal Sonic exploded right in front of Nicole. The mission complete, the very satisfied lynx began flying back towards her human companion.

With one last punch, the sole, single surviving piece of the blocky structure was crushed under the Bringer Claw's fist. The closed claw lifted up to reveal nothing but the gray, wireframe ground beneath it, after which Sorun let out a satisfied sigh as the two digital claws dusted themselves off against each other.

"Thaaaat should do it." Right as he finished speaking, he heard the soft sound of feet touching down on the ground behind him. Sorun turned around, and then softly sighed in relief when he saw Nicole standing right behind him, smiling at Sorun. "You're a genius, Nicole," he told her as he began to approach the lynx, the Bringer Claws on his back disappearing. "It worked, right? All the Metal Sonic things are gone?"

She nodded. "Yes, that is correct. With the core coding to the anti-intrusion software destroyed, Metal Sonic should not be able to impede us any further. I imagine the firewall that had blocked are way disappeared as well, so we should be free to leave at our earliest convenience."

"Oh, huh." Well that sounded great. A little too great, actually, but despite that Sorun didn't have a deep feeling of foreboding at the back of his mind telling him something was wrong. The kind of feeling one would expect to get when things were running just a bit too smoothly. He just felt at ease, and a bit mystified that he felt such a way. "Wow, this was... this was really easy," he noted as he glanced behind him at the now non-existent blocky structure. "Is this what it's like when a plan actually works flawlessly? 'Cause this feels great. Like, just this whole plan. It worked out really great." He turned his head back to Nicole and gave her an appreciative smile. "I mentioned you're a genius for thinking this plan up, right?"

"Yes, you did." She shifted her head to the side, looking a bit bashful from the praise. "It really was not that difficult of a strategy to devise. Your presence made it all the more simpler, and-"

Nicole suddenly stopped, her ears going up straight. Sorun opened his mouth to ask what the matter was, but he stopped himself when one of Nicole's blue digital screens appeared right next to her. The lynx looked down at the screen, reaching out to type a few buttons while frowning at the lines of code sprawled across the screen.

Sorun cleared his throat to gain her attention. "Something the matter?" he asked.

"Possibly." Nicole closed the window and looked back to Sorun. "It seems that by destroying the core processing system to Metal Sonic's security software, we inadvertently activated yet another failsafe within its systems. The power from the backup energy unit in its head is being rerouted to power another subroutine deep within its systems, though I am unsure to its function."

A concerned frown found its way onto the human teen's face. "Do we have to go find another piece of coding to smash?" he asked her.

She thought over the question for a single second, and then shook her head. "I would prefer it if we were to evacuate ourselves from Metal Sonic's systems as soon as possible now that the way is clear. Once we are back in the HQ computer's mainframe I will de-digitize you to send you back to the real world. We can figure out what to do once you've disconnected the head from the computer."

He couldn't fault that logic. He wanted the both of them to leave this head before they got stuck again. "Alright, go back and tear the cables out. Easy." He stepped forwards and held his hand out. "C'mon, let's go."

Nicole looked down at the hand being offered to her, blinking at the extended appendage. When Sorun shook the hand out of impatience, she immediately reached forwards and tightly wrapped her digits around his wrist. She took off right after, Sorun being dragged right behind her as the lynx flew the both of them towards the cable they'd used to enter Metal Sonic's head.

The trip to the cable, thankfully, had been short and uneventful. Nicole had wasted no time in flying directly into the cable once they'd finally arrived at it, Sorun only having had a few moments to prepare himself for the inevitable nausea soon to follow from going through the cable again. But they'd flown through and came out the other end quickly enough, even if it had ended with Sorun stumbling towards the end of the tunnel while holding his stomach.

He didn't think he'd ever get used to that feeling.

"I'm initiating the de-digitization sequence now, Sorun," he heard Nicole say from behind him. "Remember that once you return to reality-"

"Yeah, cables, I know. Urgh." He winced and nearly doubled over from another wave of nausea. "So how-"

Flash!

Flash!

"- long... man, she works fast," Sorun mumbled to himself as he took a look at the new surroundings. Metal walls and floor, miscellaneous pieces of science equipment scattered haphazardly all over the place, computer with a bunch of monitors in the back... it was reality, all right. Freedom HQ's lab, just as messy as they'd left it. And as a bonus he didn't even feel that nauseous anymore.

The teen tilted his head down to breath out in relief, but froze midway and made a displeased expression when he saw the coat his virtual self had worn had reverted back into the sleeveless hoodie Honey had made for him. He'd really liked that coat. It had been just like Vergil's- the cables.

"Son of a- head, right," Sorun quickly grumbled as he whirled around towards the table near the computer, and saw the severed head and the wires connecting it to the computer. He ran over to it immediately, bundled all of the cables in his fist, and violently tore them all out from the head. He slowly breathed out, and then dropped the cables onto the ground.

"I realize the urgency of the situation... but we still use those cables, you know." Sorun turned around just in time to see Nicole body finish constructing itself right behind him. She was looking down at the discarded cables, an admonishing yet teasing smile on her face. "I would have to ask you to please be more gentle with them the next time around."

"I'll be sure to work on that." The teen turned back towards the head. "So are we good? Because the head's flashing."

He wasn't sure the fact that the red irises in its black eyes were flashing was a good sign that the crisis was over. He half expected something absurd like lasers to shoot out of the eyes at Sorun, but when he saw Nicole move next to him to bend down to examine the head he felt a bit at ease. It had to be fine if she wasn't worried, after all.

"It's still receiving power from the backup unit implanted in it, but for what function, I do not know," Nicole admitted as her eyes looked over the head. "I did take note of what seemed to be a broadcast signal being emitted from somewhere within its internals shortly before you disconnected the head."

"A broadcast signal?" Sorun quietly repeated as he leaned down alongside Nicole to scrutinize the head. The flashing of its eyes drew Sorun's attention the most, and when he leaned in closer he saw that those red eyes weren't eyes at all. They were red, flashing words in place of where the irises should have been.

Words that read out "Recovery Mode".

"'Recovery Mode'...?" The teen turned his head to Nicole, who looked just as confused as he was. "What does-?"

Crash!

The sound of a door being flung from its hinges caused the pair to shoot straight up. Separate sets of black hair flying wildly, they both whipped their heads back towards the lab's door, which was now currently lying on the ground after having been pushed off its frame from the figure on the other side. The completely metallic, headless figure that had a turbine on its back firing up.

Without even thinking, A blue, spectral hand appeared over Sorun's shoulder before it reached out and pushed Nicole to the ground. He dived down right after her just as the headless Metal Sonic swooped in over their fallen bodies. Once reaching the table, its metallic claws fumbled forwards before the pointed digits finally landed on the head. It firmly grasped the pointed head once finding it, and then cradled said head to its chest before turning around. All Sorun and Nicole could do was watch as Metal Sonic's body sped off in a blur towards the HQ's stairs, and then it disappeared up them.

Moments passed, during which the two just stared blankly at the broken door and the quickly dissipating trail of smoke from Metal's back turbine. Eventually they both blinked in bewilderment, and Sorun made the first move by slowly getting up to his feet. He willed the summoned Bringer Claw to disappear, and then bent down to help Nicole up to her own feet.

"Well... that happened," Sorun breathed out, eyes still facing towards the opened entrance. "What in the world just happened?"

"A recovery beacon. The power unit was powering a recovery beacon inside of the head." The voice that reached Sorun's ears sounded unusually blank for Nicole, causing him to turn towards her. Her face was unusually still given what they had just endured, but there was no mistaking that defeated look he saw settle within her eyes. "It must have been a final failsafe Dr. Eggman installed in the event somebody tried to recover sensitive information inside its memory banks and managed to circumvent its security measures. That was what I detected before we left. A recovery beacon that would activate the reactor inside of its main body and allow it to automatically recover the head. It's probably making its way back to where its programming has dedicated a home base for repairs. Likely New Megaopolis." Her shoulders slumped. "To think he would account for something so specific and plan around us trying to access its head alone... to think he'd install a beacon with a strong enough signal to reach all the way to Knothole..."

Sorun clicked his tongue in understanding and disappointment. "So it's gone?"

"Yes, Sorun. It's gone."

The teen slowly nodded, and then turned his head to face Nicole. "You think Sally's gonna be mad that we lost it?" When Nicole elected to remain silent, Sorun grit his teeth from the awkward air hanging over them and tried to lightly shake her shoulder to rouse some life into the lynx. "Hey, we still got those files, right? The whole reason we even went in there?" he tried in an encouraging voice. "Yeah, we lost the body, but the files were important thing, right?"

"... I suppose so, yes." Nicole's head picked up, her mouth turning up into a half-smile as she placed her hand over the pale one on her shoulder. "I am thankful you pushed me out of the way. I would have been fine regardless, but... it still hurts when this body receives damage."

"Sure, don't worry about it." Quickly, Sorun pulled his hand back and began walking towards the broken entrance. "Why don't you get to work on those files? I'm gonna go survey the damage."

The lynx gave him a small nod, prompting Sorun to exhale in relief and turn towards the doorway- relief for some time to think to himself and relief he'd gotten Nicole to do something to maybe help cheer her up.

"Man, what a day," he thought as he stepped around the fallen door. "Mm, doesn't look that busted. Tails or Rotor can prolly fix it. Geez, how much stuff did it barrel through on its way here?"

He stepped into the HQ's living room, slowly swiveling his head from left to right to survey the damage. Everything looked fine for the most part. The couch was overturned, likely due to the headless Badnik having blindly rushed right towards the head being held in the lab, but otherwise he didn't see any damage.

"Oh, please don't tell me it broke the console... whew." Thankfully, when Sorun turned the couch right-side up with his Bringer Claws, he saw that the game console was untouched. "Thank goodness the couch didn't fall on it. That woulda been a disaster."

The teen stepped further towards the back of the HQ, near where the stairs were. A short trip up them and he made it all the way to the HQ's entrance, where the door was hanging off by a single hinge. He sighed at the sight.

"Geez, so what, that beacon in its head activated and its body picked the signal up and beelined it all the way here? Thought they were keeping its body in Sonic's uncle's workshop? But that thing is as fast as him, so... yeah, guess that wouldn't really matter then, huh?"

Well, other than some doors, it seemed like nothing important had been broken. All in all, he'd take a couple of broken doors over something much worse happening, and Sorun was more than willing to just leave it at that. And so, with his miniature inspection done, the teen began to slowly trek back towards the lab. He was starting to grow an urge to check on Nicole that he wanted to satisfy, and he was partly interested in seeing what was on those files he'd almost died over.

"Well, could have been worse," he silently reasoned with himself as he reached the bottom of the stairs and began walking back to the lab. "Sally's probably gonna be pissed at us for going behind her back like this and losing the robot. Maybe I can shift most of the blame onto me so Nicole doesn't feel too down about it. Lie and say it was my idea." He considered the idea for a second, and then shook his head. "Nah, that'd never work. She wouldn't buy it and I don't think Nicole would wanna lie to her. Eh... I guess I'm not too worried about it. It'll be fine."

Besides, from what he'd noticed Sally and Nicole were the best of friends. Had to be since Sally was the one carrying Nicole around all the time. There wasn't any way that she'd stay mad at Nicole for an unreasonable amount of time if she just explained. She'd be fine. Sorun wouldn't. He didn't wanna imagine how much he was gonna get yelled at by her, but if worse came to worse he'd just tune Sally out and ignore it while blindly nodding along.

Yeah, solid plan. Worked all the time with his own mother. And as long as most of the anger was directed at him and not Nicole he was fine with whatever happened. Didn't matter what happened to him since he was eventually leaving anyways.

"Hey, hey." Finally reaching the lab's entrance, Sorun leaned against the opened entrance and knocked on its side. "Good news, nothing but the doors got broke. How's the, uh... you doin' alright over there?"

Nicole had seated herself in a chair in front of the computer, likely working on those files she extracted. Though now she was just slumping forwards, elbows planted on the computer's keyboard with her face resting in her hands. The rather sullen atmosphere she was emitting caused Sorun, who blinked in puzzlement at the sight, to then begin approaching her.

"Uh, Nicole?" Sorun stopped right behind her, and then gently shook her shoulder. She didn't budge and kept her face pressed into her palms. "You doing okay? Something wrong with the files?"

"Look for yourself," came Nicole's muffled voice.

Seeing no reason not to, Sorun did so and leaned in towards the computer's main monitor. He really wished he hadn't.

The file that was pulled up on the monitor, quite bizarrely, was one of Eggman. And that was it. Just a picture of Eggman in some large, metal room smiling victoriously at the camera while pointing at it, almost as if he was laughing hysterically at whoever was on the other side of the screen.

He couldn't recall the last time he wanted to punch a computer monitor so badly.

"This is what the encrypted files encompassed." Nicole's hands slid down from her face, eyes glumly looking forwards at the computer monitor and the round man on the other side that seemed to be laughing at her. "It was nothing but approximately five-thousand, four-hundred and thirty-seven gigabytes of self portraits of Dr. Eggman."

"... What...?" Sorun blinked several times in disbelief. "B-but... that's like five terabytes... you're seriously telling me he took five terabytes worth of selfies?" He couldn't even comprehend such an absurd number; his mind was having a hard time trying to calculate how many selfies five terabytes implied. "Jesus, these pics must have the highest quality in the world if they take up that much storage. Where does he find the time to... how many... how is that even...!?" He trailed off when he turned to Nicole for an explanation, his disbelief withering to quiet worry when he saw just how glum she looked. "Uh... Nicole...?"

"Metal Sonic's true memory files were layered under these encrypted... fakes," Nicole tonelessly mumbled, eyes turned downwards and away from the monitor. "I'd noticed there was a sub-layer of files hidden under the direct ones, but by the time I'd noticed the security system was active and those programs were breaking past my partition and... I was too worried for your safety, so I copied whatever I found first so we could leave as soon as possible." Her head lowered far enough that it almost touched the keyboard. "These were little more than dummy files used to obscure the true data. Dr. Eggman didn't even just fill it with nonsense junk data. He just used these pictures of himself laughing to mock whoever wasted their time collecting these files."

There was only one word Sorun's mind could come up with to accurately portray the general mood: bummer. He didn't dare say it aloud, though, for fear of what reaction Nicole would have over it. But it well and truly was a bummer. A bummer that Sorun had almost died for a bunch of worthless selfies of Eggman. Bummer this whole unofficial mission they'd gone on had been a huge waste of time and a robot.

The one who looked the most bummed out was Nicole, though. He didn't think he'd ever seen anybody sulk as hard as Nicole was right now. He didn't have to think hard to see why- Eggman's borderline obsessive amount of precautionary coding tricked her. Pure and simple, they'd both lost and had nothing to show for it. And Sorun didn't really know what was bugging her more: that they'd both been put in danger over nothing, or that she'd allowed them to be put in danger to begin with. Sorun didn't even blame her, but he wasn't gonna pretend to know what was going on in her mind.

"... At least it was just a recovery beacon and not a self-destruct bomb, right?" He'd greatly hoped that silver lining, possibly the thinnest one possible in all of existence, would brighten her mood at least a little. It didn't. Nicole had lifted her head up a bit and turned to address Sorun, but that same defeated look was still on her face. "Er... you doing alright?" he quietly asked.

"... It is difficult to classify the emotions I am feeling right now," she slowly admitted. "I believe this is... frustration? Or anger? Properly conveying what it is I am feeling is proving to be difficult as I cannot figure out what it is I am experiencing."

"We call that feeling really bad," Sorun told her. "Which is, you know... justifiable. Since all of that just happened. It could have been worse, though. We're still alive at least."

That didn't improve Nicole's mood in the slightest. Her face didn't even twitch. "Our lives were put in peril for nothing but a joke. You were put in peril because you decided to come with me to help. And because I was fooled by all those elaborate tricks-"

"Nicole, listen, I ain't got another speech in me," Sorun interrupted, "but just listen. We're fine . Okay? We worked together and we got through it." By some miracle, and admittedly she had done most of the heavy lifting since all he'd done was punch a building and make a wall of swords, but this was left unsaid by Sorun. "We failed, yeah, but failure isn't the same as losing. Failing is just falling down, learning from the experience, and getting back up so that it doesn't happen again. Some old guy with a big hat or something probably said that back where I'm from, I dunno, but-"

"I know. People... make mistakes, no matter how hard we try to avoid them. And we're people. It's just another part of life. That's what you said, right?" Nicole's head and ears perked up just a slight amount, and a soft smile formed on her face. "I am still upset, but... this helps. I appreciate you sticking with me through this."

If it wouldn't have been overly embarrassing to do so, Sorun would have sighed so hard he'd double over from the pressure of a sad Nicole being lifted of his shoulders. He had standards, though, so he remained completely rigid while staring the lynx in the eyes. He couldn't hold back the small grin that made its way onto his face, though, much to his consternation.

"Alright. Glad to hear you're alright." Sorun turned towards the broken-down door to the lab, and rather sheepishly began rubbing the back of his head. "Seriously though, how mad is Sally gonna be? Just so I can mentally prepare myself for what's to come."

"Hard to say. I doubt she will have many pleasant things to say," Nicole informed him. "But seeing as we both managed to survive unscathed, I do not think she will be overly furious at us. And I may know what to say to her to get her to calm down so she isn't too harsh on us."

Sorun turned his head back to Nicole in surprise. She was wearing a grin to match his own now, with his own slowly stretching wider at the AI's words. "Well, hey. That works for me," he said. "So now that the crisis is over and there's nothing else to do- get this off the screen, it's creepin' me out." He reached down to the computer's mouse and clicked the selfie of Eggman away so that the monitor was blank. "Now that we got nothing else to do... wanna play some video games?"

The grin that had worked itself onto Nicole's face turned into a bemused smile. "Is that really the only thing on your mind after everything we've endured?"

"You know it." He began nudging her shoulder. "Hey. Hey, come on. I wanna play video games with you. Come on. We both need the break." It was more for her sake than his just so he could try taking her mind off of this catastrophe, but he'd be lying if he said he didn't want to unwind with video games after this experience as well. And the console was literally in the next room.

"Sorun, I don't-" Nicole's body flickered. "I don't have enough power to sustain this form for much longer."

"Nah, it's fine it's fine it's fine. I know Rotor keeps a stash of Power Rings around here somewhere for his experiments." Sorun stepped away from the computer and began walking towards one of the shelves hanging off the lab's ceiling. "That guy ain't slick, I know where he keeps them. I'll just borrow one. Or two. Some, I'll borrow some." Whether he would replace them later on depended if he remembered to bother doing so. Chances were he wouldn't.

Nicole continued to watch Sorun rifle through the shelves for a minute. She looked down briefly, pensive look on her face, and soon after looked back towards Sorun as he felt his hand around inside of a shelf. "Sorun?"

"Yeah?" he acknowledged as he began pulling something from the shelf.

"Thank you for today," he heard her say. "For helping get us through that situation. For teaching me a bit about what it means to be alive. I've learned a lot today thanks to everything you said." The teen briefly flicked his eyes over to the lynx, his stare becoming blank when he saw the smile she was giving him. "I just wanted you to know how grateful I am for everything you do for me. It feels nice to have a friend like you."

"... Mh-hm, sure." With a tired sigh, Sorun finally pulled a handful of golden rings out from the cabinet, and with a forced smile he held them up to Nicole. "So what game are we playing?"

"I just had a very interesting chat with Nicole." With an aggravated sigh, Sally began rubbing the sides of her head with her hands while the human in front of her leaned back onto the couch behind him. "Let me just get this straight. You both, without my permission, attempted to hack into Metal Sonic, one of Eggman's most dangerous and versatile Badniks, almost get killed when its security protocols activate, and in the process you both somehow managed to activate some kind of distress signal that put its body on autopilot so it could escape with its head. So in addition to you both recklessly putting your lives in danger you lost an important asset. And if I'm hearing Nicole right, you accomplished all of this... with nothing to show for it."

Yeah, she was mad. The kind of mad where it wasn't showing on her face, but the scalding anger could still be heard in her voice. Nicole had done Sorun the favor of taking Sally aside to talk with her once she'd entered the HQ at the end of the day from the mission she'd went on with the others, and based on the look on her face when she'd come back from the lab, she wasn't pleased in the slightest.

Well, it was to be expected, so Sorun had paused the game he and Nicole had been playing and chose to stand up and lean on the couch while bracing for the inevitable verbal lashing. His nerves had calmed down enough by now that he could take it, but even relaxing to hours of playing games with Nicole wasn't making this any easier.

And while Sorun couldn't blame her at all, he felt the need to correct her on one detail.

"No, it wasn't for nothing," he corrected her. "We got a lifetime supply of Eggman selfies out of it."

If looks could kill, the glare she sent him probably would have disintegrated him on the spot. Fortunately the only thing Sorun felt burning was his mental fortitude under her gaze, causing him to nervously laugh a bit.

"Just, uh... trying to inject some humor into the issue..." he muttered, though this only caused Sally's glare to intensify. Sorun sighed as a result, and then hung his shoulders while giving the chipmunk a serious look. "Okay, fine. Yeah, we screwed up big time. And lost the robot. And all that other stuff you said." His eyes drifted to the side to avoid eye contact with the princess. "Some other stuff happened too, but yeah, that's the gist of it. So, uh... yeah. Sorry. Won't happen again."

Maybe she deserved much more than the half-assed apology he'd just served her, but Sorun just didn't have the mental energy needed to think up anything better than that. It seemed Sally noticed the mental fatigue, too, as her stern features softened and, with a groan, she began rubbing the space between her eyes.

"I talked it over with Nicole. I'm not happy with what you two did, but... I'm glad you both are alright," she finally admitted. "And while it's admirable that you both tried to take a bit of initiative for the cause, just please, please do me the favor of asking me next time you decide to pull a stunt like this. Okay?"

"That's more than fair," Sorun readily agreed with a nod of his head. "So am I free to go, or-"

"Not at all, mister," she denied with a shake of her head. "You're helping Rotor fix all the doors Metal Sonic broke down tomorrow."

He saw that coming a mile away. "I will," he promised her. She seemed satisfied at that, and then turned around towards the exit stair to the HQ. "Hey, Sally. Wait up a moment," he called. She stopped mid-step, and turned her head to address Sorun. "Getting the meds to the rest of those settlements. It went okay, right?" he asked her.

Sally blinked at the question, though Sorun felt he already got his answer when her eyes turned downcast. "We salvaged what we could, but... I'm not sure what we managed to get out there will be enough for them all," she answered honestly.

"... I see. Okay." It wasn't the answer he'd wanted, but he'd expected it nonetheless. It didn't make him feel any better.

"Hey, it'll be alright, Sorun. It always get worse before it gets better." Sally turned around and continued walking towards the exit. "I just hope it starts getting better sooner rather than later..."

"... Right," Sorun muttered in response. He sighed out once she left his sight, after which he turned his eyes towards the opened lab. He saw Nicole standing there in the lab, smiling sheepishly at him while giving him an encouraging thumbs-up. Instead of giving a similar gesture, Sorun reached behind him on the couch cushion and held up the corded controller, waving it up in the air.

She got the message easily enough, and began walking out of the lab and towards the couch. "I told you that she wouldn't be as bad as you were thinking," she told him after stopping right in front of him. "Though I did have to talk her down a bit before she came to you. You're welcome."

Rolling his eyes, Sorun turned around and practically collapsed into a sitting position on the couch. "Yeah, yeah. Thank you, Nicole. You're a genius. You see fit to remind me every five minutes."

"I wouldn't go that far." Settling on the spot next to Sorun, Nicole picked up her own controller before facing the screen. "Are you ready to continue?"

"Sure am," Sorun confirmed as he unpaused the game. "So as I was saying, hyper armor is super important. I know it doesn't look smart at first to be eating hits while the character's attack animation winds up, but the hyper armor means they won't get knocked out of the move and the damage trade-off is more than worth it. You gotta watch out for command grabs, though, they'll get through that armor like no tomorrow. So essentially it's a real high risk, high reward play, but you can mitigate that risk by abusing hyper armor in the middle of the opponent's combo like so..."

They'd spent nearly the rest of the night playing video games after that point. Sorun was fairly sure he could see the sun peaking up over the horizon by the time he made it back to Sonic's home.

More than worth it.

Chapter 20

Recursion Error

Episode 20- Strike three

One month.

As of today, that was the amount of time Sorun had spent on Mobius. One whole month exactly. He remembered a time all the way back at the beginning of this mess when he'd hoped that this whole twisted adventure of his would only take a month, two tops. But, as things were, it didn't even look close to being finished. One whole month here and what did he have to show for it in terms of finding a way back? Two out of seven magical jewels of infinite power needed to go home, which was awful enough seeing as it wasn't even close to half, but it was even worse since he hadn't found a way to actually extract them. If anything he'd made negative progress in all this time.

It didn't help that he actually was counting the days, and when he woke up on day thirty and realized it had been a whole month he'd been sent into a depressive mood. He hadn't even felt like having breakfast that morning. He didn't feel like going all the way to Freedom HQ to do whatever there was to do there. He didn't feel like talking with anybody, he didn't feel like doing a mission, he didn't feel like training, and he plain just didn't feel like doing anything.

So he took a walk.

After a whole month, he finally decided to just walk around Knothole. Not to duck around the corners of houses to avoid people or try to skirt around the edges of the city proper. Just... walk the streets and get some thinking done. And he'd made that promise to Bunnie anyways to eventually maybe try spreading out a bit, so as he saw it this was just killing two birds with one stone.

And as it turned out, Bunnie had been right. He didn't get so much as a single off, sideways glance from any of the random Mobians he passed. He did get some hellos and waves here and there from some of the citizens with some polite smiles mixed in, but for the most part he was pretty much just ignored. Not for being human, but for being just another random bystander walking around minding his own business. And if it was any other time Sorun actually would have felt relieved over it, but today was the one month anniversary of his life taking a turn for the worst, so he couldn't be bothered to notice.

"Maybe I should just start planning to run away now. Should I?" Eventually in his aimless wanderings Sorun had happened upon a bench near a crossing intersection, so he'd elected to just sit down and watch the bustling citizens of Knothole move on with their days as he thought. "It's been a whole month and I'm no closer to getting home than I was on day one. Jeez, I'm more closer to dying than going home because of these Emeralds. But I still need them, don't I? Do I?" He leaned forwards on the bench and looked down at the ground. "I don't even know anymore. I just... fuck am I supposed to do? It seems like no matter what I do, eventually I'll wind down into the grave if I stay on Mobius. If these friggin' Chaos Emeralds don't kill me it's gonna be one of Eggman's robots. Unless that fat bastard decides to go ahead and hit the 'carpet bomb Knothole' button sitting next to him, 'cause that's still hanging over my head. But my one ticket home are the Emeralds, and for all I know I already fucked myself over on that front by absorbing two." He lifted his head up to look at the morning sky. "I just wanna go home..."

But oh, he just didn't know if he was gonna make it home. He didn't know if there was a way, and if there was he didn't know if he was going to live long enough to get there. And he was just so tired of it all. All the nonsensical events and adventures that kept flinging themselves at Sorun. The training, the fighting, risking his life. Waking up in fear every morning that he was gonna get blown up because a fleet of ships dropped an arsenal's worth of bombs on Knothole. He legitimately didn't know how much more of this he could take.

"Ugh... my life sucks. Everything sucks." He heard footsteps crunch on the ground nearby to him, and out of the corner of his eyes he could see the shape of somebody stop right next to the bench. Sorun debated just ignoring them so he could continue wallowing in self pity, but after around thirty seconds of this heated internal debate the figure had yet to move. So Sorun let out a small exhale and turned his head towards them.

"Oh, awesome. It's this guy." The curious figure in question was Tails. It was easy enough to tell him apart- the two tails slowly swishing behind him was a dead giveaway. Why he was standing next to the bench Sorun was sitting at and staring at him, though, the human had no idea. Nor did he particularly feel compelled to ask. But he would, if only because there was a small chance it would lead into Tails going away and leaving him alone. Because as it was, he just didn't feel like spending any time with the person responsible for dragging him into this world on the worst anniversary of his life. If it were any day, he'd gladly do so. Tails was more than a nice enough person who could hold an interesting conversation. But not today.

"What do you want, Tails?" Sorun grumbled, slinging one of his legs over the other as he gave the fox a flat look.

The harsh tone in his voice had caused Tails's tails to freeze in surprise, though he quickly regained his composure and cleared his throat before speaking. "Oh, I was just... walking around and saw you kind of just sitting here so I... came over to see how you were doing..." He shrank backwards when Sorun continued to give him an unflinching glare with his eyes. "Are you doing okay, Sorun?"

"I'm never doing okay, Tails." Sighing, the human teen shifted his gaze from the fox to the sky. "Any idea what day it is today?"

"Er... Saturday?"

The answer elicited a single, short laugh out of Sorun. "Sure, man. Saturday." He wasn't going to tell Tails why today of all days was dragging him so far down, of course. That was the gateway to all sorts of uncomfortable conversations about his feelings that he really wasn't in the mood for. "I was just doing some thinking is all." He focused back on Tails. "So if that's all-"

"Actually, Sorun, there was one more thing," Tails said before Sorun could finish. "I was gonna wait until later, but you're already here, so..." He suddenly grew uncomfortable, looked around, and then looked back to Sorun. "Actually, do you wanna head back to the HQ with me?" he asked him. "This... might be better said over there."

Sorun rose an eyebrow. "Or you could just say it now. Since we're already here. Talking."

Growl...!

That had been Sorun's stomach. Loud enough for both of them to hear, causing them both to look towards the human's abdomen. Afterwards Tails rose a questioning eye up to Sorun, who shrugged. "Skipped breakfast," he explained.

Tails groaned. "Sorun, you can't just go and skip breakfast like that. It's the most important meal of the day."

"You know, I have yet to see any definitive proof towards that being an accurate statement." He crossed his arms in a huff. "I don't feel like eating, anyways."

"Are you sure?" Tails asked him. "I remember seeing some cereal over in the HQ's kitchen."

"... Damn you, Tails." It'd be just like him to exploit one of his many weaknesses: some good cereal. He knew what box Tails was referring to, as well, and Sorun actually rather liked that brand. Ring-O's, he believed they were called. They were pretty much a one-to-one recreation of Cheerios, more evidence to Sorun's theory that a lot of the food brands of this world had their formulas pilfered from surviving recipes of the old world's foods, but he couldn't care less as long as it tasted good. And now that Tails mentioned it, he could go for some cereal.

Well, he might as well. Especially since Tails had something important to say. Being all depressed on a bench was getting boring, anyways.

"Sure, fine. Let's go." In a flash of blue Sorun's Bringer Claws appeared. "We're flying back, though. I don't feel like walking all the way."

In response, the two tails behind the fox began to rotate. Even as his body began to be lifted off the ground from the spinning tails, the fox was giving Sorun an inquisitive look. "You finally got the hang of flying with those things?" he asked him.

Sorun looked to the side at his right Bringer Claw, and then shrugged. "Been practicing," he said. "I'm decent enough with them now." The feathered, spectral arms began to slowly extend outwards. "C'mon. Let's go already."

It was always such a satisfying sound, pouring cereal into a bowl. Sorun had no idea what about that sound was so appealing. That continuous stream of soft plinks and plonks as all the circular pieces of whatever Ring-O's were made of landed in the bowl. Whole grain and sugar or something, Sorun had glazed over the nutritional information when he skimmed everything on the box. The only thing he cared about was that it tasted good and filled him up.

That was true for any food that he ate, now that he thought about it.

After placing the box back into the cabinet and closing it, Sorun turned to the HQ kitchen's table, where he saw Tails patiently waiting for him. The teen pulled up a chair, and promptly sat down while placing the filled bowl and a spoon in front of him.

"You're not gonna put milk in it?" Tails idly asked from across the table.

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, I don't do milk with cereal. The sogginess kills that crunch I really like. Also I don't like milk." He scooped up a spoonful of dry cereal. "So what's the dealio, Tails my dude? What's so urgent that you dragged me all the way here?"

"Well," Tails began as Sorun crunched down on his cereal, "it's about... it's about the Chaos Emeralds you've been taking into your body."

The crunching ceased almost immediately as Sorun affixed Tails with a stare. The young fox fidgeted nervously under the glare, looking down towards the table as his gloved fingers nervously tapped on the table's surface.

He should have figured it was something like this. Tails was a busy guy as of late. Always kept busy with maintenance stuff or doing missions or something productive. Sorun rarely ever had any training sessions with him due to the human having all but given up on piloting and never showing much an interest in the mechanical side of things. Tails just hadn't had that much to show Sorun in those cases compared to what everybody else offered. So other than a few passing conversations here and there whenever the pair happened to run into each other, they'd never had much reason to meet up like this.

Except if it involved Chaos Emeralds. Sorun had been made known that Tails was pursuing some research into the gems already transmuted inside of his body, and with no other alternatives in sight, Sorun had mainly just been waiting on any results Tails would turn up. But the way the young Mobian was acting was making Sorun almost as nervous as he was. The way he was rapidly breathing and actively trying to avoid meeting Sorun's eyes.

Absolutely none of these were positive signs.

"It's not good news, is it, Tails?" The spoon had been dropped into the bowl of cereal, which was practically forgotten by now as Sorun pushed the bowl aside. "Just give it to me straight, man," he softly requested.

Tails nodded, and then took a deep breath before explaining. "I ran every single possible test I could, Sorun. Rotor helped me out with some of the tests and Nicole even crunched some of the numbers for me, but Chaos energy is... it's always been unpredictable. But after the results I got from some of my final experiments last night... well, I'm gonna have to call it at some point, Sorun." Slowly, the fox began to shake his head. "I'm... I'm really sorry, Sorun. They can't come out. There's just no way."

"... Oh." He felt something just give out inside of him, and the human's form went slack in his chair. "... You don't know that for certain."

Tails winced, as if he'd been expecting that reaction but also had been dreading it. "Sorun, I am sure. Those Emeralds are completely fused to your body's systems, and they can't be extracted since they're existing in an immaterial energy state while fused to you."

"I don't want to accept that." Sorun had to lean forwards on the table just to keep himself steady. "This is the same world that has things like digitizers and robots and people with powers that defy physics. You can't tell me that all that exists but there isn't a way to remove the Emeralds."

"Sorun, I really don't know. Maybe there is, but I just... if there is, I don't know. And I really doubt it."

The teen looked at Tails again, and the fox began actively fidgeting in his seat under that gaze. It was more than just those sunken, dark blue eyes staring into Tails' eyes. There was the deep frown set on his face, and the way his form was slumped over. He looked positively miserable. Miserable to the point that Tails almost felt all the negativity radiating off the human, and, growing worried, began reaching a hand out to him.

"Sorun? S-Sorun, I know this sounds bad, but-"

"Quit talking." From the corner of his eyes he saw blue light flash on his right side, and Tails had sat right back down in his seat as a result. Sorun had barely even registered any of this, though, as Tails' words were sinking so far into his head that he couldn't recognize much of anything at the moment.

He didn't want to believe it. Not a single word. Not from him, not from those sky echidna, not from anybody. Going home was the goal. Had been from word go. The only reason he even went along with being a Freedom Fighter and risking his life for everybody was just to secure a way home. He didn't have a reason to fight outside of that, and he absolutely refused to acknowledge the fact that going home was impossible.

But then there was that small part of his brain trying to tell him the reality of the situation. The logical part of his brain that kept reminding him of all the evidence that said going back was impossible. The part he'd been shutting out ever since that night with the first Chaos Emerald. The voice that was practically screaming at him right now to listen to what Tails was trying to say to him.

And Tails.

Tails. Tails, who'd built that machine. Tails, who'd dragged him here. Tails, who was telling him he couldn't go back. Every single thing that had gone wrong and Tails was all a part of it, and the more he thought on it the more furious he grew at the fox, and...!

And... that fox was currently pressing his body into his chair, practically shaking as he stared wide-eyed at Sorun's right shoulder. The confusion briefly reprieved the teen from his roiling outrage, and slowly he turned his head towards the shoulder. He saw immediately why Tails looked so frightened- his right Bringer Claw had manifested. It wasn't resting on Sorun's shoulder, either. The feathered arm was hovering at his side, the clawed, spectral hand practically shaking in a way that matched the silent rage coursing through Sorun. He couldn't help but note the way the claws were pointed in Tails' direction.

Sorun stared at the arm for the longest moment, and then forced himself to take a calming breath. The arm slowly dissipated in a shower of blue particles, and once it was gone he turned back to Tails, who was already beginning to calm down. But seeing Tails act like a scared child for a moment had reminded Sorun just who he was: a child.

A child genius fighting in a hopeless war he had no place in.

A child who just wanted all the fighting to end so he and his friends and family could just live in peace and have a future.

A child who was so understandably desperate he'd listened to a prophecy inscribed on a wooden tablet along with everybody else in the hope that it would lead to something that could help because nothing else was working .

A child who was fully aware of what'd he'd done to Sorun, and was trying his best to make it up to him and apologize. Who'd brought him orange juice that one time and kept Sorun company. Who talked with him and tried helping him like everybody else, because he along with the rest of the Freedom Fighters knew Sorun's situation was unfair and wrong. The same child who was aware of the mistake he'd made and was trying his best to fix it.

He'd almost clawed that child.

"... I'm sorry about that," Sorun apologized, regret filling him. "It... slipped."

Tails' body relaxed, and he released a light breath as he leaned a bit forwards into the table. "I-I didn't mean to make you so mad... Sorun, I'm sorry, I just-"

He was interrupted by the short, humorless laugh that left Sorun. Here he was, almost ready to claw the fox apart with his powers. And he was the one saying he was sorry. Because Tails probably knew just how much Sorun was struggling with this.

Tails really was too nice. Mobians were too nice. Sorun didn't feel like he deserved an apology after what he'd almost done.

"I thought I already told you I didn't like people using 'sorry' so carelessly," he muttered, the smallest smirk on Sorun's face. "And I already told you I forgive you. You... did nothing wrong. And I... appreciate... that you went through so much trouble with all the research you did. Thank you, Tails." The smirk fell, and Sorun looked to the side. "But I just don't want to accept there's no way back home."

"... Yeah." Tails sat back in his seat, looking down as his ears drooped down. "I understand. I don't think I blame you."

At least they'd reached that much of an understanding. That was the air between him and Tails cleared up, at the very least. But everything going on inside of Sorun's mind was a different story. That inner turmoil that was one half in heavy denial over everything Tails had said and one half trying to accept it.

A knock roused both the human and Mobian from their thoughts, and they looked towards the kitchen entrance. Sorun instantly recognized the red form leaning against the open frame as Knuckles, who was looking between the both of them with a neutral look to his violet eyes. "Am I interrupting something?" he asked.

Both Tails and Sorun looked towards each other, the latter shaking his head as they looked back to the echidna. "No, you're not interrupting anything," Sorun quietly told the echidna. "What's up?"

Knuckles, noting how unusually quiet Sorun was, gave the human a sideways glance, but soon brushed it off as he walked into the kitchen. "I actually came in here for Tails," he explained. "The... detectors you guys set up. They picked up another Chaos Emerald signature, and I'm the only one available to go get it. I was just hoping you could fly me there in the plane, Tails."

Sorun's spine went rigid at that. Another Emerald. More potential power. More potential years off his life. More potential problems.

"Actually," Knuckles continued, "are you busy doing anything, Sorun? I could use the help if you're willing."

The pale teen sighed out a large breath through clenched teeth, hanging his head low enough so that his locks of straight, black hair obscured a majority of his face. "Must we?" he asked Knuckles. "Is getting another Chaos Emerald really that important?"

"Er... yeah? It's a Chaos Emerald. Of course it's important." Knuckles leaned in closer to Sorun. "You doin' okay? You're looking kind of down."

"Just fine. Don't worry." Sorun picked himself up, and then brushed the excess hair out from his pale face as he fixed his eyes onto Knuckles. "On second thought... seeing as you're going after it anyways, I may as well tag along. More the merrier, right?"

And it would take his mind off of literally everything that had happened since entering this kitchen today. Off of today in general and the anniversary of his abduction. If ever he needed a distraction, it was now. Even if this distraction was going to end today with a Chaos Emerald. And he could already see problems arising from that.

He'd just deal with it later.

Knuckles grinned, showing off his pointed teeth. "Yeah, that's the spirit!" He turned to Tails, who was still looking towards Sorun with a worried expression. "Well, Tails? You're in, right?"

"Huh? Oh, yeah!" The fox turned towards Knuckles and gave him an enthusiastic nod. "Yeah, of course! I'll go warm up the plane right now!"

"Alright! Sounds like a plan!"

Sorun watched the interaction between the two in mild amusement, and then rose up out of his chair. "I'll go with you, Tails," he said as he pushed the chair in. "I don't have anywhere else to go right now."

"Uh, sure. Okay." Tails pointed towards the bowl of cereal still on the table. "Don't you at least want to finish your breakfast, though?"

Blue eyes flicked over in the direction of the bowl. Sorun's expression twitched into a grimace for a single moment, and then he turned back to Tails. "It's alright," he said. "I lost my appetite."

The plane ride? More awkward than it needed to be. At least that's how it was for Sorun. Tails was giving off the impression that he'd already put the earlier incident behind him and was acting more like his positive self. Sorun was glad for that much, at least. That his misery wasn't bringing somebody else down into this depression along with him.

Sorun himself managed to take his mind off of things on the plane ride over, getting lost in looking down at the passing landscape while they had been flying high in the sky. The issues of going home to Earth were still nibbling at the back of his mind, but for now distracting himself was working. It was a brief reprieve that felt like a breath of fresh air.

If Knuckles had noticed anything amidst, which Sorun was certain he had, he wasn't saying anything about it. He was somewhat grateful for that. The less they delved on sensitive subjects like that, the better.

The trio had to reach their destination eventually, though, as shown when Tails had landed the plane in a small clearing of trees. Sorun didn't know exactly where they were going- he'd been too preoccupied with his own thoughts to bother to ask Knuckles, who had been directing Tails as he piloted the plane-, but he had a pretty solid idea it had something to do with the small mountain Tails had parked the plane near. The mountain the three were currently walking towards.

A short two-minute walk later, and the three had pushed their way past some forest brush into another clearing, this one pressed right up against the side of the mountain. Sorun knew something was off immediately when he saw vehicles parked all around the clearing. Red and black machines with Eggman's logo pasted on all of them. Large transport ships and other, wheeled vehicles with attachments such as giant drills and shovel-like claws. And conveniently enough, they were all parked next to a cave opening on the side of the mountain.

"Let me take a wild guess," Sorun began as he eyed the dark opening of the cave. "The Chaos Emerald is somewhere inside of that mountain."

"Yeah. The signal was strong enough that we got a general location, but it was too faint to pick up anything exact. Rotor told me that likely meant the Chaos Emerald was deep in the ground somewhere." Knuckles gestured towards the mountain. "Or in this case a mountain, I guess. But it looks like Eggman beat us to it. He's already got robots here trying to dig it out."

"Feels like he always knows where these things are right before we do," Sorun commented as he began scratching the back of his neck. "Don't you guys think that's kinda weird?"

Tails shrugged. "Not really. He probably has sensors of his own placed everywhere that detect Chaos energy signatures, and they're probably loads more advanced than the ones we have placed. If anything, we're lucky to be finding them as fast as we are."

"Mm, guess that makes sense," Sorun conceded. "So what's the plan? Go in the cave, bust the robots, take the Emerald? Seems kinda simple."

"That's 'cause it is simple. They don't know we're here, and we're more than enough for a bunch or robots. It should be fine." The echidna turned towards Tails. "But uh, hey, just in case you think you could stay by the plane, Tails? You know, keep guard and warm it up in case something happens?"

The fox gave him a simple nod, and then proceeded to spin his tails up and fly back towards the plane. The remaining pair looked towards the other, gave each other a nod, and then turned towards the cave before proceeding to walk towards it.

Well, on the downside it seemed like there was going to be some inevitable conflict if there were already robots in that mountain digging for the Emerald. It wasn't an ideal situation in Sorun's eyes, but compared to how he was a month ago it was far from hopeless. He at least knew for a fact that his powers were effective against the weakest of Eggman's robots, so assuming that's all that was in there he wouldn't be helpless. And Knuckles was there, too, if worse came to worse. So he wasn't all that worried. He just hoped nothing horrible like a cave-in or something occurred.

"Hey, Sorun, everything okay between you and Tails?" Knuckles had suddenly asked as the pair continued walking towards the cave entrance, drawing Sorun's attention towards Knuckles. "You're just kind of acting a bit weird is all," he informed him.

"Tails gave me some bad news I'm trying to ignore," Sorun answered. "That's all. There's nothing weird going on."

"Bad news, huh? What kind of bad news?"

"I don't want to talk about it."

"Alright...?" On that note, the two had reached the mouth of the cave entrance. "Well, you ready to head in?"

Sorun squinted his eyes and peered into the cave. It didn't look natural, that much was for certain. The cave itself looked more like a tunnel that a cave, and the walls and entrance were much too smooth and circular. It was lit, too. Poorly, but there were lines of cables running on either side of the cave's wall with rows of dim lights hanging off those wires.

"I feel I should confess something to you, Knuckles," Sorun said as he turned from the cave to the echidna. "I was never much of a spelunker." He blinked. "That still a word people use? Spelunking? I don't know how many colloquialisms are still around."

"Yeah, that's still a word," Knuckles confirmed with a slow nod. "But don't worry about it. Searching underground for treasure is one of my things. Just stick close to me and you should be fine."

"Is that so?" Sorun airily replied as he watched the echidna walk into the cave. He shrugged, and followed the echidna in while staying close to his back. "So is digging around for stuff a hobby of yours or what?"

"Yeah, as a matter of fact, it is. Or was, I guess, before everything started happening." The light from the mouth of the cave soon began to fade behind the two teens as they slowly progressed further into the tunnel. "I made it a point to explore as much of Angel Island as I could as a kid. I am the Guardian of the place, after all." He paused, and his face fell slightly. "Kind of been doing a pretty poor job of it lately, though."

Sorun chose not to press the issue. He didn't know a lot about Angel Island, nor what the deal with the whole Guardian bit was. Just that it was a island that floated all around the world and that it was where a majority of the echidna lived. But for whatever reason that island was a sore topic for Knuckles, and he always strayed away from it. Sorun could be sympathetic enough to respect that, considering his own situation, so he always chose to refrain from asking questions about it.

After all, he didn't need a Knuckles with hurt feelings on the mission. So Sorun supposed he'd try changing topics a bit to take his mind off of it. Maybe go back to the treasure hunting topic from earlier.

"So were you a top-tier treasure hunter back up on that island?" Sorun asked in a bland tone, fingers interlaced behind his head as he stepped up to besides Knuckles. "Famous adventurer all the cool kids wanna grow up to be?"

That brought a small smile to Knuckles' face, followed by a chuckle as he scratched at his abashed face. "I wouldn't go that far," he said. "I just explored a bunch. Between that and solving any problems on the island, there wasn't much else to do. But everybody on the island knew me since I was the Guardian, so yeah. I guess I was pretty famous back then."

"Wow, you were a regular Indiana Jones, huh? That's, uh, a famous treasure hunter back where I'm from. Well, archaeologist, but same difference," he explained when Knuckles sent him a confused glance. Sorun chose to omit the fact he was fictional as well. "All you're missin' is that stylish brown hat and you'd have the whole look down."

"... A hat, huh?" Knuckles looked up and patted the top of his red head. "I dunno. You really think I could pull off wearing a hat?"

Sorun blinked, not having expected Knuckles to take the suggestion seriously, but then shrugged. "Um, sure, why not? It's your head, man. Wear what you want."

"You know... I just might..." Knuckles trailed off, and then began to slow down while pointing his gloved hand ahead. "Looks like we got some trouble. Check that out."

Stopping alongside him, the pale teen lowered his hands back to his sides and stared forwards. There was a circular, metal door blocking the way forwards. A door that, much to Sorun's disgust, was styled to look exactly like Eggman's head, grinning maniacally at any trespassers who would step up to the door.

"How conceited does the guy have to be to make almost everything look like his face?" Sorun grumbled under his breath as he began approaching the door. "Seriously, look at this. His stupid logo and robots wasn't enough? He's makin' doors that resemble him now, too? He's gonna carve his face into a mountain at this rate."

He would't put it past that madman, either. He'd only seen his actual face once, but even that one time was enough to cement the fact that Sorun really, really hated his face, and if he ever had the opportunity he would punch it right off his head with a Bringer Claw. And every single time he saw something that even closely related to the man's face, it set something off in Sorun. Something violent.

Kind of like the feeling of him wanting to punch the door that he was experiencing right now.

"Don't give him any ideas," Knuckles drawled out as he approached the door. "Looks like his Badniks put this here to block anybody off who wandered in from the cave entrance." He ran one of his spiked fists over the door's exterior. "I'm not seeing anything like a switch or lever, though. Not even a slot to put a key of some kind in."

Sorun hummed, and then stepped next to Knuckles once more to examine the door. Other than it being perfectly circular and shaped like Eggman, it seemed like an ordinary door. A door, however, that had no visible means of opening. In fact Sorun had almost given up entirely and called it a wall and not a door, but very faintly he could see an almost invisible seam run down the center of the circular door. So it definitely opened. It just wasn't clear how.

"Think we can just dig around it?" the human suggested. "I feel like it'd be way easier to dig through all this rock than solid metal."

Knuckled paused to contemplate the suggestion for a moment, but then shook his head. "No, I don't think that's a good idea. We're pretty deep in, and I'm worried about causing a cave-in. Plus there's no telling how much damage to the mountain's structure the Badniks have already done with their excavating. Too risky."

"Yeah, I guess you got a point," Sorun murmured in agreement. He looked to just below the center of the door, and then saw something that caused his eyes to widen. "Hey, doesn't the mouth part of his logo usually only have six teeth?"

"Yeah? Why- wait, I see what you're looking at." Both teens leaned in closer to the door, Knuckles in particular giving a small nod. "Yeah, this looks like something, alright."

Sorun had seen that logo enough times to recall every detail. He'd had so many life and death experiences involving it that it was practically burned into his memory at this point, so it was impossible not to notice a detail such as this. That logo of his, styled after his face, usually had six rectangles vertically aligned next to each other over where the mouth was, representing, the teen assumed, the man's sadistic, toothy grin. It was the kind of thing that was as cartoonish as it was nightmarish.

This door, however, had twenty rectangles all lined up next to each other. Otherwise the door was virtually identical to the logo design-wise, but those teeth were a glaring exception. Even more damning was the fact that, unlike the rest of the door, the teeth were made of some type of clear material. And Sorun felt compelled to reach out and touch one of the teeth.

His hand only made it halfway before Knuckles' hand snapped up and grabbed it.

"What're you doing?" Knuckles asked in a hushed whisper.

Sorun looked at the echidna, and then nodded his head at the door. "I was gonna touch a tooth to see what happened," he said.

"Seemed like the next step."

"You're seriously just gonna go and touch it when you don't even know what it does!?"

"... That's usually how these things work in video games," Sorun weakly defended. "Dude, it's a door and we're in the middle of a cave. What's the worst that could happen?"

"I don't know! It could be a trap or something! You touch something wrong and a bunch of holes open up in the wall to shoot us with tranq darts or an electric cage drops on us to capture us or something! That's what he does!"

The human teen gave the echidna a flat look. "Knuckles, you see any other way forwards?"

Knuckles hesitated, still nervously glancing at the door. "Well... no..."

"You wanna give up on the Emerald and head back?"

He shook his head. "No way!"

"Cool. I'm touching the tooth then."

After what was surely some heavy internal debate, Knuckles let go of Sorun and took a step back. The human turned back to the door, exhaling slowly as his finger hovered closer to one of the center teeth.

The finger stopped just short of touching it, and remained hovering on the spot.

A couple of seconds passed where Sorun continued to simply point at the tooth. Knuckles stared at the display in confusion for a couple of seconds, and then cleared his throat. "Uh, Sorun? Any day now. You gonna press it?"

"... You got me paranoid with all that talk about traps," Sorun mumbled as he pulled his finger back. "I don't wanna press it anymore."

A loud slap was heard as Knuckles palmed his own face. "Sorun-!"

"You're the one that brought it up!" It seemed outlandish to the pale teen when he first heard it, nothing but Knuckles being overly paranoid, but then he realized this was Eggman they were talking about who, yes, probably was crazy enough to trap a cave. It wouldn't even be that unusual compared to some of the other things he'd done. The five terabytes of selfies was still fresh in Sorun's memory. "Uh-uh-uh- you touch it."

"Me!?" Knuckles shouted in outrage. "Why me?!"

"'Cause it's your fault this is happening right now," Sorun argued, "so you get to press it!"

"Fine! I will!" Taking a deep breath, Knuckles lightly shoved Sorun aside and prepared to press down on one of the buttons. Like Sorun, however, he'd stopped centimetres away from the button, deflated, and stepped back. "Yeah, I don't wanna, either," he said.

Sorun groaned, and then ran a hand along his face. "Oh, for the love of- Bringer Claw, go."

In a flash of blue, the right Bringer Claw appeared over Sorun's shoulder. The spectral hand closed all but its index claw inwards, the extended appendage pointing right at the the left centermost tooth. The pointing claw slowly moved forwards. Both Sorun and Knuckles held their breath, their hearts beating faster the closer the claw got, and both couldn't help but cringe away when it softly touched the tooth.

The rectangular tooth lit up blue. That was all that happened. Sorun and Knuckles continued staring at the lit-up tooth in utter silence for a solid thirty seconds before the Bringer Claw disappeared, with Sorun wiping a bead of sweat off his forehead.

"Well, that was overly dramatic," the human teen sighed out as he leaned towards the door's mouth. "So I guess we just... light up all the teeth and the door will open. Or something like that."

"Sounds about right," Knuckles agreed with a nod. "Which tooth should we press next?"

"Gee, I dunno. All these identical rectangles look so appealing, I just can't decide," Sorun remarked in a low drone. "How about we go for the one right next to it?"

He pressed the tooth just to the right of the one he'd activated like the first one. This one lit up blue, too. What also happened was that the previous one turned back off into its unlit state, and curiously the tooth all the way on the left lit up.

Knuckles face fell into confusion immediately at the sight. Sorun stared blankly at the mouth for all of five seconds, and then slowly started to adopt a look of horror as he pressed both of his hands against his face.

"Oh no. Oh god it's one of these puzzles..." Sorun pitifully groaned out, voice muffled from his palms. "Dude, we ain't getting past this door. There's no way."

"Huh?" Knuckles looked to Sorun, and then back to the door. "Why not? What happened?"

"It's... a puzzle," Sorun ruefully groaned out as his hands limply fell back to his sides. "Turning one tooth on turns on or off other teeth. We have to activate the teeth in an order that lights them all up, which is gonna be really hard since they all interact with each other. So we're gonna have to keep track of all that while figuring out a pattern we can use." He deeply sighed. "I always hated these puzzles in games. I never manage to beat them without looking a guide up."

"Is that all it is?" The look of puzzlement on Knuckles' features morphed into a relieved one. "Then we're all set! All we gotta do is solve the puzzle and open the door."

"'Solve the puzzle' he says," Sorun muttered with a roll of his eyes. "Knuckles, I don't think the gravity of how hard this puzzle is has hit you yet."

"It's just a puzzle," Knuckles reasoned, "and there's two of us. I'm sure we can get through it just fine if we put our heads together and think it through."

Sorun wasn't nearly as optimistic as he was. These puzzles were the bane of his existence during his life as a gamer. All puzzles had been, really, but this one reigned as the king of puzzles in terms of difficulty for him. And as daunting a task as it was, they did actually need to solve it in order to move forwards. So it didn't seem like they had a choice.

But maybe Knuckles was right. Maybe with two brains they could do it. He honestly doubted it, but it was worth a shot at least.

"Okay, let's go for it," Sorun sighed out as he moved to the leftmost tooth. "First thing first is we gotta figure out which tooth is connected to which, so we'll press 'em all to get the sequences down. We can puzzle out what order to press them in right after."

"There, see?" Knuckles grinned at him and gave him a thumbs-up. "We're already getting through it and you didn't even need my help!"

"Save that for when we actually solve this thing. If we can."

5 minutes

"Okay, so the third tooth is connected to the fifth and eighth teeth, and the fourth... fourth..." Knuckles trailed off, and then shook his head. "I forget. Can we go through them again?"

"We've gone through it three times, Knuckles," an irate Sorun groaned out as he ran a hand through his hair. "It's the exact same sequence as the last three times we went through it, so it's not gonna change on the fourth!"

The echidna sent him a challenging glare. "Then tell me what teeth are connected to tooth four, then."

Sorun opened his mouth to answer, but when his mind turned up blank, he sighed and trudged his way towards the fourth tooth to press it.

10 minutes

"Hey, look at that. It didn't work," Sorun flatly stated as he looked at a line of twenty teeth, a random half of which were lit up. "Knuckles, man, we screwed it up."

"Yeah, I know," Knuckles sighed out. "Okay, reset them all so they're all off and we'll try it again."

The human teen began rubbing his temples with his fingers. "Yeah, see, that's the thing. I don't know how to reset it. All the lights are mixed up and if we try turning them all off it's just gonna light up the other half. I don't even know how we got to this point."

"Look, it's easy. All we gotta do is... is..." Knuckles stopped, a worryingly low hum escaping him as he looked over the door's mouth. "Actually, yeah, you're right. How... wait, which ones were connected to which again?"

Sorun was seriously considering if risking death by a cave-in was preferable to enduring this hell.

"How!?" Knuckles growled out in frustration. "We went through the order! We both agreed with it! It should have worked!" He slammed his fist into the door, causing it to rattle and make small amounts of dirt fall off the cave's roof as it shook. "Why can't we get them all to light up!?"

"I don't know, man, I don't know..." Sorun mumbled in despair as he held his head in his hands. "Who makes the key to a door a puzzle, anyways?"

"Eggman," Knuckles bitterly ground out, "that's who. This is just like him."

"Of course it is." The pale teen shook his head and approached the door's mouth. "Okay, I got an idea. Let's try this."

---

25 minutes

They weren't getting through the door.

It just couldn't be done. Despite pooling their brainpower together, the pair just couldn't suss out how to open that infernal door. They'd gotten close once, when they'd managed to light all but one of the teeth up, but trying to light up that last one had resulted in the entire thing turning off. Right back to square one. Suffice to say the two gave up after that last attempt.

And now they were sitting on opposite sides of the cave, staring forlornly at the door. To Sorun it almost looked like it was laughing at them. Mocking them in their attempt at solving such an advanced-level puzzle. It was maddening enough that the both of them had even tried punching down the door to no avail.

A defeated sigh rattled out of Sorun's throat. "Are we just idiots?" He asked aloud, more to himself than to Knuckles. "I mean we're both functional teenagers, right? We should be able to solve a puzzle."

"Yeah, but Eggman's a genius, and he designed this puzzle," Knuckles said as he weakly gestured towards the door. "Makes sense that it'd be so hard you'd need to be a genius to solve it if you really think about it."

Slowly blinking, Sorun rolled his head in Knuckles' direction. "Knuckles, there are children back on Earth who could solve this puzzle," he deadpanned.

"..." The echidna let the words sink in, and after a moment huffed out a defeated breath as he began to roll the cuff of his left glove back. "I'm calling Tails," he grumbled out.

The pale human sat straight up. "Hey, come on, no!" he loudly protested. "I don't want Tails comin' in here knowing we couldn't solve a puzzle!" He had some pride left over, damn it. It wasn't much but he was trying his best to preserve what little there was left. And he didn't know if he could handle looking so lame in front of Tails. Or if he could handle the story getting out to the others.

Knuckles shot Sorun a heated glare. "You wanna keep butting our heads against it?" he ground out with narrowed eyes.

"Look, let's just give it a few more tries-"

---

30 minutes

"Call Tails."

Knuckles rolled his eyes, and then fully rolled up the cuff of his left glove. Sorun noted a wristwatch-like device clamped to the echidna's wrist, with a small speaker and set of knobs on its face in place of a clock. Knuckles fiddled with the knobs a few times before speaking into the device. "Hey, Tails? Yeah, it's me. Can you come into the cave? We ran into a problem. No, yeah, just keep going straight. Yeah. Alright, thanks." He rolled his glove back over the device, and then looked up to Sorun. "He's on his way."

"Fantastic," the human drawled out, leaning his head back so it banged against the rock wall of the cave. "I don't care what you said about structural integrity. We're digging around the door if he can't figure this thing out."

"He'll figure it out," Knuckles assured him. "Surprised you couldn't solve it with all your talk of gamer knowledge this and gamer knowledge that."

Sorun made a "tsk" noise. "Forgive me, Knuckles, but I left all my hint coins in my other pair of pants back in my home zone. And you can't talk; you couldn't figure it out either."

He didn't have a remark for that one, and the two left the argument at that as they stared at the ground in complete silence. Some minutes later the sound of whizzing tails reached their ears, causing the pair of teens to pick their heads up and look towards the source of the noise.

As expected, Tails' short form came flying in from the end of the cave. He touched down on the ground once his tails ceased spinning, and then began to look back and forth between Sorun and Knuckles with a questioning look on his face.

"It's been around half an hour since you guys walked in here," he said. "What happened?"

Loudly exhaling, Sorun pointed his thumb in the direction of the door that had given him and Knuckles so much grief. "Door's locked behind a puzzle," he mumbled. "We couldn't solve the puzzle."

"..." Tails silently stared at Sorun, and then slowly turned towards the door. He blinked in surprise, and then looked back towards Sorun with disbelief written on his face. "Seriously...?"

Sorun grit his teeth in indignation. "Tails, either help us out and solve the puzzle or get out."

The fox rolled his eyes, but still stepped towards the puzzle. Sorun looked after him for a few seconds, and then tore his gaze back to Knuckles. "So is there a reason I don't get a cool wrist communicator thing, 'cause I'm feeling pretty under equipped here."

Knuckles rose an eye ride at the human. "Would you wear it if we gave you one?"

Sorun looked down at his bare left wrist, regarded it for a second, and then shook his head. "Nah, watches don't really mesh with my style," he said.

"Oh, because you suddenly have a style." Knuckles slung one leg over the other while resting his hands behind his head. "Right."

"Hey, Honey says I do. Which, actually, come to think of it, she probably wouldn't even let me wear one." Would she? She'd probably make an exception if he said a wrist communicator was mission-imperative gear, but... well, knowing her, he didn't know if that was nearly a good enough excuse. Probably not, really.

"Why exactly did you do that weird sponsorship deal with her again?" Knuckles asked him. "It seems like it's giving you more trouble than it's worth."

"A desperate man will do a lot of things for free clothes and discounts, Knuckles," Sorun answered. "I happened to be a very desperate man at the time. Still am, actually."

The echidna stared at Sorun with a completely unconvinced face. "I'm a guy and I wouldn't have done it."

Sorun scoffed. "Yeah, well, you don't have to wear full-body clothing like I do since you're a Mobian. And I'm broke."

The stare remained unblinking. "Dunno if you ever figured this out, but gloves and shoes wear out too, and I'm not exactly rolling around in cash, either."

"You know what, man, I-"

"Guys, I solved it."

"WHAT!? I DON'T BELIEVE IT!" The outburst had come from Sorun, though both him and Knuckles had shot up to their feet in utter shock as they spun towards the door. Tails was right in front of it, giving the both of them an unimpressed look, and at the same time they could see the door behind him slowly begin to slide open. And all twenty of the teeth were lit up. "But... but we couldn't... I don't... b-but..." Sorun stuttered, completely in disbelief at the sight.

Tails merely shrugged. "It was a simple puzzle. I don't have any idea why you guys were so stuck on it."

This was why he hadn't wanted Tails to do it. Because then Sorun would get this feeling. This feeling of being inadequate and ashamed at the same time for not being able to solve something that took an eleven-year-old, what, a minute, two minutes? Granted he was a genius, but... but still.

On the upside, Sorun wasn't alone in his suffering. Knuckles seemed to be doing his best to try and avoid eye contact with Tails, and at the very least, Tails wasn't acting smug about it. He actually just looked more annoyed than anything else. It didn't exactly make Sorun feel better, but it helped buffer against the negative feelings.

The door had been opened, though. So there was that.

"... Tails, how about you just come with us," Sorun muttered as he started walking past the fox and towards the open door. "Y'know, in case there's more puzzles or something."

"Yeah, I think I'll do that." Tails looked up to Knuckles, who simply shrugged at the fox. Tails reciprocated the shrug and the two Mobians began following the human deeper into the cave.

"How deep does this cave go, anyways?"

The mountain wasn't even that big from the outside. Not small either by any stretch of the word, but for how long the trio had been walking in a straight line through this single, tunnel-like cave, Sorun felt like they should have come out through the other side at this point. It wasn't even going up or down, either. Just straight. And yet there was nothing but even more poorly-lit tunnel up ahead up them even though they'd been walking for twenty minutes straight.

It was utterly baffling. Like everything else in this universe.

"You guys think this is one of those tunnels that goes slightly down? Like so slightly that it looks straight but isn't so we're still technically heading underground?" Sorun asked his two companions, choosing to keep his head straight ahead. "Because I feel like we should have hit either something important or the other side of the mountain by now."

"Hm. That's possible," Tails said. "It's honestly hard to believe that Eggman's robots would dig so far into the mountain, but if it's for a Chaos Emerald, I guess there aren't many places they wouldn't go."

Sorun huffed and blew a lock of hair from his face. "And yet if he gets it he's probably just gonna put it on a stand to ogle like the last one." Said a lot about Eggman that he was willing to divert so many of his forces to dig under a mountain for an Chaos Emerald he wasn't even going to use. On one hand it was one of the most wasteful uses of resources Sorun could conceive. On the other hand, the human teen wasn't even sure Eggman needed any of it considering how close he was to completely conquering the world.

He'd openly admitted to Sorun's face he was dragging things out just to milk as much fun out of the conflict as possible.

But these were things Sorun didn't like thinking about. Because thinking about the man and his reasoning for doing all this insanity left a bad taste in his mouth, and it kept reminding him he could blow up all of Knothole when he finally grew bored of it all.

"How'd this thing even end up at the bottom of a mountain, anyways?" Knuckles grumbled under his breath. "I get they scattered all over the world after we used them, but come on. Did it just shoot right down into the rock or something?"

"Who knows, man? I stopped questioning Chaos Emeralds a while ago," Sorun commented. "Is is just me, or is the cave getting a bit wider up ahead?"

"Hey, yeah, it is!" Tails realized with widened eyes. "Come on, let's check it out!"

The trio rapidly sped up, and soon enough the cave tunnel around them did indeed begin to widen. Eventually they reached another cave mouth, the three quickly moving through it before abruptly stopping.

That cave opening had lead to a small rock platform with various pieces of machinery scattered around. In front of them was a chasm: a chasm so wide that they couldn't see the ending of it when looking left and right, though this was in part due to the low amount of lighting from the few lights scattered around on power cables lining the wall and some large, portable lamps that had been placed nearby. When Sorun had approached the edge of the cliff they now stood on and looked down, all he saw was darkness.

Across the chasm, slightly above their elevation, was another cliff, and at the end of that cliff they could see a door. Another puzzle door from the looks of it, much to Sorun's and Knuckles' chagrin, though Tails didn't seem too concerned about it. Unfortunately, though, there was nothing connecting the cliff they were standing on to the cliff on the other side of the chasm where the door was.

"What the- where's the bridge!?" Sorun exclaimed, spreading his arms out to the chasm ahead of the trio. "Why is there a door all the way over there with no bridge!?"

He felt something tug on his hoodie, and looked to the side to see Tails pulling on him to gain his attention. "I think that's it over there." He pointed towards a pile of disassembled bridge parts laying in a haphazard pile near them. "It looks like they got all the mining robots and equipment across the gap, so they disassembled the bridge behind them."

"... Why!?" Sorun held his right palm up to his forehead. "What, are they just gonna build a new bridge when they get the Emerald!?"

"Eh, Eggman's always been a weirdly paranoid guy," Knuckles supplied with a shrug of his shoulders. "Why leave a bridge lying around when you have enough resources to just build a second one on the way out?"

The human teen groaned. "I'm losin' brain cells every time I learn something new about Eggman." His hand slid off his forehead, and he turned pleading eyes to Tails. "Can you fly over there and check the door out?"

At his behest the young fox spun his tails up and flew past the vast chasm and towards the door. Oddly, he came back less than a minute later, and from what Sorun and Knuckles saw he'd barely interacted with the door. Even more worryingly was he had a concerned look on his face.

"Bad news, guys," he announced as his feet dropped onto the ground. "There's no power to the door."

"No power?" Knuckles repeated. "Why not?"

"It doesn't look like the door's hooked up to the makeshift power grid the Badniks here set up while tunneling through the mountain," Tails explained as he turned in the direction of the chasm while pointing towards the door. "I did notice that there were some cables connecting the door to some weird panel with a square indent, though."

Sorun hummed at that. "Square indent in a panel, huh? Where have I heard that before?" He took a look around at some of the equipment scattered around there, and eventually stopped when something pressed against the wall on the left side of the cliff caught his eye. A large, enclosed metal cabinet with blue light leaking out of small, oval viewing ports on its front.

As the two Mobians continued discussing the matter behind him, Sorun approached the cabinet with hands tucked in his pockets. He stopped right in front of the strange cabinet, squinting his eyes as he peered in through the viewing port. Inside were about five rectangular metal boxes with strips of blue light lining their frames. What drew his eye most, however, was the large, blue lightning bolt insignia stamped on the side of the boxes.

"... Alright, I played 'Dead Space'. I know how this game works. Just plug the battery into the thing. Why the hell Eggy designed it like this I got no clue, but I'm not gonna pretend to know what goes through a crazy guy's head." He looked to the right and saw that there was a red lever connected to what he assumed was a dispenser unit. He reached over and pulled the lever, and while the dispenser rattled slightly, nothing dropped out from the large slot at the bottom of the machine. "Ugh, come on." He pulled the lever again. Nothing. "Fuck it."

His right Bringer Claw manifested, curled into a fist, and punched the dispenser unit. The loud sound of crumpling metal caused the two Mobians to flinch and look towards Sorun, though the pale teen ignored this and punched the machine again. It rattled, and this time one of a large batteries did fall through the slot.

Letting out a satisfied hum, Sorun picked up the battery with the Bringer Claw, and then turned to the other two while waving it at them. "Hey, is this important?" he asked.

"Huh? Oh, wait! That looks like a battery!" Tails exclaimed as he and Knuckles approached Sorun. "I guess it would make sense Eggman would use a bunch of portable power sources to power up his operations here instead of trying to build a power plant. His robots are only here to dig the Emerald out. He must have a lot of these things all around the mine powering the lights and doors."

"That almost sounds practical. And here I was thinking Eggman didn't know the definition of the word," Sorun quipped, tossing the battery up and down as he looked at the door across the chasm. "So we just gotta slam this into the slot connected to the door and open it, right?"

"That should do it. Can you fly the battery over, Sorun?"

Sorun nodded, setting the battery down on the ground to pick it up while removing his normal hands from his pockets. He bent down and grabbed both sides of the battery with his hands, and then attempted to lift up.

The battery remained on the ground.

"... Hm." With a small grunt of effort, Sorun tried lifting again. The battery didn't budge. "Yeah, it's too heavy for me," he explained as he let go of the battery and stood up. "I need both Bringer Claws to fly, so I can't carry it over."

"Here, let me try." Tails stepped up to the battery and bent down to try and pick it up. Unfortunately, just like with Sorun, the battery did not budge off the ground. "Eeegh! Ah, yeah. That's heavy alright," Tails sighed out as he let it go, and then began scratching his head in confusion. "What is this thing even made out of that's making it so heavy?"

"No clue. Here, let me try." Knuckles flexed his gloved hands, and then bent down to grasp the battery. Unlike when Sorun and Tails tried, the battery was lifted almost easily off the ground by the echidna, who looked at the battery in his grasp in surprise before looking back at the other two. "I don't know what you guys are complaining about. This thing isn't heavy at all."

Sorun and Tails glanced at each other, rolled their eyes, and then looked at the door across the chasm. "Alright, here's the next problem," Sorun began. "Knuckles can't fly, and we can't carry him and fly at the same time with the battery weighing him down." He glanced back at Knuckles and the battery. "Think I could just throw it across?"

Tails winced at the suggestion, and then roughly shook his head. "I... would strongly recommend against doing that. Eggman isn't really known for making his technology using stable elements."

"What, you think the battery will explode if... actually, yeah, that does kinda sound like something that would happen." Sorun clicked his tongue in irritation, and then looked towards the chasm. "I could make a bridge with Summoned Swords... kinda worried about the weight of the battery breaking 'em, though... well, they should hold up, but I dunno... hm?"

Looking around at the chasm separating the two cliffs, Sorun's eyes happened upon a metal structure towards the right side. A large, metal box was bolted to the chasm's wall with an even larger metal arm made of metal struts attached to it, with a large, metal claw at the end of that. A crane.

Sorun hummed in thought, and then looked from the crane towards the rightmost end of the cliff. There was a large, rectangular container sitting on the ground. Empty, but the metal container was long enough to stretch out to half of the chasm's length.

An idea was forming.

"Any chance they left the keys in that crane over there?" Sorun asked, pointing over to the crane bolted to the wall. "'Cause I can probably do something if they did."

"I don't think there'd be a key for a portable crane like that. Too much of a hassle to bother with," Tails informed him. "If there's still power in it, there should just be an activation button."

"Ah, cool." The Bringer Claws manifested on Sorun's back. "Alright, I'm gonna go try something. You two sit tight."

It was no sooner did the human announce he had an idea than he flew away with those strange, spectral appendages he could create out of his back. Tails sighed at the retreating form, his ears slightly drooping while his tails began drooping towards the ground.

"Hey, so uh, since he's gone for a second... you mind telling me what's up with you and him?" Tails' head picked up, and then turned towards his back where he saw Knuckles looking at him with questioning eyes. "He said you gave him some bad news, but he wouldn't talk about it. I'm just wondering what the deal is since he seems kinda... off. You know, more than usual."

"He called it bad news, huh?" That was an understatement if Tails had ever heard of one, but he wouldn't put it past somebody like Sorun to phrase it like that. The human always seemed to have some way of underscoring the severity of some things. His humor was weird like that. "I... Knuckles, what would you do if I told you that for some reason you could never, ever return to Angel Island again? Where all your people and family are? How do you think you would react?"

Knuckles' eye ridges rose in surprise at the question, though they lowered a few moments later as understanding crossed the echidna's face. "Oh. It's that bad, huh?"

With slumped shoulders, Tails gave a confirming nod. "I told him that extracting those Emeralds are all but impossible, and he's..." Biting his lower lip, Tails turned back towards the crane on the wall and saw Sorun climbing inside of it. "I think he's in denial about it," he finally said while turning back to Knuckles. "He doesn't want to believe it, and I don't blame him since... since it's his home, you know? And we took that from him, and I just... how are we supposed to make up for something like taking his home and everything he knew away from him?"

The question hung in the air for a while between the two. Knuckles looked to the side in thought, looking extremely uncomfortable with the question, and then turned his gaze towards the crane as it slowly began rotating. "We can't, really," he said. "The best we could do is try giving him a new home. I don't know, maybe you guys could settle him somewhere in Knothole? Get him his own place once all the fighting dies down a bit?"

It wasn't a perfect solution, but it was definitely better than nothing. "Yeah, we might have to," Tails agreed, "but... I know he said he doesn't hold what we did against us, he understands why we did it, but at the same time he... Sorun just seems so upset."

He still kept flashing back to when they were in the HQ kitchen, back when Tails had told him the news. The way his irises had shrunken down to pinpricks while his eyes began shaking in their sockets despite the human teen himself being practically as still as a stone. How strained and quiet his voice had sounded when he spoke. He'd looked more melancholic than Tails had ever seen anybody ever, and he couldn't help but feel sad in place of the human.

And then there had been that hand. That blue, spectral claw that had Tails frozen on the spot, because there was something just plain threatening about that thing. Tails would readily admit that he was afraid of it when it appeared, but he was quickly surprised when Sorun had acted like he hadn't even known it was there, and then quickly made it disappear before apologizing to Tails. It made the fox feel relief that he had no conscious intention of lashing out, but he definitely must have felt like it. He wasn't so sure that claw would have appeared otherwise.

But the fact that Sorun was even suffering through all these emotions in the first place made Tails feel awful. He didn't deserve to go through this. Nobody did, but it felt worse in Sorun's case because he had slowly become one of them. He didn't like showing it for some reason that was beyond Tails, but he really was a nice person. He'd helped them. Even started saving lives! And it tore at something inside of Tails knowing he was doing all this for them even though he quite possibly just lost everything.

"I just feel really sorry for him. And I want to help him, but he... just doesn't open up to people." The crane arm began moving towards the metal container, though this was mainly ignored by Tails as he once again turned to Knuckles. "What do you think?"

Knuckles idly watched as Sorun attempted to use the crane's claw to grab at the container, and then looked down at Tails. "Yeah, it's rough," he agreed, "but he's been managing fine with it so far. I think he'll be okay with enough time." He looked to the side and began awkwardly rubbing the back of his head. "I mean, Sorun, he's... he's a solid guy."

"Yeah," Tails agreed. "It'd be easier if he just talked about his problems with us, but-"

"- But he never likes talking about that stuff," Knuckles finished with a sigh. "I don't know, maybe he's still sorting through his feelings over everything or something. Just give him some time. He'll pull through."

The fox Mobian blinked hopeful eyes at Knuckles. "You really think so?"

"Yeah, sure. It won't be easy since, you know... he lost everything. I don't really know how you recover from something like that. But Sorun's cool. And if worst comes to worst he's not alone. He's got us and everybody else. He'll be fine."

"... I think you're right." A small smile tugged at the corner of the fox's lips as the two turned back towards the crane. The claw was failing to grip onto the metal container, and very faintly they could hear unintelligible, angry shouting coming from the inside of the crane's cabin. "Did you hear that brain cell joke Sorun made about Eggman?" Tails idly asked while keeping his eyes on the crane.

"Yeah," Knuckles confirmed with a nod. "I didn't really get it. You?"

"I... think it means Eggman's actions make Sorun confused? Or maybe... I dunno, he says a lot of weird jokes." Maybe it was a zone thing- the way Sorun was so sarcastically dry half of the time. And maybe a lot of the jokes he said were lost on them because they required context that was commonplace in his home but completely absent for everybody on Mobius. That was Tails' theory at least, but he truly didn't know for certain. Sorun really was odd, after all.

A spectral blue fist punching the door to the crane's cabin away shook Tails from his thoughts.

The door fell all the way to the bottom of the chasm, and a disgruntled Sorun emerged from the cabin, blue spectral wings slowly flapping as his feathered arms flew him back towards the two Mobians. He dropped down in a huff, blue arms disappearing as he continued to angrily grumble to himself.

"- Rigged, thing's rigged, couldn't pick up a box..." he heatedly grumbled, turning around to them. "Okay, so I was gonna use that box as a platform to carry Knuckles and the battery across the chasm, but that stupid claw couldn't pick up the stupid box , so that plan's out. So I'm going with Plan A."

Tails nodded in understanding. "Oh, that's too bad. But what's Plan A?"

"This." Sorun snapped his fingers. "This is Plan A."

Bring!

In a flash of blue light and particles, a tightrope bridge made completely out of Summoned Swords appeared to connect the two cliffs together. A tightrope bridge that, to Tails' mind, looked incredibly structurally unsound with it being made of magic swords . Knuckles looked hesitant as well, backing up a single step as he warily eyed the bridge.

"Don't tell me you expect me to walk on that while holding the battery," the echidna said as he looked from the bridge to Sorun.

"Yeah, Sorun, that..." Tails turned to Sorun, and gulped from the glare the human was giving him. "I'm not sure that bridge will, well... hold up."

"I've done this before. It holds up fine," he assured them with a hand wave. "Just don't, you know, trip or something and you should be fine."

"You sure?" Knuckles had bent down to pick the battery up, but he still had an unsure look about his face as he eyed the bridge. "I don't wanna doubt you, but..."

Sorun, with a roll of his eyes, groaned. "Look, it held me and Sally up back when I first tried it, so if it can support the weight of two people, it can support you and a battery."

"... This thing is a bit heavier than a person-" Knuckles cut himself off when Sorun's glare shifted to him. He sighed, and then began walking towards the bridge. "I'm totally blaming you if this thing breaks on me..."

Amazingly, to Tails at least, the bridge held up as the echidna slowly walked across it. Sorun didn't look nearly as impressed, and instead just crossed his arms in a huff as he watched Knuckles slowly carry the battery across the bridge.

"Told you it'd hold up, ye of little faith," Sorun snarked from besides Tails. "Helps that the swords float."

"Oh, that's why it's not collapsing." He'd been meaning to ask. The bridge really shouldn't have been holding together like that from the way it was constructed. That and the fact that it was solely made of pointed, rigid objects. "Heh. Nice going, Sorun."

"Sorun the bridge builder aims to please."

Tails laughed once more, and then looked up to Sorun's face. The frustration from earlier had faded from the human's eyes, and for the most part his expression seemed normal. He still felt there was something off with him, though, and although Tails couldn't tell what it was, he could hazard a guess as to what was on the older male's mind. And there was something Sorun had said earlier today that was bugging Tails. So he endeavored to ask him about it.

"Hey, Sorun?" The human turned to look at Tails when he began speaking. "Earlier today when I asked if you were doing okay, you... you said you never were. That was just one of your weird jokes, right?"

Sorun continued to stare blankly at Tails for what seemed like a full minute. It was long enough that the young fox was beginning to worry, but eventually Sorun broke the stillness by tilting his head slightly while giving a practically microscopic smile.

"Yeah, it was a joke. Sarcasm. I'm doing... I'm doing okay, Tails. Don't worry about me." He turned towards the chasm as his spectral arm-wings appeared. "Let's just get this Chaos Emerald and go hom- back to the HQ, alright?"

He flew off right after saying that. Tails stared after his back and, unsure about whether or not he believed him, began spinning his tails up to fly right behind him.

Well, of course he'd lied, but telling Tails about his perpetual depression wasn't exactly going to do him any favors. And besides, he was already lying to a lot of people about a lot of things. What was one more small lie to a child? He didn't see the problem.

"God, I feel awful."

Other than the increase in emotional stress it piled on him.

Rather fortunately, Knuckles had successfully passed the bridge with the battery. They'd plugged it into the wall, the door lit up, and Tails had solved the door puzzle even faster than the first one, much to the other two's disgruntlement. And right after that- to nobody's surprise- was even more walking down a giant artificial tunnel deeper into the mountain.

And more walking.

And more walking.

"How. Deep. Does. This. Go?" The Emerald couldn't have possibly gotten this deep inside of the mountain. According to everybody they'd just shot up into the sky and shot off in all different directions to be deposited in random places around Mobius. Sorun found himself agreeing with Knuckles in that he failed to see how one of them could have randomly shot so far down into a mountain.

But then again, these were the same Emeralds that were conduits for a source of unlimited energy that were giving him powers from a video game, so going inside of a mountain was pretty tame compared to all that. But why did it have to be so deep?

"Is there any chance somebody made a mistake?" Sorun asked as the trio continued to progress down the tunnel. "I won't even be mad if it turns out it isn't down here. I just wanna know if it's worth going any further."

That was a lie. He be furious. He didn't know what he'd do with all that anger, though. Probably kick a rock.

"Sorun, I highly doubt that the Badniks would have dug this far down if their equipment didn't assure them the Chaos Emerald was here somewhere," Tails said to him. "And our own equipment pointed to this area, too. It's here. Just... really far down, apparently."

"Ugh, yeah, 'apparently'," Sorun echoed while making finger quotes. "I swear if we have to keep going for five more minutes- oh, what is this?"

The three Freedom Fighters had rounded a corner, and upon coming around that bend they saw that the tunnel diverged. A lot. In fact, it seemed that the tunnel split off into dozens of different tunnels branching off from the main one they were walking down. And they all looked like the exact same tunnel.

"Oh..." Tails mumbled out in a dejected tone. "That's... that's a lot of tunnels."

"You don't say, Tails, you don't say." Barely containing a frustrated sigh, Sorun gestured out wildly to all the tunnels in front of them. "What's up with this? Up until this point it was a straight line."

"If I had to guess... Chaos Emeralds give off a high amount of energy that can disrupt sensitive equipment. It's completely possible the equipment they were using went haywire when they got close, so they couldn't get an accurate reading. So they probably started digging all over." The fox's features brightened up. "But hey, that just means we're getting close!"

Sorun didn't share Tails' optimism, and instead slumped his form forwards in exhaustion. "Yeah, awesome. That's just super. Now all we gotta do is figure out which tunnel is the right one." He looked to his left. "Any ideas, Knu- Knuckles? Huh?"

The echidna was no longer at his side. He blinked in confusion, and then looked forwards. He instantly saw the red Mobian near the center of the end of the tunnel, where all the divergence points were. He was kneeling down on the ground, feeling the ground with his left hand while holding his right one out. Both Sorun and Tails glanced at each other, gave each other unsure looks, and then looked back to Knuckles.

"Uh... whatcha doin' over there, dude?" Sorun asked as the both of them began approaching Knuckles. "Kinda weirding us out here."

"I'm feeling out the Emerald, now be quiet," Knuckles answered them, not even bothering to glance back.

"... Ah-huh." Sorun nudged Tails with his elbow. "I don't think the ventilation down here is too good. It's getting to Knuckles."

A soft growl emanated from Knuckles' kneeling body. "I heard that."

"Mm, I'm sure. With those big ears of yours." Sorun paused, and then squinted his eyes at Knuckles' head. "Wait, I just noticed... you even have ears?" All he saw was a head with dreadlock-like flesh appendages lining the edges. He didn't see anything that even resembled ears the closer he looked.

Knuckles actually twitched at that remark, and then turned his head to glance at Sorun from the corner of his eye. "What the- of course I have ears!" he barked at the human. "How else am I supposed to hear!?"

"... If you say so, man." Sorun didn't see it, but if he said they were there, he guessed they were there. "So what do you mean you're 'feeling out the Emerald'?"

The echidna regarded the human for a few more seconds, and then faced his head back forwards. "I've always had a strong connection with the Chaos Force," he explained. The explanation and the mention of Chaos Force made Sorun unconsciously stiffen his body. "Why's not important, but it gives me abilities outside the norm. One of them is being sensitive to things that give off a lot of Chaos energy. I can kind of... sense them, if they're really close by and I focus real hard." He softly hummed. "Actually, I think I can sense you back there, Sorun. You got a ton of Chaos energy radiating around you. Must be all those Chaos Emeralds you're eating for breakfast."

"Yeah, must be," Sorun dryly replied with a roll of his eyes. "So any idea which way is the right way?"

"Hmm... I'm... feelin' something down thataway..." Knuckles rose up to his feet, and then walked towards the right. He stopped in front of three of the tunnels, humming again as he lowered his head and closed his eyes, "Yeah, I'm feeling something really strong down here alright," he said, opening his eyes back up, "but it's too faint for me to tell exactly... hey, wait a second."

He stepped closer to the centermost tunnel, eyes narrowing as he looked down towards the edge of the tunnel. He looked at the edges of the other tunnels, and then began running his gloved hand against the edge he was scrutinizing.

"Okay, I'm certain of it." He nodded his head, and then turned around to Sorun and Tails, who were both staring at him with wide, bewildered eyes. "The edges of this tunnel look fresher than the edges on the other ones, and I'm feeling the Emerald down this way." He pointed at the mouth of the tunnel. "We need to go this way."

"Uh... huh." Sorun tilted his head forwards towards the edges of the tunnel. As far as he could see, it was nothing but rock. Rock that looked about the same as the rest of the rock around them. "If, uh... if you say so, Mr. Treasure Hunter Man."

"Hey, come on," Tails tersely whispered at him. "Knuckles knows a lot about this stuff, so just give him a chance."

"Alright, alright." Sorun rose his hand and gestured to the tunnel Knuckles was standing in front of. "Lead on."

The trust Sorun had placed in Knuckles was steadily being waned.

He knew that Tails was right when he insisted Sorun entrust in Knuckles' abilities here in these tunnels. Sorun could see the logic in that. Everybody had strengths in some areas and flaws in others. That was the point of teams: they complimented each others' weaknesses with strengths. He understood that. It was why the Freedom Fighters left the technical things to Tails and Rotor, or strategic things to Sally, or to trust Sorun to fill up a spot somewhere on a team when nobody else could do it since he didn't really specialize in anything.

Unlike Sorun, Knuckles had real strengths outside of his actual strength. Such as this treasure hunting thing, and his apparent Chaos energy sensing ability. So that was why Sorun had listened to Tails and trusted Knuckles to lead them. Because this was his area of expertise. Because he knew better than the both of them.

But after twenty minutes of them winding through various tunnels with Knuckles leading them with absolutely no rhyme or reason to each new tunnel they traveled down out of the dozens of others, Sorun had to start questioning how wise of a decision this had been.

Oh, Knuckles would assure them they weren't lost. Sorun had asked as much, but according to Knuckles they were right on track. Sorun wasn't seeing it. Tails wasn't seeing it, either, and even he was becoming antsy over how long this was taking. Not to mention the stale air down here was starting to bother all three of them.

"Are we there yet, Knuckles?" Sorun asked past a tired yawn, hands loosely tucked inside of his pockets as he elbows swung back and forth freely. "Just wondering if we're there yet."

If there was anybody that didn't look concerned, it was Knuckles. He had the same focused look on his face that he'd adopted since he began leading the other two, though Sorun's question did cause it to waver a bit in frustration. "It's not gonna get any closer the more you ask, you know," he grumbled out.

"Yeah, I know, but this is taking forever," Sorun complained. "... Seriously, though, are we there yet?"

"It's just. A little. Further," Knuckles informed the human through grit teeth. "And so help me, if you ask one more time...!"

"Okay, calm down. Message received," Sorun assured him. Knuckles continued to stare at him silently for a few seconds, and then slowly turned his head back forwards. The silence lasted for about twenty seconds before Sorun spoke up again, saying, "Hey, what's-?"

Knuckles' head whirled around with a snarl on his face. "Sorun, I-!"

"Hey, wait!" Tails exclaimed, running between the two while waving his arms. "Sorun's right, there's something over there!"

The snarl dropped off of Knuckles' face entirely, and he turned towards where Tails and Sorun were looking, towards the end of the tunnel. And, oddly enough, there was something there: a great source of light shining in from the end of the tunnel as opposed to the near-darkness of the barely-lit tunnels they'd been traversing thus far. All three of them continued to blankly stare down at the light, and then automatically began to jog towards it.

They'd reached the end of the tunnel soon enough. Surprisingly, it lead to a drop, with the floor around five meters below the edge of the tunnel. This was largely ignored by the trio, though, as their main focus was on the room the tunnel lead off into. It was a massive cavern spanning larger than even the large aircraft hangar they all used to store the aircraft back in Knothole. It was well-lit, too, with enough light fixtures and portable lamps placed everywhere that it may as well have been daytime in there.

There were robots, too. Egg Pawns by the dozens, most of which that were, rather strangely, painted yellow with orange stripes and with yellow hardhats on top of their heads. Some were pushing carts of excavated rock away while others were meandering about with various mining tools such as drills, shovels, or pickaxes. Sorun, with much disdain, noticed a few of the red-painted ones with their lances were scattered about, too, and he felt his hands unconsciously clench at the sight of them.

But right at the end of the room was something that had drawn the human's attention away from the lance-carrying Badniks. All the way at the back of the cavern, towards a wall of brown rock where the cavern ended. There was a gathering of the mining Badniks and regular Badniks huddled around a small, metal pedestal with a glass case above it. And inside of that case was a shining, red object that gave off a bright glow. A red object that was shaped just like a Chaos Emerald.

"Ooh... great..." It was an odd feeling for Sorun. Feeling so much dread at something so shiny and inviting. Not because it was surrounded by about fifty killer robots, but because of everything that Emerald represented. And the problems he could already see arising once they brought that thing back to Freedom HQ.

"Yeah," Knuckles agreed as he crouched down next to Sorun, having missed the apprehension in Sorun's tone. "Looks like there really was an Emerald all the way down here." A savage smirk grew on his face. "And look at that. They already went and dug it up for us."

"Mm. So no, uh, no chance of just leaving it there and going home?" Sorun asked with a hopeful edge to his voice. When the two Mobians besides him gave the teen odd looks, he coughed into his closed fist. "Er, rhetorical question, hah hah."

In response, Tails quirked his head to the side. "Sorun, I don't want to be mean, but I really don't think these sarcastic jokes of yours land that well," he said.

"Uh-huh, jokes, yeah." Sorun sucked in a large breath through his teeth, and then gave a stiff nod. "Duly noted," he said in a strained voice. "So what's the plan here? We just gonna go down and-" Sorun made a snatching gesture with his hand, "- take it?"

Tails hummed, his twin appendages swishing the air behind him as he rubbed at his chin. "There isn't really a good way of sneaking down there undetected. Looks like we'll have to fight." He turned his head to Sorun with a reassuring smile. "It's just fifty of them against the three of us, though. That's not many at all. We can do it."

"Yeah, JUST fifty..." Sorun echoed with an exasperated breath.

"Aw, what's the matter?" Knuckles clapped the human on the shoulder, the force making him stumble and almost fall down into the cavern. "Don't tell me a buncha Egg Pawns got ya runnin' scared? You got all those fancy powers now, and we'll be right there with you. It'll be a cinch."

"I'm not scared," Sorun defended, his eyes still locked onto the red Emerald at the back of the cavern. "I just... eh, doesn't matter." In a flash of blue, the Bringer Claws appeared, and four Summoned Swords manifested at Sorun's sides. "Alright, let's..." He stopped mid-sentence to let out a yawn. "Awww, man, all that walkin'... 'kay, let's go." He glanced at the other two, who were both giving him unimpressed looks. "What?"

They both continued to stare at him, followed by both sighing while shaking their heads and holding their foreheads, with Knuckles saying, "That's your big 'to battle!' line? Come on..."

"I'm not feelin' very energetic." And with that, Sorun's Bringer Claws flapped their wings and he took off out of the tunnel.

He didn't really have a specific target. As far as Sorun could see, the only weapons all of the Badniks were carrying were of the melee variety from the lances to the mining equipment a majority of them were holding. Considering that, the circular shape of the cavern, and the fact they were all pretty evenly spread out aside from the gathering near the Emerald, he didn't see any advantage to starting in one area over another. So he chose to lock onto a Badnik in the center of the cavern.

As such, he'd touched down in a crouch right next to said Badnik. It hadn't even registered him before his left Bringer Claw slammed its open fist onto the robot, driving it right into the ground.

A small gathering of Egg Pawn miners noticed the scuffle, though by then the Bringer Claw that had slammed onto the Egg Pawn next to Sorun had wrapped its claws around its sparking form and lifted it up into the air. The spectral claw squeezed down, compressing its metallic body and causing it to spark more, and with narrowed eyes Sorun willed the feathered arm to throw the wrecked Badnik at the crowd. The body slammed into one Badnik, causing both to tumble away, and while the other four looked after them a multitude of Summoned Swords shot forth and embedded themselves into their bodies. Amidst all the sparks their lights went dead, and they collapsed.

Sorun stared down at the fallen robots, and then snapped his head in the other direction when he heard heavy footsteps approach him. One of the red-painted Egg Pawns was running right towards him, lance in hand with the tip aimed right at his body. Before it even got close the left Bringer Claw grasped forwards, gripping the shaft of the lance and stopping the Egg Pawn in its place.

With eyes slightly widened in anger, the teen willed the Bringer Claw to rip the lance right out of the Badnik's grasp, after which it flipped the spear around. The Egg Pawn, seeing the large, spectral claw pointing a lance at it, began to slowly back up as Sorun continued to stare at it in complete contempt. "Not so funny being at this end, is it?" he darkly muttered at the robot.

Before the Egg Pawn could even turn to run, the Bringer Claw savagely threw the lance at it. The lance impaled itself through the Badnik's whole torso, the force of the hit knocking the robot onto its back as the half of the lance protruding from its back anchored into the ground. Its lights died shortly after.

Huffing, Sorun turned his head towards the other side of the cavern. He saw Knuckles there, beating apart robot after robot without so much as a sweat. It almost looked like a breeze for the echidna, as one solid punch was all he needed for his spiked fists to completely tear through one of the robots. Nearby Tails was faring about just as well, his yellow form zipping all around the Badniks faster than they could keep up before the young fox would spin his body and smash them apart with his tails. Between the two of them half of the Badnik forces had already been decimated.

"They're fine," Sorun decided as he turned towards the pedestal with the Emerald and the concentrated group of robots near it. "Guess I'll deal with them."

He started walking forwards, noticing handfuls of Egg Pawn begin to charge at him with mining tools and lances. In response, eights Summoned Swords appeared around Sorun in a circle and began spinning. To the teen's surprise, and mild amusement, the Egg Pawns had run right into the Spiral Swords, only to be cut apart from the spinning ring of swords going around the teen. It was enough that all Sorun had to do was calmly walk forwards as any Egg Pawns that neared him were cut in half completely from the swords.

The large gathering of Egg Pawns near the Chaos Emerald saw Sorun approaching, and began readying their weapons. Sorun's reaction was to loudly snap his fingers, causing twenty Summoned Swords to appear in the air above the group with their blades pointed downwards. The Egg Pawns hadn't even noticed the Heavy Rain Swords hanging above their heads, and as such hadn't even attempted to dodge when the cloud of swords rained down upon all of them. With swords sticking out of their bodies, the Egg Pawns dropped their weapons one by one before going offline and falling over.

Right after, the Spiral Swords spinning around Sorun stopped and closed in on the teen's body. Two more Badniks were running towards him, but right as they got close the eight swords surrounding the teen shot forwards. Six missed while two embedded themselves right into the Egg Pawns' faces, causing them to lifelessly fall forwards.

With that done, Sorun let out a slow breath. Nearby behind him he could hear the last of the Badniks hit the ground, and with a confirmatory glance he saw both Knuckles and Tails finishing off the last of the robots. He looked back forwards, and then began walking towards the pedestal.

Some movement caught his eyes as he neared the pedestal, causing him to look downwards. He saw one of the Badniks he'd skewered with the Heavy Rain Swords, filled with gaping puncture marks from the swords that had already disappeared, but still moving slightly with its lights flickering. A heavy scowl formed on Sorun's face as he stared down at the struggling robot.

"You trash..." The right Bringer Claw reached out and slammed its palm down on the Egg Pawn's head. Sorun watched as it lifted the struggling robot up, only for the spectral claw to then slam the Egg Pawn down on the ground three times face-first. Its metallic head cracked completely open upon its third impact with the ground, prompting a scowling Sorun to toss its body off to the side.

As the Bringer Claw folded itself back onto Sorun's shoulder, he heard footsteps approach him from the back. He turned his head just enough to glance behind him, and saw Knuckles slowly approach him while looking around at the cut-up robots strewn about.

"You finished over here already? Nice work." The echidna glanced down at a Egg Pawn cut completely in half at his feet, and then let out a whistle while giving Sorun an approving look. "Wow, you really don't like these things, do you?"

An understatement if ever there was one. He absolutely hated Egg Pawns. "Well... I did almost lose my head to one," Sorun muttered in an unusually low tone. He glanced around at some of the robotic corpses all around them, and his face brightened up slightly. "I feel a bit better now, though."

"Yeah, I bet. You're doing way better now with-" The ground beneath their feet began to rumble, making the two lose their footing while also cutting Knuckles off mid-sentence. "H-hey! What gives!?"

The ground shook again, making Sorun stumble and nearly fall down. He noticed a few small rocks drop on the ground near him, causing the teen to lock upwards. His eyes widened when he saw an unusually large chunk of rock break off from the cavern's ceiling, and when he looked down at the rock's trail, he saw it heading directly towards Knuckles.

Reacting out of alarm, Sorun willed a Bringer Claw forwards to grab the closest part of Knuckles Sorun could see which, unfortunately for the red Mobian, was his small, zig-zag-like tail. The spectral claw clamped down on the appendage, and then wrenched the echidna backwards just as the large boulder fell on the ground he'd been standing on.

As the Bringer Claw pulled back towards Sorun, Knuckles let out a low groan as he rubbed at his backside where his tail had been pulled. He turned his head to glance at the human teen right after, a peeved look on his face. "Warn a guy the next time you do that, will you?"

"'Warn a guy the next time you do that,' yeah, warn a guy the next time you toss a Chaos Emerald in his hands," Sorun bitterly thought, though after taking a calming breath he chose to refrain from saying it aloud. "Aw, you're welcome, Knuckles. You okay?"

"Yeah, fine," he grunted, removing his hand from his back while looking up. "I think we got a bigger problem than a few rocks, though..."

Sorun followed Knuckles' gaze upwards, blue eyes narrowing when he saw a segment of the ceiling began to shake around as more rocks fell from the spot. Eventually, something metallic began to poke through the rock. A small piece of metal that, after revealing itself, exploded through the rest of the rock to reveal a giant, conical drill spinning through the rock.

Nearby across the cavern, a flying Tails had gone up to investigate the vibrations, but had flown away right as the giant drill had burst out from the ceiling. The drill continued spinning until it along with the machine it was attached to, an eight-wheeled box, fell down through the ceiling before crashing down on the ground. The crash had kicked up a large amount of dust, forcing Sorun and Knuckles to cover their eyes from the resulting cloud.

As Sorun continued holding his forearm against his face, he heard a concerning sound. The sound of an engine revving along with the loud whirring sound of the conical drill reached his ears, and he realized too late what was happening as he heard the drill-mounted vehicle drive right towards him and Knuckles. By the time he'd lowered his arm to see, most of the vehicle and the drill mounted to it had already taken up most of his vision, and it was too close and moving too fast for either him or Knuckles to react.

Despite its speed, the drilling machine had missed skewering the pair by a small margin. As it happened, Tails had flown in just in the nick of time, grabbing each of their right arms with one of his own and then pulling them up towards the ceiling with him just as the drilling machine drove through. Both the teenage human and teenage echidna spit any residual dust out of their mouth, and then looked down towards the drilling machine as Tails kept them aloft.

"Oh man, check that out," Tails whispered out in shocked awe as he stared down at the machine. "That must be one of the machines they used to dig out all those tunnels. It's a giant drill!"

Sorun wasn't feeling nearly as enthusiastic in the drill as Tails was. He felt livid, in fact, as he would have been drilled to death seconds prior if not for Tails saving him. He felt incredibly irked for both of these reasons- for almost dying again and having to have been saved by Tails. The anger and adrenaline from the near-death experience alone was drowning out the fearful beat in his heart.

He wanted to kill it.

"I'm gonna tear that drill right off of it..." Sorun growled under his breath as he looked closer to examine the drilling machine. He saw a small driver's cabin on the vehicle portion behind the drill, and inside that cabin he could see an Egg Pawn at the drill's controls. "There's a robot driving the thing," he called out to the two.

"Yeah, I see it," Knuckles called back. "I got an idea how to take care of it, but I don't know how we're gonna stop the drill."

"Oh, don't you worry about the drill. I got it covered." The Bringer Claws manifested on the human's back. "Just take care of the driver and I'll stop the thing."

Knuckles nodded. "Alright, sounds good. Tails, launch me!"

"Got it!"

On the fox's word, he'd released Sorun fist, who flew right above the drilling vehicle with the use of his Bringer Claw's wings. Right afterwards, Tails gripped onto Knuckles' arm with both hands and, using his tails to rotate his whole body, made one complete spin and threw Knuckles towards the machine.

The force of the throw had been so great that Knuckles shot towards the vehicle like a bullet, his spiked fists outstretched towards the driver's cabin. When he finally made contact, he didn't merely hit the cabin. His fists shredded right through the cabin like it was little more than paper, with the Egg Pawn that had been driving it being no exception. The echidna rolled onto the ground, stopping in a kneeling position just as pieces of the destroyed Badnik flew past him.

Though the driver and controls were completely destroyed, the drill was still active and, without any steering, had began driving in random directions. This didn't last long, however, as Sorun dropped right next to the haywire machine with his Bringer Claws hovering over his shoulders. The right feathered arm shot forwards, wrapping its claws around the drill. The vehicle as well as the drill itself was stopped right in its tracks, the sound of whirring motors being heard as the drill worked to try and spin despite the spectral hand holding it in place. Eventually multiple metal snapping sounds were heard, and rather comically the vehicle itself began spinning as opposed to the drill. The left Bringer Claw reached out and grabbed onto the vehicle, stopping it in its place as well as the drill.

Finally, with brows furrowed in anger Sorun willed the Bringer Claws to pull apart. This had the effect of the right Bringer Claw pulling the drill right off the vehicle in a shower of sparks and metal bits, with the vehicle part of the machine losing all turning momentum against the claw holding it. This done, the left claw slammed the vehicle right onto the ground, holding it down as the right claw positioned the removed drill right above it. Without even pausing, the claw holding the drill slammed the cone down point-first right through the vehicle's top and all the way through it until a quarter of its full length pierced through its bottom and into the ground. Not finished yet, both spectral claws let go, hovered above the skewered vehicles, and clasped together before finally hammering down on the head of the broken-off drill. The vehicle was smashed completely following that, with over half of the drill pushed into the ground from all the force that had been applied to it. The freshly-crushed vehicle stopped sputtering and whirring and went completely silent soon after.

Once the violence and dust had settled, the Bringer Claws disappeared completely as Sorun heaved out a large sigh. He was soon flanked by both Knuckles and Tails, who both also had exhausted but relieved looks on their faces as all three stared at the destroyed drilling machine.

"Welp, we did it, lads. Nothin' to it," Sorun congratulated as he weakly held up both hands to give them thumbs-up. He saw Knuckles roll his eyes from the corner of his vision, though he did see the echidna to give him a friendly jab in the side with his elbow. The force alone was more than he expected, causing the pale teen to wince and stumble a single step. He heard Tails giggle right after, and that along with the small smirk Knuckles was wearing caused the teen to make a loudly exaggerated sigh as he turned around.

"Aw, come on, Sorun. Don't be like that," Knuckles said, grin still on his face as he grabbed the human's shoulder and shook it. "You had fun, admit it."

"Yeah, no, almost getting drilled isn't my idea of fun," Sorun retorted, not even bothering to remove the hand on his shoulder. "But... it did feel pretty good pulling that drill off," he admitted, "so, you know, thanks for having my back." He glanced towards Tails. "And, uh... thanks for savin' us back there, Tails."

"Mm-hm! No problem!" The young fox beamed a smile up at Sorun as his twin tails swished happily in the air behind him. "What are teammates for, right? And that was really cool what you did back there with your arms!"

"Er, uh, yeah, well, you know... yeah," Sorun stammered as he turned his abashed face away from Tails, brushing a few bangs of hair in front of his face to hide his embarrassment. When was the last time somebody had called him cool? He couldn't even remember. "Oh hey, guys, look at that! The Chaos Emerald!"

The attempt at diverting the Mobians' attention fortunately worked, leading to all three looking back towards the pedestal holding the Emerald. They approached it immediately, Sorun doing the honor of punching the glass away with a momentarily-formed Bringer Claw to reveal the red gem behind it.

"Hm..." Sorun hummed, warily looked down at the Emerald that glowed such an intense red color. The happy mood from earlier almost instantly washed off of him as he laid his eyes down on it, though he could see from the corner of his eyes the victorious smiles still present on the other two. He couldn't help but be slightly jealous of that, though that jealousy was soon overshadowed with concern over the Emerald. "Hey, Knuckles, why don't you hold onto it?"

"Huh?" Blinking in confusion, Knuckles turned towards Sorun. "Don't you want to-?"

"Here of all places? Seriously? That can wait until we get back," Sorun quickly rebutted as he took a step away from the pedestal. "Besides, red gem, red fur, it was practically made for you to hold it," he continued as he gestured to Knuckles' body.

Knuckles' response was to scoff, but to Sorun's relief he reached over and grabbed the Emerald off the pedestal. To his even further relief nothing else happened. No rumbling as a result of a trap being sprung, no more robots coming out in an ambush, nothing. They'd successfully gotten it. And yet despite that Sorun still felt nothing but anxiety over the gem Knuckles was holding.

"How the hell am I supposed to spin this...?" he thought, unconsciously biting his lower lip as he stared at the Emerald. "So... time to go back now?" he voiced, eyes still on the Emerald.

From his side, Tails nodded. "Yep. Doesn't look like there's any alternative exit in here, though. We'll have to go back the way we came."

At that, Knuckles groaned out loudly. "Are you kidding me!? We gotta walk all the way back through all those tunnels!?"

Normally Sorun would have been just as annoyed, but in this instance he felt the opposite as his head perked up. Time. He had all the time it took them to walk all the way here, and the time it took to fly here from the plane. He had time to think of some excuse not to absorb the Emerald by the time they made it back to Freedom HQ. Plenty of time.

He could make this work.

"Oh, really?" Yawning, Sorun stretched his arms over his head as he turned back towards the tunnel they had emerged from prior to the attack. "Ah, well, nothing to do about it I guess. Come on, guys, let's go."

"Aw, man..." Knuckles sighed, but relented as he began trudging onward right behind Sorun. Tails flew in right besides the echidna, offering him a helpful smile.

"Don't worry, guys. Since we're just heading straight back we'll be home in no time!" he cheerily supplied, causing Sorun to flinch.

"Ah, that's... that's great," the pale teen said, craning his head back to give the pair a forced grin. "That's... real great..."

He was wrong. He hadn't been able to think of anything.

Try as he might, no matter how much Sorun wracked his brain, he just couldn't find a good excuse to not absorb the Chaos Emerald for more power without telling the truth, which obviously wasn't an option for him. By the time the trio had finally exited the mountain he'd begun to grow worried by his inability to think of something. By the time the Tornado had approached Knothole he'd begun nervously fidgeting. And now they were walking into Freedom HQ and Sorun was in full-on panic mode, doing his best to suppress it while his eyes darted nervously from looking forwards to Knuckles and the Emerald.

"Damn it. I got nothing. This isn't good..." They'd already descended the stairs into the main living room. Interestingly, Sorun saw the only two other people currently there were Rouge and Bunnie, all the way towards the back and talking. "There aren't many people here," he realized with slightly raised eyes. "Okay, maybe I can weasel out and just leave. That'll buy me all the way until tomorrow, maybe, and after that..." He exhaled and began to nervously scratch at his neck. "Fuck, am I gonna have to bail already?"

It was too soon. He hadn't prepared himself yet physically or mentally. He had no idea what the lay of the land was and he didn't know where he was supposed to go if he did run. But if it was between that or losing twelve more years of his life, the choice was obvious. He'd run. But he just couldn't decide on what to do.

"If I stall until tomorrow and leave tonight... wait, but Sonic might catch me, we sleep in the same room. And no way in hell am I gonna outfly a guy that can run faster than sound." He took another look around the room, and then back towards Bunnie and Rouge, who had finally noticed the trio enter. "... Sonic's not here right now." He glanced at the Emerald Knuckles was holding. "... No, it's too soon. Is it? I can't- I'm not touching that thing. I can't. Stall. I just gotta stall for more time."

"Hey, boys. You just get back from that Emerald run you got sent on?" This was voiced by Rouge, who along with Bunnie stopped right in front of the trio. "It certainly looks like it was a success," she added when she saw the gleaming red Emerald in Knuckles' grasp.

"Heh, yeah, it went down fine," Sorun confirmed, eyes slowly scanning around the HQ. "Hey, Sonic's not here, is he?" he asked.

"No, he's still on his own mission with a few of the others." Rouge rose up one of her eye ridges in question. "Why do you ask?"

Sorun shrugged. "Just curious. No other reason."

Off to the side, one of the doors to one of the HQ's bedroom began rattling. Sorun's eyes flicked over to it right as it opened, and he felt his own teeth clack together in concern when he saw a striped hedgehog poke his head out from the door.

"Dammit. He's here," Sorun thought as he watched the door open further as Shadow looked towards them. "He's fast, too. Up there with Sonic 'cause of those shoes of his. I can't fly faster than he can run, either."

"I thought I felt a familiar presence enter the base," Shadow remarked as he approached the group, eyes locked onto the Emerald. "You managed to acquire another one, it seems."

"... Yup," Sorun silently murmured as he back up near the couch. "Fought a drill and everything."

"Yeah, it was really crazy," Tails excitedly said, bouncing towards Bunnie with wide eyes. "You should have seen it! There were all these tunnels and this crazy drill machine but Sorun fought it off with his Chaos arms and- oh, wait, but before that...!"

The more Tails spoke, the more enraptured with the story the rabbit he was talking to became. In fact, everybody began paying rapt attention to Tails as he continued to recount their adventure under that mountain. Even Knuckles became distracted by the story, though it seemed to be more out of amusement for listening to Tails speak of them from the small grin on his face.

To Sorun, however, it was an opportunity. An opportunity to get the hell out before anybody brought up the Emerald.

"Okay. Okay, if there was ever a time, it's now." He eyed the group of five in front of him, and then slowly looked towards the HQ stairs. "Alright... just slip out while they're all talking, go home, and wait for all this to blow over. Dunno what the hell I'll do tomorrow, though."

Didn't matter. More time was more time, which increased his odds of thinking up something. And with that thought squarely planted in his mind, he turned his back towards the group and began to slowly but calmly walk his way towards the stair.

"Sorun."

He'd only made it halfway before he heard his name be spoken. He silently cursed, and then slowly turned around with as straight a face as he could manage. Shadow was standing right behind him. The red Chaos Emerald was in his right hand.

"Yes?" Sorun asked, the smallest bit of shakiness layered in his otherwise even voice.

"I think you're forgetting something," Shadow said, crossing his arms while staring the human right in his eyes.

Sorun looked down at the Emerald, swallowed nervously, and then looked back to Shadow. "No, I don't think I am," he said.

"The Chaos Emerald." The dark hedgehog took a single step forwards. Sorun took a single step back. "You gain powers from them, do you not?"

"... You know what, man, it's been a long day." His greatest hope now was that he could just play off being tired. Wanting to wait until tomorrow. That had to work. "We had a long mission, tons of robots, lots of walking-"

"It's still daylight outside," Shadow argued.

Feigning exhaustion hadn't worked at all, and it was with slumped shoulders that Sorun instantly realized this. "Look, can this just wait until tomorrow?" he asked. "I'll get up bright and early and come here first thing first to absorb it, but I just want to take the rest of the day off, alright?"

Shadow's eyes narrowed. "Is absorbing the Chaos Emerald physically strenuous for you?"

"No," Sorun said with a small shake of his head.

"Is there any justifiable reason for you wanting to hold off on this until tomorrow?"

Yes, but he couldn't say. "... No," the human admitted, "but-"

"Then I see no reason why you should delay." Shadow took another step forwards and uncrossed his arms, the Emerald glinting almost dangerously in his hand. "I'm aware that you have some aversion towards the Chaos Emeralds for whatever reason, but this isn't a time to let petty emotions get in the way."

"'Petty emotions'...?" Sorun repeated in his head, hands twitching at his sides.

"Like it or not, you're a member of this team, and this team is quite literally the only thing left standing between Dr. Eggman and total world domination," Shadow continued. "You get stronger with every single Emerald you absorb. We need all of our members as strong as possible if we are to even stand a ghost of a chance, and the longer you delay the more chances arise for something to happen to the Emerald because you decided to stall." He would have went further, but the hedgehog stopped himself when he saw the way Sorun's eyes were nervously looking at the Emerald, eyes slightly shaking. He sighed, and then tried again. "Sorun, listen," Shadow said in a slightly softer voice, "I know that this life isn't one you asked for, and that you would rather be anywhere else, but this is the reality we're in right now." He held the Emerald out towards Sorun. "As much as we both wish it wasn't so, it is, so please just take-"

There was a flash of blue. In a single movement the Chaos Emerald was slapped right out of Shadow's hand by a Bringer Claw, both spectral appendages hovering over Sorun's shoulders. The four Mobians in the back who had been watching the exchange silently widened their eyes in shock at the action. Even Shadow seemed surprised, having flexed his now-free hand with raised eye ridges before looking back up at Sorun.

"I'm not touching that thing ," Sorun hissed out. His entire body was shaking slightly at this point, but he stood rooted to the spot as he tried his best to stare Shadow down. "I'm never going to touch it, so quit asking."

Behind Shadow, Tails pushed towards the front of the small group, his expression concerned. "H-hey, Sorun, come on-"

The red-striped Mobian held a hand out, stopping the fox's advance. At the same time, his eyes began to shift from being sympathetic towards irritated. "And why not, Sorun?" he asked, an angered edge to his voice. "Is there any particular reason you are refusing more power? Power that is sorely needed in a war we're on the losing end of?"

Oh, how he wanted to say everything. To spill it all to them and pray that they would understand that he just couldn't and let the matter be. But he couldn't. He couldn't and the same things he'd been worrying about happening was happening. And he just couldn't think of what to say to get him out of this.

"I... I just don't want to," he mumbled, turning his head to avoid Shadow's scathing gaze. "It... really hurts, touching those things..." A pathetic excuse he would have never willingly used, but it was all he had . And unfortunately it didn't seem like it was enough, because if anything that answer only seemed to anger Shadow even further.

"Is this a joke?" Shadow harshly demanded. "We have people going out there in the field every single day, putting their lives on the line and getting wounded time and time again, but you're not going to absorb that Chaos Emerald because it hurts ?"

Sorun was fully aware of how shameful and pathetic the excuse was. Enough that Sorun felt angry at himself for even insinuating such a thing, so when Shadow rounded on him with such a harsh tone, he snapped his head back towards the hedgehog with angered eyes. "It's more than that, alright!? I can't because-!"

Thump-thump.

Gritting his teeth, Sorun lowered his head to the ground as the stabbing pain of his heart stopping spiked through his chest. But even so, desperation still coursed through him, so fighting through the pain he slowly lifted his head up and tried speaking again. "I-I can't-"

Thump-thump.

This time he had to grip his chest as he stumbled back. The pain went away quickly, though, causing Sorun to let out a breath of relief. Too quickly for any of the Mobians to notice anything, apparently, as Shadow was still harshly staring him down while the crowd in the back just stared owlishly at Sorun.

Shadow shook his head in disbelief. "That's a lie." The hedgehog began stomping towards the human, the metal jets underneath his shoes threatening to leave indents into the ground. "Even you are not that pathetic as to let something as trivial as pain stop you. So what is it? Why won't you take it?"

"... I can't say," Sorun answered, straightening back to his full height. Shadow didn't seem to like his answer, though, and was practically snarling as he stopped mere inches from the human.

"If you can't answer, than you don't have an excuse!" he shouted at him. "You are honestly going to tell me you're going jeopardize the fate of the world because of some nonsense, personal reason you refuse to even speak of-!?"

"What does it matter to you, anyways!?" It was here that it was all starting to boil over. The frustration at not being able to speak the truth. Sorun's life being threatened from damn near everything on this planet. Shadow shouting at him and trying to force the Emerald on him. It was all beginning to become too much, and Sorun felt all the anger rapidly accumulating in him begin to leak out. "You're not the one touching these things for powers! It's me! It's my choice, and you don't get to tell me what I have to do with that Emerald! I don't have to do anything!"

Shadow's red eyes were practically blazing in anger at this point. "You're a Freedom Fighter! You made an obligation to help this planet regardless of personal cost-!"

"I never wanted to be a Freedom Fighter!" Sorun shouted back. "I never wanted to go out there and risk my life! I never wanted to train to be the poor excuse of a resistance soldier I am right now! I did it because it was best chance of going home, but guess what!? I probably can never go home! So what's the point of being a Freedom Fighter if I can't even get that!?"

"SO RUN, THEN!"

The only sound heard after the final shout was the heavy breathing of both Sorun and Shadow, the two winded from the shouting match. The other four chose to remain completely silent, though all four were still staring at Sorun with increasingly concerned expressions. Shadow still looked beyond angry at Sorun. Sorun's anger, however, was slowly being replaced by an unreadable expression.

"... What?" the human asked, blinking in surprise at Shadow. "What did you just say?"

"If you don't want to be here, then run away," Shadow reiterated with a disgusted sneer. "You're right; we don't have any say in what you do. And as far as I'm concerned, we don't need to be wasting time on a coward like you who doesn't want to fight with us. So if you really don't want to fight, if you really want to abandon everybody who have done nothing but try and help you, then go. Leave. I won't follow."

... Was he serious?

He had to be. Sorun knew Shadow's personality relatively well. Well enough to know that he wouldn't lie about something as serious as that. It was a legitimate dare. A dare for Sorun to throw away everything the Freedom Fighters had done for him and run away. To leave it all behind.

And Sorun would take that dare. Because as far as he was concerned, that was his golden ticket out of here. So this was it, then.

Time to bail.

"... Okay." Sorun's answer, spoken barely above a whisper, caused mixed reactions. Shadow's body had stiffened, his eyes widening slightly in surprise as if he hadn't expected that answer. Rouge had a similar reaction, if a bit more exaggerated. Tails, Knuckles, and Bunnie had all three widened their eyes to the absolute max in shock at the humans words as a loud gasp left them. "I'm done. I'm leaving and never coming back."

And without another word, Sorun turned around and stormed up the stairs, the blue wings of his Bringer Claws trailing behind him.

"He... actually left...?"

No sooner had the human ascended the flight of stairs than two forms bolted past Shadow to give chase to the human. He vaguely noted them as being the fox and rabbit, though he was still too busy mentally processing what had just happened to pay too much attention. Behind him, Knuckles was frozen to the spot in a similar stupefied state.

"- adow? Shadow!?" He blinked, and then turned towards the voice calling him. He saw the voice's owner as Rouge, who looked, for lack of a better term, distressed. "Are you serious? What were you thinking!?" she yelled at him while wildly gesturing towards the stairs. "Why'd you go and say that to him!?"

"I didn't think he'd actually leave," he said back, unusually calm. He really hadn't, either. Sorun was full of negative traits, but cowardice to this degree? Abandoning them all and running away? And for what ? So he didn't have to touch the Emeralds? So he didn't have to fight anymore because he didn't want to?

No, he hadn't expected that at all. His intention had just been for the human to see sense and to finally just take responsibility and take the Emerald. He hadn't expected him to seriously entertain Shadow's dare and actually leave.

"Well guess what, genius? He left!" Rouge shouted at him, almost voicing his own thoughts. "He left because you had to go and goad him into leaving like that! Why'd you push the Emerald on him so hard!?"

"You know why," he muttered back, looking towards where the Emerald had fallen and going towards it. "We need every edge we can get in a hopeless war like this, even if that edge comes in the form of somebody like Sorun. If he won't fight, though, then he has no use. Nothing I said was untrue." He bent down to pick the Emerald up, brushing off the small amount of dust it accumulated. "Besides. He'll come back."

There was a disbelieving scoff from Rouge behind him. "Oh, really? And how do you figure that, huh?"

"What was he saying about his home?" With a impatient sigh, Shadow turned back towards the bat. "Where else is he going to go, Rouge?" he asked her. "Knothole is the only location on the entire planet he is familiar with. This is nothing but a childish tantrum he's throwing for reasons only known to him. He'll come back."

"Sure, fine, he comes back. And then what?"

That, he had no answer to. Even so, Shadow severely hoped he was right in assuming the human would come back and that he hadn't just scared him off of the resistance. The one thing keeping him from breaking his word and chasing after the human to drag him back was in his own logic telling him Sorun had to eventually return.

He hoped so much he was right and hadn't just made a terrible mistake.

"S-Sorun, wait!"

He'd only made it a few steps outside before he heard Tails' voice call out to him. It went ignored, though, as the Bringer Claws beat down on the ground and lifted the pale teen up into the air. He didn't get very far in the air, though. Tails had flown in right in front of him, a desperate look in his eyes.

"Get outta the way," Sorun said, stopping in the air as the Bringer Claws slowly flapped to keep him aloft. "I'm serious. I'm leaving."

"Sorun, just hold on a second now!" That was a new voice. Bunnie's. He turned his head around to see the rabbit floating in the air just behind him, body held up from the jets firing out from the bottom of her bionic feet. "I don't know what's got ya'll in a twist, but runnin' away ain't gonna solve yer problems! Come down so we can talk!"

There was something heart wrenching in how worried she and Tails sounded. The fact there were people that even bothered to worry about him, and that he was doing this to them, was heart wrenching. It was all twisting a terrible knot inside of his chest, and he wanted nothing more than to go down to the ground and explain everything.

But he couldn't. And his life was more important than some hopeless cause that was just waiting to be bombed to oblivion by a madman. He was leaving, and they weren't going to stop him.

"This isn't something we can talk out. I'm not staying here just to die." Sorun's spectral wings pushed him past Tails, though he only made it a few feet before Tails flew in front of his path again.

"Sorun, just please wait!" Tails begged him. "Y-you're overreacting! I know being a Freedom Fighter can be dangerous, but we wouldn't let you die-!"

Sorun's teeth grit in anger. He didn't understand. Nobody did. Nobody could because of this damned curse . "Get out of my way, Tails."

Tails shook his head. "I'm not doing that. I know... I know you're scared, Sorun," he said, and the teen's ire began to grow exponentially at each word, "I know you're upset about your home, but this isn't-!"

The right Bringer Claw shot out and grabbed Tails. The fox let out a startled yelp and attempted to struggle against it, but he was completely trapped with all five spectral claws tightly wrapped around his entire body.

"Buzz off, Tails!" Sorun screamed as the Bringer Claw reared backwards. It flung forwards, letting go and throwing a screaming Tails at Bunnie, who could only stare in shock as he crashed into her body. The hit caused her to lose her balance, and with the young fox held in her arms Sorun watched as both Bunnie and Tails crashed towards the ground.

Right before they'd hit the ground, Bunnie had twisted her body back upwards and managed to stabilize their descent as the jets under her feet flared brighter. They stopped just inches above the ground, with both her and Tails looking up at Sorun. The human stared down back at them, meeting their pleading eyes with his own anguished eyes.

And then, he turned around. His Bringer Claws began flapping, and he took off towards the sky. By the time both Tails and Bunnie had flown back to their previous altitude, the pale teen had already flown out of sight.

Just like that, he was gone.

A/N- It's probably obvious by now, but in addition to the Latin thing from chapter 16 Sorun's name comes from the phrase "So Run", which in itself is a direct allusion to the fact that Sorun just wants to run away from danger. It's also a reference to the relationship Sorun and Sonic share, along with their names sounding similar and the blue color scheme both of them have. Sonic's purpose in the story is essentially to serve as a foil to Sorun's character, as from an ideological perspective they hold completely different beliefs. Sonic runs towards danger of his own volition, whereas Sorun wishes to run away from danger but cannot due to his circumstances. Despite that, though, they both still share a desire to protect others, but differ in that Sonic protects through completely altruistic reasons while Sorun protects through personal and pragmatic reasons, though his sense of self-preservation and just wanting to leave everybody behind to save himself overrides this along with everything else going on with him.

That's my interpretation of it, at least. Characters and their ideals are always subject to change through progression, though, for better or worse. Can't just have them be flat and static throughout the whole story. That'd be boring.

But anyways, yeah, Sorun's out boys and girls. He's out.

Chapter 21

Recursion Error

Episode 21- So I ran

So he'd done it. He'd ran away.

Bailed.

Gotten the fuck outta dodge.

It had to happen eventually, though if he could have he would have done it in a more quiet fashion. Gone out when nobody was looking, maybe leave behind a note so they didn't wonder why he just up and disappeared on them. He would have been nice enough to have left them with some closure.

Instead that happened. Him and Shadow blowing up at each other. Telling those five he was leaving. The actual act of leaving and throwing Tails in the process. He found it a miracle he'd managed to get away at all without being chased, but he'd gone so high into the clouds that he was practically invisible. He also decided never to fly that high that fast ever again, because his head absolutely did not agree with the rapid change in pressure.

But he'd successfully gotten away, and that's all that mattered. So where did that leave Sorun? Well, that was the thing. He didn't rightly know.

When he'd flown up into the sky, he didn't come down for a while. A long while. He hadn't even paid attention to which direction he decided to go in. He just picked a random direction and kept flying forwards, sheer adrenaline and panic from making his big move motivating him forwards. It all wore off eventually, though, which was when he dropped down through the clouds, headed for ground, and finally landed before he started walking.

The problem was that the whole eastern half of Northamer was nothing but forests and plains; any discernible landmarks of the old world were washed away by time and gene bombs, so he had no idea where he was. All he saw were trees. Trees and more trees all around, without even so much as a path to follow. So as far as he could tell, geographically speaking, he was somewhere between the most southern point of what was once America and the most northern point of what was once America. On the eastern half.

So he was lost then. Fantastic.

"Well, Sorun, what'd you think was gonna happen when you decided to bail on everything and run away? You didn't exactly plan on where you would bail to," The human teen mumbled to himself as he walked through the forest. "Ugh. Could be worse, at least. This forest isn't the worst place in the world to walk through."

Honestly, aside from areas around any of Eggman's structures, the environment around Mobius was always nice. Great temperature, great air, clear skies when there wasn't a storm. Even the forest itself was accommodating. The trees were high and numerous, but they weren't so overly dense that he had trouble navigating through them. There was actually plenty of room between all the trees for him to hike around.

Still lost, though, but at least he was lost in the nice part of the world.

"Alright, so where am I going?" Sorun asked himself as he kept walking forwards. "I gotta get out of Northamer, that much is certain. Kingdom of Acorn is situated here, so there's too big a chance of somebody finding me, even if it is small. Down to Soumerca? Nah, nothing but jungle down there from what I heard. Except Station Square is near where Brazil once... except it's occupied by Eggman like the rest of the world, damn," the teen cursed with a snap of his fingers.

"Okay, east, then? Towards where the human and Overlander territory is? What was that one place called, Spagonia? That or one of the other UF cities. Maybe go back to life among humans." That'd be nice. Maybe get some sense of normalcy back to his life by surrounding himself with faces similar to his. It wouldn't be Earth, not by a long shot, but it would be close. "No, wait, all the UF cities got occupied by Eggman along with G.U.N., too, didn't they? And he knows my face. Probably on a wanted list or something like that."

So... that left out any and all human and Overlander territory, then. And anywhere else Eggman had taken over, which was practically almost the whole world. Unfortunate, but nothing that he could do about it.

"Where does that leave me? Downunda?" He made a disgusted face and stuck his tongue out. "Oh, hell no. Not a chance. Yurashia? Go oriental? Eh... maybe, I dunno. Efrika? Not really a fan of the heat, and that's where Africa used to be. But then again maybe all the climate fuckery done by the gene bombs made it cooler. It sure feels nice here." He softly groaned and began to rub at his eyes. "Maybe I should have actually planned an actual exit strategy. I thought I had more time, though. Ugh..." His hands flopped down to his side. "What are you thinking, Sorun? All those places are on the other side of the world. I mean, maybe I could make it to Mercia, but that's still all the way past former Canada. And there's no way I can make a trip like that. I never packed any food."

A really shortsighted decision on his part, really. In fact the only food he was running on was a spoonful of cereal from this morning. He hadn't eaten anything else all day, and that was after having fought a bunch of robots after spelunking through a mountain and running for his life.

He was actually kind of hungry now that he thought about it.

"Shoulda at least prepared a bug-out bag or something," he scolded himself. "Damn. Alright, maybe I'm stuck in Northamer because my dumb ass didn't actually prepare to make a long trip of any kind."

Given more time and preparation, he might have been able to pull something together. With a bit more foresight he may have actually been able to prepare in advance. Hindsight was twenty-twenty, he supposed. Too bad he was probably gonna starve at the cost of learning that lesson. He couldn't even go back to Knothole if he wanted to since he was lost.

"Maybe I'll run into a village or something," he reasoned with himself as he ducked under a low-hanging branch. "They'd give me some food, right? Mobians are nice. I could just pretend to be a weird nomad guy or whatever, they set me up with some supplies, and then... then...

"... What the hell is my actual plan here...?"

After all this time, he only now just realized that he'd spent so much time thinking about leaving that he hadn't thought about what he was going to do once he left. The only thing on his mind had been getting away from Knothole. To get away from the Emeralds and fighting so he could survive. Well, that part was done with, now, so now what? Find a way home?

Except what was he going to do on that front? Find a way to extract the Emeralds? Using what? Gather the rest of the Emeralds? He didn't know how he'd do that, and even if by some miracle he did the final Emerald, and Tails, who was the only one who could use the machine to send him back, were all back in Knothole. Which meant that, if he really did go down that route, he'd inevitably come into contact with all the Freedom Fighters again, and that was not an ideal prospect for him. So what was he actually supposed to do now that he was gone?

"... Let's just focus on finding a village and work from there," Sorun murmured to himself, sighing as he looked towards a tree. He hummed, and looked down to its base, where he saw a patch of green moss growing. "Hm. 'Moss always points to civilization.' Heh heh... man, I miss Earth." He turned his head towards the direction the moss was growing in. "Is that thing about moss always pointing north actually true, though? If I just head in one direction I gotta hit something eventually. Or maybe I can use the sun? It goes from east to west, right?" He looked up towards the forest's canopy. "Or, wait, was it west to east? No, it was east to west. I think. Maybe. Wait, but what if it's different on this world? Shit." He looked down at the moss again, sighed, and pointed towards the direction the moss was growing in. "Screw it, I'll just trust in the moss. Maybe find a rock to drive like the pioneers of old." He started walking, a joyless chuckle leaving him. "Man, I really miss Earth."

Was deciding to travel in a direction for no other reason than because of moss the wisest decision for him to make? In all honesty, probably not. He didn't know. But it was better than wandering aimlessly until he possibly starved to death because he ended up going in circles due to being directionally challenged. And he had to run into some form of civilization if he just kept going in one direction, right? It made perfect logical sense.

Some thirty minutes later and he was still hiking through forest, occasionally looking towards a tree to check on the moss to ensure he was heading in the right direction. Still no sign of civilization, but it was progress forwards. At least that's what he was telling himself, and that singular belief was about the only thing keeping him going. He did, after continually walking forwards, hear something aside from the quiet sounds of the forest, which immediately drew the teen's attention. The sound of running water, like from a waterfall or a river. So, without any other locations to go towards, Sorun wandered towards the sound of water.

Following the sounds lead him past a barrier of bushes and right into, from appearances, a large grove. It was relatively clear of trees with an exception of a couple scattered around, the entire perimeter surrounded by more forest. The source of the sound of rushing water was revealed to be a small rock plateau nearby streaming water into a pond in the middle of the grove.

It would have been beautiful if it weren't for the fact the place was completely wrecked.

The few trees that were in the grove were cut down and burned. The grass carpeting the entire grove that Sorun was sure was once a luscious green was completely scorched. And littered around the destroyed groves were Eggman's robots. A dozen or so Egg Pawns that were completely destroyed, their parts strewn about the grove. Unfortunately it seemed that the oil from the inside of the machines had leaked into the ground and stream, coloring what was likely once a crystal-clear pond into a pond full of murky, dark water.

"... Jeez, the hell happened here...?" Sorun muttered to himself as he slowly walked into the destroyed grove. "Looks like somebody went to town here. What were a bunch of Badniks doing in some random-ass grove, though?" He glanced around at the line of forest trees surrounding the grove's perimeter. "The rest of the forest doesn't even look like it was touched," he continued to himself, "so what was the deal with this place?"

He glanced down at one of the destroyed Egg Pawns. Like the rest, it was cut completely to pieces. Cut... oddly cleanly, too. So cleanly and precisely that he had to wonder just what was able to cut apart a titanium-plated robot so perfectly. "What in the world managed to slice these robots up so neatly?"

Squish!

Sorun froze, and looked down at his foot. He lifted his boot, and then grimaced when he saw a bloodied... appendage of some sort that he'd accidentally stepped on. He wasn't really sure what it was. It had the appearance of a stubby, light blue arm with no hand or fingers with a yellow tip. The other end was was torn and bloodied red, likely having been torn off whatever was attached to it. It was small, too- just barely larger than his longest finger, and at least twice as thick. It was small enough at least that he wasn't surprised he hadn't seen it before stepping on it.

The more he looked around after seeing the strange limb, the more he realized there were more pieces of whatever this creature was scattered around. Lots of them, too, as there were dozens of mauled severed limbs and bodies scattered all about the burned grove, all lying amidst the destroyed Egg Pawns.

"Ooh, that's... man..." So that's what happened. For whatever reason these Egg Pawns had come here to wipe out... whatever these small creatures living in this grove were. He didn't know if they either fought back or something or someone else came around to destroy them, but it seemed like they succeeded nonetheless. And now Sorun couldn't help but acknowledge the bad feeling growing in his stomach when he looked around at all the carnage. "Fuckin' Eggman..."

"C-chao..."

Sorun's ears perked up upon hearing the high-pitched call of whatever made that noise, and he turned his head to follow the sound. Towards the source of the noise was fallen tree, burned into a black husk with its top half completely missing. When Sorun looked closer, his found his eyes widening when he saw a small something trapped underneath the burned tree and wiggling around in an effort to try and free itself.

A sad frown frown formed on the teen's face, and his right Bringer Claw manifested over his shoulder. It slowly reached out, grabbed the fallen tree, and gently lifted it off of the struggling creature before setting it back on the burned ground far away. The singular Bringer Claw returned and folded onto Sorun's shoulder afterwards as he stepped forwards to get a good look at the thing that had been pinned under the tree.

It... was small. That was the first thing he noticed. Around the size of a large plush doll. Its main body was roundish, with its two arms and legs lacking feet or hands much like the limb he stepped on earlier. Weirdly its head was a teardrop-shaped thing that lacked any features aside from a mouth and two wide, iris-less eyes with large dark blue pupils, with its entire body being blue with the exception for yellow tips on its arms, legs, the top of its head, and a strange yellow dot floating above the point of its head.

"... What even is this thing?" Sorun thought to himself as he watched the blue creature slowly stumble up to its feet. "It's like a... blue marshmallow... monster thingy."

The creature managed to rise up to its feet fully, and then blinked its owlish eyes up at Sorun, who stepped back in surprise when he saw the yellow dot floating above its head shift into the shape of a yellow question mark. It took a single step towards him, and then elicited a high-pitched yelp as it fell forwards onto its face.

Blinking, Sorun leaned forwards towards the fallen thing to look at its back. The only two things of note he saw were the blue, ball-like tail on its backside and a pink, heart-shaped, insect-like wing appendage on the left side of its back. He assumed there was supposed to be a wing on the right side, too, but in its place was an empty spot and a bloody gash on its back where the wing was likely supposed to be attached.

The blue creature managed to eventually stand up on its tiny, stubby legs, looking around for a little bit until its round eyes stopped on one of the few standing trees near the edge of the grove. Its surviving left wing began buzzing in an attempt to fly, and though it managed to lift on the ground and flew forwards a few inches, it crashed back onto the ground shortly after, Sorun wincing at the sight. It picked itself back up right after and began waddling towards the tree.

"This is just sad to watch," Sorun morosely thought as he watched the blue thing stop at the trunk of the tree. It looked up and reached out towards the branches, Sorun looking up along with it to see a bunch of red apples hanging off of the tree's branches. He looked back down to the blue thing, wincing again when he saw it try to fly towards the apples, not even making it halfway up the tree before falling down again. "It can't even get food anymore 'cause its wing-gah, I can't watch this."

Watching the little creature struggle just to try and feed itself caused something to wrench inside of Sorun's chest, so he endeavored to try and do something about it. He once more looked back up towards the apples, and willed the Bringer Claw resting on his shoulder to reach up towards the branches they were connected to. The spectral claw shot up, and then very gingerly plucked one of the apples off a branch with its talon. The blue thing watched the spectacle, its head slowing turning back to Sorun as the Bringer Claw brought the apple back to his right hand before disappearing.

"... Here," Sorun said, lightly tossing the apple so that it rolled onto the ground near the blue thing. It chirped happily, and then bounded towards the apple. It wrapped its small arms around the fruit once reaching it, and then began to ravenously chomp down on it as it ate the apple.

"Well, there's my good deed for the day." Satisfied, Sorun looked back up at the burned grove. "... I've had enough of this place," he said to himself, and then turned around to walk towards the nearest exit point.

"Chao?"

The pale teen stopped in his tracks, and then swiveled his head around behind him. The blue thing had already finished the apple, as it was now nothing but a apple core sitting on the ground. The creature itself was standing upright in front of the easten apple, staring straight up at Sorun. The yellow ball floating above its head had turned back into a question mark.

"..." Sorun stared back at it for a few seconds, and then turned back around to walk forwards again. He walked five steps, and then abruptly stopped and turned his head back to the thing.

It was the exact same distance away from him as it was before he started moving. Like it was following him.

"..." Still looking at the creature, Sorun took a single step forwards to confirm his suspicion. And just as he thought, it took a step forwards as well. "Oh, come on, no," he groaned in exasperation as he fully turned to face the creature. "Look, you can't come with me. Go home."

The question mark turned back into a dot as the creature's head turned around towards the grove, as if gesturing towards it. Sorun followed its gaze, his stern expression softening when he saw the devastated landscape it was looking at.

"Oh, I... guess this was your home, huh? And all those bodies and parts were your... pals, I guess..." Come to think of it, there weren't any other living ones around that he saw. Just the one-winged one. All the rest were just dead ones scattered around. "Don't tell you're the last one here left," he mumbled as Sorun and the creature faced back towards each other. It looked up to him with a saddened expression, the dot on top of its head forming into a swirling pattern.

"... Okay, listen, I get that... your whole community here just got obliterated," Sorun said, feeling awful at himself as the words came out of his mouth, "and you probably can't stay here since the whole grove looks wasted, but I can't take a pet along with me. Go somewhere else."

The saddened expression on the blue creature's face didn't leave. In fact, it looked pleading now.

"Hey, don't give me that face." Growing increasingly uncomfortable under its gaze, Sorun was forced to turn his head to the side as a low breath escaped him. "Dude, come on..." He squeezed his eyes shut in thought, and after a few seconds his shoulders slumped as a defeated sigh left him. "Ugh, for the love of..."

"Chao-chao!"

"Shut up."

Alright, so he'd decided to take it with him. It's not like he could have just left it in the wasteland that was once its home, amidst the body of all its former friends and family with a polluted pond. It couldn't even reach up towards trees for food anymore with its missing wing, so it would probably starve to death eventually if he left it alone.

It wasn't like he wanted to bring it along. He just felt responsible for it now since he saved it from that tree that trapped it and already fed it. So leaving it alone to die would just be irresponsible of Sorun, and that would leave a bad taste in his mouth. So the thing was his now, he guessed. On the upside he didn't feel so lonely anymore.

On the downside, they were still lost. He'd taken a bunch of apples from that tree and stuffed his pockets with them, so that was the food situation taken care of for the time being, but they were still technically lost. And his faith in moss had been all but lost by this point, so it was back to aimlessly wandering in a single direction they went.

"Chao!"

"Ugh..." Sorun's head fell, and then picked back up to look at his left shoulder. The blue thing couldn't fly anymore, and with those stubby legs there was no way it could keep up with his walking speed. So it elected to cling onto his left shoulder, its head and arms resting over the shoulder's top with the creature's face turned towards Sorun.

He didn't really mind, since the small weight on his shoulder was somewhat of a comforting reminder he had a companion now, but the thing would not stop making those happy noises and it was beginning to grow on his nerves.

"Would you just be quiet for five minutes, you little...!" Sorun stopped himself. What was he supposed to call this thing? "... Alright, look, if you're gonna be taggin' along with me, you're gonna need a name." He reached his right hand towards it, the little creature offering no resistance as he plucked it off his shoulder. The blue thing safely fit in the palm of his hand, with its body being just small enough to comfortably rest there as it stared back up at the human. "Okay, so what am I supposed to call you...?"

There had to be some name for its species, though he didn't have a clue as to what it was. So just calling it by that was out. A proper name, then. But what was he supposed to go with? The teen never had to name a pet before in his life, and he didn't know what other people based their pet names off of.

"Jeez, uh... name it after somebody I know? Don't really know if I want a little blue thing called "David" or "Dave" followin' me around. That just sounds lame. Mom's name? Nah, that's even lamer, and I'm pretty sure this thing is a guy. I think?" As far as he could see he couldn't see any identifying traits on it to tell if it was male or female. Maybe its species was monogendered. He didn't know. "I'll just go with it being a guy. Getting a guy vibe from it," he thought. "Uhhh... screw it, this world's already making me steal stuff from 'Devil May Cry', and that series had some pretty rocking names in it. Let's just take some names, too, while we're at it.

"But what to go with? Well... since he's kinda my pet now, uh... Nero?" He blinked in contemplation, and then tilted his head to the side. "How do you feel about Nero?" Sorun asked him. "You like that name? Nero?"

The blue thing tilted his head along to the side with him, blinking up at him with a blank expression.

"I don't think he likes it. Plus 'Nero' doesn't really go along with his color scheme," Sorun thought as he turned his head to the side. "Hm... Why not just go with Vergil? Cool name, but... nah, I'm not gonna disrespect Vergil by naming this thing after him. It really is a cool name, though, so maybe... I could do something similar? As a homage or something?" He hummed in thought. "Didn't he anagram his name in that one side book? Gilver? Nah. Sounds too much like Gilbert. Maybe... oh. Oh! What about that!?"

"How about Virgil?" Sorun asked as he turned his head back to the thing. "It's like Vergil, but spelled with an 'i' instead of an 'e'. Huh? Huh? Whatcha think?"

The creature's head straightened up, and the yellow dot shifted back into a question mark.

"Well, Virgil with an 'i' is the Latin spelling of Vergil," Sorun explained, "and since mom isn't here I gotta keep the tradition of naming things in Latin going, y'know?" He reached over with his free hand and poked the thing on the side of his face. "C'mon, Virgil's a cool name. It's named after one of my favorite people in all of fiction, and that guy was really cool. You wanna be cool, don't you?"

The reaction he got from the blue thing seemed to be positive, as his face lit up in a large smile. "Chao-chao! Chao-chao!" He began clapping his small arms together, and the yellow dot floating above his head shifted into a heart shape.

"I... guess that means you like it," Sorun decided. "Alright, then, Virgil," he said as he placed Virgil back on his shoulder, "let's go. And keep all the chaoing down, huh?"

"Chao." He would assume that was a confirmatory noise.

And with his new companion given a new name, they continued walking deeper into the forest. A small smile grew on the teen's face as a warm feeling grew through his chest, and absentmindedly he reached over to scratch the top of Virgil's head with a finger. "Well, so far this has gone pretty horribly," the teen thought, "but at least I made a new friend and got some food. That's gotta count for something, right?"

A/N- Finally managed a short chapter for once.

Originally I was gonna name the Chao Gilver, but Gilver sounded so close to Silver I decided against it and went with Virgil. It's more appropriate anyways.

And speaking of Chao, jeez. I wanted to give Sorun a little Chao companion but I knew next to nothing about them, so while looking up Chao for research purposes I came across this website called "Chao Island". I went in it and my brain was assaulted by a world's worth of Chao lore because apparently the two Sonic Adventure games went hella deep with the Chao mechanics. Felt like I needed a PhD just to understand half of it. I'm not gonna go anywhere near as deep into the Chao stuff as the games did, and I don't think the comics did, either, but there's still a little wiggle room there to do some cool stuff. So there's that.

Chapter 22

Recursion Error

Episode 22- That one jackal

By now the sky was beginning to slowly transition into an orange color as the sun slowly approached dusk. Not much had transpired in the amount of time that Sorun had found Virgil and now. Sorun had gone through a single apple and Virgil had thankfully remained silent, though whenever Sorun snuck a quick glance at him to make sure he was okay he saw that the thing still had a happy smile on his face. That wound on his back was still bothering Sorun, though. It stopped bleeding, at least, but that was still a large open wound on the creature's back. He was worried about infection, and he didn't have anything to clean and wrap the wound with.

Maybe it would be fine. Maybe Virgil's species was magic or something and didn't get infections. Or maybe that was just wishful thinking on Sorun's part as he hoped that the blue thing wouldn't just drop dead on him due to infection.

He didn't think he could handle something like that happening, especially after he already went and named him.

If there was a bright side, it was that the forest was beginning to thin out. There were still trees everywhere, but the forest wasn't even half as dense as it had been prior. Unfortunately, that did not mean that there was much more room for the human and his small companion to navigate around. Because everywhere they looked, for as far as the eye could see was, for lack of a better term, junk.

Robot junk.

Metal corpses and parts were strewn all around and bunched together into large piles. It wasn't just Egg Pawns, either, though he could see plenty of parts that belonged to that variety of Badnik randomly mixed in with all the other piles of junks. There were various makes and models of so many different robots he'd never seen before that he couldn't make one part out from another, and because everything was in pieces and wrecked he couldn't really identify anything, either. It was all just a chaotic mish-mash of electronics and metal parts.

"What, did we wander into a junkyard or something...?" Sorun wondered aloud as he stepped around a large pile of discarded robot parts. "What's with all this robot stuff?"

"Chao." Virgil gave as good a shrug as he could since he was still clinging to Sorun's shoulder.

"No idea either, huh?" Sorun commented as he weaved past another junk pile. "Yeah, well, at least this probably means we're makin' progress towards something."

The juxtaposition between the junk piles of robots all around and the serene scene of a forest mixed in was an odd one to Sorun, but the human teen tried to not let it distract him as he made his way through the junk-covered land. He did take some time to observe some of the piles of junk, as there were some neat-looking robots here and there that caught his eyes. Large humanoid ones, animal-shaped ones, whole aircraft that looked like things straight out of sci-fi comics... practically almost everything was here.

There was one other thing that didn't make Sorun nearly as interested, though, and that was Eggman's logo. He saw it frequently on a lot of the pieces of robots in a lot of the piles he came across, which lead him to suspect that a majority, if not flat-out all of these, were Eggman's robots. That'd explain why there was a junkyard full of dismantled robots, at least.

"I'll give Eggman credit for one thing: the man never runs out of ideas for new robots." He came across a large, deep groove cut into the ground, and nearby was the upper remains of a giant machine nearly the size of a small building. One of its arms was resting across the groove in the ground, and Sorun treated the robotic limb as a bridge as he slowly walked across it with his arms held out to his sides for balance. "Are these all old models of his or something? Is this some kind of dumping site for his robots?" He came to the other side of the arm and hopped down. "This world just keeps gettin' stranger all the time."

It all looked neat, at least. Something about all the different-looking robots tickled something inside of Sorun, that small bit of nerd in him that always liked looking at cool robot designs back on Earth when playing video games, but the Eggman logo he kept seeing brought him back down real fast.

The entire place was huge, though. Ten minutes of walking straight and traversing past small obstacles made from all the discarded robots and he saw no end to the junkyard. What he heard eventually, however, was a different story entirely. It was faint at first, but as Sorun approached the noise it became clearer: grunting. Grunting and sounds of frustration and disgruntlement, coming from, by the tone of it, an aged male.

"Alright... that's something." And something was better than nothing as far as Sorun was concerned. Hopefully it was a person he could talk to, and with luck they could tell him where the nearest village was. Or even better take him back to theirs if they were from one. At the very least it was somebody to talk to to relieve the monotony of being lost and hiking through a forest and junkyard full of robot corpses.

Slowly, Sorun made his way towards the sound of the grunting until he caught sight of the source, prompting him to take cover by a nearby pile of broken robots as he observed the sight before him. The grunting was coming from, by the looks of it, a cat Mobian with completely black fur. No clothing aside from shoes and gloves.

Currently he was kneeling in front of a metal wagon, which was completely full of miscellaneous parts and pieces of machinery. The back left wheel of the wagon, Sorun noted, was dislodged completely, and seemed to be the source of the old Mobian's ire as he seemed to be grumbling loudly directly onto the broken wheel.

"What is he doing all the way out here with a wagon full of junk? He a scavenger or something?" Sorun thought to himself. "Well, scavver or not it's somebody, which is just what I need. Alright, Sorun, play it cool and confident. It's just a single Mobian and you need the help. I'm sure it'll turn out fine."

Meeting new people always made him nervous, and on Mobius this fear was amplified due to the world's unpredictable nature, but he didn't have many other options. So the teen jumped up to the top of the pile, sat down on the wrecked Egg Pawn, and waved towards the cat Mobian while shouting out, "Yo!"

The Mobian jumped right up to his feet and whirled around towards Sorun. By Mobian standards, his features were pretty average. The only notable features Sorun saw were that the tufts of fur on his cheeks had gray coloring near the edges and that his eyes were green, but otherwise he didn't seem all that different from any other cat Mobians he'd seen.

"O-oh! What in the...? Oh! Hello there!" The aged-sounding Mobian waved his hand towards Sorun, who became flooded with relief at the friendly gesture. "I didn't notice you there, ha ha! Not very surprising, I guess. My hearing ain't what it used to be."

Sorun slid off of the metal pile and began to slowly approach the black-furred Mobian. "Sorry if I spooked ya."

"Nah, don't worry about it." The cat waved a hand to the side, and then leaned his head closer towards Sorun as he stopped right in front of him. "A human, eh?" he mumbled. "Don't really see your kind around these parts, sonny. What on Mobius are you doing on this side of the world?"

"That... is a really long and complicated story," Sorun answered with an exasperated breath. "Long story short, I'm lost and wandered in here by mistake. How about you?"

"Ah, just doin' a bit a scavenging, though the goll-durned wheel on my wagon here decided to go and fall off on me." The cat Mobian glanced at the broken wagon, and then looked back to Sorun with a light laugh. "But it ain't no problem. Anyways, I'm Sam. Nice to meetcha."

"... Wow, okay." He'd met Mobians like Sally and Sonic's family that had relatively normal-sounding names, but compared to all the other ones it felt like people with names he was familiar with were in a minority. It still threw him for a loop whenever he met a Mobian like Sam with a name that would be commonplace on Earth. Sorun quickly regained his composure and introduced himself, saying, "My name's Sorun."

"Sorun, huh?" Sam nodded, and then turned back to his wagon. "Well, sonny, I dunno why you chose to get lost here of all places, but there's worse places to be wanderin' in, I suppose," he said as he walked over to and crouched down next to the wagon. "Place is a robot graveyard. Usually nothin' comes 'round here, 'cept me when I'm scavengin' parts."

Slowly approaching the cat and his wagon, Sorun took a single sweeping glance over the entire area. "I got that this place was a robot junkyard, but where'd all this stuff come from, anyways?" he asked.

"Eh, you know how it is. This world's been embroiled in a war for over a decade against a mad tyrant usin' robots to try and take everythin' over. Sure there's resistance fighters bustin' them up all the live-long day, but all those robots gotta go somewhere, and that crackpot Dr. Robotnik ain't too keen on recyclin', apparently," Sam gruffly stated as he inspected his wagon's wheel. "This ain't the only dumping site on the continent where people toss trashed robots, but it's one of the bigger ones. Keeps the rest of the place clean."

The human teen nodded in understanding, silently watching as the black-furred Mobian continued to examine the broken wagon. He felt a small tap on his left shoulder, prompting him to look towards Virgil. The little creature was pointing one of his arms towards Sam and the wagon while staring at Sorun with his round eyes.

"What, what is it?" he whispered in response. Virgil gestured towards the cart and Sam again, causing Sorun to look towards the two and then back to the creature. "You want me to help him?"

"Chao."

Rolling his eyes, Sorun shook his head in disagreement. "Virgil, come on, we got better things to do than help some old guy with his wagon."

"Chao?" Virgil tilted his head and gave Sorun a questioning look.

"... Okay, fine, we don't really have anything better to do," he admitted, "and... maybe he can give us some directions if we help out. Ugh, fine." With a sigh, he turned back towards the cat Mobian and his wagon, breathed in deeply, and stepped right next to the Mobian. "You need any help with the wagon, man?" he asked.

Sam stood upright in surprise and looked towards Sorun. "Er, I wouldn't really be one to turn down a helpin' hand," he said, "but do you know how to fix somethin' like this?"

Sorun hummed, and looked down towards the wagon. It seemed a simple enough construction: a simple wagon with four wheels all connected to a central axle under the actual wagon with a pull bar attached to the front. It seemed like an easy fix for somebody who had at least a small amount of technical knowledge.

Too bad Sorun's skills as a mechanic were absolute trash.

"Nah, not really," he said as he turned back to Sam. "I could, uh... carry it for you, though. If you want."

"Carry?" A unsure expression crossed the cat's features as he scratched the back of his head. "I appreciate the offer, sonny, but my home's a few miles back and I got the thing completely loaded down with parts. I don't think-"

Sam was interrupted when, in a flash of blue, Sorun's right Bringer Claw appeared resting on his shoulder. The cat stepped back in complete shock as the spectral claw unfolded itself, positioned its hand under the wagon, and lifted it up completely into the air with no effort whatsoever.

"It's not a problem," Sorun assured the cat as he turned towards the bewildered Mobian, not an ounce of strain to be seen on his face. "It's, uh, don't... don't think about it too hard."

He mentally prepared himself for any reaction, ranging from wide-eyed wonder to Sam screaming and running away in fear from the blue, spectral arm holding the wagon up. Instead what happened was that the cat's expression fell blank as he shrugged his shoulders. "Oh, okay. Neat."

"... Mobians, I swear..." Was he surprised that Sam was so flippant towards the reveal of the Bringer Claw? No, not really. That's how practically all Mobians acted around his powers. It still floored him each time. "So are we heading out, or what?"

"Er, yeah. 'Course. This way." Sam turned around and began walking away, and Sorun walked by his side with the wagon full of parts being suspended above them by the Bringer Claw. "Like I said, my home village is a few miles down the way."

"Ugh, miles?" He'd missed that part the first time he said it. His feet were already getting tired from all the hiking he'd done today. But he had to remind himself that he'd already promised Sam he'd carry the wagon, and back to a village, at that. That was everything he needed right there. Maybe he could get some directions afterwards. Or at least some medical attention for Virgil's wound. "I mean, uh, yeah.

Miles. No sweat," Sorun laughed off. "So this village of yours. What's it like?"

"Well, it's a nice enough little place," Sam began as he tiredly stretched his arms over his head. "We keep to ourselves, mostly. Kinda have to these days what with everything going on in the world. We get a few travelers that come through from time to time that have been to a bunch of other settlements saying that a lotta folk out there have fallen on hard times, but fortunately for us we happen to live right next to one of the biggest junkyards in the world." The cat spread his arm out to the piles of dismantled robots they passed as they continued walking. "We sustain ourselves for the most part by scavenging anything we need from here." He paused to hum. "Actually, about near everythin' in our village is made of stuff scavenged from this junkyard now that I think about it. Homes, water purifiers, that hydroponics buildin' some of the others set up... yeah, that entire village was made up of parts taken from this place. The whole reason we set up the village there in the first place was because of all the free parts just sitting around that nobody was usin'. One thing lead to another and here we are just a few years later!"

Sorun nodded along to the history lesson, giving a small hum of acknowledgement. It made enough sense. He remembered being told that all the trade routes were all nonexistent at this point because of how far Eggman's conquest had progressed, so he could easily see that any villages that couldn't self-sustain were pretty much doomed without some alternative means of keeping themselves alive. That was the whole reason he'd been on that botched medicine mission.

From the way Sam was saying it, though, the people of his village found a pretty elegant workaround to this by using the discarded remains of Eggman's robots to sustain themselves. There was a bit of irony in there that gave Sorun enough amusement to huff a single breath of air out of his nose. Knowing Eggman's efforts were inadvertently letting at least one settlement out here thrive. It wasn't anything significant, not even enough to muster a bit of spite against him. Eggman could probably roll over them like it was nothing if he ever felt like it, but that was true for pretty much everywhere that hadn't been touched by him yet. Which as far as Sorun knew, wasn't a lot of places.

As far as villages went, this one was sounding like probably one of his best bets out here. They had to be somewhat advanced if they made a self-sustaining home out of advanced junk like this. Had to be at least one person there that could help out with Virgil's wound.

Speaking of which...

"Hey, Sam." Sorun reached over to his left shoulder, plucked Virgil off, and let the thing sit in his hand as he brought him into the older male's view. "You have any idea what this thing is?" If anybody would know, it would be a local. Maybe Sam could shine some light on this mysterious thing.

"Hm?" Sam turned his head towards Sorun, his eyes lighting up when he saw the creature sitting in his hand and staring at him. "Oh! That's a Chao you have there!"

"... They're called Chao? Seriously?" He looked down and gave Virgil a flat look. "Why does that sound so famili- wait, wasn't there a soda or something named like that...?"

"Heh heh! You really must not be from around here if you don't know what a Chao is," Sam commented, his features slowly turning inquisitive. "Usually you only find Chao in Chao Gardens. They always make little communities in groves and such and never really move on from there. What're you doing bringing along a Chao with you?"

Sorun made a light grimace, and turned his eyes from the Chao to Sam. "I think I ran into its Chao Garden," he explained. "Place was completely destroyed. Lot of Eggman's robots were there. They were destroyed- something cut them up, dunno what-, but the whole grove was completely trashed." He paused, and stroked Virgil's back with his thumb. "And... Virgil here was the only surviving Chao I found," he explained, causing both his and Sam's expression to turn dour. "He lost one of his wings, too, so I decided to take him with me so he wouldn't starve to death. But, to be honest with you, I don't really know what I'm doing with the little guy."

"Oh, I see... that's too bad. Chao are a bit rare these days, so hearin' that one of their Gardens just up and went like that... darn shame." The cat looked down towards the ground, sighed deeply, and looked back to Sorun and Virgil. "Well, the truth is I ain't too knowledgeable 'bout Chao myself. They're friendly enough creatures, real empathetic towards others and all that. Usually just survive off of fruits and nuts from what I heard, but other than that, I don't know much. You'd be better off talkin' to an expert on the critters, but I don't know where you'd find someone like that."

"Ah." Letting out a disappointed hum, Sorun placed Virgil back on his left shoulder. "How smart are they?" he asked. "I feel like he understands me, but all he does is say 'chao' all the time."

"Eh, sure they're smart. 'Bout as smart or you and I, really. They just ain't got the ability to speak words, that's all."

Well, that answered the question of if Virgil actually managed to understand Sorun or not. He suspected it to be true considering how responsive it was to his words, but he had to wonder seeing as it only ever said one word.

"Still," Sam continued, a smile taking over his features, "it was very generous of you, takin' in a wounded Chao like that. You must have a mighty kind heart to go out of your way to do somethin' like that, Sorun."

"... I wouldn't go that far," the teen mumbled out, eyes turning to the side to look away from Sam. Partly in abashment at the comment, and partly in guilt as his mind wandered back to Knothole. "Is there somebody back at your village that could look at Virgil?" he asked.

"I'm worried about the giant gash on his back from where the wing was."

"Yeah, we got a doctor. Don't you worry none," Sam assured him. "I really gotta thank you for helpin' out with the wagon, though. I was worried I'd have to leave it and come back with some of the others later, but at the rate we're going we should hit home before nightfall."

"What is all this stuff I'm carrying, anyways?" Sorun questioned him.

Sam waved a hand. "Oh, nothin' important. Just some spare parts for if anything ever breaks down, stuff like that. We like to keep a large reserve just in case, you understand."

"Makes sense, I guess." The pale teen faced back forwards, a weary sigh escaping him. "I really hope you're right and we do get there before nightfall, 'cause my feet are killin' me here..."

In the end Sam had kept his promise, if barely. The sun was just beginning to touch the horizon, but after cresting a small hill Sorun had seen it. Nestled in an extremely large clearing, on top of a large hill, was a village. Sam had mentioned on the way there that their population was in the range of around two hundred, and from what Sorun saw he could believe it. Buildings and houses of all shapes and sizes were located in the giant compound, all of them seemingly cobbled together from sheet metal and other mechanical bits.

The most eye-catching thing that drew Sorun's attention, however, was the hundred-foot windmill slowly spinning in the center of the village. Like everything else, it looked like it was made completely out of scrap metal, which made Sorun hope it was built as sturdy as it looked.

"Well, here we are!" Sam announced as the settlement came into view. "Scrap City! Well, more of a village, really, but 'Scrap City' rolls off the tongue better."

"Ah-huh." Sorun's eyes had become half-lidded from exhaustion at this point, but he still had enough energy to maintain enough speed to keep alongside the cat Mobian as his Bringer Claw continued to carry the wagon above them. "About damned time we got here," he internally groused. "I was getting sick of walking around."

"Chao!" Virgil seemed more excited about the village than Sorun was, but he wasn't the one that had to walk around all day. At least it was a good sign that the wound wasn't bugging him too much, which gave Sorun some small relief.

"Gotta say, Sorun, you really saved me a lotta trouble helpin' me with the wagon. Plus these trips to and back from the junkyard get a bit lonesome some days," Sam continued as he turned towards the tired human. "I'll be upfront and say I've never actually seen a human before in my life outside of pictures, but I didn't know you people could have big feathery arms come outta your back like that."

Sorun sighed. "We can't. I just get to be 'special' is all."

"Hm? Special how?"

"Special in that the universe loves to punch me in the throat," Sorun replied in a dry tone. "I messed around with some stuff I shouldn't have messed around with and got weird powers out of it, alright? I told you not to think about them."

Sam rose his palms up. "Alright, alright. Didn't mean nothin' by it. Just curious is all."

The pale teen glanced to the side at Sam, and then faced back forwards. "I just don't like talking about them. They brought me a whole lot more trouble than they're worth."

"Hm. They sure are good for carrying wagons though, huh?"

He almost punched Sam right there for daring to say that, but when Sorun glanced back at the cat with slightly narrowed eyes he saw that his expression was genuinely teasing. Sorun's own expression softened, a long breath leaving him as he slowly nodded. "I guess, Sam, I guess."

"Chao?"

Sorun's ears perked up, and he glanced down at the Chao on his shoulder. He was looking up at the teen with curious and concerned eyes, causing Sorun to sigh and scratch the top of Virgil's head with a finger. "Empathetic. Right. I'm really gonna have to watch my mood around the little guy, aren't I?"

Maybe that would be a good thing. Help Sorun learn a little stress control. He really doubted it would, but if Chao really could pick up on emotions like Sam said, Sorun at least had to try. He didn't want any of his negative emotions to accidentally bleed into the Chao he was carrying around. The last thing he wanted was to leave bad impressions on Virgil.

The three of them eventually reached the entrance to the village, which wasn't so much as gated off. And now that he had a better look around, Sorun noticed there wasn't even a wall around the village, either. He was starting to suspect Mobian architects never discovered the concept of enclosure.

But inside the village itself, everything was relatively calm. Even with the day ending there were quite a few Mobians wandering about, either in the streets or near their buildings and homes. Some had stopped to smile and wave towards Sam. Others were staring at Sorun and his Bringer Claw, but they were also waving at the human, too. Sorun, feeling shy under all the looks, turned his head towards Sam so he didn't have to acknowledge them.

"You're, uh, pretty popular around here, huh, Sam?" Sorun mumbled to the cat. "Gettin' a lot of stares here."

"Actually, Sorun, I think they're all starin' at you. We don't really ever get any humans through here. Or people with weird glowing arms comin' outta their back." He somehow missed the deadpan stare Sorun shot his way. "But I'm not really surprised they're all excited to see me. Stuff's always breakin' down around town, and I'm the only one goin' out there for replacement pats these days."

Sorun nodded in understanding, and then did a double-take on the old cat. "Wait, you're the only guy here goin' out there poking around in that junkyard?"

Sam shrugged. "Everybody else is busy doin' this or that around here, and it's work that can be handled by a single person now that everything's up and running. The long walks can grow weary on the old bones, but I don't mind that none since everybody depends on me."

"That's... admirable."

"I suppose so. Anyways, my home's up here. You can put the wagon down in the garage."

After walking a bit more, they came upon a small field of similar-looking houses which were, like everything else, constructed from scrap metal. The one they stopped in front of, the house itself practically identical to the rest around it, had a small garage attached to its side. Sam walked over to the garage's door and opened it up towards the ceiling, and then gestured his hand towards the inside. In response, Sorun's Bringer Claw gently placed the wagon inside the garage, and then disappeared.

They wandered into the garage right after, Sam crouching down towards the wagon while Sorun idly inspected the garage's wall. He didn't see anything out of the ordinary: just some tools and parts hung up, a workbench to the side cluttered with pieces of metal, and a shelf nearby that held more tools and parts.

"Guy's a real gearhead. Wonder what Tails would say if he saw this place?" Frowning, Sorun ran a hand along the workbench's edge. "Wonder how they're all doing with me leaving and everything? I hope they don't come looking for me. Doubt they'd actually find me, but I dunno, they're real resourceful."

His greatest fear was that he would be minding his own business and all of a sudden a blue, blurry shape would stop in front of him. He could easily picture Sonic's stern face just staring at him, arms crossed as he rapidly tapped his foot on the ground. And if that happened, Sorun was just done . He couldn't even dream of getting away from a guy like that. Not with that speed. Or Shadow. Or the ship if they went as far as to bring that.

Come to think of it, he was done regardless of what they did as long as they found him. But he doubted they would. The chance was there, certainly, but it was low. He never gave hints that he wanted to run away. He didn't leave clues. He was in the clear. And yet the paranoia of them finding a way to find him regardless was still there.

"Nah, I'm overthinking it. They ain't gonna find me," Sorun dismissed with a shake of his head. "They're too busy dealing with Eggman to come and look for me. I'm in the clear. I can see it now. Sonic jumping at the ready to come and find me, Sally shooting him down with a regretful and remorseful face because she knows they can't spare the manpower. Sonic getting all sad 'cause he knows she's right, then he'd probably get all sulky for a bit. Then Sally'd get all sad, and Nicole would probably be there, too, so she'd get sad. Oh man, Nicole. I really hope she isn't taking me leaving too hard..." Sorun shook his head. "Don't worry about it, man, don't worry about it. You did what you had to do. They'll all move on."

"Welp, the damage don't look too bad." Sam's voice had roused Sorun from his thoughts, causing him to turn from staring at the wall to the black cat right behind him. "It's that same rusty bolt that's been givin' me trouble for a while now. I'll get it fixed up first thing tomorrow." With a light groan, Sam stood up and faced Sorun. "Don't mean to sound like a broken record here, sonny, but thanks for the help."

"Yeah, don't worry about it." Something outside the garage, in the street just outside the house, caught Sorun's eyes after he said this. A small, dark form that was rushing towards the garage, seemingly right towards Sam. "Uh, Sam? You got incoming."

"Huh?" Sam turned in the direction Sorun was looking towards, his shoulders immediately going slack at the sight. "Oh, bother."

The cat Mobian was instantly tackled by the small, dark form immediately after saying this. Sorun had reared his head back in surprise at the sight, but upon looking closer he calmed down when he saw it was just another Mobian. A child from the size of it, and another cat with black fur to boot. Even had the same clothes.

"Grandpa! Grandpa!" Sorun let out a silent "ah" of understanding after hearing this, stepping back away from the pair as he quietly observed them. "What took you so long!? You were supposed to be back an hour ago but you never came home and everybody got really worried and-!"

"Calm down, sport, calm down! I'm fine!" Sam smiled down at the child and ruffled the top of his head, making the child look up at him with a matching pair of green eyes. "I just ran into a bit of trouble with the wagon is all."

Sorun watched the small exchange for a bit, and then turned away from it as a spike of envy shot through him. "Must be nice, having people that like you enough that they just run up to you like that. Good for you, Sammy." The way Mobians could be so affectionate towards each other still amazed him every time he saw it. Being exposed to it by some of the other back with the Freedom Fighters had been a different experience, though. Feeling the borderline alien experience of all that friendship by some of those people had been... oddly nice, even if he was never able to reciprocate it. And seeing it for himself right in front of him made him realize how much he'd enjoyed all that friendly attention without even realizing it.

He felt something rustle on his shoulder, and automatically started to reassuringly rub the top of Virgil's head with his finger when he caught the Chao giving him a concerned look. He calmed down right after, thankfully, and the fact he showed concern for him in the first place made Sorun feel a bit better, but it didn't help that hollow feeling growing in him.

"What do you mean you lost your ball on top of the windmill again!?" The sudden yell tore Sorun out from his own thoughts, causing him to focus back on the pair of cat Mobians near him. Sam had risen to his full height with his hands held on his hips, while the child cat was looking up at him with a sheepish grin.

"It wasn't just me, grandpa! Me and all my friends were playing and somebody kicked the ball all the way up there."

"Consound it, Gary, again?" Groaning, Sam rubbed at the top of his head. "What am I gonna do with you...?"

Sorun watched the two for a bit longer, and then glanced towards Virgil. The Chao blinked up at Sorun, and then pointed his hand-less appendage at the cat duo. Releasing a consigned sigh, Sorun nodded at him and stepped towards the two.

"What's this about a ball?" he asked, turning his head to the side while rubbing the back of his head.

Both of the cats turned towards the human, the younger one's eyes brightening up considerably at the sight of Sorun. Sam's reaction was much more subdued as he opened his mouth to address the teen. "Oh, Gary, this is the one I was telling you about that helped me carry the wagon all the way back home!"

"Ohhh! So this is what a human looks like!" The smaller cat, Gary, bounded towards Sorun and stopped right in front of him. He flashed the teen with a grateful smile. "Thank you for helping my grandpa, mister!"

Feeling his cheeks begin to burn in embarrassment, the Sorun brushed some of his dark hair over his face to hide it. "It wasn't that big a deal," he mumbled out. "You didn't answer the question about the ball."

Sam's triangular ears rose up in surprise, and then lowered slightly as he shook his head in exhaustion. "My goofball grandson and his group of friends went and got their sports ball stuck up on the windmill again. I tell you, they do this all the time, and after the trip we had I don't think I'm in any condition to go and get it for them."

"Sounds like a real problem, alright." Giving a contemplative hum, Sorun turned his gaze from them to the Chao on his shoulder. He didn't have to- he really didn't- but it seemed Virgil obviously wanted him to, but more than that Sorun didn't feel right leaving a group of children's ball to its fate up on a windmill. Especially considering he had wings and could probably get it in around five seconds. And he still felt he owed Sam a bit for showing him to the village. "Tell you what, Sam," he said as he removed Virgil from his shoulder. "You get Virgil to that doctor you were talking about to look at the wing wound, and I'll go get that ball."

"Huh?" Gingerly taking the offered Chao in his hands, Sam looked to Sorun with surprise in his eyes. "Are you sure? After everything you-"

"Sam, it's just a ball and I got, you know, those arms. Don't worry about it."

"Well, I'd... I'd be mighty appreciative of you if ya did that for my grandson," he said at last, and then gave Sorun a nod and a smile. "Alright, Sorun, ya got yourself a deal my friend."

There it was again. The "friend" word that seemed to cause Sorun so much distress. Now it just made his chest ache for some reason.

"Okay, then." Sorun turned towards Gary. "I think I saw the windmill you were talking about on the way into town, but could you show me the way there?"

"Mm-hm!" Gary enthusiastically nodded at him and turned towards the garage door. "It's this way! Come on!"

Sorun made the move to follow him, but when he heard something call out to him, saying, "Chao! Chao!", he stopped and turned back around. Virgil, held in Sam's hands, was reaching out towards Sorun, the dot above his head shifting into a question mark.

"I'm just going away for a bit, Virgil," Sorun explained to the Chao. "Sam's gonna take you somewhere to get you looked at in the meantime. I'll come get you later, okay?"

The Chao continued to reach out to him for a bit, but then he nodded his teardrop-shaped head as the question mark turned back into a dot. Sam had laughed at the sight, and then slowly began stroking the side of Virgil's face with his finger.

"Don't worry none about your Chao, Sorun, I'm sure he'll be fine. Our doctor is top-notch," he assured the human.

"Hm. I'm gonna hold you to that." With that, Sorun turned his back to the old Mobian and made his way out of the garage and towards the younger Mobian. "Alright, so where's this windmill at?"

"It's this way, mister! C'mon!" Gary had turned towards the left side of the street, and began running down it. Sorun stared after his back, briefly turned back towards the garage to glance at Sam and Virgil, sighed, and then began following the cat child.

Following Gary through the moderately-sized village, Sorun got a good enough look around to get an impression of the place. He wasn't so sure of the place at first glance, mostly due to everything being made of scrap metal, but after going inside of that garage it seemed that everything was built relatively well enough. They all had to, he supposed, seeing as people lived here. And the few Mobians still out at this time of day all seemed happy enough as Sorun and Gary passed them.

If anything, the place had a fairly peaceful air about it. The same kind of peaceful air Knothole had. A nice open place in the woods full of nice people living a peaceful life. It gave him an odd sense of nostalgia, which was really strange as he never felt at ease in Knothole. Even so, he couldn't deny it was a place that was practically built to have people live at ease in it. A home for a community of people.

"This place ain't so bad," Sorun thought to himself as he continued following the Mobian child, hands tucked inside of his pockets. "How do you like living here?" he asked, eyes wandering left and right as he looked around at the metal village.

By now Gary had slowed down to a brisk walk as the two continued going forwards, though he did crane his head back to address Sorun. "Huh? It's nice, I guess. Grandpa takes care of me and all the other kids always play with me. All the other people are really nice, too!"

"Sounds great." About the answer he expected. Aside from the war going on in the outside he didn't really see what-

"Well, except... nah, it's nothing."

And now Sorun was interested. "Huh? Except what?"

Gary's features scrunched in discomfort, and he turned his head back forwards and away from Sorun. "Oh, it's nothing." He pointed ahead of them. "That's the windmill up there."

Sorun's eyes followed the pointed finger, and then traveled upwards. The four, gigantic spinning blades held aloft by the hundred-foot tower seemed even more large and imposing up close than it had seeing it at a distance. "So what's this giant windmill for again?" Sorun questioned aloud.

"Uh, I think it gives power to the village and stuff," Gary innocently answered, blinking up at the windmill's blades before going back down. "Oh, there they are! Guys, hey!"

Up ahead was a small gathering of a couple dozen or so Mobian children. They were all wildly varying species, like most other gatherings of Mobians Sorun saw. Mostly mammal-types, a few avians mixed in. Forest-type animals, mostly, with even more that he was sure were common animals but couldn't rightly place.

It was something that was a pretty ordinary sight at this point.

"Hey! Gary!" One of the children in the group- a bear, or badger, or some other third thing that looked like the first two- ran up to greet the cat Mobian, a few more children trailing behind that one. "What took you so long? And who's this? I thought you were bringing your grandpa?" The new child looked up at Sorun and tilted his head to the side. "Also, um... what species is he?"

"Yeah, he looks weird. Where's all his fur?" a second new child asked.

"And what's why is he wearing so much clothes?" asked a third.

"Is skin supposed to look so light like that?"

"You know, I almost forgot how unintentionally mean kids could be," Sorun thought to himself with a sour look on his face. "Calm it down, Sorun, calm it down. It's just a bunch of ignorant kids." He slowly exhaled. "At least these ones ain't throwing rocks at you."

"Grandpa couldn't make it, but this is his new friend Sorun! He said he'd go up and get the ball!" Gary gestured a hand out to Sorun. "Also he's a human."

There was a collective "ooohhh" among the crowd of children that had gathered around, along with a few comments like "so that's what they look like" and "I thought they were taller than that" mixed in. Sorun tried his best to ignore them, particularly the ones about his height, and began stomping towards the tower.

"I'm still taller than all you munchkins," he bitterly thought as he looked up towards windmill. "How'd you guys even kick it up that high?" he asked to the crowd behind him. Just barely, near the top of the windmill, he could see it. A red rubber ball that, at this distance, was practically a dot. It was wedged in between a support strut holding up the top part of the windmill the blades were attached to.

He looked back towards the crowd expecting an answer. What he got was a group of Mobian children looking down to the ground, avoiding his gaze and kicking guiltily at their feet. None of them spoke up at first. Soon, though, Gary was the one that stepped forwards. "It was my fault," he said. "I-"

"Hey, wait, it was me!" interrupted a rabbit boy who ran up besides Gary. "Gary didn't do anything wrong, so if you're gonna be mad at anybody-!"

"No, it was me!" cried out a third. "I-!"

"Alright, stop. I get it." Sorun softly groaned and rubbed at his forehead. "They must be really tight with each other, throwing themselves under the bus for their friends like this. Pretty sure all my friends on Earth woulda just sold me out for giggles. Eh, to be fair I woulda done the same thing probably if it was funny enough." He lowered his hand from his head and looked to the crowd of children. "I'm not mad at anybody, but please just promise me that you guys won't kick the ball all the way up there again. I'm pretty sure people around here have enough problems."

The sight of all the children snapping to attention and briskly nodding at Sorun was almost funny enough to make him laugh out loud. It did make him smirk, though, which he quickly hid by turning his head around and up towards the windmill. "Alright. Be back in a sec."

It was hard for him not to hear the various "oohs" and "ahhs" of wonder from the children when his two Bringer Claws manifested onto his back. They were probably even more shocked when he flew up into the sky, stopping right where the ball was within a few seconds. Hovering in the air next to the ball, he reached out and grabbed it with his hands before beginning to pull.

"G-geez, how hard did they kick this?" With a small grunt of exertion, Sorun finally managed to free the object from its wedged confines after a few hard tugs. He stared at the ball in his hand, and then gave himself a small nod of satisfaction before dropping back down to the ground. He landed with a small grunt, Bringer Claws disappearing off his back as he straightened up his posture while holding the ball up. He had to turn his head to hide his smile with his hair when he heard cheers of happiness from the children, and proceeded to lightly toss the ball at them.

The sudden pressure he felt on his legs rapidly made him startled, however, and he immediately turned his head downwards. Some of the children, to his growing embarrassment, had clung onto his legs in the form of a hug while the rest were beaming wide smiles at him. His anxiety was steadily rising and he greatly desired to shake the children off of him to satiate his nerves, but the knowledge that kicking kids off of him likely wouldn't do well for his image stayed Sorun from committing the act. He prayed none of the adults in the village were watching.

No, some of them were. He confirmed it by glancing towards the village. And they were all smiling, too. Goddammit.

"Well, if I had any masculine pride... it's gone now." Releasing a lamenting sigh, Sorun reached down and patted one of the kids on the top of their head. "Uh, yeah, yeah, you're all welcome. Let me go." Thankfully they did so, letting Sorun breath a sigh of relief at the new freedom. "Alright, kids, there's your ball back. I gotta go now. Have fun." He began briskly walking away. "And don't stay out too long, it's almost night!"

"Bye!"

"Thanks, mister!"

"Goodbye!"

"Come play with us sometime!"

"Tell grandpa I'll be back in a bit!"

Sorun recognized that last voice as Gary's, and gave the cat and the rest of a children a small two-fingered salute behind his back as he continued walking.

"Gah, man, if I don't get some sleep soon I'm gonna collapse right in the street." He decided to head back to Sam's place soon after the adventure with the windmill and the ball. He didn't go back immediately; he wanted to give as much time to visit the doctor as possible for Virgil's sake, and the teen wanted to explore the village a bit more. But he was tired, his feet were tired, and the sun was almost completely set past the horizon. He needed to find a place to rest. That and his worry for Virgil was steadily beginning to grow over time. Either way, he needed to go see Sam again. And if he wasn't home yet he'd just wait in the garage for the cat to return.

That is if Sorun didn't just up and fall asleep while waiting for him if he wasn't there yet.

"I guess... this place is actually pretty nice," Sorun internally admitted as he walked through the increasingly darkening streets. "It's no Knothole, but the people here are friendly enough. It's peaceful. There's no way I can stay here, but maybe I can spend a few days to chill out and plan out my next move. Whatever that is." He was still completely blank on what he was doing on the front of "what to do next", but he was confident he'd get there. Eventually. Maybe after a night of sleep his head would be cleared up and he'd get some better thinking in.

He was fairly sure that was what the issue was. Sleep deprivation and exhaustion. He'd be right as rain tomorrow morning, and then he could figure out what to do.

"Oh, hey, he's already there." The door to the house's garage was open, and Sorun could see light from a bulb shining onto the street. "That was fast. 'Least I don't gotta wait."

The pale human maneuvered past the garage's opening and entered the small structure. His eyes were immediately drawn towards the center, where he saw Sam crouching down next to his wagon again. Sitting on the wagon's rim was Virgil, who Sorun noticed now had gauze wrapping going all the way around his shoulder and body and a bandage over where he'd lost his wing. The teen allowed himself a small exhale at that. He seemed fine.

Sam must have heard Sorun's breath, as the cat rose his head up to the teen and stood up on his feet. "Oh, Sorun, there you are. Was wonderin' when you'd show up again."

Virgil seemed leagues more excited than Sam was, as he'd jumped up onto the wagon's rim while holding his arms out towards Sorun, calling out, "Chao! Chao!"

"Yeah, missed you too, buddy," Sorun mumbled quietly as he picked the Chao up and then turned him around in his hands. "So the doctor said he was alright?" he questioned as he inspected the bandage and gauze wrapped around Virgil.

The black-furred Mobian nodded at Sorun. "Yep, your little's pal's all good. He'll, uh, never really fly again on account of, y'know, the wing, but the doctor said that the damage should heal up nicely. Chao are real resilient."

"... Sure they are." He didn't really believe that after what he saw in the Chao Garden, but as long as Virgil was fine, that's all he cared about in the matter. "So," Sorun continued as he placed Virgil at his spot on his shoulder, "you all good, or...?"

Sam waved a hand. "Yeah, I'm alright. Don't you worry none about me, you've done plenty. How about Gary and his friends? You get their ball back?"

"Yeah. One of them's got a really good leg, man, 'cause they kicked that thing all the way to the top of the windmill."

A bark of laughter burst out of Sam. "Yep! That'd be Gary, alright. Little sport always did have a leg on him. Parents would be proud."

"Ah." Sorun didn't feel comfortable with the undertones of that statement. He awkwardly looked towards the garage's wall, where the house was attached to it, and clicked his tongue. "So, uh... kid's parents aren't in the house?"

When he turned back to Sam, the cat's features had grown a bit more somber. He practically felt Virgil wither a bit on his shoulder, too, meaning he likely felt something sad radiate out of Sam. It was enough to make Sorun fear he'd done something wrong by bringing this subject up.

"Don't gimme that look, sonny, I ain't mad," Sam assured him. It made Sorun breath out in relief, but he still stared expectantly at the Mobian for him to continue. "It ain't something too uncommon. Boy's family used to live in the big city before Robotnik took it over 'bout ten years ago. Parents were roboticized and everything. I heard that everybody on Mobius mysteriously got turned back to normal, but, well... not everybody made it back, you know? Usually the people that got broken down and destroyed while enslaved to that man before they got turned back." He sighed and leaned back on the wagon. "Dunno if that's what happened, but it's the likeliest story, as much as I hate to admit it."

"No chance that they just couldn't find the village?" Sorun asked in a quiet voice.

Sam shook his head. "No. They wouldn't have known about this place since it came into existence after the fact, but we had folks comin' in here looking for relatives back when all the roboticized Mobians turned back. If they managed to find this place, then they would have, especially for their son. They loved him like nothin' else in the world, lemme tell ya. So seein' as all them other people found us and they didn't..."

"It doesn't paint a good picture, yeah," Sorun finished with a slight grimace. "There's not a robot problem or anything like that around here, is there? No Eggman robots harassing the place or anything?"

"We wouldn't rightly still be here if that were the case," Sam said in a huff. "No, Eggman hasn't found us, yet. Or if he has he just doesn't seem to think we're important enough to attack, but that don't mean the prospect isn't hangin' over everybody's heads. Though I suppose the same could be said for every Mobian settlement around, even Knothole."

"Man, you got no idea," Sorun thought with a shudder. "So everything's okay here, then?"

Sam's face grew hesitant. "Relatively speaking, aside from... one problem. But you don't need to concern yourself with that." The cat's features turned back to being cheery as he pushed off the wagon he was leaning against. "So what's your plan now, Sorun?"

"Honestly? Still trying to figure that out," the teen admitted. "I was thinking of finding a place to sleep and then... I dunno. I'm sort of just figuring this out as I go."

"Hah! I can relate," Sam said with a laugh. "Well, I got a spare cot in the corner over there. You and your Chao are welcome to take it if you want."

Sorun glanced over to the back end of the garage, where there was indeed a cot set up in the corner. "You sleep in the garage?" Sorun asked with an incredulous glance back at the cat.

Sam shook his head with a shrug. "Nah, I get sleepy workin' on some projects sometimes and just rest here," he explained. "I feel kinda bad just offerin' you that, though, considering everything you've done. If you want-"

"Nah, nah it's fine. Don't worry about it," Sorun assured him. "I'll take the cot, man. Thanks."

"Ah, don't mention it," Sam said with a wave of his hand. "I'm gonna be fixin' dinner for me an' Gary pretty soon here. You're welcome to a place at the table if you feel like it."

"I'd love to, Sam," Sorun said, "but I'll be real with you. I'm so tired I don't think I'd make it to the table." With a soft groan, he went over to and sat down on the cot while leaned his head to the side to let Virgil hop down from him. "I'm just gonna go to sleep and figure out what to do after." He snapped his fingers and pointed towards Sam. "I'll take breakfast later on, though, if you're really offering."

"Hah hah! Sure thing, Sorun." With that, Sam walked over the garage door, leaning a hand out towards the room's light switch. "Well, I'll leave ya be for now. Good night, Sorun."

"Night, Sam." The lights flicked off, and the garage door closed behind Sam as he left Sorun in the garage. The pale human stared through the darkness at the closed door, and then let out a tired yawn as he settled onto the cot and rested his head on the pillow.

Not even ten second later he felt a small weight press itself onto his chest. He cracked an eye open, and through the darkness just barely made out Virgil sitting on his chest as the Chao rubbed a limb over a tired eye. The Chao yawned, and then leaned back until he was flat on his back on Sorun's abdomen.

"Musta been as tired as I was. Not very surprising, I guess. Little guy just lost everything." Sorun turned his eye up to a blackened ceiling, and then settled further into the cot as he slowly closed his eye again. "Guess it's fine if he sleeps there. Too tired to care.

"Ahhh, man... fadin' away, here. I should really thank Sam again tomorrow morning. He's a nice guy for a geezer. Everybody here's so kind." He felt his face settle into a slight frown as he felt his mind begin to drift off. "I'm sure everyone in Knothole's doin'... alright. I just... I'll figure out what to do in the morning..."

Too tired for any further thought, Sorun finally joined his Chao in sleep.

The next morning came when Sorun and Virgil were awoken to a peculiar sound. With the kind of setting he'd found himself in, Sorun had expected to wake up to a lot of things. Birds, laughing children nearby, Sam and Gary talking somewhere nearby and waking Sorun up with their voices. The sounds of living in a tightly-knit village in general. The kind of sounds that one would be glad to wake up to because it meant everything was peaceful and okay. A great way to wake up.

He didn't get that. He got terrified screaming instead.

"... It hasn't even been a full day." Groaning in irritation, Sorun slowly sat up in the cot Sam had lent him while rubbing at his groggy eyes. "Of course I can't catch a fucking break for a full twenty-four hours before something crazy happens again. Why the hell would I?"

Maybe it was too good to be true after all. Knothole was one thing- it had a full entourage of guardsmen and the Freedom Fighters living in it for defense. This was just some random village out in the sticks. But there were a lot of those around, and it seemed peaceful enough here that Sorun had assumed that, after everything that happened, he'd get at least one single goddamned day of peace and quiet before having to go back out into the fray. Everybody certainly acted like that was the case.

Nope. Couldn't have that, because this world always found some new crazy thing to throw at him.

"Sonofa- what is it, huh? Robots? Is it robots? Did the fucking windmill turn into a Transformer or something and I gotta go put it down?" He wouldn't even be surprised at this point. It'd be tame compared to some of the other stuff he'd seen so far.

Down to his side, he saw Virgil standing on the ground. He was way more awake than Sorun was, and looked frightened and worried as he looked towards the garage door towards where all the sounds were coming from outside.

"Don't worry, Virgil, it's gonna be alright," Sorun mumbled to the Chao as he scooped him up and placed him on his shoulder. "It's not gonna alright for whoever decided to start my morning off like this, but everything's gonna be fine. Don't worry."

With an irritable groan, Sorun shot up to his feet and stomped his way over to the garage's entrance. He reached down and practically wrenched the door open towards the ceiling as he stepped out into the street, widened and angry eyes sweeping left and right to try and identify the disturbance.

The screaming noises were a lot more apparent now that he was in the open, and the sight of panicked townsfolk running around with panicked expressions on their faces confirmed to Sorun that, yes, something was seriously wrong here. He heard something else that was much more peculiar, though- engines. Loud engines, like the kind Sorun had heard on dune buggies and bikes back on Earth. When he looked towards the source of the noise, in the distance past a lot of houses, he saw something that might have been the source: a buggy. A regular, four-wheeled dune buggy that was definitely being driven by Mobians, though from this distance he couldn't make them out. What was strange was that they were circling some of the townsfolk he recognized from last night.

"... Okay, wait, what's actually going on?" It wasn't robots, then. It was a bunch of... drivers disturbing the peace? Other Mobians? He didn't know; he only saw the one vehicle. "This... doesn't seem like an Eggman attack. I think? I don't- I need some answers."

He saw a small, dark form dart past him, and Sorun immediately recognized it as Gary. Sorun, eager to end his confusion, bolted forwards and grabbed onto the child's arm to slow him down. He yelped out in surprise at first and whipped his head towards Sorun with panicked eyes, though he calmed down just slightly when he saw it was just the human holding him.

"Gary, what's going on?" Sorun asked him. More panicked Mobians were running past, some holding or guiding children and going one way while others were going another way. "Everybody's going crazy, what happened?"

"O-oh, Sorun." The Mobian child blinked up at him, and then worriedly turned his head towards the edge of the village. "They-they're back. The bandits."

"Bandits? There's bandits now? Seriously?" Shaking his head in surprise, Sorun knelt down to Gary's eye level. "Okay, Gary? Slow down and explain."

"I-I-I don't know," Gary stammered, pulling his arm out from Sorun's grasp. "They come here once already and I'm supposed to go to the shelter and grandpa and a bunch of the older adults went to go see them and-"

"Alright, that's enough." The child was starting to hyperventilate at this point, and Sorun didn't want a kid passing out on him on top of everything else. "A bunch of people went to go see bandits. And there's bandits apparently," he muttered to himself as he looked back up towards the edge of the village. "Ugh, man... okay, Gary." He turned back to the child. "You say there's a shelter?"

"Mm-hm." Gary nodded his head, green eyes wide and glossy and his body shaking. "W-we're supposed to go there if-"

"Great, go there with everybody else." Sorun stood up to his feet and patted Gary on the back. "Go, go now."

"Huh? But what about y-?" Gary snapped his mouth shut when Sorun cast a glare down at him. "I-I'll go," he squeaked, turning around and running in the direction a majority of the other Mobians were going in.

Sorun watched the child run off for a couple of seconds, and then began walking towards the end of the village he'd seen that buggy. "So there's bandits now. Fan-flipping-tastic. Sam and Gary kept mentioning something, but goddamn. Bandits?" He supposed it wasn't completely out of the norm. He recalled that one city that Sally and Knuckles had mentioned back when he'd gone over that map, Sandblast. They'd alluded to the place being filled with Mobians that didn't have the best of intentions. Mobians may have been nice, but Sorun wasn't nearly naive enough to believe that it was a universal rule despite all the Mobians he encountered. The prospect of them having fought in wars all but snuffed that idea out.

But bandits? Was the war with Eggman really making people this desperate? It was possible, but Sorun didn't know. He didn't even know this was a problem until a few minutes ago. He didn't know that thing Sam mentioned but refused to elaborate on was this. Bandits harassing the town for... something. Something he didn't know about, and wasn't too inclined to find out. Something he'd rather just ignore and go away from just so he didn't have to get caught in the crossfire.

And yet his feet were carrying him forwards.

"Agh, this is stupid. What am I... I'm just gonna look," Sorun assured himself as he continued pressing forwards towards the village's edge. "Maybe it's not as bad as it looks. I'll just take a quick peak and if it looks too bad I'll get out."

Because dealing with bandits? Not in his purview. He ran away from the Freedom Fighters specifically to avoid danger such as this. And everybody seemed happy enough last night despite the fact this was apparently an ongoing problem. He'd just... go take a look. Make sure everything wasn't out of hand, and then he'd quietly make his exit.

Soon enough, he made it to the village'd edge, and hid behind a nearby house while peeking his head around a corner. At his end was a gathering of some of the townsfolk, all standing back with worried and grim looks on their faces as they looked ahead.

And in front of them, past the village's perimeter with light forest right behind them, were who he assumed were the bandits. Around twenty of them in total, with various motorcycles and buggies parked behind them. From here he could see that they were all Mobians, though he noted they all seemed to be the same species. What that species was he couldn't pin down exactly, but they seemed canine-ish from the wild hair and doglike ears and teeth they had, though they seemed like oddly sharp features for dogs or wolves. All had similarly colored fur, too, in various blacks and grays, and were holding different kinds of swords and knives as they all stared at and sneered at the crowd of townsfolk in front of them.

"Alright, it's a bunch of... canine Mobians. All the weapons they're holding is makin' me nervous, but nobody seems hurt yet. So far it's not looking catastrophic." His eyes trailed to the center of the bandit group, near the front, and he felt his body freeze up. "Oh, what the hell is he doing there!?"

If there was a sight Sorun really did not want to see, it was Sam right in front of the bandit group. He was on his knees and facing the crowd of villagers with his head down, but thankfully, he looked unharmed. It didn't change the fact that the position he was in did not look very good from his point of view.

"Oh man, that's... maybe it's nothing bad. And even if it is, I... should I just go right now?" he wondered to himself, grimacing slightly. "All the bandits seem to be right there and distracted by the villagers. None of them have guns. I could just fly away right now and not look back. That's what I should be doing right now. This doesn't have anything to do with me."

He wanted to fly away. Really, he did. But the sight of the faces the villagers had and seeing Sam on his knees over there was rooting Sorun to the spot for whatever reason, and he couldn't help but continue to observe. He flinched, however, when he heard one of the buggy's doors slam shut.

Focusing towards the source of the noise, he saw another one of the Mobian bandits strut towards the front of the group. The rest of the bandits, who had been jeering at the crowd, quieted down immediately and almost cowered back away from the new one. And when Sorun got a good look at him he had to blink multiple times just to make sure he was seeing right.

Black boots and black gloves only for clothing. Mobian standard. Body covered in black fur, with the exception of a long, black tail behind him with a whitened, wild tip, three white lines on either side of his chest where his ribs were, white muzzle, and a head full of wavy, tangled white hair flowing behind his head. He was heterochromatic, too: his right eye was blue and the left one yellow. And his overall disposition and the way he was glaring at the crowd of villagers with utter contempt made Sorun cringe back along with the Mobian's appearance.

"I didn't think being goth was a genetic predisposition in this world, but it looks like I was wrong. The hell is up with this guy?" His eyes narrowed at the blue-handled, curved sword the strange-looking Mobian was casually swinging in his right hand. A curved sword with a completely red blade that looked to be made of crystal. "Jesus, even his sword is edgy as hell."

"It was a simple arrangement," the Mobian spoke, the sound of his voice making Sorun's ears perk up. "It was my assumption that creating such a simple arrangement would be sufficient for you imbeciles' comprehension, but it appears that I was mistaken." The morning sunlight glinted off the red blade as he spun it around in his hand. "How very unfortunate for you."

"Holy hell, he looks ridiculous but his voice is smooth. How does that even work?" It was a tone lower than normal, but it came out completely clear and articulate. An authoritative tone undercut by a dulcet edge. "But what's he doing with Sam over there?"

"It is completely mystifying, too," the Mobian continued, "as when me and my associates first came across this hovel you showed an acute sense of recognizing your position in relation to us. You'd all kowtowed under us without so much as a single spark of resistance, and I truly thought after seeing such subservient behavior that you all knew better. And yet... here we are, with obligations unfulfilled despite my sincerest efforts of making the process as smooth and succinct as physically possible. I'm beginning to think your initial reaction towards us was nothing more than the instinctual throes of vacuous villagers eking out a meager existence, and it seems that, over a very shot amount of time, you've all forgotten your place." He looked down towards Sam, baring his teeth while tightening the grip on his sword. "That was a mistake."

It was honestly amazing how every single sentence spoken by that Mobian was making Sorun ill, but he did his best to ignore the feeling as he looked towards Sam. "This isn't looking good. He wouldn't... he's gonna hurt Sam," he realized. "I should help, shouldn't I? But I don't... I'd probably have to fight them, then." He grit his teeth, and the looked back towards the sky. "I don't want to get involved. I just wanna leave, but... but Sam and these people." He looked back towards the Mobians. "Goddammit, I don't wanna see him get hurt."

He felt that same urge beginning to rise in him. The same urge he'd felt when Shadow had held that Chaos Emerald in his hand. That he felt one his first few days on Mobius. The desire to flee away from the violence. But he couldn't ignore the fact that he felt genuinely worried over Sam's safety, either, especially after everything he'd done for Sorun. It was bad enough that the teen felt conflicted on what to do, though he did feel his feet begin to turn away in preparation for bolting away from the crowd.

But then that red sword in the Mobian bandit's hand was risen in the air, right above Sam's head. And in that moment, any thoughts of running away were completely dissolved from Sorun's mind as he sprung forwards, Bringer Claws flashing into existence as they flew him forwards.

The red sword was swung down. It never reached Sam's neck even though it was aimed at it. A blue, spectral sword had appeared right in its path, its blade held above Sam's neck and stopping the red sword in its place. The Mobian holding the sword looking down at the blue sword struggling against him with a perplexed expression, though he quickly jumped back when a spectral claw reached forwards, grabbed Sam, and pulled him back.

"Damn it all..." As the old cat Mobian was set aside next to Sorun, he couldn't help but mentally curse at himself. "This wasn't part of the plan. I just... Should've left. Why did this have to happen now?"

Despite the vast amount of frustration and self-anger filling Sorun, he managed to reach up and gently pluck Virgil off of his shoulder before nearly thrusting it into a confused Sam's grasp. "Take him. Go back with the others. Don't interfere," he said in a low voice.

"Wha...?" Wide-eyed, Sam looked down at the Chao in his hand, who looked just as confused if not worried as him, and then back to Sorun. "Wait, Sorun, you can't-!"

"You either step back or I throw you back." The glare Sorun had sent at the cat caused him to flinch, and he hesitantly nodded before backing up towards the crowd of villagers, who also moved back to give space. Virgil was reaching a limb out towards Sorun while calling out "chao! Chao!", but Sam held him back.

Sighing, Sorun turned his head down. He felt angry at himself for what he just did, but it paled in comparison to the absolute rage he was feeling towards the Mobians behind him. The one with the red sword in particular was drawing a majority of his ire, but he felt anger at all of them. For almost cutting down Sam like that, who Sorun liked. Possibly robbing Gary of his only family left. For harassing this nice little village. For making him feel these feelings and making him get involved.

He wasn't supposed to be getting involved in these things anymore, dammit. He ran away just to save his life, not put it in danger again. But even though he tried, he didn't want to ignore this.

Breathing out again, Sorun rose his head. "Oh fuckin' boy, here we go," he angrily thought as he slowly turned towards the bandit Mobians, Bringer Claws tightly squeezing his shoulders. "Well, too late to back down now."

Time to save the villagers from the bandits, then. He could berate himself for being an idiot and figure out why he'd done and made such a stupid choice later.

The villagers had gone far enough back that they'd taken cover behind some of the houses. The bandits in front of him were all staring wide-eyed at Sorun, particularly at the Bringer Claws, though some were almost eagerly running their claw-tipped fingers over their blades. The one with the red sword and blue and yellow eyes looked oddly calm, his expression going neutral as he and Sorun locked eyes.

"And here I thought all Mobians were nice. So much for that fantasy, huh?" Sorun was the first to speak, gesturing towards the group of armed Mobians with a single hand and a deep frown on his face. "Isn't it a bit stereotypical for a pack of wolves to prey on a helpless village like this?"

Some of the Mobian bandits snarled at him, and the one with the red sword seemed particularly affronted. "We are jackals ," he hissed out, composure briefly wavering.

"Swing and a miss, what are you gonna do?" Sorun said with a shrug, not a care in his voice. "Honestly I'm not seeing it, but if you're jackals, you're jackals."

The odd-eyed jackal who Sorun assumed to be the leader regarded Sorun with narrowed eyes, and then scoffed as he rested the sword's blunt side on his shoulder. "I didn't expect to encounter a human anywhere in the continent," he said. "I'll admit that I've never even encountered a member of your kind before. I've heard the stories, though. We all have." The jackal leader began slowly pacing from left to right. "A weak, cowardice race who resorted to underhanded tactics and ranged weapons to kill from afar, and still lost in the Great War. A completely pathetic species, really. Nothing but weaklings in the face of Mobians."

The jab caused a bit of irritation to flow through the teen. "Yeah, you're not wrong. Our physical abilities are pretty pathetic compared to a Mobian's. Weak, though? I don't think so," Sorun said, voice as even as he could make it. "But pardon my mistake from earlier. What's a bunch of jackals doin' terrorizing a village and putting old folk to the sword?"

The jackal's eyes had widened just the slightest amount, as if he hadn't expected such a response. He'd tilted his head to the side in an interested manner, and then shifted his gaze to the villagers in the back. "The people who live here have a knack for fashioning working pieces of technology from scavenged junk for a living," he explained. "Water purifiers, transistors, conductors, and so on. Technological pieces such as those are a scarcity in these times due to the war with Dr. Eggman, and there are many who would be willing to pay a great price for such commodities." He gestured to the jackals at his sides. "We're simply a traveling pack of mercenaries attempting to forge a living in these trying times, human. But the villagers here decided they had the nerve to try and deny us our right to take what's ours."

Sorun gave the jackal a flat, unimpressed look. "You know there's a whole junkyard down the way full of that shit, right?" he asked as he stuck his thumb out behind him. "You seriously gotta raid a village instead of scavenging it yourself?"

If the harsh language bothered the jackal at all, he didn't show it. One of his eyelids did twitch, however. "Such work is completely beneath us," he claimed. "It's not as if this village would be completely helpless. They can simply create more of whatever we take from them. Such is their place."

"Their 'place', huh?" Sorun repeated. "So, what, you just roll into town with your boys and a buncha swords and you suddenly own the place?"

The jackal shook his head. "I wouldn't go that far," he denied. "It's simply the order of things." He pointed the tip of his sword past Sorun and at the townsfolk behind him. "The weak will always be inferior to the strong. That's simply the way of the world. Those who cannot resist the current of the strong have no choice but to submit or be crushed."

A weary breath left the teen. "Oh, brother, you're one of these guys," Sorun groaned as he pinched at the bridge of his nose. "Yeah, yeah, I've heard the spiel a million times before. Weak live to be crushed, strong can do whatever they want, blah blah blah, the fuck is your point?" He gestured back to the townsfolk. "You showed up with a bunch of guys with swords and demanded shit from them. Of course they went along with your demands at first. That's not weakness. That's trying to not get their loved ones stabbed to death by you idiots. The hell do you expect them to do?"

"To fight back, perhaps?" the jackal suggested. "Even if half their population is children and feeble oldfolk, they had more than enough to outnumber us and ample time to prepare. I went as far as to prepare for resistance, and with their numbers and technical know-how I half-expected I'd need to cut my losses and call this trashpit a loss. But what did they do instead?" He shook his head, glancing at the townsfolk with almost disgust lacing his features. "They denied us when we came to collect, but nothing else. No resistance. Nothing. They simply told us 'no' and hoped we would move on. Such weakness... it's despicable," he spat.

Sorun glanced back at the Mobians, and then back to the jackals and their leader. "They're Mobians," he said. "Unlike you guys, I don't think they like fighting. But I wouldn't really know; I'm kinda new here. But I've been around Mobians long enough that I can see that they really don't like violence. You're really gonna fault them for trying to take the peaceful, nonviolent route with you? If anything you should be grateful they tried just telling you off."

The jackal's response was to scoff. "You cannot possibly be that blind. In this world ravaged by the likes of Dr. Eggman, such weakness is fatal. They're fated for death, those weaklings, one way or another. We are simply trying to exploit that weakness to survive. The right to survive where others would perish is a right solely reserved for the strong. If scavenging off the efforts of the doomed weak is what it takes for us to remain strong, then so be it."

Sorun sighed, and hung his shoulders. "You know what you are?" he asked as he pointed at the jackal leader. "You're that one kid in the back of the class that learned one single philosophy lesson and suddenly thinks they're on the same level as somebody like Nietzsche because their smooth-ass brain managed to absorb that one nugget of knowledge. You're not Nietzsche. You can use as many pretty words as ya like, but you're nothin' but a bunch of opportunistic douchebags. Nothin' more, nothin' less."

The odd-eyed jackal quirked an eye ridge in confusion, perhaps at the mention of Nietzsche's name, but he quickly brushed it off. "And you are little more than a lowly human uselessly preaching morality on a subject you yourself believes in." The point of the sword shifted to Sorun. "You're little more than a fool begging for death by trying to defend those weaklings. Those such as you that would willingly jump into the jaws of death are worse than weak. I absolutely despise wastes of skin like you that would throw their pitiful lives away for nothing."

He lowered his sword back to his side after that. A few seconds passed as a gust of wind blew a handful of leaves between the two, after which they both began to laugh. Low, humorless laughs full of nothing but contempt for one another, their eyes still locked onto each other despite their shaking shoulders. The laughter ended as quickly as it began, though, with Sorun speaking first.

"Yeah, you're absolute scum," he decided. "I'm Sorun, by the way."

A rueful chuckle left the jackal. "You are certainly more than what I expected out of my first meeting with a human. I am Infinite."

Sorun made a "tsk" noise. "God, even your name is the most pretentious thing in the world," he muttered.

One of the ears on top of Infinite's head flicked, and he gave the human an irritated glare. "And just what is that supposed to mean?" he demanded.

"It means every single word you say makes me wanna punch your teeth in, and you know what, it just might come to that. But I guess I wouldn't really be doing my point justice if I didn't at least try the diplomatic route." He also really didn't want to fight, despite how he felt about the jackals. He doubted his words would be able to get to them, though, but he would at least try resolving this peacefully. If only because it meant there was a minute chance he didn't have to fight. "Alright, Infinite, here's what's gonna happen. You're gonna leave. You're gonna take your little jackal posse there, and you're never gonna come back to Scrap City ever again."

"And if I don't?" Infinite challenged.

"Then I'm gonna break all your arms and legs."

A beat passed between Sorun and the jackals. Infinite gave the human a critical glare, and then looked to the side at two of his comrades. "Take him," he ordered.

There was absolutely no hesitation in the jackals, and with swords bared they ran straight at Sorun with their eyes completely locked onto his body. The human, for his part, gave them a completely blank stare, and then proceeded to stand absolutely still as his two Bringer Claws shot forwards.

The first Bringer Claw had curled into a fist and punched the first jackal right in the face. The force was sufficient enough that the jackal was sent flying all the way back to his group before slamming into a buggy's door and falling down unconscious. The second jackal watched the display with a gaping mouth, and then yelped out in surprise when his leg was grabbed by the second Bringer Claw. He was lifted up into the air, slammed down into the ground, lifted up, slammed a second time, and then his knocked-out body was tossed at Infinite's feet.

The heterochromatic jackal watched the other jackal's form roll to his feet, and then glanced over at the other jackal that had been slammed into the buggy. His face still impassive, if not slightly irritated, he turned back towards Sorun as the Bringer Claws folded back onto his shoulders. "So. You are strong, then," he said. "Why ever are you endeavoring to defend these village simpletons with those abilities of yours?"

"You see, that's the problem with the 'strong always trample over the weak' philosophy. You morons never seem to realize that nice people, or as I like to call them, people with common fucking sense, can be strong, too, and usually don't appreciate people like you pushing the 'weaklings' around. Man, too bad common sense is such a precious commodity these days," Sorun answered with a shake of his head.

Infinite's face scrunched in dismissal at the claim. "I fail to see the logic in such a thing."

"Oh my g- fine, you want some cold, hard pragmatism? You want facts? I'll give you some fucking facts," Sorun ground out in frustration. "I know this may be a foreign concept to someone like you, but wouldn't you know it, if you're nice to people they're nice back. You may start to like each other, and you keep helping each other. You spread this to more people. You know what you get with that formula? A fucking community working together to survive!" Sorun screamed out as he gestured to the village behind him. "I mean, Jesus, the Kingdom of Acorn was founded on the idea of a whole bunch of different Mobian species coming together to form one gigantic community through, egh, can't believe I'm saying this, friendship and love and all that other surprisingly effective stuff. And you know what? It works! Because somehow they all managed to beat the Overlanders in the Great War! I don't know how, they fucking shouldn't have because guns , but they did! The Mobians figured out the system, Infinite! They cracked the code! Turns out love for your fellow man, a willingness to cooperate with people, and a desire to help and defend others is all you need to make it in life!" He took in a deep breath, and then exhaled as his shoulders relaxed. "Look, Infinite. Going it alone? Sure, some can do it. Some have the raw ability or the opportunity. The people that say everybody's born equal? They're liars trying to make themselves feel better. Some people are just born better than others. But everybody, even them, even the people born into royalty or born with super speed powers, need help sometimes. That's not weakness. That's trusting in the strength of others so that they can rely on your strength. What you're doing? You're just isolating yourself off from others and denying forming bonds with people just to try and keep yourselves alive in this world. It's not a sustainable economy. It's just not."

Throughout the entire speech, Infinite had only stared wide-eyed at Sorun, remaining silent as to let the human speak. When he finished, though, the jackal's features hardened as he shook his head. "What rubbish," he said. "You truly believe that tripe?"

Letting out a breathy chuckle, Sorun shrugged his shoulders. "To be fair, I'm ripping most of this off of 'Death Stranding'. Thing was a slog to get through, but the messages are relevant." He held a finger up, ignoring Infinite's confused look. "But I meant what I said about humans," he said. "Physically, yeah, we're weak. Everything else, though? Humans can accomplish anything they put their minds to. It's that same infinite willpower that made the modern age out of sticks and rocks. It's that same ability to go as low as possible if it means winning that let them create nukes that could level whole cities. It's the same infinite compassion needed to build communities and the same infinite cruelty tempered by mercy that wins wars. Humans are amazing, Infinite, and Overlanders are just humans evolved by the gene bombs. So if the Mobians managed to beat back the infinite willpower of humanity in the Great War?" He shook his head in a breathless chuckle. "There's gotta be some truth to that friendship trash."

He figured after all that, after that whole rousing speech that was one word away from making Sorun throw up for how cheesy it was, he'd get some positive reaction out of the jackal. But the reaction that Infinite gave as a response to Sorun was not one the human had expected at all. The jackal slowly closed his eyes as a smile formed, and he held two fingers up to Sorun.

"You're wrong on two points," he said, "and as it happens, they all revolve around the same man." He opened his eyes and looked up to Sorun. "You must have skipped a few history lessons, human. You're right about one thing: the Overlanders were ruthless in their campaign during the Great War. The Mobians were losing ground rapidly and were set to lose the war at a moment's notice. Do you know what changed?"

Infinite's words sparked some thought in his mind, and as he thought on them it hit him. Like a bolt of lightning going through his head, he realized he'd forgotten one crucial piece of information, and as a result his shoulders sagged. An important fact Sonic himself had told Sorun long ago. "Right," he mumbled. "Eggman was the Mobian war chief back then. I forgot about that part."

"I believe back then he was referred to as Julian Kintobor," Infinite supplied. "Were it not for his tactical advice, the Kingdom of Acorn would have fallen in the Great War. The Mobians only won because they followed his tactics. Tactics that were even more underhanded than the Overlanders'. How can you say that strength through Mobian bonds of friendship are enough to overcome 'humanity's infinite willpower', as you call it, if they needed the assistance of the absolute worst Overlander this planet has ever produced?" He sniffed harshly and looked to the side, towards the sky. "And secondly," he added, "if the strength of those bonds were truly enough, then the world wouldn't be at the cusp of being completely lost and conquered Dr. Eggman. Mobians such as us wouldn't be fighting and raiding just to survive if the Freedom Fighters were enough to beat him." He turned back to Sorun, his face in a harsh sneer. "The bonds of friendship are a fleeting thing against true strength, Sorun. The Freedom Fighters failing to defeat Eggman only prove it. It's not enough."

"Well, technically speaking they did beat him. A worse Eggman just came and took his place."

"I hardly think that is a valid point considering the current state of the world."

"Yeah..." Sorun's form had become much more relaxed. "You know, you sound pretty admiring of humans and Overlanders for a guy claiming that they're so weak."

Infinite scoffed. "Don't mistake respect for acknowledgement of strength. Without all their tricks, they'll never be stronger than Mobians. The same can be said for Eggman. He's nothing but an Overlander who used clever tricks and machines to cheat his way to victory."

"Well, yeah," Sorun admitted. "The Freedom Fighters still beat Eggman once, though. The first one, at least. That's proof enough for me it works." He paused, and then sighed. "You're not wrong, though. This current Eggman they're all dealing with? I just don't think they can beat him. Not with how everything is. It's just like you said, Infinite: if there's one thing humans excel at above everything else, it's their ability to cheat their way to victory. And this Eggman cheated like crazy with those seven Chaos Emeralds. The guy's insane enough not to steamroll everybody all at once just for the sport of it, but he's not at all afraid of playing dirty." He looked down at his right hand. "Friendship and trusting in others. It's important, but against him, I just don't think it's enough. So I don't know. Maybe if they had somebody on their side that could cheat just as hard as Eggman could by getting bullshit powers out of Chaos Emeralds they could pull a win out." A sad, conflicted smile formed on his face as the hand dropped. "Maybe if they had a friend just as bad as Eggman, they'd finally have a shot at winning."

Infinite tilted his head to the side, confusion lacing his features. "What are you getting at...?"

The smile dropped off of Sorun's face, set back into a neutral expression. "Eh, don't worry about it. Just thinking aloud over here. All this mushy talk about friends... I blame Mobians. They're starting to rub off on me I think. But you know, after living life among Mobians for a bit... I dunno. I think I like their method. Having friends like that felt... nice."

"Hmf." Infinite huffed, but a small smile soon overtook his features. "I don't get you, but you're an interesting human regardless, Sorun," he said. "A shame you'll die here. Nobody else has ever engaged me as thoroughly as you. It's... refreshing."

The teen felt his shoulders slump at that claim. He'd hoped after all that Infinite would at least think about reconsidering what he was doing here. But based on his wording, he seemed set on finishing what he started with the village. And he didn't mind mowing through Sorun to do it, it seemed.

Well, that was fine. He still felt like breaking his legs for almost killing Sam.

"I'm flattered. Really," Sorun sarcastically remarked. "None of this changes the fact you almost cut Sam's head off."

"Indeed it doesn't." Some of jackals at Infinite's sides rose up with their swords, but in a move that surprised both them and Sorun, he waved his hand down. "It's obvious your ability far outshines my compatriots here," he said as he brandished his red sword. "So why don't we fight? You and me. With just that sword of yours."

"... Just swords, huh?" In response, a single Summoned Sword manifested in Sorun's right hand. "Well, we could have a sick sword fight, Infinite. For sure we could. I could also just end it all right now and bust you up with the Bringer Claws, which sounds way easier to me."

Phenomenally easier, really. That wasn't even factoring in Sorun being vastly weaker than a Mobian like Infinite and having absolutely skill absolutely swinging a sword though. Punching and grabbing with the arms, though? He had that down pat. And he felt very confident in being able to beat the jackal into submission with those alone, but then he started chuckling.

"Alright, then how about this?" Infinite offered. "We fight, the both of us, with just swords. If you win then we'll leave, just like that. When I win, though, hmm..." He brought his red sword up and ran a finger along the edge. "Well, as thanks for giving me such thought-provoking entertainment, I'll at least make your death quick and painless."

Sorun sucked in air between his teeth. "Gee, I dunno. I wanna trust that smooth-as-butter voice of yours, but wouldn't you know it I just don't." He held his Summoned Sword up to peer through the barely-translucent, blue blade. "Then again, by the time I'm done with you you're never gonna wanna come back here anyways." He lowered the sword, and the blue wings hanging off of Sorun's shoulders disappeared. "Fine, whatever. Get over here so I can cripple you."

Were Sorun an outside observer, he would have called himself stupid for agreeing to do this. But, as it happened, he had a plan. It was in no way a clean or very "good" plan in that he doubted almost nobody in the Freedom Fighters would ever agree with the plan, but they weren't here and he wasn't a Freedom Fighter at the moment. But what the plan lacked for being clean it made up for being practical and easy.

The plan was he was going to cheat by using a bunch of Summoned Swords and then threaten Infinite's life once Sorun won. It wasn't very pretty at all, but it'd get results. And he doubted Infinite or his band of jackals would ever dare to come back here again seeing as he wasn't planning on letting Infinite leave in a walking state.

By now, Infinite had began slowly stepping towards Sorun, red, curved sword held to his far side as his eyes bored straight into Sorun's. The pale teen just stood there, Summoned Sword lazily held in his hand as he calmly waited for Infinite to make a move. It was when the human blinked that the jackal silently pushed forwards, raising his sword up without a sound in an effort to bring it down on Sorun.

He scoffed. "What a chump."

A blue flash of light stopped the red sword in its path right before it impacted Sorun. Infinite , gripping the sword tightly with one hand, had widened his eyes when he saw the dozen Summoned Swords hovering in front of Sorun and blocking the red sword with their own blades.

"You never said anything about how many swords I could use," Sorun said, "or how I could use them."

The red sword pressed against the blue ones began to slightly vibrate as Infinite struggled against them. "You cheating coward...!"

"Yeah, guess what, cowards win."

The blue swords locked against Infinite's sword pushed outwards. The jackal was sent backwards, feet skidding against the ground before he came to a full stop. "Tch!" He bent his legs slightly and jumped. Jumped high, Sorun noted, as the jackal's body had sprung all the way up to the top of the nearest tree, and then jumped right off that one to another treetop.

"Wow. Guy can jump," Sorun thought, eyes struggling to keep up with Infinite's form as he jumped from tree to tree while getting closer to Sorun. "Not gonna help you, though."

Right in Infinite's jump path spawned four Summoned Swords, their blades crossed into a shield. The jackal slammed right into them, and let out a soft grunt as he fell onto the ground. No sooner had he made contact with the ground did four more swords spawn near him, all four spinning in tandem with their tips converged at one point as they corkscrewed over to his body. Infinite, surprisingly, had managed to raise his red blade up just in time for its flat side to catch the Stinger Swords. Even more surprisingly managed to hold his ground against the four swords drilling into his own, sparks and red fragments of sword flying outwards.

Shatter!

Unfortunately for the jackal, the onslaught of the four blades proved to be too much, and the four swords managed to break right through his red sword. He gasped in shock as the blue hilt and red shards flew out of his hand, and then quickly backflipped backwards when the four swords swung upwards at him. The blades of the blue swords just barely missed grazing the jackal's chin mid-backflip, and he landed back into a crouch after having successfully dodged the blades.

He looked up just in time for a fifth Summoned Sword fired from Sorun's side to fly by and slash him across the face.

A spray of red flowed out from Infinite's face as he fell onto his back. Slowly, he pushed himself up into a sitting position, panting heavily as he held his wound with his hand. He removed his hand to look down on the blood that had leaked onto his glove, revealing a large, diagonal cut running right through his right eye. He opened it right after, the newly-made cut having untouched the blue eye underneath, though he still growled softly at the wound as he looked up to Sorun. He only became further enraged when he saw the human's passive expression.

"You lost your sword, dude," Sorun said, his hands tucked into his pocket as he glared down at Infinite. "Give it up, Infinite. You can't beat me. Not in a million years."

"Human..." Giving Sorun an indignant glare, Infinite slowly stood up to his feet. "I'm not conceding to somebody like you...!"

Sorun's response was to roll his eyes. "Pfft. Get real." His Bringer Claws manifested and quickly reached out towards Infinite.

To his credit, the jackal did try to dodge them, but the arms proved to be just too quick for him. The left claw reached his face first, wrapping its talons around his head and slamming him into the ground. The right claw grabbed onto his left arm.

"I'll make it real clear," Sorun began, blue eyes glaring furiously at the struggling jackal's body as he thrashed against the arms holding him down. "You're done. You lost. So here's what you're gonna do."

The Bringer Claw holding Infinite's arm squeezed down hard enough that an audible crack! was heard as the arm's humerus shattered. Infinite had done his best to stifle the resulting grunt of pain, though he still thrashed more violently as the limb was broken.

"You're gonna take yourself and your gang of losers out of here." The two spectral claws released the jackal, only to move lower and grab onto his legs. They lifted Infinite up into the air and slammed him down onto the ground hard enough so that when they released their grip, his legs were bent at odd angles. "You're never going to come back to this village again."

Infinite continued to softly growl in rage and pain as he attempted to lift himself up with his remaining, unbroken limb. Sorun's left Bringer Claw quickly slammed down onto his right arm, however, wrapping it in a tight grip and pulling upwards to lift the jackal into the air. The Bringer Claw then moved closer to Sorun, and Infinite, too exhausted and wounded to move, had no choice but to limply hang by the spectral arm holding him up.

The Bringer Claw eventually had moved Infinite right in front of Sorun's passive yet angry face. Infinite's eyes were practically searing into the human's, blood from the gash on his right eyelid seeping into an eye that was seething in rage at the sight of the human that had so thoroughly beaten and humiliated him in front of the pack of jackals fearfully watching from the back. Uncaring for the deathly stare being sent his way, Sorun willed the Bringer Claw to lightly shake Infinite before he spoke again.

"Listen, Infinite, here's the thing. I don't really wanna kill you and the rest of the jackals in front of those villagers. They don't need to see that," Sorun said, voice soft and tinged in anger. "Beyond that, though, you actually bothered to sit through that little debate of ours, so I legitimately think there's a bit of hope for you. I truly want to believe you're just an unfortunate byproduct of the messed up world created in the war against Eggman, and I really hope that some of what I said will get through to you in time so you can change for the better. So I'm letting you go. But if I hear you came back here and pulled this shit again after all this? If you go out of your way just to prove me wrong?" He rose his right hand out of his pocket and snapped his finger. A Summoned Sword appeared over Infinite's head, pointing down at him. The jackals in the back all yelped when more Summoned Swords appeared over them, each and every single one aimed at a jackal. Sorun had turned Infinite's head just enough so that he could see all the swords aimed at his squadron. "I'll kill you all myself. Don't waste your second chance, Infinite. Now take your weak ass and get out of my sight."

Once he was done talking, the Bringer Claw holding Infinite up squeezed down and broke his remaining humerus. The cry of pain elicited from the jackal was a bit more audible than the others, though Sorun ignored it as best as he could as he tossed the Mobian's broken body at the pack of jackals staring wide-eyed at him. Infinite's body rolled to a halt, and as soon as all the Summoned Swords above them shattered, they moved. Infinite's body, as well as the bodies of the other two jackals Sorun had knocked out, were quickly loaded up into the bandits' buggies as they mounted them and the motorcycles. Their engines revved up, just barely drowning out the fearful yelping of the jackals, and soon enough they were all peeling out and driving away at max speed away from the village.

"Well... that's that. I really hope he takes that warning to heart. Don't think I could ever find those guys again if I tried." He hadn't been bluffing, of course, but at the same time he had his own problems to worry about. Defending a village past the point of him coincidentally being there at the time was low on his list of priorities, but he was partly confident that he'd managed to scare them away from Scrap City for good. The villagers were saved.

The same villagers he had to address now that the threat had passed. One in particular, at least.

With a sigh, Sorun turned around. The small amount of villagers that had been hiding behind the houses far in the back were slowly poking their bodies out from their hiding spots as the jackals drove further and further away. Some were giving the retreating jackals looks of disbelief, though most eyes were on Sorun. Widened, grateful yet unreadable expressions Sorun couldn't place that immediately made him nervous.

"Gah, I hope they didn't hear me talking with Infinite. I said some explicit and embarrassing shit back there," Sorun thought to himself as his Bringer Claws lifted up into the air, only to bring him back down in front of the crowd of startled villagers. He only needed a quick glance to find who he was looking for.

Sam was amongst the villagers quietly staring at Sorun, and the cat Mobian's own eyes were equally as wide as he looked at the teen. The Chao he held in his hands seemed just as baffled as the rest of them, something Sorun had taken quick note of before addressing the Mobian holding him.

"Hey, Sam," Sorun greeted in a tired voice. "You okay? Nothing hurt?"

"Er... er, yeah. I'm fine. Thanks." The cat Mobian gave him a stiff nod. "Sorun-"

"Can you do me a quick favor?" Sorun quickly interrupted. "Hold on to Virgil for a little bit longer. I'll come back for him soon, but I..." He sighed, and looked up at the center of the village, towards where the windmill was. "There's something I gotta go do. Just a little bit, alright?"

"Okay-?" Sorun hadn't given Sam the time to finish his sentence. His Bringer Claws beat off the ground and lifted him up into the air the moment he heard the confirmation from the cat.

"The village should be fine now. Jackals are gone, and it doesn't look like they did any damage," he thought as he looked down at Scrap City. "They'll be fine. Me, though..."

Things had been said during that argument with Infinite. The jackal had raised valid points, and even more importantly Sorun himself had said some things that gave him pause. Pause that made him realize some uncomfortable truths about himself, and had lead him to question some of the things he was doing. More than that, though, he definitely didn't want to stick around this village after what had just happened. He didn't want the attention, and he had to move on anyways.

But where to move on to? That, he could not make up his mind on. So he needed to plan what he was going to do next. He needed to sort out his own thoughts and settle the doubts he was beginning to have because of that conversation with Infinite.

He needed some time alone to think.

A/N- Oh hey, it's that one villain everybody loves.

Alright, so here's what happened. Sonic Forces was the last Sonic thing I researched during my Sonic research binge prior to writing this story during the planning phase, since, well, it was the last game made. And I remember seeing all the low reviews saying the game was horrible, and as I was getting into it my thoughts were, "There's no way it's as bad as- ohhhh , yeah it's bad..."

That said I just watched a playthrough of the game, but from what I saw the story was bad, pacing was off, music was hit and miss for me. Overall just... bad. But I'm not here to review a game I never even played, we're here to talk about why I decided to put Infinite in the story.

I saw the guy, and my first impression of him was just, "Man, yeah, this guy's kind of a loser with a lot of power." And, you know what, during the planning phase when I was making Sorun I was also thinking, "You know, Sorun's kind of just a loser with power, too. Maybe I can do something with that."

So I do a deep dive into the character to get a feel for him, and what I get is really not encouraging to that idea. The guy, Infinite, he's just... he's just bad. Like, character-wise he's just awful. A one-dimensional, shallow character that revels in death and destruction and all that edgy goodness. And I mean, it's Sonic, I wasn't expecting the deepest character in the Sonic lore, but even by Sonic standards this guy had nothing going for him. He was edgy for the sake of being edgy. No depth at all past the weakness hangup. An evil psycho that was a evil psycho "just 'cause", basically. And the problem here is we kind of already have someone like that in the story, we have Eggman, but Eggman has a certain charm going for him that's likable and fun to play around with whereas Infinite is so out there with his brand of cartoonish evil that he really doesn't even feel like a Sonic character. Even his color scheme is off; he's just this weird, monochrome character standing next to all these other colorful characters in this colorful world.

I don't like him. I like what he could be, though.

So obviously the Infinite in this story isn't a 1:1 recreation of the game's version. My thoughts along those lines are, "Well, it's a fanfic and Archie is a separate universe from the games anyways so he doesn't have to be the exact same guy, so there's a ton of liberties I can take here." It's an attempt to give him some depth where there is none, but even then there's not a lot of room to work with without completely remaking him. But I know even after all that people still don't like him, so I'm not making him the final end-all-be-all villain or anything like that, or even a character that'll appear prominently in the story. This is more just to establish he's here in the world.

So yeah. There's that. Moving onto Sorun.

Sorun's a good boi who helps out and respects moms but is also a social neophyte allergic to friendly touching because he's a touch-starved gamer nerd. But despite that, he's still someone that knows right from wrong. That being said, almost every time he's said something deep it's come from a video game or movie. He's a guy that paid a lot of attention to those stories, and in that way he's kind of a walking, bastardized encyclopedia of story morals and life lessons absorbed through gaming walking around in a world where that kind of entertainment media doesn't really exist on that level anymore.

Chapter 23

Recursion Error

Episode 23- For what it's worth

Flying to the top of the windmill and staring aimlessly out into the blue sky wasn't exactly on Sorun's docket for the day, but after the event with the jackals, he just needed to get away. Get some time to himself to think.

Some things had been said between him and Infinite, and because of those things, Sorun had started to question things about himself. About what he was doing and what his plan was going forwards. What his actual goals were. Sorun needed to take a minute to sit down and think about everything that had happened and what he was going to do, what he could do, and he needed a quiet place to contemplate this all. So he chose the windmill in order to think in peace.

He had thoughts he needed to sort through.

He needed to face some hard truths.

He needed to reflect on his actions.

He needed to reevaluate his fucking priorities.

"I'm never going to see Earth again." That was the first thing he came to terms with as he sat on top of the windmill, knees pressed up to his chest as he looked up at a passing cloud. "The Emeralds don't come out. Athair said it. Tails said it. There's no getting around it. I'm stuck on Mobius forever. And I sure as shit ain't gonna find a miracle to my problem just wandering blindly around the world, assuming there even is a miracle. Which there probably isn't."

It wasn't him giving up; it was him realizing that, no, there was no going back. Ever. He didn't want to believe he'd never see the things he loved so dearly ever again. His mother. His friends. The life he'd lived. All those video games and pieces of entertainment media. The memories. His home . Just thinking about it now made silent tears stream down his otherwise calm face, but it was the truth, no matter how much he wished it wasn't so. He hadn't wanted to accept it, part of why he ran was because he refused to accept it, but now that he was taking the time to think? He didn't have any choice but to acknowledge the facts.

Here were the facts: he couldn't return to Earth. Ever. He was here to stay on Mobius.

So where did that leave him?

"I could always just go back," Sorun internally mused. "Back to the Freedom Fighters. I was only gone a day. They'd understand. They'd forgive me. And then it'd be, what, back to the daily grind? More training, more missions against Eggman, more years lost to Chaos Emeralds in exchange for power? More fun times with all those great guys?" His head tilted down to Scrap City. "I don't have to do that, though. I could just... stay here. Make a life. If not here, somewhere else. I'll never be able to live a full life because of the two Emeralds already in me, but I could make something with the time I have left. Because if I go back to the Freedom Fighters... I'm just gonna die. Either from a robot or the Emeralds." He sighed deeply. "Would abandoning them all for a new life even be worth it, though?"

He'd meant what he said to Infinite: he didn't believe the Freedom Fighters could win against Eggman. Hell, even Sonic had expressed doubts. The whole reason he was even brought here was because everybody had doubts. Aurora and Athair with their limited insight into the future said it to his face. And what happened when Eggman won? World domination. Enslavement and death of everybody. Likely very horrible and humiliating deaths that Sorun didn't want to think about. Skies perpetually covered in smog and metal for as far as the eye could see. A death to Mobius. A peaceful world turned into a tortuous landscape void of hope.

That was what awaited Mobius if Eggman won. Sorun didn't want to live in that world. Nobody did.

With Sorun, though, and his powers, there was a chance. A chance to win against Eggman, once and for all. In a month's time with two Emeralds he'd grown in strength exponentially. He only now realized it, but he'd accomplished feats he'd never even dreamed of achieving ever in his life. Defeated robots. Became strong enough to beat a Mobian like Infinite with the use of his powers. How further could he be carried with even more Emeralds? Enough, just enough, that he could be the one to turn the tide and help the Freedom Fighters beat Eggman once and for all. Aurora and Athair hinted as much.

But that path meant death for Sorun. Because those Emeralds would end up killing him. And he didn't want to die.

So what was he to do? Live for himself? Die for others? From where he sat, those were his only two choices. A hellish choice he just couldn't make his mind up on, because either way he sliced it, he didn't like either outcome. His life was ruined pretty much either way. It was already ruined since he couldn't return to Earth. So what was he to do with what he had left? He truly didn't know, and the path to gaining that wisdom was one he didn't have.

There was somebody else that had that wisdom, though. A fictional character from one of his favorite video game series. The brother of the one whose powers and son's powers the Emeralds had gifted Sorun. Someone wise enough to see the true power of humanity and never turn his back on it. Somebody who knew the significance of loving someone or something. Someone Sorun deeply respected despite him being a little more than highly-detailed pixels voiced over by an actor.

It was time get some advice from Dante from the 'Devil May Cry' series. And in turning to Dante, Sorun couldn't help but remember one particular quote that continued to stick out at him.

"Strength is a choice. Fighting like hell to protect what's important."

So what was important to Sorun? Earth, obviously, but that was lost to him forever. So what else was there? His life? That was hanging precariously over the edge, but it was something to start with.

"Say I do nothing. What happens to the world?" Sorun thought. "Most likely, Eggman wins. And that world he creates... that really a world worth living in? Assuming I'll live at all, anyways. He takes over the world and eventually I get hunted down by robots to get killed or worse." He shuddered at the thought. "Even if that doesn't happen, even if I survive, do I really want to live in a world ruled by that guy? A polluted, metal world where he reigns over everybody else? What kind of life is that?"

A terrible life. For him and everybody. A life nobody deserved. He'd go as far as to say it wasn't even a life worth living, not in a world like that.

"But if I go back and fight, we just might beat him. Everybody gets to go on in peace, but I'll end up dead. But which is better? Dead or alive in a world ruled by Eggman?"

That, he didn't know, nor could he make up his mind on. So that was the importance of his life thought of. What else was important to him? Well, his Chao was certainly important. And thinking about Virgil had lead Sorun to think about the Mobian people he'd encountered. And then he realized they'd suffer in a world ruled by Eggman, too.

"I don't even want to think about what he'd do to all the Freedom Fighters if he won. And everybody else..." He frowned, and looked down at the village. "I like them," he silently admitted to himself. "I... actually like these people. I wouldn't have gone out of my way to save Sam if I didn't. I... I don't want anybody to suffer in that world. Not the Mobians, not the humans and Overlanders, not anybody. Nobody deserves that. And these Mobians, especially the ones in Knothole... they were all so kind to me. Kinder than my own mother in some cases, and that's a real hard bar to pass." A mirthless chuckle left him. "I focused so much on hating my position here that I never even paid attention to everything else. Now that I've left and gotten my mind off of it, interacted with the people in that village down there... I really liked it. I like living with them. I liked everybody in Knothole. Everybody there was so considerate of me. So patient and understanding. They put so much time and effort and hope into me, went so far out of their way to try and befriend me to help me as much as possible...

"... And I ran out on them."

He hadn't even realized any of this until he'd left Knothole. He didn't realize how much he valued their attempts at befriending him until he'd felt jealousy over Sam hugging his grandson. He didn't realize how much he liked helping others and being acknowledged for helping until he'd helped those children. He didn't realize he'd grown to like them all so much he'd actively put his life on the line to defend them until he'd done so. Like he'd done with Sam.

Like he'd done with Knuckles, when that rock almost crushed him. Because despite the incident with the Emerald, Knuckles was a solid guy who'd forgiven him with a single apology.

Like he'd done with Antoine and Bunnie, back with that train. Those two had been among the nicest people he met, and they, along with Sally, went so far out of their way to try and help Sorun adjust to the world that he couldn't help but acknowledge them all as friends.

Like he'd done with Nicole, back when they were inside of Metal Sonic's head. She and the games they played were one of the only things that had kept him together back when he was with the Freedom Fighters. She was probably his best friend there.

And even if he still harbored some resentment for every single one of the Freedom Fighters, with the exception of a few, for bringing him here, that animosity faded more with each day.

Sorun truly liked them all. And he couldn't bear the thought of them all suffering in a future ruled by Eggman. He didn't want to picture the grisly fates that would befall every single individual he'd come to cherish if the Doctor won. He hated the fact that they'd already suffered so much at his hands. That whole lives were ruined, that people he only now realize he'd grown close to had to take up the mantle and fight him since they were children. That they'd lost so much in this war they shouldn't have had to fight in. He just wanted them to finally live in peace.

And if possible, since he was stuck here forever anyways, he'd like to live a life in peace alongside them. But, of course, in order to give them that peaceful life, he'd have to give up his own.

There really was no winning with this.

"So what are you gonna do, Sorun? You gonna live in a fucked-up dystopian torture future and watch everybody you've come to adore die or get enslaved into a meaningless existence? Or are you gonna take the quick way out and try to save everybody?"

Well, when phrased like that, the choice was obvious.

He didn't want to die.

He wanted all his friends to die even less.

"... RRRAAAAGGH!" Screaming at the top of his lungs, Sorun bolted up to his feet and threw a Summoned Sword at the sky. "FINE! I'LL DO IT! I'LL FUCKING DO IT!" He screamed out even louder to the heavens as more swords uselessly shot up to the sky. "THAT WHAT YOU WANTED, YOU ECHIDNA FUCKS!? HUH!? WELL, YOU GOT IT! CONGRATULATIONS!"

And with that, he'd finally decided what he was going to do.

He'd do it. He'd go back to the Freedom Fighters and gather more strength from the remaining Chaos Emeralds.

He'd kill himself for Mobius.

Part of Sorun almost expected the few clouds in the sky to part and for a ray of light to shine down on him to signal that he'd finally satisfied some hidden prerequisite so that he could talk to Athair and Aurora again. Or that, after finally committing to ending his life for the sake of everybody else, he'd fall unconscious again and wake up in that alternate zone they were in. But all Sorun received was the quiet sound of the wind blowing past him from the slowly spinning blades of the windmill.

So, with his expectations completely curbed and his body out of breath, he collapsed face-first onto the top of the windmill.

Full minutes passed of Sorun just laying there, body subtly shuddering as he tried to control his own emotions. The dread and frustration coursing through him as he realized he was choosing to die. Some more minutes passed before he finally slowly picked himself up into sitting in an upright-position, a few more latent tears remaining on his face that he quickly wiped off. He sniffed once, and then looked back up at the sky.

"Well... fuck. Hah... I guess on the bright side it can't get any worse than this, right?" he muttered to himself as he slowly got up to his feet. "It's all up from here, Sorun. At least 'til I die and it all comes to an abrupt, screeching halt. Fuck, my life sucks." He took in a deep breath, and then slowly exhaled. "But I guess if they all get to live in exchange, it's worth it. Better that than let Eggman win. No way am I letting his fat ass ruin everybody's lives.

"I better get a whole chapter in the history books for going ahead and doing this. I want shit named after me. I want a fucking movie made in my honor. Maybe a video game, too, if society manages to pick itself back up far enough to start producing all that stuff again." A morose, joyless smile on his face, Sorun walked up to the edge of the windmill's top and looked down at Scrap City. "Well, before any of that, I gotta get back to Knothole. Problem is I don't know where it is exactly. Maybe Sam knows- I gotta go get Virgil back from him, anyways." A sigh left him as the Bringer Claws manifested. "Guess it'd be a good time to say goodbye to him and Gary, too. Doubt I'll ever live to see them again once I leave."

With that, he jumped off the windmill and flew in the direction of Sam's house.

Sorun hadn't made any stops or delays on the way to the two cats' dwelling. He had too much on his mind to deal with any of the other villagers, and after what happened with Infinite and his jackals, he didn't really know what their reactions would be towards him. Most likely positive, seeing as he had gone and saved their village from a bunch of crazy jackals. The overwhelming kind of positive that would involve a large crowd and a lot of heartfelt thanks and maybe hugs.

No, that was a bit too embarrassing for his taste, and if he was really gonna commit to a death march in the name of peace for the world he wasn't gonna attach himself to more people than necessary. Better for him to be that one weird human guy that had briefly stopped by town and saved them only to never be seen again than become somebody too well known. That wasn't gonna work for Sam and Gary, though, hence why Sorun was bothering to visit them one last time to say goodbye.

Plus he needed his Chao and directions.

Touching down right in front of the front door to Sam's house, Sorun wasted no time in knocking on the front door as his Bringer Claws disappeared. Some seconds passed before he heard small footsteps approach from the other side of the door, followed by the door quickly opening.

"Hey, S- huh?" There wasn't an aged cat man standing in front of Sorun. When he looked down, however, he saw that it was a much younger cat boy that had answered the door, black ears and tail stuck straight. "Oh, sorry about that, Gary. You know where your grandfather-?"

"Sorun!"

What happened next was that the Mobian child jumped right up to Sorun, wrapping his arms around the human's waist while burying his face into his abdomen. Sorun, with a small "oof", stumbled backwards at the new weight settling onto him, some slight panic going through him at the unexpected contact. He looked down at Gary, and then managed to take a deep breath in order to calm himself.

"Really gotta remember to thank Bunnie for that breathing tip she gave me. Thing's been a lifesaver," he thought, sighing as he rubbed the top of Gary's head. "Missed you too, pal," he muttered. A few more seconds passed, and while Sorun couldn't find the energy to pry the child off of him, the contact was still beginning to make him uncomfortable. "You can let go now."

Thankfully, Gary complied and let go of Sorun's torso, stepping back while staring up at the teen with his wide, green eyes. "Everybody's saying that you fought off the bandits and saved the village."

"... I guess that's technically accurate," Sorun said in response. Gary's eyes had brightened up so intensely from the response that Sorun had actually winced and turned his head slightly to the side.

"You're so cool!" The high-pitched praise and the sheer intensity of the smile being beamed at Sorun was almost too much to endure, and he was forced to resort to brushing his dark locks of hair over his abashed face. "Grandpa said that they almost did something really bad, but then he said you came in and beat up a bunch of those mean jackals with your blue arms and chased them off!"

"That all happened, yes," Sorun agreed with a small laugh. "Gary, come on, calm down. It wasn't anything special."

"What do you mean is wasn't anything special!? You saved the village!" The Mobian child stopped bouncing on his feet, though he still had that wide, grateful smile on his face. "You're the best, Sorun! Now come on!" He reached forwards and gripped Sorun's right hand. "You need to come in and tell me all about it!"

"H-hey!" He found himself quickly pulled inside of the house, though Sorun didn't at all resist against the child's pull despite his vocal protest. He in fact closed the door right behind him, and at Gary's behest, sighed and began recounting what had happened earlier today.

He left out a lot, of course. Mainly a majority of what he'd said to Infinite and the part where he'd actually broken all of the jackal's limbs, as he felt that maybe glorifying the act of crippling somebody in such a way to a child wasn't the best of ideas. So the story Sorun told Gary was about as barebones as it went: he'd seen trouble, so he'd swooped in, saved Sam, and beat up jackals with his Bringer Claws until they went away. The consequence of such censorship was that it wasn't the most glamorous of stories, but Sorun at least tried adding a bit of flair by mentioning the Summoned Swords.

To somebody like Sorun, it was an even more droll story to listen to than actually say. Gary, on the other hand, practically had stars sparkling in his eyes. Sorun didn't know if it was because he was desensitized to action at this point due to a life of gaming combined with a very short real-life career in life-threatening situations, or if Gary's life was really just that quiet. But whatever the case may be, by the end of the story the pair had landed in the house's kitchen, both sitting in separate chairs at the table. Sorun's form was slumped over it, elbow on the table with his head resting on his palm, whereas Gary was standing on his chair and leaning over the table.

"Woooow..." The kid was practically starstruck by the time Sorun had finally finished. "So... you really saved grandpa's life?"

"Well, I mean... you know, he... he probably wouldn't have..." Sorun trailed off, turned his head a bit to see Gary's eyes, sighed, and turned back. No use in trying to hide it, he supposed. "Yeah," he breathed out, "I saved him."

"Oh..." Gary's mood instantly deflated as he sat down in his chair. Sorun looked back over to him, softly sighed, and then picked his head up and fully turned towards him.

"Gary, it's fine," Sorun said to him in a soft voice. "He's alive along with everybody else."

"Yeah, I know. It's just that thinking about what could have happened..." The Mobian child took a shuddering breath, and then gave Sorun a small smile. "I guess the important thing is that it's over and nobody got hurt." His smile brightened. "Thank you so much for everything you've done, Sorun. You're one of the nicest people I've ever met!"

"Chao!"

The noise drew both the human's and Mobian's attention towards the kitchen entrance. Gary's expression brightened even further when he saw Sam standing there in the entrance, while Sorun's eyes locked right onto the cat's left shoulder, where he saw a Chao waving wildly at Gary.

The child laughed. "You too, Virgil. You're really neat, too."

"Hey, how come he gets praise?" Sorun complained as he pointed at the Chao. "He didn't even do anything."

"Chao."

"Emotional support!?" The teen sputtered in outrage. "What are you, my mascot now!?"

Virgil shrugged.

In a huff, Sorun collapsed right into his chair with a defeated expression. The act caused both Gary and Sam to burst out in laughter, and even the Chao on Sam's shoulder was mildly chuckling in delight. The sight was enough the bring the smallest smirks to Sorun's face as well, though he tried his best to turn his head enough to hide it.

After a few seconds of laughing, Sam sighed out and picked Virgil up off his shoulder. "To think yesterday you were askin' me if Chao were even smart," he commented as he set Virgil on the table. "Now you're acting like you understand the little guy."

Sorun shrugged as he watched Virgil waddle towards him. "Eh, still don't, but it's not really that hard to kinda get what he's saying if you can read the subtext," he explained. "Play enough games like I have where you gotta raise the stupid relationship levels of pets and companions through actions and dialogue and you learn to read subtext REAL well."

The looks he got from the cats and Chao were ones of confusion. With a sigh, the pale teen rolled his eyes.

"... The gestures help." They continued to give him confused looks, causing him to sigh again. "Geez, forget what I said," he muttered as he picked Virgil up and placed him on his left shoulder. "Thanks for looking after him, Sam."

"Er, yeah." The older Mobian regained his composure and gave him a nod. "I think I should be the one thanking you though, Sorun. After everything you-"

"Chao."

"- and Virgil have done, I wasn't gonna forget you," Sam added, causing Sorun to shoot the Chao a dirty glare. "Ever since I met you yesterday you've been nothing but a big help for all of us." He started to rub the back of his neck. "Didn't think you'd end up savin' the whole village from a buncha jackals, though. Eheh."

"Yeah, speaking of which," Sorun began. "You guys, uh, did you hear what I actually was talking about with that one guy? And, um... nobody got freaked out by, you know, how hard I went on him, did they?" he asked, a nervous tone to his voice. "I was really angry at the time when it happened, and I'm not exactly sorry for what I did, but looking back I kinda realized that most people probably woulda seen what I did as... you know. Distasteful."

With a wave of his hand, Sam shook his head. "Nah, don't worry none about it. Guy had it comin' to him, and a few broken bones never hurt anybody. 'Sides, not like you did anything that won't heal up," he said, "and maybe it'll go to be teachin' him some humility and have him stop harassing folk."

Sorun let out a sigh of relief. He'd been worried that the people wouldn't take to kindly to the way he treated Infinite. He supposed considering he'd almost killed one of them, though, they weren't going to be too overly sympathetic for his him. Seemed like everybody was just happy Sorun saved the day according to Sam.

"But, uh, nah, we were all a bit too far away to hear anything specific," Sam continued. "Heard a lot of shouting from you, though. What were you trying to say to that fella?"

"I was trying to take the diplomatic approach and maybe talk some sense into him so they'd leave in peace," Sorun said with a shrug, relieved all those embarrassing and explicit words he said hadn't been heard. "Diplomacy failed."

"Ha! That it did. Suppose you did the right thing trying to talk it out first, even if it didn't work." Sam pulled up a chair and sat down at the table with the rest of them. "That all being said, I don't think I'm ever going to be able to repay you for what you've done, Sorun. For savin' my life and the village and... making sure my little Gary here didn't lose his only family left." He reached over and ruffled the top of the cat child's head while giving Sorun a sincere smile. "Really. Can't thank you enough."

A soft groan of embarrassment left Sorun as he crossed his arms and turned away from the smiling pair of cats. He felt something tap his shoulder, and he glanced over to see Virgil smiling at him, too. But while the smile was a happy one, his eyes were closed just the slightest amount. Like they were teasing, almost.

"What the hell, you were so sweet yesterday. When'd you get so cheeky?" Sorun thought as he lightly flicked Virgil on his forehead. He ignored the indignant sputter of the Chao and turned back to the Mobians. "It was nothing," he said. "I wasn't just gonna sit by and do nothing . Especially when I got powers that make it easy." He glanced off to the side. "And even then, y'know... everybody in this village seems nice and it wouldn't have felt good doing nothing."

"Chao."

"Yeah, plus Virgil would have never let me forget it."

"Heh heh. I imagine not." The smile on Sam's face fell a bit. "So, Sorun, when we first met you said that you were lost. Dunno if you ever had a destination in mind, but, well, everybody in the village practically already loves you-" Sorun's chest jolted at that, "- and we have a spare bedroom, so, you know, if you wanted-"

"Yeah, just stay with us!" Gary said enthusiastically as he leaned over the table again. "Please? It'll be really fun, I promise! We can play ball and do all sortsa stuff together and you can be, like, the village defender or something if anybody like those jackals or Eggman or whoever shows up!"

Sorun found himself blinking in surprise. He'd entertained the idea of just staying, but he hadn't thought that the possibility would come this easily. And from the way they were looking at him, it almost felt like they wanted him to stay. Gary for sure, but even Sam seemed a bit hopeful.

It was almost enough for him to take it, too. It wouldn't be home on Earth, not by a long shot, but it wouldn't be terrible. Living in a peaceful village full of people that already accepted him after everything he'd done. To just settle down from all the craziness and just relax. Finally get some of that peace he'd been searching for.

But no. He couldn't do that. Protecting a single village was nice, but protecting the entire world and everybody inside of it, including that village, was more important to him. And he'd already made up his mind.

Sorun gave them a smile- a grateful smile- but, to their disappointment and Virgil's visible confusion, he shook his head. "Sorry, guys," he said, "but I can't stay. I'd like to, but I can't. Thanks anyways."

Gary let out a whine of disappointment and slumped back into his chair. Sam looked slightly disappointed himself, but unlike his grandson the black-furred cat had a thoughtful look on his face.

"I see, I see," he mumbled. "Well, that's a shame, but I can't rightly try to chain someone down who doesn't wanna stay. That said, Sorun, I don't rightly know where you're headed, but... have you ever considered going to Knothole?"

Sorun's ears perked up in interest, and he turned to face Sam completely. "Why do you ask that?" he asked.

"Well... Sorun, I'll be honest with you," he said. "Seeing everything you can do with those arms and swords, well... you're a pretty powerful fella, ain'tcha?"

The pale human scoffed. "Arguably."

"Don't be coy, now, I saw what you did to them bandits," Sam said. "Doubt you don't know this, but the whole world's on the brink of falling into the hands of that madman, Eggman. There's a group out there called the Freedom Fighters that've been trying to beat him back since the start of this whole mess, but, well, they've been hurtin' real bad as of late," he admitted. "I just thought that somebody like you would maybe have a place there with them. Not just 'cause you got power, but because you got heart, too. You saved that Chao there, helped me and my grandson out, saved the whole village outta the kindness of your heart without askin' anything in return... well, I wouldn't know personally, but if that don't make a good Freedom Fighter candidate, then I don't know what does. I could show you on a map where the place is if you're at all interested."

It almost seemed too good to be true. Enough that Sorun burst out in a quiet, disbelieving chuckle as he held his face in his hand, shaking his head. "Alright, world, I get it. I gotta go back. I can read the damn room." Whether it be through unlikely coincidence or some unseen force, something was telling him that he needed to go back to the Freedom Fighters. Well, luckily for whatever that was he was planning on doing exactly that. But he supposed that, before anything, he should at least be straight with Sam. It was the least he deserved.

"Well, Sam... to be honest with you, I already checked that place out," Sorun admitted, causing the eyes of both cats and the Chao to widen. "Even ran around with them for a bit. Some... stuff happened between us and I had to leave for a bit." He sighed. "But I chilled out, and everything that's happened to me in the village got me thinking."

"So that's what you meant when you said you had to think about something," Sam realized. "So what-?"

"You were a Freedom Fighter!?" Gary shouted in excitement. "Did you ever meet Sonic the Hedgehog!?"

Sam shot the younger Mobian and annoyed glare. "Gary...!" he groaned out while palming his face.

"What?" With a nervous chuckle, Gary shrugged. "I-I've always wanted to meet him, so I just thought-"

"Yeah, I've met him," Sorun said, causing stars to appear in Gary's eyes. "Had to sleep in the same room as him, actually."

"Sleeping in the same room as Sonic..." The amount of awe in the young Mobian's voice was almost enough to make Sorun scoot back in his chair. "What was he like!?" Gary almost demanded. "Was he cool!? I bet he was cool! Sonic's the coolest ever!"

Sorun regarded the young Mobian for a few minutes, and then rose a flattened hand and began shaking it. "Eh. He was an okay guy. Kinda full of himself," he blandly answered.

The answer caused Gary to practically flop onto the table top. Sam roared out in laughter at the sight, an actual tear of joy streaming down his face.

"Ha ha ha ha! Ah, I needed that," the old Mobian sighed as he wiped a tear away. "Don't mind him none, Sorun. Sonic's a big hero around in a lot parts around the world to a lot of people."

"Yeah, apparently," Sorun muttered, blowing a lock of hair out of his face. "You were saying something?"

Sam tilted his head to the side, and then remembered what he was going to say and perked up. "Oh, right. I was just gonna ask if all that thinking changed your mind."

"... It did," Sorun said. "I wanna go back to Knothole. Back to the Freedom Fighters." A few blue, spectral feathers briefly appeared over his back, floated down, and disappeared. "Figured all these powers of mine should be good for something. And I... kinda miss them." He gave Sam a serious glare. "Don't tell them I said that, though. I mean it. If you ever see a Freedom Fighter never tell them I missed them."

"Ha! No promises." Sam sat up out of his seat while Sorun grumbled something under his breath. "Well, I've heard enough. Sit tight, Sorun. I'll go get you that map."

He left the kitchen shortly after. Sorun continued sitting in his seat, occasionally glancing at Virgil and a window outside. He heard shuffling in front of him, and then looked forwards to see Gary sit up in is seat.

"So you're really leaving?" he asked, his voice a bit quieter than normal. The disappointment on his features wasn't lost at all to Sorun, who nodded in confirmation.

"Well, someone's gotta save the world," he said. "Right, Virgil?"

"Chao! Chao!" Virgil clapped his arm-limbs together happily in agreement.

"See?" Sorun pointed at the happy Chao. "Virgil gets it. Sorry if you wanted me to stick around, Gary."

"No, it's fine. I understand." A quiet sigh left the young cat. "I... I think it would have been really nice having someone like you around. You could have been like my big brother," he said.

The fact that somebody would even consider such a thing towards him moved something inside of Sorun's chest, but he did his best to smother the warm feeling so it wouldn't leak out onto his face. He still saw Virgil give him an almost knowing smirk from the corner of his eyes, though, and Sorun had to resist the urge to flick the Chao again.

"But you going out there to help save the world is more important," Gary continued. The downcast look he had turned into a smile. "I bet you'll be great. So great that you'll be even more famous than Sonic!"

"Oh, that'd be awesome. I could lord it over him forever," Sorun commented with a light smirk. His head perked up when he saw Sam reenter the kitchen, a rolled piece of paper in his hand. "Yo, Sam. That the map?"

"Sure is," Sam said with a nod as he tossed the paper to Sorun. "Kinda funny that Knothole's location used to be such a well-kept secret, but after it got so big I guess it kinda became an open secret since everyone knows where it is now. I'm actually surprised you don't know where it is since you're from there and all, Sorun."

Sorun opened the map halfway, and then glanced up at Sam. "Directions are hard." He ignored the snickers from the two cats and rolled the map open further. He saw Northamer and a circled spot labeled "Scrap City", and a circled spot lower down on the continent labeled "Knothole". He gave a satisfied nod, and then rolled the map back closed. "Alright. I can figure it out from here," he said, focusing back on the two Mobians. "So, uh... guess this is it, then."

"Guess so," Sam agreed. "Well, Sorun, it's been a pleasure. Truly." He stepped closer to Sorun, and then held a hand out. "You're always welcome here if you ever need somewhere to sleep. Now stay safe out there, y'hear?"

Glancing down at the hand, Sorun let out a chuckle at the irony of the statement before grasping the cat's hand and shaking it. "Yeah. You too, old timer." He let go of his hand and looked towards Gary. "Bye, Gary. Try not to kick that ball too high. Your old-old man can't handle the stress." He got the barest bit satisfaction from the clicking sound Sam's tongue made.

"I won't!" Gary waved his hand in Sorun's direction. "Bye, Sorun! Bye, Virgil!"

"Chao!" Virgil cried out happily, waving his limb at the direction of the two cats. Sorun stared at the pair of cats for a long moment, taking in the sight of their happy faces so he could memorize them, and then smiled the barest amount while he turned around and gave them a two-fingered salute from over his head.

He walked out of the kitchen right after. The teen made his way to the house's front door, and then stepped out without a moment's hesitation. He closed the door behind him, and then took in a deep breath as he took in the sight of the vibrant village around him. His eyes lingered on the happy villagers walking by, some of which had smiled and waved in Sorun's direction. He'd waved back at them as he began walking forwards.

"Yeah. I'm makin' the right choice here." He didn't want to see all this peace snuffed out by Eggman. Not Sam or Gary's peace. Not the peace of everybody in this village. Not anybody's in Knothole. Not the peace of his friends in the Freedom Fighters. Not any of the Mobians' or humans' or Overlanders' peace on any of the continents. Not to anybody's peace in the world. He may not have been able to undo the damage that psychopathic Doctor had caused, but he could at least ensure he was stopped so that this world had a true chance at peace. For whatever that was worth seeing as he'd never be able to experience it personally. As long as everybody else was happy, though... well, he wouldn't say he was satisfied with the outcome, but he'd take it. "Consequences be damned. May not be my first choice, but if I'm really stuck here I'd rather die saving the world than live seeing it rot." He made a sad smile as his Bringer Claws formed. "I made my choice. Everybody is just too important to me. Time to get more power and end this."

"Well, Virgil," Sorun sighed out as he looked up at the sky, "you ready to go be a Freedom Fighter? I'm gonna warn you right now: it involves gratuitous amounts of violence and friendship, and copious amounts of stress from both."

"Chao-chao!" He vigorously nodded at Sorun and excitedly clapped his arms together.

"Heh. Alright, then. Let's go save the world." The Bringer Claws began flapping. "Even if it kills me."

The Bringer Claws beat down on the ground, and Sorun, carrying Virgil on his shoulder, shot up into the sky. The only sign they were ever there were a few loose blue, spectral feathers that had fallen off of the Bringer Claws that slowly touched down on the ground before dissipating into nothing.

A/N- He's back in, boys and girls. He's back in.

So I wanna take this moment to talk about the gag curse, since I keep getting asked about it. Truth is the gag curse is a convenient plot device I made, because while planning this story out I thought to myself, "Well Sorun's just gonna tell them and they won't let him touch any more Emeralds. And he's not gonna go out of his way for them. What am I supposed to do about that?" Gag curse was kind of a band-aid in that regard to remedy the problem, and it added another layer to the story so why not, but a lot of the reasons I didn't go too far into it was because I figured as long as I had at least some moments where Sorun tried to get around it it'd be good enough until we got here.

But yeah, the gag curse is kind of moot now since Sorun just consigned himself to death. He actively wants to absorb all the Emeralds now, and telling anybody about the negative effects would be counter-productive to that, so he'll willfully keep it a secret. If anything he'd actively make sure it remains a secret at this point.

To be honest I feel like the gag curse is kind of a weak point in this story since it feels kinda slapped together. It kinda also has to exist because without it the whole plot falls apart, but, eh, it just didn't seem that eloquent to me but I couldn't think of a better alternative. I tried my best to make up for it by writing around it and all the mental trauma it caused Sorun. But again, that curse is pretty much useless now since Sorun's made up his mind.

Recursion Error

Episode 24- Back in

Step one in Sorun's "commit suicide for the sake of the planet" plan: Sorun needed to get that red Chaos Emerald he'd left in Freedom HQ ASAP.

Before that, though, he needed some advice, or at least to talk to somebody about what he'd done. About some of his internal feelings. About something , because while he'd finally made up his mind on what he was going to do, Sorun felt that maybe some guidance was in order. Or at the very least a second voice to help clear his head of any lingering doubts. And there was no way he was just gonna fly right into Freedom HQ immediately, walk in, and pretend nothing happened to everybody that was there. That'd be too awkward.

No, he needed time and help from somebody else to prepare him for that disaster in waiting, and as it happened, there was one person that came in mind. Sorun had only ever had one conversation with him, but he was somebody that was technically outside the Freedom Fighters and who could at least barely relate to Sorun's plight.

It probably wasn't an ideal choice, but since he really needed to talk to somebody, he'd take it.

"Well, there it is, Knothole. And... it looks the exact same as I left it," Sorun thought. Flying through the sky, he and the one-winged Chao on his shoulder came to a halt as just above the city with the evening sun and an orange sky overhead. "Guess I was just gone for a day, so I... don't really know what I was expecting, actually. But it still isn't bombed out, at least. So that's great." His head tilted further downwards, towards Castle Acorn. "He better be in."

The Bringer Claws beat forwards and propelled Sorun's body towards the castle. He made sure to stay as high as possible as to remain unseen from those below, and then dropped straight down until he'd made it to the side of the castle. The Bringer Claws beat downwards, holding Sorun steady in the air as they slowly moved him towards the center of the castle, near the walls.

After flying around for a bit, he saw what he was looking for: large, vertical windows lining the side of the castle's wall. He chose the window furthest in the back, and then flew up towards the top where there was a small, secondary window on top of the main one that swung open. He flew up, slowly pushed the window open, and then climbed towards the top.

Looking inside the room on the other side of the window he was above, Sorun saw that the castle's throne room looked about the same as it had a month ago, when he'd visited on his second day here. Really long and really empty, aside from the large throne chair at the back. A chair with a familiar red-haired squirrel Mobian sitting in it.

Sorun didn't make a move at first. He just stayed still up on the window, staring down at Elias as he thought over what he was supposed to say to the king. He also was waiting from him to eventually notice Sorun was just hanging out up there so they could go from there, but much to Sorun's growing annoyance, whole minutes passed of him just staring at Elias waiting to be noticed. Eventually, he sighed in frustration and called down to him.

"Yo, Elias, you blind? Up here." The sudden voice startled Elias, practically forcing him to jump out of it as he looked up. His eyes widened and he looked even more startled when he saw the human up on the window, back against the wall and another leg pressing into the window's frame as his second leg hung down freely.

"S-Sorun?" Elias called back, voice in disbelief.

"Yep." Sorun tore his gaze away from Elias to look around at the empty throne room. "Hey, breaking into the castle like this doesn't make me an enemy of the state or anything like that, does it?" he asked as he turned back to Elias. "I woulda just used the front door, but, well, I didn't want people knowin' I was back yet."

The squirrel blinked his blue eyes in confusion, and then shook his head. "No, no it doesn't- can you please get down from there?"

Shrugging, Sorun leaned fully past the window and dropped down. His Bringer Claws flapped a few times to slow his fall, ending in his feet softly touching down on the ground as the winged arms disappeared completely from his back.

With both of them now at the same level, the human and the Mobian took a few minutes to take each other in. Sorun's expression was mainly passive, if a bit nervous from the way he would occasionally fidget. Elias seemed more baffled then anything, blinking over and over as if to make sure it was Sorun standing there in front of him and not an illusion. He was the first one to speak.

"So you're back," he said, and then looked towards Sorun's shoulder. "Pardon me, Sorun, but may I ask why you have a Chao on your shoulder?"

"Don't worry about the Chao." Sorun held a hand up to block Virgil, forcing him to let out a "chao!" of outrage. "You know, it's kinda creepy how you're just sitting here all alone in this giant room."

"I was just taking some time to myself to think."

"Ah." Sorun slowly nodded. "So, uh... nobody's mad at me, right?"

A few seconds of silence passed, ending with Elias' face turning into a wince as he gave Sorun a pitying look. "Well..."

Sorun's arms went limp. "Aw, that ain't the good noise."

Elias sighed, and then rubbed at his forehead. "Sorun, you ran away-"

"I know, kn-"

"Everybody was beyond upset, Sally was furious, Sonic almost ran off to go look for you-"

"Yeah, I figured something like that would happen, but-" Sorun paused, and his pupils shrunk in fear. "Wait, how mad was Sally, 'cause she really scares me somet-" He stopped himself at the withering look Elias shot him. "Okay, fine, I get it. Going AWOL wasn't an okay thing to do." He held his index finger up. "But you know, technically I was only gone a single day, so if I really wanted to I could just say I went out on a really long walk-"

"You told them you were never returning," Elias reminded him with an unamused face.

The finger wilted and fell to Sorun's side. "... Oh yeah, I did say that." He sighed, and then hung his head. "Ooh boy, it's gonna be way more awkward than I thought."

He slowly walked past Elias, letting out a tired breath as he sat down on one of the few steps leading up to the platform where the throne was. Elias stared down at the human's slumped form, and then gave an equally tired sigh as he stepped in front of the pale teen.

"Sorun," he began, "I don't know what possessed you to run away or to break into the castle like this, but something is clearly wrong with you. Just tell me what the matter is. What happened that made you so upset you needed to abandon Knothole?"

"I came back, didn't I?" He glanced up at Elias' face, but when he saw that it still had a stern if not worried look on it, he hung his head downwards again. "I needed to get out for a bit," he answered. "I just... look, it's been a lot, okay?"

"Okay," Elias said with a nod, "then why don't we start with why you chose to break into Castle Acorn's throne room?"

Sorun looked up towards the window he came in from. "Is it really breaking and entering when you leave the window unlocked?" he asked.

Elias's eyes narrowed. "If you don't start taking this seriously I'm calling Sally and the others to tell them you're here."

"Wait-wait-wait, hold up, let's not do anything crazy!" Eyes wide in panic, Sorun snapped his head towards Elias while waving his arms out in front of him. The squirrel's stern gaze hardened, causing him to sigh and have his arms fall back down. "I needed to talk to somebody," he said. "And I wanted to talk with somebody outside of the Freedom Fighters so I could, I don't know, mentally prepare myself and maybe get some advice. I wanted to talk to you because the only other candidates were Sonic's relatives, and there was no way I was gonna risk running into him."

"Okay..." The king nodded his head. "Why me and not somebody else? Sally had told me you and that tailor, Honey, became well acquainted."

"Seriously? I don't need more crazy right now," Sorun said with a scoff. "Geez, man, she drives me nuts, but I have to deal with her because she is literally my only source of pants in this world." His face scrunched in irritation. "Seriously, nobody wears pants. Nobody! I haven't met a single Mobian other than Rouge that wears pants, and I don't even know if those weird leggings she wears counts as pants!" He looked up at Elias's head, and then narrowed his eyes. His vision traveled down from the gold, acorn-shaped crown he wore, to the regal blue coat and red cape he had on, to his legs and feet, which were completely bare save for the red boots he wore. "Even you," he hissed. "You wear everything but pants. Why are you like this?" He looked back up to Elias' face. "What do you people have against pants!?"

"I don't- why-?" Elias palmed his face in exasperation. "Sorun, what does this have to do with anything!?"

"Nothing, I just- this is really uncomfortable for me, okay!?" he yelled out. Sorun took a deep breath, and then allowed his body to go lax as his muscles became less tense. "I came to you because you said you ran once, too."

The squirrel blinked his eyes in surprise, his expression softening a bit. "What?"

Sorun rose his hand to the Mobian, shook his head, and allowed his hand to fall back into his lap. "It was too much, okay?" he muttered out. "The-the-the whole thing with being a Freedom Fighter, the Emeralds, my home, almost dying on a practically weekly basis, it-it all just kept adding up, and I never talked to anybody about it, so I-I blew up when it became too much. I left because I thought that's what I wanted to do, but then I took a really hard look at myself and realized that it wasn't what I wanted to do, so I came back, but I just don't know what I'm supposed to say to everybody." He finished with a loud breath, looking down at the floor. "You said you ran away once. Because the whole king thing was too much or whatever, so you ran out but came back later." He sighed and looked back up at Elias. "I mean, look, I know it's really weird that we only ever had one conversation, and that was like a month ago, only for me to come back now with all this heavy stuff, but I am desperate for help here, man, and I can't go to anybody else with this."

Because he truly didn't know what he was supposed to say to everybody to explain himself. He knew a simple sorry wasn't gonna cut it, but what was there beyond that? There was only so much he could explain while leaving the Emeralds and their debilitating effect on his body out. Maybe he could string some lies together- say all the stress got him, and it wouldn't even be wholly untruthful- but what was there passed that? He had no clue.

Elias might have had a clue, though, because he had experience in this dilemma. So Sorun had gone to him because maybe he had some answers. More than that though, it was somebody to talk to. Somebody Sorun could just vent at for a bit so that maybe he could get some good advice. It wouldn't make him feel better about the fact he was planning on dying- nothing was going to make him feel better with that- but it was something, and right now he needed something to help him if just a little bit.

The silence held between them was broken when Elias let out a small, knowing sigh and began to step closer. Sorun didn't move at all when the young king settled next to him on the same step he was sitting in, hands folded over his knees as he leaned in closer to Sorun.

"I suppose it makes sense why you'd come to me if that's the problem," Elias said. "I'll admit that I am sympathetic towards you since, yes, I did run out on the people I had a duty to. Though, eh heh, I took a bit longer than a single day to return," he said with a light laugh. "And it took a great deal of convincing for me to return with my new family. I came back because I was shown that everybody in the kingdom needed me." He reached over and placed a gentle hand on his shoulder. "But you didn't even need that, Sorun! You came back all on your own. You should be happy that you managed to come to your senses before something awful happened."

Sorun looked up at the room's ceiling with a groan, not even bothering to remove the hand on his shoulder. "Yeah man, sure, but I never asked for all this responsibility," he mumbled. "I didn't ask to be a Freedom Fighter. I didn't asked to be ripped away from my home forever or to get super powers from Chaos Emeralds and all that. I never wanted any of this. I just... I just wanted some peace."

"I understand all too well what you mean," Elias assured him with a comforting squeeze on his shoulder. "I felt the exact same way when I ran. It's why I tried settling down to make a new life. I had never asked to be brought into royalty. I'd been living a peaceful life up on Angel Island until I was whisked away to take up the crown. I suppose, just like you, the pressure became too much and I folded. I felt what had happened to me was unfair and unjust, and I just wanted to go back to the life I had beforehand, or at least something close to it."

"That was pretty much what I was feeling, too," Sorun admitted.

Elias made small laugh. "I know it's difficult, Sorun. Believe me, I do, but whether we like it or not we do have responsibilities. Me with my kingly duties, you with your powers helping out with the Freedom Fighters... it's responsibilities like those that ensure we eventually will have that peaceful life we desire, is it not?"

It made Sorun upset at how right he thought Elias was being, but he didn't have it in him to manifest any of that anger. Instead he just released a listless breath. "Mh-hm, hey, Elias, you're not the one going out there getting stabbed at by robots." He didn't ask to die, either, but this was left unsaid as he turned his eyes back to the squirrel. "I don't know how you Mobians do it, but humans can't just brush off all these near-death situations I keep having like it's nothing. Or at least I can't. I... I'm getting better with it, but this is still hard, you know?"

"I know," he said with a nod. "I know. It's not as easy for us, either, believe it or not. But having those close to us around to help us through dark times make it all the easier. All of your friends in the Freedom Fighters would surely help you with this. They were all frustrated at you being so closed-off because they were worried something like this would happen to you."

Sorun rolled his eyes, though he did feel his heart warm a bit at the squirrel's words. "Why do you gotta use the 'F' word?" he mumbled out.

"... You mean 'friends'?"

"Yeah, right. My 'friends'."

Elias tilted his head to the side. "You do consider them your friends, correct?" he asked.

Yes, he did. "No, not really," he said. "... Maybe a couple, but... ugh. I don't wanna be mad at them for bringing me here, I know it wasn't their fault, and if I'm being real with you at this point I barely even feel mad at them over it anymore so eventually maybe, but... no, it's too soon for me to be calling them something like friends."

"But... there must be at least some you consider friends," Elias pressed.

"Well, I mean, you know, Nic-" Sorun roughly shook his head, causing Elias' hand to leave his shoulder. "Would you get off the friendship bit!? Geez." He breathed heavily through his nose, and then slumped forwards. "Beyond that, though, past all the stress of fighting for my life and the responsibility and everything else... on the day I ran, Tails told me it was impossible to return to my home zone. So I'm pretty much stuck here forever." He looked back at Elias, who continued to look at him somberly. "I needed to take some time to come to terms with that."

Elias didn't say anything at first, his face a mixture between sympathy and pity for the human next to him. He blinked, and his features relaxed as he lowered his head. "Tails had mentioned as such, but are you positive-"

"Elias. I can't go back."

"... I see," he said with a slow nod. "And you're quite understandably upset that you will never see your world again."

"Oh, I'm super depressed over it," Sorun agreed, the flippancy of such a statement making Elias freeze in shock, "and I... haven't really, you know, gotten over it or anything, but I'm getting there. I think." His voice lowered a bit. "I hope."

The squirrel next to him remained still for a few seconds, and then regained his composure. "You're very carefree over your... distraught condition," he noted.

"Dude, I'm not lying when I say all this dry humor and sarcasm of mine is the only thing keeping me from becoming a crying mess. It's how I cope with it. I think that's one of the only ways to deal with depression." It was his own best explanation for it, at least. He didn't know how he felt admitting this to Elias, but at this point, seeing as he planned on dying, he just didn't care enough to hide it. "Don't get too worried about me, Elias. I'm going back to the Freedom Fighters. Being around others'll help me. I just, you know... it's rough. Knowing I left everything there behind. It's really rough."

"I... imagine so," Elias said, voice lowered and saddened. "I won't pretend to understand how you're feeling, I simply can't imagine, but I think you're right in wanting to return to the others for healing in addition to continuing your Freedom Fighter duties." A beat passed. "Does this not then technically makes you homeless, Sorun?"

Sorun shrugged. "Guess so." He turned his head back to Elias. "Wait, am I technically an illegal citizen since I'm living at Sonic's house?"

"No, no it doesn't... well technically an argument can be made if you were to take up permanent residence here-"

"Where's my visa, Elias?" Sorun interrupted with a frown. "I want my green card. I'll marry you for it if I have to."

"Pardon me, but I don't know what those- w-what the-!?" Elias leaned back in shock, arms frozen to one side as he stared at Sorun with wide eyes. "S-Sorun, I'm married! And-and you're a-!"

"Ah, come on, everybody here is so progressive. I'm pretty sure they wouldn't look twice at polygamous marriage." A blush began to form on Elias' face, and he began to incoherently stammer. Sorun burst out in short laughter at the sight. "Relax, man, I'm just messin' around with you." He laughed again. "I really needed a laugh, though, you have no idea."

The king sighed in relief, and then crossed his arms with a pout. "That's not a very appropriate joke to make, Sorun," he muttered.

"You people have no sense of humor," Sorun claimed. "The shot was there. I had to take it."

"Eghh..." Elias ran a hand over his face, and then shook his head. "Back to what I was trying to say, if you wanted, it wouldn't be any issue to offer you official citizenship within the Kingdom of Acorn. After everything you've done for the Freedom Fighters already it's practically earned. And I am the king, you know."

"Pulling political favors for me? We're already practically married." A small grin formed on Sorun's face when Elias began sputtering again. "Seriously though, uh... don't worry about it," Sorun said with a shake of his head. "Right now I just wanna focus on the Freedom Fighter stuff. Maybe after the war has ended we can talk about my residency."

That's what he said, at least. Really Sorun wasn't worried about his citizenship at all considering he was going to die before it became important. It was nice to know it was something that could be done for him, though. Helped him feel like he belonged. It made the weight on his heart that much lighter.

"Of course, Sorun. You need only ask." Elias calmed down and gave Sorun a worried look. "Are you going to be okay, now?"

In response, Sorun blew out a long breath. "I don't know." He really didn't, he realized, as he stood up and began walking towards the windows. "I, um, feel better, though. Yeah. Talking helps. I guess that's why Sonic was always so insistent on it." His face fell as he came to a stop and stared out the window. "He can never know I admitted he was right." He did truly feel a bit better, though. Not by much, but it was progress. Enough that he felt he could go back to Freedom HQ with a reasonable amount of confidence, at least.

"Heh heh." Elias rose up from his sitting position on the stairs. "I'll be sure to keep mum on that around him."

"Ah-huh. Hey, Elias?"

"Yes?"

"What's with the giant, robot wasp over there?"

Upon Sorun's question, Elias ran over to the teen's side by the window. Sorun, in turn, pointed his finger in the direction of what he had been referring to.

It was definitely a wasp. Or something shaped like a bee, at least, with a silver carapace and fitted with a pair of buzzing wings that were somehow keeping it aloft. It was a fair distance away, at the edge of the city, and was flying off in a direction away from Knothole. It took Sorun a few moments to realize that was the direction of the HQ.

"... A goddamn bee? Are you kidding me?" He glanced over towards Elias, and sighed when he saw the concerned look growing on his face. "I swear to god if I have to fight something again when I already had to fight all those jackals this morning..."

"I don't know what that is, but based on its mechanical nature, I would have to assume it's of the Doctor's creation," Elias said, causing Sorun to groan in exasperation. "I'll go and inform-"

"Nah, don't worry about it." The Bringer Claws flashed into existence on Sorun's back. "I gotta make up for all the trouble I caused, and I'm in the mood, which is really unfortunate for that wasp." He took a step back and look up at the window. "Thanks for the talk, Elias. I gotta go now." He glanced back at the squirrel. "And for god's sake, man, lock your windows. You never know what kinda creep's gonna come sneaking in."

"Er... I'll be sure to relay your advice to the guards." Rather awkwardly, Elias gave Sorun a stiff parting wave. "Farewell, Sorun. Good luck."

"Mm." The pale teen looked back up at the windows. "Seeya, Kingy."

He flew up and out the open window without another word, with Elias silently watching the human fly off in the distance.

It wasn't even that he was upset at all this insanity that kept forcing Sorun to fight things. He'd long since accepted that this was just something he had to deal with. That wasn't the issue. The issue was the sheer frequency these events kept happening.

He realized the rest of the world was already taken over. He realized the current situation was bleak and the numbers and odds were really stacked against them all. He realized that, because of this, maybe an inordinate amount of fighting and missions was necessary. He couldn't even remember anymore if he'd ever even had a single week on Mobius that hadn't had at least one life-threatening event he'd been involved in. He understood the necessity of it all, but there was a certain limit of how much of this he could tolerate.

Then again, Sorun supposed he couldn't complain too much. Sonic and the rest had been doing this kind of thing all their lives since childhood, and they all still had their respective sanities perfectly intact. Whether it was because they were just that strong or because they'd all always had each other, he didn't quite know, but he couldn't help but respect their mental fortitude they had that allowed them to weather all the craziness. Because Sorun himself? He was on the brink of losing it. Because after dealing with the mountain yesterday, and the jackals this morning, and dreading whatever was gonna happen with the Freedom Fighters, the last thing, the absolute last thing, he needed right now was another fight.

And yet here he was, flying through the sky and racing towards a gigantic, house-sized robotic wasp flying towards Freedom HQ. And nine-to-ten odds said it was something from Eggman he'd have to smash. Because this was the rest of his life now until he died.

"Different day, same shit..." he internally sighed as he stopped in the air. He'd followed the wasp far enough that, down on the ground, he could see the small hill and the flagpole that Freedom HQ rested under. He could just barely see a blue shape and a black and red shape down there, too. Sorun winced and briefly wondered if Sonic or Shadow managed to spot him yet.

And of course, hovering in the air but still below Sorun, was the metal wasp. Sorun was tempted to rain down Summoned Swords on it right now from where he was, but he stopped himself when he heard a voice be projected out from the robotic insect.

"Alright, you mangy animals, give it up!" He knew that annoying voice anywhere despite only ever having heard it once- that was Snively's voice. And now that Sorun looked closer, he could see that there was a glass dome on the top of the wasp robot's head, and, indeed, the Overlander even shorter than Sorun was sitting inside of the dome operating what he assumed to be the controls to the wasp. "I have a Chaos energy detector right here telling me there's a Chaos Emerald in there! Now fork it over or else!"

Sorun's face fell. "Oh, he's attacking because I left the Emerald here. The same thing Shadow said could happen. The thing that's happening right now." He sighed as the Bringer Claws went slack and allowed Sorun to drop. "He's never gonna let me live that down, damn."

Well, all in all, it could have been worse. At least he got to slap Snively around now to relieve some of this stress. The thought alone was already making Sorun feel better.

A few moments of falling later and Sorun's feet landed right on top of the wasp's head dome with a loud thunk! Snively, from the inside, started at the loud noise, and then looked up in annoyance. His irritated expression shrank right down into worry when he saw Sorun standing above him, hands casually tucked into his pocket with the teen's blue eyes glaring angrily into Snively.

"Yo, Snively," Sorun greeted, the cold, angered edge to his tone betraying his otherwise casual demeanor, "your days of terrorizing people with a bee mech are over."

The worried expression Snively held morphed into rage when he finally recognized the human. "It's a wasp , not a bee," he disdainfully hissed out.

"Ah-huh." At that point, Sorun remembered the weight on his left shoulder, causing his head to turn towards the Chao angrily glaring down at Snively from the teen's shoulder. "Uhp, hold on," Sorun said as he turned back down to Snively. "Gimme a minute to take care of something real quick. I'll come back and slap you right after."

Ignoring the indignant yelling from the Overlander, Sorun lazily hopped off the wasp's head and safely floated down to the ground with the help of the Bringer Claws. He walked forwards a few steps after touching down, the spectral hands proceeding the rest on Sorun's shoulders, and then came to a halt when he felt he came to a satisfactory distance.

For a moment, the pale teen had glanced ahead to catch sight of Sonic and Shadow. And to his great discomfort, they were both staring straight at him with wide eyes and shocked expressions. He breathed out of his nose in worry, and then did his best to put them out of his mind as he crouched down. "Alright, Virgil," he muttered as he removed the Chao from his shoulder, "this is your stop. Stay here a second."

"Chao-chao! Chao!" Even after setting the Chao on the ground, Virgil didn't look at all pleased over his treatment. He was giving what Sorun assumed to be the equivalent of a Chao's frown as he hopped on his feet while reaching out towards Sorun. "Chao!"

"Huh? No, you're stayin' here," Sorun said with a shake of his head. "I got wing-arms and swords. You're down a wing."

Virgil shook his head and tried reached forwards again, only to be pushed back when Sorun pressed a single finger against his forehead. The dot floating above its head turned into a exclamation point. "Chao!"

"Not happening. I'm serious, it's too dangerous for you."

While Sorun continued arguing with his Chao, the giant mechanical wasp buzzing up above them flew back a few feet. From inside his control seat, Snively gave out a cruel smile as he pressed a few buttons on his control console. At the same time, the wasp's metal thorax, at the bottom of which was a giant, metal spike, shifted upwards so that the point of the spike was aimed right at Sorun's back.

There was the sound of a small explosion, and the conical spike fired out of the wasp and straight towards Sorun. Sonic and Shadow, who had been standing by nearby with baffled expressions, saw the spike rushing through the air towards Sorun and were both ready to sprint over him and carry both him and the Chao away to safety.

This proved to be unnecessary, however, as right before the spike made contact with Sorun, his right Bringer Claw snapped out behind him and clamped down on the spike, instantly stopping it completely in its hold. The sudden stop had carried enough power behind it that a heavy amount of wind rushed out from the action, causing the leaves on nearby trees to rustle and for Sorun's hair and clothes to flit about. The human, with his spectral arm holding the spike behind him, remained completely motionless in his crouched position for a few moments, and then slowly breathed out as he turned his head enough so that he could glare at Snively with one eye.

His face was completely passive, but his one visible eye was so livid that Snively began unconsciously sweating.

"... Seriously? You seriously just tried shooting me and my Chao in the back...?" The Bringer Claw chucked the spike in the air, the projectile spinning round and round as it flew up. The teen rose up to his feet with a sigh, and slowly began to walk over to the wasp mech. The Right Bringer Claw held its hand out, and then caught the spike when it fell into its grasp. "You really wanna earn that slap, don'tcha, Snively!?"

The Bringer Claw threw the spike like a spear right at the wasp mech. It buried itself right into its thorax with the accompanying sound of screeching metal and sparking wires. The wasp shuddered in the air, and Sorun's Bringer Claw reached up to grab it by the end of its thorax. The blue hand found a solid grip, squeezed down, and slammed the mech right onto the ground.

A large cloud of dust had picked up as a result of the mech being slammed down. Sorun, not missing a beat, willed the Bringer Claw to reach back and grab onto one of the large, metal antenna sticking out of the wasp's head. The spectral arm stretching out contracted, pulling Sorun right towards the fallen mech. He swung around the antenna and landed right on the wasp's back, where he proceeded to reach out with both Bringer Claws and grab each of the mech's wings right as they began to try and flap. And then they started pulling.

"Hey! Hey, stop!" Snively shouted from the inside of the wasp's head as the metallic insect wings were slowly torn out from the mech's body. "You can't just pull my Egg Wasp's wings off like that! It's not fair!"

"You don't get to talk after that cheap shot you took back there." With the sound of tearing metal, both of the wasp's wings were torn off by the Bringer Claws and casually tossed to the side. Afterwards, Sorun stepped over the wasp's head, hopped back down to the ground, and without even looking back willed the right Bringer Claw to grab onto the wasp's face. It did so, lifting the mech, and Snively who was screaming inside the cockpit, up into the air before slamming it back down in front of him on its back. At the same time, twenty Summoned Swords appeared over it and rained down on its body, impaling the mech and pinning it to the ground at various points along its body.

With the mech stuck into the ground, once more Sorun's right Bringer Claw gripped onto its head. It began pulling harder and harder, the metal on its neck beginning to give out as sparks and wires began to become exposed before, finally, the head was ripped off completely. The body instantly became lifeless as a result, and with a flick of its thumb talon the head Snively was in was sent spinning while balancing on the tip of the claw's index talon, the Overlander within's screams being distorted from the speed. Sorun continued to watch the spectacle for five seconds, let out a single, dry laugh, and then in an instant willed the Bringer Claw to grab the head and flick it up into the air.

Watching the spinning head rise up to its apex, Sorun let out a content sigh as gravity began bringing it down. "I could kill him right here. It'd be so easy, too. All I gotta do is hold the head down and turn Snively into a living pincushion with Summoned Swords. Or just crush the head." He began winding his right arm up, the right Bringer Claw moving in tandem with the real arm's movement. "Too bad I'm terrified that Eggman'll blow Knothole up in retribution if I kill his nephew. Ah, well."

The Bringer Claw reared back, its blue glow seemingly intensifying as the spinning head dropped nearer to the ground. Right before it impacted, the spectral hand lashed out and savagely slapped the head right on its face with enough force that, not only did the head go flying away, but the branches on the surrounding trees began to rustle.

Spinning uncontrollably through the air, the severed head eventually stabilized itself when four jets on the head's underside came to life. The flames from the jets stopped the spinning altogether, and made it so that the head was hovering midair. From where he stood, Sorun could clearly see Snively holding a hand to his mouth with a ill expression on his face, and deep inside he felt immense satisfaction.

There was a loud, electronic squealing sound as the speaker from earlier came back on. "Urp... oh... this... isn't over-"

Snively was interrupted when a Summoned Sword shot from Sorun's side and embedded itself through the dome, the tip of the sword resting mere centimetres from Snively's forehead. He screamed in fright after the sword shattered, and the wasp's head turned around and fly away after the jets of flame roaring out of the thrusters intensified. The satisfaction in Sorun only grew as he watched the heady fly away and shrink down until it disappeared completely.

"Ahhh... I'm gonna smack him every single time I see him," Sorun decided as he turned towards the spot he'd left Virgil. He began walking over towards the Chao, the ghost of a smile that had formed on his face disappearing quickly when he noted the blue and black and red colors from the corner of his vision. "Oh, man. This ain't gonna be fun." He shook his head. "Alright, Emerald first, then I can deal with this."

He hadn't been naive enough to assume nobody would be at the HQ, and if there wasn't that none of the Freedom Fighters would take notice of the fact there was a fight with a giant robot wasp happening, but he'd at least been hoping people like Sonic or Shadow wouldn't be there. He wasn't really sure he was ready to deal with them in particular quite yet. Didn't even know what to say, really.

Well, they were there, and it was way too late for him to run now. He'd have to deal with it one way or another anyways, but the Emerald and his Chao came first.

Stopping in front of his Chao, Sorun tilted his head downwards to see, with some amusement, that Virgil had crossed his arms and was pouting up at Sorun. The thing floating above its head at least turned back into a dot, so he figured that was a good sign. "Chao," he grumpily said.

"Come on, don't look so sour." Sorun bent down and picked the Chao up. "It's my job to do all the dangerous stuff. Your job is emotional support, remember?"

Virgil huffed and turned his head to the side as Sorun placed him in a sitting position on his left shoulder. "Chao-chao."

"Hey, no, you do help. Who else is gonna motivate me to be so stylish when I'm slapping somebody silly?" he asked as he turned towards Freedom HQ's entrance. "'Sides, you can't move that well with only one wing."

"Chao..."

Sorun sighed as he began walking towards the HQ's entrance. The fact that the two hedgehogs were to the side of his path and staring intently at him was not lost on him. "Look, Virgil, don't worry about it, okay?" he said. "If anything you're the lucky one. You don't have to fight."

Virgil didn't say anything in response, but the Chao still had an upset look on his face. Sorun didn't much know why. Upset at his own inadequacy to help his friend fight, probably, as he'd been really mad when Sorun had just offloaded him like that. Or maybe he just wanted to stay on Sorun's shoulder as he fought for the thrill. He didn't truly know, but no matter what face Virgil made he wasn't gonna put the Chao in danger by taking him into a fight with him. He just had to learn to live with it, Sorun supposed.

The human teen felt his heart rate increase a fair bit when he approached the two hedgehogs, though he kept his eyes forwards on the HQ's door entrance as he tried his best to look towards them. This proved to be in vain, however, as Sonic had stepped closer to him and held a hand out.

"Sorun-"

"Not a word, Sonic." Sorun stopped in his tracks and, not even looking towards Sonic, pointed his index finger at him. "Not. A single word. Out of you."

He lowered his hand back to his side and continued walking to the entrance. He opened the door, and then quickly descended the steps down into the HQ itself. He stepped into the HQ's living room, a bit of nostalgia hitting him as he looked around at the familiar surroundings along with relief when he didn't see anybody. He only got one step in further when Sonic zipped in front of him in a burst of super speed.

"Sorun, can you stop for a sec-!"

"What did I say- oh, forget it. Hold this." Without another word, Sorun picked Virgil up off his shoulder and deposited him into Sonic's hand. The blue hedgehog looked down at the Chao he was holding in bewilderment, and then looked back up as Sorun stepped to the lab's entrance.

Taking a deep breath, Sorun opened the door to the lab and stepped in. As he suspected, he saw the red Chaos Emerald resting on a nearby table. He also noticed that Tails was there at the computer, though the fox was mainly ignored by the human as he walked towards the Emerald. He wasn't ignored by Tails, however, who stopped whatever it was he was doing to stare bug-eyed at Sorun as he stopped in front of the table and reached to pick up the Emerald with his left hand. He made a small noise when he felt the red Emerald stick to his hand, and then promptly turned back around to walk back into the living room.

Walking back out into the living room, Sorun saw that Sonic was still there, his gaze shifting from Sorun to the Chao he was currently holding with confusion in his eyes. Shadow had arrived, too, looking just as confused as Sonic was as his eyes traveled down to the Chaos Emerald stuck to Sorun's left hand.

He avoided both of their gazes and turned towards the couch. Grumbling under his breath, he walked over to it and began removing the cushions from the furniture piece before he began laying them out on the ground.

"... Sorun, what are you doing?" he heard Sonic ask from behind him, voice almost exhausted at watching Sorun's antics.

"I want something soft to land on when this thing knocks me out," Sorun answered as he put down the last cushion.

"Fair enough," Sonic said with a frustrated sigh as the human turned towards him and Shadow. "Can you just please slow down so we can talk?"

"Mm. Sure, in a minute after I wake up," Sorun agreed as he looked down at the red Emerald. He stared down at it for a second, and then took in a deep breath to prepare himself for the coming shock. "Here goes... well, everything."

He slammed his right hand down onto the Emerald, his breath hitching in his throat when he felt the Chaos energy beginning to rapidly surge within him. All too suddenly he felt an overwhelming jolt of power run through him, and automatically began tilting backwards as a result. He'd gone unconscious before his body had even hit the cushions.

Chapter 25

Recursion Error

Episode 25- Dilemmas

Oddly enough, absorbing Chaos Emeralds was becoming less and less of a painful process. Ironic, really, seeing as they kept bringing Sorun closer and closer to death.

He'd noticed it as far back as the second Chaos Emerald. Its power had flooded into him much faster than the first one, and while it had still been painful, he'd been knocked out so quickly that time it didn't even compare to the first time. That first time where it had felt like he'd been struck by a lightning bolt.

The third time around he actually noticed that the energy surge didn't hurt nearly as much. He wasn't even sure he was knocked out that long; he'd gone under, that much was for certain, but when he began to blearily open his eyes he still saw faint wisps of smoke wafting off his body. Convenient enough, he supposed, but suffering less and less pain absorbing these things the further he went didn't really make him feel all that better seeing as he'd die shortly after the last one.

The one thing that did feel better, though? The back of his torso and head. Because his brilliant idea of cushioning his fall had paid dividends. He may still have been fried by the Emerald, but he was fried comfortably.

Small victories.

"Best idea ever," he thought to himself, blinking more and more to try and clear his vision as he offhandedly patted the couch cushions he landed on. As feeling began to return to his numb body, he noted a small amount of pressure resting on his chest. He made a low noise and rolled his eyes towards his chest, where he saw a blue shape with bits of yellow sitting directly on him.

"C-chao?" The noise that came out of Virgil was small and worried, and the Chao's eyes were widened in concern as he stared down at Sorun's face. He even went as far as to shuffle forwards and touch Sorun's face with one of his limbs, causing Sorun to snort in amusement. "Chao? Chao!?"

"Hey, Virgil," Sorun muttered as he lifted his right hand up to stroke the top of the Chao's head in an effort to calm him. "I'm okay. Little charring never hurt anyone."

The Chao tried smiling at the joke, but it was a wavering smile that did nothing to erase the concern in the Chao's eyes. A dry chuckle left Sorun, and he scooped the Chao up with his right hand only to place him down on the arm of the couch right behind him. With a small groan, he sat up and scooted backwards so that his back rested against the couch for support. He breathed out, and then lifted his head upwards.

Sonic and Shadow were, of course, still there. The shocked and confused expressions they'd had on their faces earlier had greatly diminished, though now they held unreadable, questioning looks on their faces. Tails had joined the group, too, and Sorun had a hard time pinning down a single emotion to read on the fox boy's face: relief, worry, surprise, and a whole lot of astonishment just to name a few he managed to see. And his eyes were so wide and his mouth was hanging so far open that Sorun couldn't help but chuckle.

"Tails... your face looks really funny right now," Sorun mumbled, lowly chuckling further as he pulled a knee up to sling an arm over it. "I really wish I had a camera right now. Too bad I dropped my phone in that store."

The younger Mobian tilted his head in confusion, and then he sputtered in outrage at Sorun's words while closing his mouth. "What the- Sorun! You can't- you can't just run off like that only to come back saying stuff like that!"

"Sure I can. I just did."

Another voice began chuckling. Sorun shifted his gaze towards Sonic, who was shaking his head while looking from Sorun to the Chao on the couch behind him. "It's great to see you haven't changed at all, Sorun, but can I ask you what the deal with the Chao is?" he asked. "And... what happened with its wing?"

"Oh, Virgil?" Sorun mumbled as he tilted his head up to look at the Chao in question. "I found him like that and decided to rescue him. He's mine now, I guess."

Sonic blinked in surprise, and then focused back on Virgil. "You went out of your way to rescue a Chao...?"

"Why do you sound so surprised?" Sorun asked, tilting his head back down to look at Sonic. "His Chao Garden got torched by a bunch of robots and he was the only survivor. I wasn't gonna leave Virgil to starve."

He saw Sonic flinch in dismay after Sorun mentioned the Chao Garden. The same expression was more pronounced on Tails' face, and even Shadow momentarily grimaced. "That's awful," Sonic said, "but... but you really went and named him and everything?"

"Do you seriously have that low of an opinion of me that you thought'd I'd just abandon him to death?" Sorun asked in a flat tone.

"N-no! I wasn't saying that at all!" Chuckling nervously, Sonic waved his hands out in front of him. "I'm just really surprised. Not that you'd rescue something in danger, of course you would, I just didn't think you'd, well... keep it," he said. "I saw the bandage, so you must have gotten him treated somewhere. Why'd you keep him?"

"'Cause I wanted to? I dunno. Just did." Sorun shrugged. "There isn't a rule against pets in the Freedom Fighters, is there? Because if there is I'm ignoring it."

The blue hedgehog remained silent at first, his gaze going from the Chao to Sorun. He gave the human a critical look, and then chuckled while shrugging his shoulder. "And what if there is? Don't tell me you're not so dedicated to the cause that you wouldn't follow every rule to the letter."

Sensing Sonic's sarcasm, Sorun breathed out a single chuckle and rubbed at his head. "Oh, so there is? Dang, guess I'll just leave again."

"Ah, come on, Sorun. You're not gonna leave again," Sonic said. "We all know you just came back 'cause you missed my mom's pancakes."

"Oh, as if!" Sorun rolled his eyes in an exaggerated movement before focusing back on the blue Mobian. "She's great, but she ain't that... alright, she is, but I came back for more than just that."

Both teenagers stared silently at each other for a few more moments, and then they both burst out in quiet laughter. "Ah, man. Called it," Sonic said through his chuckles. "Glad to have you back, Sorun."

"Yeah..." Sorun laughed as well for a few more moments, and then stopped as the mirthful smile fell off of his face. "Alright, let's get the obvious out of the way. I'm never going back to my zone again."

And just like that, the semi-light mood that had settled over the room plunged right into nervous awkwardness. The small smile that had been on Sonic's face fell off immediately. Tails had begun to wring his hands together, and Shadow's eyes became half-lidded as he looked towards Sorun.

Sonic was the first one to speak. "Sorun, you don't know-"

"Dude, come on. Read the situation," Sorun mumbled as he looked up at the ceiling. "I didn't even need Tails to tell me. I... had a feeling before even that, but when he did all that work and confirmed it for me, I just... I didn't want to believe it. I mean, who would? Seriously, who?" He let out a sigh as his eyes fell back on the trio. "I left for a lot of reasons. Denial over being stuck here in this world forever. Anger because I had to talk with the same people responsible every single day. Fear over dying fighting Eggman." He paused, looked to the side, and then looked back at the Mobians. "Let's be honest, you guys pretty much ruined my life. And I didn't really see the point in being a Freedom Fighter after all that. So I just left 'cause... well, it was all way too much.

"Buuuut... I rescued Virgil, and seeing him all hurt and seeing a field full of dead Chao made me realize I don't really wanna see people die because of, you know, the war . And then I did some heavy thinking and... thought about all of you." Sorun forced himself to look away from them as a tinge of embarrassment rose in him. "I know that you people would never willingly ruin somebody's life and drag them into a war they didn't want to fight in and that what happened with me was a horrible mistake made out of desperation. That doesn't make it better," he elaborated with a quick glance back at the three before looking away again, "but I understand. And... you're all pretty cool. You know, for putting so much on the line to save the planet and everything. And you're not the worst people to hang around." Sorun's eyes flicked to Shadow. "Most of you, anyways."

Shadow made a "tch" sound. "What is that supposed to mean?"

"Kidding, man," Sorun mumbled. "Anyway, beyond all that... I figured, you know, since I'm stuck here forever and I got all these powers, I might as well help out so my new zone doesn't become a metal wasteland of suffering under Eggman. And honestly, I don't really have anything better to do. So I came back." He stopped, and then began drumming his fingers against his knee. "That's all I got."

Nobody said anything at first after his long-winded explanation, making the teen begin to grow more anxious over their reaction. He heard something shuffle towards him, causing Sorun to look back forwards. He wasn't that surprised to see Tails standing there in front of him, though the sight did still make him take a heavy breath in preparation for what was to come. The fox's two tails were dragging against the ground, and his ears were lowered to match the saddened look he had on his face.

Of all the conversations Sorun foresaw coming, this was one of the ones he dreaded the most.

"... Hey, Tails," Sorun began in a soft voice. "Sorry for throwing you."

The fox shook his head. "Don't worry about it, Sorun, it's fine. You didn't even throw me that hard." A beat passed, and his whole form seemed to deflate. "... I don't really know what to say," Tails mumbled out, eyes trained on the floor in an effort to avoid Sorun's gaze.

"I don't really think there is anything to say, Tails," Sorun said.

"Probably not," he agreed, "but... I know you lost your home-" Tails winced, "- and I know that's really horrible, but I don't think your life is ruined."

"That's debatable." Doubly so considering Sorun was going to die.

Tails' face grew a bit exhaustive at the statement. "Sorun, really, I mean it," he said. "You're still alive, and there's people here that care about you."

"Yeah, and you practically live here already," Sonic added as he stepped next to the fox. "It's not the greatest solution in the world, I get it, and it doesn't make up for what we did. I don't think anything ever will. But if we can't give you back your old home, the least we can do is give you a new home." He outstretched a hand out to Sorun, a hopeful smile on his face. "And... maybe a few friends to help you along the way?"

Sorun stared deeply at the offered hand, a blank expression on his face as he contemplated the pair's words. In truth, he would have loved to have taken that outstretched hand and accept that offer of friendship. To maybe build a new life around all these people and make the most of what had been given to him despite everything that had been taken. He could even see him doing it; he liked each and every one of them already, after all. It wouldn't be a terrible life. It'd be great, really.

But, unfortunately, he just couldn't. Not when he was going to die from all these Emeralds. And the last thing he wanted to do was give everybody even more grief because he'd gotten so attached to them all before dying. No matter what way he played it he doubted that it would be unavoidable, and Sorun himself wasn't even so sure how long he could keep the facade up after failing to distance himself the last time he tried this, but he still wanted to try nonetheless. If only to make his death as painless as possible for everybody else.

A deep sigh left Sorun, and he shook his head as he denied the offered hand and stood up to his feet. "Sorry, Sonic. It's not happening," he said, doing his best to ignore the disappointed look the hedgehog gave him. "Just because I understand why you all did what you did doesn't change that you still did it. It doesn't mean I'll never forgive you, if anything I already do, but... I can't do anything like that. Not just yet." He looked to the side at the wall. "If we actually manage to beat Eggman and you manage to give me this 'new home' you're talkin' about... then we'll talk. 'Til then, though, we're still just comrades."

Sonic's gloved hand lowered to his side as a deflated breath left him. A humorless smile soon found itself on his face as he shook his head. "Still, huh?" he muttered.

"Yeah. Still," Sorun confirmed with a nod. "Not forever, though."

"... I guess that's fair," Sonic conceded with a sigh. "The important thing is that you're back, though. No more issues with the Emeralds?"

It took all Sorun had not to sarcastically scoff at that. "Nah. It's sorted."

"Great, great. Glad to hear it." Sonic shot Sorun an inquisitive look. "So what snazzy new power did you get out of this one?"

"Huh? Oh!" In all this awkward conversation, Sorun had forgotten he'd even gotten a new power just a few minutes ago. He didn't even know what it was yet. "Yeah, no clue. Lemme just... try and feel it out or something." He slowly rose his right hand up, furrowing his brows as he concentrated. "I don't... really know what I'm looking for here. Usually they just kinda come out naturally." He closed his eyes and concentrated harder. "I'm feeling something here. Gimme a sec..."

It was an odd, foreign sensation he was feeling. A sensation not unlike the new sensation he felt when he gained his Summoned Swords and Bringer Claws. It was different and unique, though. A sensation that stood out from the other powers in the same way the other two powers stood out from each other so he could differentiate the two. He wasn't exactly sure how it felt different, either- it just was different.

Well, whatever the case, it was still a third, new sensation he felt inside of himself. So he reached in towards it and pulled on the sensation.

He got bonked on the head by something for his effort.

Sorun cried out, more in surprise than pain, after the hit on his head and stumbled back. At the same time he heard whatever had fallen on his head clatter on the ground in front of him, and then heard the other three Mobians step back. He reached up and rubbed the spot on his forehead he'd been struck, letting out an annoyed mumbled in the process, and then opened one eye as he looked down at the ground where he heard the clattering noise.

What he saw on the ground surprised him immensely, enough so that he lowered his hand and opened both of his eyes up. On the ground was an object. Not a transparent, spectral object like the Summoned Swords or Bringer Claws, but an actual, solid object. An object that gave Sorun much confusion until he looked closer, and then immediately recoiled upon seeing the shape.

"It's... a katana?" He'd seen enough in his previous life to know one when he saw one, though the three Mobians were looking down at the sword lying on the ground in confusion. It was what it was, though: a simple, ordinary-looking katana nestled in its scabbard lying flat on the ground. "Are you kidding me? The Chaos Emerald gave me a weeb stick?" Sorun angrily muttered as he bent down to pick up the sword. "Of all the... wait. Wait a minute ... I know this sword..." Sorun's eyes widened dramatically in realization, and so shocked was he from the revelation that he almost dropped the sword back on the ground. "Oh, no way, it gave me this ...!?"

There was absolutely no mistaking it; he recognized the design anywhere. The black, seemingly lacquered wood scabbard with the decorative, metal bit on its tip. The flat, dark blue cord tied near the bottom of the sheath with the two ends freely hanging off like ribbons, with faint gold dots seen in the blue material. The ornamental, hexagonal, dark blue guard just below the sword's gold neck, split in half by the sword passing through it and with more intricate gold designs along its faces and rim. A handle made from a strange blue material not unlike the scales of a reptile, diamond-wrapped in white cloth. More gold on the handle's flat pommel.

Of course there was no way for Sorun not to know this sword at a single glance. He'd seen it too much to ever not recognize it. It was practically burned into his memory.

It was Vergil's sword.

"This is... Yamato..." Sorun whispered in wonder, his voice so low it was barely even heard by his own ears. He gripped the sword's handle with his right hand, and with his left hand gripping the sword's scabbard he slowly unsheathed the sword. The soft, scraping sound of the metal blade being unsheathed was almost as quiet as the teen's own awed voice, and he didn't dare drop the scabbard as he gazed into the curved, silver blade of the sword, his own reflection distorted by the temper line running through the blade's length.

So amazed was he by the sword that the odd looks he was being given by the three Mobians and the Chao on the couch were completely unnoticed by Sorun. They'd all given each other looks, and after collectively shrugging Sonic took it upon himself to step forwards. "Wait, so... your new power is a... is that a sword?" he asked in an unsure voice. "Kind of a weird-looking sword, isn't it?"

"It's a katana," Sorun explained, voice not all there as he stared at the incredibly sharp-looking tip of the sword. "Its name is Yamato."

"... Tomato?"

Sorun's grip on the sword's handle tightened, and he sharply inhaled as he head snapped in Sonic's direction. "Gonna pretend you didn't say that," he muttered out as he lowered the sword. "It's Ya mato," he reiterated. "And what do you mean it looks weird? Just because its blade is curved a bit? I never heard you complain about Antoine's sword being weird."

"That's 'cause his sword's a saber, and that thing... I mean, look at it," Sonic said as he pointed at Yamato's blade. "It's real long, sure, but doesn't it look kinda, I dunno, thin?"

"You've never seen a katana before, have you, Sonic?" Sorun turned his body fully towards the hedgehog, his eyes trained down at the sword. "Guess it's not surprising seeing as eastern culture got blown up along with everything else when the Xorda hit. Then again, a lot of things managed to survive that somehow." He looked up at Sonic. "The design is eastern in nature. They might have swords similar to this in Yurashia, but I don't know for sure. I've never been there." He held the unsheathed sword up, scabbard still held in his left hand. "That said, this isn't a normal katana. It's a power from the Chaos Emerald." He paused. "It's very special."

"Pfft. Special? I don't know, Sorun," Sonic replied. "I've seen a magic sword or two in my time, but that? I'm just not seein' it." The blue Mobian reached forwards. "Here, lemme see-"

Right as Sonic's gloved hand hovered just a few inches over the katana's blade, he stopped dead in his tracks. Sorun's eyes narrowed in confusion, and he looked from the hand towards Sonic's body to ask what the matter was when his voice caught in his throat. The hedgehog's entire body had gone stiff. His green irises shrunk down a fair amount, and even some of his blue quills were standing up on end.

He almost looked like he was incredibly disturbed by the object he was reaching out towards.

Before Sorun could question the hedgehog's reaction, Sonic quickly pulled his arm backwards while taking a few steps away. "W-wow, I take it back. Eh-heh, that thing's... really something." Sonic's voice almost sounded nervous as he rubbed at his arm, his eyes still trained on the sword. "Sorun, me and Chaos energy have always had a kind of funny relationship. I've been around a lot of the stuff, so it's real easy for me to get a feel for it. And that sword... Sorun, that sword is putting off a lot of Chaos energy. Like, a lot a lot."

The perplexed teen continued staring at Sonic as he sheathed the sword. "It did come from a Chaos Emerald," Sorun reminded the hedgehog. "One of the infinite sources of Chaos energy? Like all the rest of my powers?"

"Yeah, and I always felt something out of your other swords and arms, but not that much," Sonic said. "You're sure that thing is safe, right?"

Sorun blinked, and then looked down at Yamato. "It's just a sword, Sonic." An incredibly powerful sword. A sword with very special abilities he would have to explore later. The applications for this thing if he was right were mind-blowing...

"Alright. If you say so." Sonic loudly exhaled, almost as if he was attempting to calm himself down, and then stepped back towards Tails. "Well, we're gonna take off. I guess I'll, uh, see you back home, Sorun. I'll tell my folks you're coming back."

"Okay?" Head tilted in confusion, Sorun waved goodbye at the retreating hedgehog and fox. "Uh, bye then, guys."

"Bye, Sorun." This was said by Tails, who waved back at Sorun while turning his head towards a retreating Sonic. He seemed to be just as confused as the human teen, but then turned around to follow the other Mobian out of the HQ.

After the pair had left, only three were left inside of the HQ's living room: Sorun, his Chao, and Shadow, who had mostly been silent since entering and who continued even now to just stare at Sorun with his arms crossed. This did not go unnoticed by Sorun, who rolled back and forth on his feet before sighing and turning to face Shadow.

"Was there something else you wanted?" he asked, half nervous from the stare and half curious at what the dark hedgehog had to say.

"Nothing important," he said at last, uncrossing his arms as he stepped closer to the human. "I don't see why they were so surprised at your return. I knew you would come back."

"Did you, now?" Sorun dryly remarked. "You looked just about as surprised as Sonic was while I was beating up that dumb wasp mech. And you sure didn't sound like you wanted me to come back after everything you said right before I left."

Shadow winced at that, looking down at the ground briefly before looking back up at Sorun. "I may have overstepped my boundaries without thinking clearly," he admitted with a long sigh. "I was unaware that you were permanently situated here against your will. I failed to consider that, at the time, you may have been struggling heavily with this information. Evidently you were struggling, and me pushing for you to take the Emerald so hard may have been uncalled for." His red eyes flicked towards the HQ's entrance. "That being said, Chaos Emeralds are still Chaos Emeralds at the end of the day. Doctor Eggman would never admit it, but he knows the danger just one of those gems possesses. I don't doubt he somehow knows the power you gain from them as well. The fact his nephew went as far as to come here to try and reclaim it a single day after you retrieved it-"

"Yeah, they're dangerous to hold onto right now, I get it," Sorun finished. "Look, Shadow... don't worry about what happened back then. I wasn't in a good state of mind, you regret what you said, it was bad all around. But it's fine now. I'm back, and I plan on touching any other Emeralds we get our hands on as soon as we get them. So there's no problem anymore."

If he was being honest with himself, he was completely shocked that Shadow was going out of his way just to say all this. Knowing Shadow, Sorun had gone into this expecting snide remarks and maybe a bit of belittling on how his actions potentially put people in danger. He didn't expect a full-blown apology from the hedgehog. Especially when it looked like Shadow was just as uncomfortable doing this as Sorun was.

He did appreciate it, though. He had just as hard a time showing it as Shadow did making the apology, but he deeply appreciated it nonetheless. He just couldn't say it.

"Right. Of course," Shadow said as he nodded his head. "Well, regardless, I'm glad you managed to set your head on straight while you were out there. It seems some of my words actually managed to reach you after all."

"Huh? Oh, nah," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "I wasn't thinking about you at all. I did all that on my own."

It was true for the most part, but this was mostly said by Sorun for the sake of playful spite. Shadow picked it up easily enough, as he'd huffed and turned to the side while crossing his arms again.

"Tch. I'm sure." He glanced to the side towards Sorun. "You've become very proficient with your Chaos abilities. I was surprised you managed to take down that wasp Badnik with so little effort."

"It was just one bee," Sorun said with a shrug. "It's not like I haven't been trying to learn how to survive out there with these powers. I'll kinda die if I don't."

"Hm." Shadow's eyes trailed down to the sheathed katana held in Sorun's left hand. "... The Faker is right about that sword," he said. "The amount of Chaos energy radiating from it is... concerning, to say the least. Are you sure you can handle that properly?"

"I can handle Yamato just fine," Sorun assured him as he held the sword up. "I just, y'know, gotta figure out how to use it is all. And see if it can do what I really think it can do."

At that, Shadow's eyes narrowed slightly. "There you go again. Acting almost familiar towards your new powers." A low hum left him as he turned back towards the human. "Are you absolutely sure there isn't an important detail regarding those powers you're neglecting to mention?"

Sorun tore his eyes from the Yamato towards Shadow. He opened his mouth to answer, but then quickly closed it as he thought to himself. He pondered Shadow's words over in his head, came to a conclusion, and then opened his mouth again.

"... Tell you what, Shadow. Later on we'll talk about my powers. Maybe when I try to figure out Yamato's abilities. When we're alone. You can call it training if you really have to." He closed his mouth as he finished his sentence, and then winced when a sudden wave of vertigo hit him. "But later. Later," he said as he held his right hand up to his forehead.

Shadow's eyes widened a bit in concern. "Are you feeling unwell?" he asked.

"No, I'm just... kinda dizzy, is all," Sorun answered as he lowered his hand. "Just, uh, tired I guess. Heh. It's been a long day."

The striped hedgehog continued looking towards Sorun, and then accepted the answer with a nod as he turned to leave. "Understandable. Get some rest if you're really feeling unwell. Until next time." With that, he fully turned around and left towards the stairs leading out of the HQ.

Sorun watched the hedgehog leave, and then breathed out a sigh of relief once he was out of sight. That hadn't gone horribly, at least. Not nearly as horrible as he expected the reunion between him and Sonic and Shadow to be. If anything he felt a slight bit better. Mentally, at least. Physically he was still a bit dizzy.

He suddenly felt something warm and wet drip down from his nose. He touched two fingers towards the spot, and when he pulled the hand back to examine it, he saw two dark red splotches on the tips of his fingers. He sighed, and then wiped the blood away from his nose. "A nap. Yeah, Shadow's right. I could use a nap."

Turning towards the couch, Sorun bent down and scooped the cushions up from the ground. He stepped forwards to set them down, and then stopped when he saw Virgil on the couch's arm looking up at him.

"Chao?" He still looked a bit concerned, and the dot above his head had turned into a question mark. A Bringer Claw momentarily manifested to give the Chao a reassuring rub atop its head as Sorun set the cushions back on the couch, but the upset look on Virgil's face remained. "Chao."

"What's got you so sour?" After finally setting the couch back to the way it was, Sorun tossed his body onto it and leaned his head back on the couch's arm. "Don't tell me you're upset over what I said to Sonic and the rest."

"Chao." Sorun gathered he was right on the money when, after the question mark turned back into a dot, Virgil nodded.

The pale teen sighed. "So what if I lied about not wanting to be friends with all of them? Doesn't really matter." Sorun interlaced his fingers behind his head as he stared up at the ceiling. "Fighting for the freedom on the planet's dangerous, Virge. I might die. I'd rather not grow too close to them knowing there's a good chance I'll die just to try and spare them as much emotional harm as possible."

The answer didn't seem to satisfy the Chao, as he gave Sorun a stern frown. "Chao-chao."

"You think it's stupid?" A shake of the Chao's head. "Paranoid?" A nod. "Mm." He just barely managed to hold in a chuckle. "Yeah, probably," he airily replied, "but I've already made up my mind. And to tell you the truth, I don't really know how long I'm gonna be able to keep the act up." A sad smile placed itself on his face. "As much as I keep saying and denying it, I really do like all of them. That's why I don't want them to be too sad wh- if I die."

"Chao?"

"What's the point, then? Gotta try at least, Virgil," Sorun answered. "Even if it's in vain and I give up halfway, I wanna at least try. But maybe it'll be a different story once the war ends and I don't gotta worry about all this heavy 'dying' stuff," he said in an effort to appease the Chao.

A dissatisfied "chao" left Virgil's mouth, but he gave a small nod as he leaned back against the couch. Sorun breathed out a chuckle through his nose at the sight, and then closed his eyes.

Apparently he hadn't been as tired as he thought he had been, because try as he might, he couldn't catch any sleep. Either that or he was unconsciously resisting sleep as, a few minutes in, he realized he in no way, shape, or form was gonna make the mistake of sleeping on that couch again. Ten minutes in he gave up on tossing and turning, and decided to just open his eyes again and stare up at the HQ's ceiling while he thought to himself. Most of those thoughts had lead the teen to thinking back to Earth, putting him in a rather melancholic mood.

Now it was an hour in and, growing bored, Sorun had unsheathed Yamato once again so he could examine the sword's blade. "Of all the swords the Emerald could have given me, it gave me Vergil's," he thought with a bemused chuckle. "Of course it would. They already gave me Vergil's Summoned Swords. Why not his actual sword, too? And if this thing really is like the original... I'll need to experiment with it later." He angled the sword just right so he could see his distorted reflection in the blade. "Out of all the powers that Emerald could have given me... the ability to summon the Yamato isn't too shabby."

Oh, the things he could get up to if even just some of the powers from the games' version of the sword transferred to this Chaos-created version. He had high hopes some did, too, based on Sonic and Shadow's reaction towards the blade. The fact they seemed so nervous around it was nothing but encouraging for him. He really would have to see for himself just what was possible with it later on at some point.

He opened his mouth to examine his teeth in the blade's reflection, and then sighed and began to pick at the plaque on a tooth with a fingernail. "Where the hell did all this crap on my teeth come from? Consequence of skipping out on brushing, I guess."

His thoughts ended there when he heard a single set of footsteps descend the steps into Freedom HQ's living room, and then stop right at the end of the couch. Sorun ceased picking at his teeth and, too lazy to look up himself, angled the sword so he could see the reflection of whoever it was that had stopped at the couch.

There was no suppressing the sigh that left him when he saw Sally's distorted visage in the blade.

"Welp, no getting outta this one," he thought as he sheathed the sword and sat up on the couch. He looked forward to the meeting with her even less than he had with Sonic and Shadow. Mostly because of what Elias had said, about how she'd been mad at him leaving. He could see from her perspective why that would be, but he had to wonder how this conversation was gonna play out. How worried she was going to be over his well being versus how angry she was that he'd tried leaving the Freedom Fighters.

It wasn't going to be a pretty conversation regardless, and unfortunately for Sally, Sorun wasn't having it.

"Yeah?" he asked, sinking deeply into the couch after sitting upright. He saw out of the corner of his vision that Virgil was still asleep on the couch's arm. At least he didn't have to be awake to witness all this coming drama. Lucky him.

"That's all you have to say?" He could hear in Sally's voice that she sounded mad. He turned his head just enough so that one of his eyes could see her, and yes, he could see that she looked the same way she sounded. Narrowed eyes, tense posture, creased lips, the works. "You run out on the Freedom Fighters, come back a day later, and all you have to say in response is 'yeah'?"

"Yeah."

A sound somewhere between an exhausted sigh and an angered huff left Sally. "Why are you acting like this, Sorun?"

The teen turned his head in her direction. "Sally, I'm sad and tired. I don't wanna deal with you yelling at me." He turned his head back forwards. "Maybe tomorrow. Preferably never."

"I didn't come here to yell at you."

Sorun turned his head towards Sally again. The frustration in her eyes was clear, but now that he looked closer he saw that her expression looked more concerned than anything else. "Alright, then why'd you come?" he asked.

"I just wanted to check up on you," she answered as she stepped around the couch. "I... admittedly did have some choice words for you for running out on us, but I had a talk with Sonic, and he told me about some of the difficulties you've been having." She paused and looked Sorun in his eyes. "Why did you decide to come back, Sorun?"

"You talked to Sonic, didn't you?" Sorun asked back. "I already told him."

"Well, I wanted to hear it from you."

At that, Sorun sighed. He leaned forwards on the couch, placing the tip of the sheathed sword on the ground while folding his wrists over the bottom of the handle to use the sword as a cane. "Don't get me wrong, Sally. I didn't come crawling back to the Freedom Fighters just because I suddenly grew some backwards set of morality saying I should put my life on the line for everybody just 'cause it's the right thing to do. Maybe people like Sonic like to subscribe to the idea of 'with great power comes great responsibility', but I have to question how great that saying is when me getting powers automatically meant I had to go risk my life for a bunch of people in a world I don't even belong in. Kinda put the whole 'freedom' part of 'Freedom Fighters' in question for me."

"Then why did you bother coming back at all?" Sally questioned him.

"Because... as is stands, I live in this world now. And there are certain things here I want to protect," Sorun answered in a quiet voice. "Fighting alongside you all against my will is one thing, but fighting because I choose to is something else entirely. I can't protect anything if I don't fight, and if Eggman wins then it's game over for Mobius."

Sally nodded at Sorun's explanation, her features softening a bit. "And what did you decide you wanted to protect?"

Sorun rolled his head back with a groan. "Does it really matter? Look-" he rolled his head back forwards, "- Sally, you and me? We're in the same boat. You don't wanna see the world get wrecked by Eggman, and I don't wanna see everybody in the world suffer under him. I've already seen enough of that." His eyes briefly flicked to Virgil's sleeping form, and then went back to Sally. "If I'm gonna live in this world, I may as well make sure it's a happy one to live in. Besides, you people kind of need me anyways. Wasn't the whole reason you summoned me here to begin with was because you were all losing against Eggman? Nothing's really changed in that regard."

"I'm painfully aware of this." Sally continued looking at Sorun, and then silently moved forwards to sit next to him on the couch. Sorun had followed her with his eyes, but didn't make a move to stop her as he leaned back against the couch while resting Yamato on the couch's side. "I would have liked it if you would have talked to somebody at some point about your problems, but I'm happy that you made up your mind and returned to us. Because you're right- we really do need your help. And I saw the Badnik wreck outside of the HQ." She turned her head towards Sorun and gave him a small smile. "You've come a really long way since you first came here, huh?"

Meeting the chipmunk's gaze with his own, Sorun let out a small laugh. "The powers help," he said, "but yeah. I guess I've gotten kind of good."

"I'd say more than 'kind of', Sorun. And... your new ability is that sword, right?" She tilted her head in confusion. "What is it supposed to do?"

"Oh, Sally, this sword can do stuff you've probably never even dreamed of." Sorun reached to his side to take the sheathed sword in his hands, turning it over as he admired it. "At least, I think it can. I haven't really tried it out yet. But don't worry too much about the sword." Suddenly, and much to Sally's surprise, the Yamato collapsed in on itself, disintegrated in a shower of blue particles, and then disappeared entirely.

Sally stared at the empty air where the sword had been, and then chuckled while turning back towards Sorun. "Well, I'll take your word for it." Her smile lessened as the concern returned to her eyes. "And don't get me wrong, I'm glad to see you're trying to get stronger for everybody's sake, but you know I would have let you back into the Freedom Fighters even without your powers, right? Especially after everything you've done and gone through. You really do have a place here alongside everybody else."

"I know," Sorun replied with a small sigh.

"... You're doing okay, right, Sorun?" she asked him.

"No, Sally, I wouldn't call me being depressed 'okay'."

Sally allowed a few silent moments to pass between them before speaking again. "Do you want to talk about why you're so upset?"

Sorun's head rolled in her direction with an incredulous look on his face. "Sally, I literally just accepted the fact that I've lost my home planet and everything and everyone I ever knew on it forever. Why would I not be upset? What possible future did you envision where I was actually okay with this?" The fact he was going to be dying relatively soon was still heavily weighing on his mind, as well. More so than the fact his zone was lost to him forever, actually, though by now he didn't even know if he was more frustrated over him actually dying or over the fact he couldn't even talk to anybody about it.

But he could tell that his words were making Sally more and more worried from the way her face was falling more the further he spoke, so Sorun decided to try and dial his mood back a bit. "Look, I'm trying to get better, okay?" he tried. "It'll... it'll pass. I just need... gah, I don't know what I need..."

"I think some helpful words would be a good start," Sally told him. "I was in the same place you're in right now way back when all this started."

At hearing her words, Sorun very much wanted to rebuke her claim and tell her that no, she wasn't, because he really did doubt she knew how he was feeling right now. But both her face and her words seemed sincere, so he kept quiet and allowed the Mobian to continue.

"Robotnik had just overthrown the whole kingdom. Everybody lost everything when we were forced to retreat back here to Knothole to escape him. It's almost hard to believe how small it was back then compared to how it is now." A single, sad laugh escaped her as Sally looked down towards the floor. "I always tried to stay strong in front of everybody, they all had as many problems as I did, but more than that I was their leader. I never wanted anybody to see I was suffering just as bad on the inside as they all were." She looked back up at Sorun. "I know it feels awful. Losing everything, losing people and knowing you'll never see them again. It won't get better immediately, but over time it heals." She looked down again and smiled a bit. "Having others that you trust around you helps a lot, though."

Sorun nodded along, his expression still gloomy as he leaned back into the couch. "I think you're neglecting a very important difference between the two of us, Sally," he mumbled. "You got your kingdom back. You got your family back. I won't."

Sally flinched, and then slowly nodded. "I know, Sorun, but-" She stopped herself when he noticed the withering glare the human teen was sending her way. "I... I'm sorry if I made you upset."

"... You didn't make me upset," Sorun said, sighing through his nose as he leaned further into the couch. "But did you ever hold out at least some hope you'd get your family and kingdom back all the way back then?"

"Of course I did," Sally softly answered. "Half of the reason I lead the Freedom Fighters was to gain back everything we'd lost, or at least as much as possible. The other half was to stop Robotnik so he'd stop harming everybody in the planet. Most of what kept us going through all those years was the hope that, one day, we'd take it all back and return to living normal lives. The lives we had before all this."

"Well... I don't have that hope, Sally. Earth is already gone for me." Sorun's eyes tilted down to his lap. "What am I supposed to do with that?"

Sally reached out towards him and tried to answer him, but no words managed to come out of her mouth. Her hand lowered back to her side, and after frowning in contemplation she began reaching into her vest. "Sorun, listen, I have to go now. But I'm leaving Nicole here with you."

The pale teen's eyes snapped back up to Sally in slight panic. "Wow, Sally, really wish you woulda told me she was listening in on this conversation before I went and said all that stuff." He doubted he would have been able to hide it anyways, but if there was one person didn't want to know of his current mental state, it was her. And now she'd just heard him spill his guts out in front of Sally.

That death by Emeralds couldn't come quick enough for all the sudden embarrassment he was feeling.

She didn't say anything in response, instead choosing to simply take out the handheld computer and place it on the other end of the couch. She hesitated for a moment, and then reached back inside of her vest before pulling out a Power Ring. Sorun groaned at the sight and turned away while asking, "Why are you doing this?"

"Because maybe she can get through to you better than I can," she answered as she began inserting the Power Ring into the computer. "She told us herself that she's the only one you go out of your way to hang out with. And I'm not leaving you alone while you're like this." She finished slotting the Power Ring in, and then got up off of the couch. She walked to Sorun's side and placed a hand on his shoulder. "Hang in there, Sorun. We're all there for you if you need it."

He didn't say a single word in response. Sorun just chose to keep facing away from both her and the end of the couch where Nicole's computer body was. Sally, seeing the sight, simply slid her hand off of Sorun's shoulder and proceeded to walk towards the stairs leading out of the HQ.

Once he heard the door leading outside faintly close in the distance, Sorun felt his body deflate as a breath left him. The presence of the computer laying on the couch near him alone was making him more and more nervous, and he felt his body tense up when he felt a sudden weight compress the couch even further. "Nicole, don't," he pleaded in a small voice.

"No." He felt another hand fall on his shoulder, and though his head was still facing away, he'd turned his eyes down enough to see the appendage. A black-furred hand connected to a brown-furred arm compressing down on his shoulder. "Sorun, please talk to me."

He practically wanted to shout at her and everybody else for not leaving him alone, but he couldn't. He couldn't bear to do something like that to her of all people, and deep down he truly was grateful everybody was going out of their way just to try and help him. It was that same friendly, helpful nature that had helped him decide that he was going to save them all.

So, with a heavy sigh, he obliged Nicole and turned his body in the opposite direction to face her. He almost felt worse when he saw her face looking almost as gloomy as his was. It reminded him of all the way back during the incident with Metal Sonic's head, back when she had a similar look on her face. Upon seeing that face, Sorun had briefly felt the desire to get that sad look off of her face overpower the more negative feelings weighing himself down.

"Sorun?" Nicole quietly called out his name while she slowly took her hand off his shoulder. "How are you feeling?"

"Mm... on a scale of one to ten, ten being the worst... I'm feelin' a solid fifteen here, Nicole." His words hung in the air a bit, and soon enough a low, bitter chuckle left Sorun. It caused the barest of smiles to form on Nicole, too, and though it was already wavering and faltering, Sorun felt better knowing he at least caused that much of a change. "Sorry, awful joke. I couldn't help it."

"No, no. It's fine," she assured him as she slid slightly closer to him. "I know how terrible this must feel for you, but if you want, we could..." Her eyes darted to the side almost desperately as she searched for something to take Sorun's mind off from his thoughts. Her eyes stopped on the TV. "We could play a game?" she suggested, turning back to Sorun with a forced and hopeful smile.

The teen glanced over towards the TV and game console, and while there was a slight sense of longing in him, he couldn't bring himself to acknowledge it. "I'm not in the mood," he said.

Nicole's forced smile dropped instantly, and she seemed almost disturbed by his claim. "That's okay," she said, a bit quickly. "We can do something else if you prefer-"

"Nicole," Sorun interrupted, eyes tired as he looked back at her. "What do you want?"

"... I just want to make you feel better," she answered. Her long, triangular ears had dipped down slightly with the answer, and she'd slid even closer towards him. "You're my friend. I can't bear to see you like this. I... I can't comprehend what it is you're feeling, I know, but I want to help so you stop feeling this."

Sorun felt a wave of gratitude wash through him, and then slowly breathed out as he sunk further into the couch. At the very least, he wasn't going to deny her the chance to at least try and make him feel better. He didn't want to risk making her feel even worse at his expense, and deep down, he really did want her company at the moment. "Then just talk," he told her. "If you want to help just stay here and talk with me."

She eagerly nodded in response, pulling herself even closer to Sorun while also pulling her legs up to rest on the couch behind her. "Of course I'll do that, Sorun. Just say whatever's on your mind."

"Mm." Sorun pulled his own legs up on the couch, pressing then to his knees as he kept an eye on Nicole from the corner of his vision. "You're not mad I left, are you?"

The lynx shook her head. "You came back. That's all that matters," she said. "Nobody can blame you for how you're reacting. I certainly do not. And I'm thankful that you've decided to come forwards to try and talk through your emotions. In the past you were rather... closed-off with your feelings, and it caused much vexation among some of the others. Sonic noticeably." A humorless smile found its way onto her face as she looked to the side. "You were always so quick to try and talk others out of their issues, like you'd done with me, and you never even considered yourself. It's a trait that I oddly admire about you, and yet at the same time it frustrates me."

"Well, nobody's perfect. Least of all me," Sorun muttered in response. "But I can only go so far before I have to admit I need help, Nicole. Otherwise Sonic might tie me to a chair or something until I start talking."

A single laugh left the lynx. "You joke, but from how much you've strained his patience, I would not put it past him. I'm happy that a chair wasn't necessary for you to finally open up."

Sorun turned his head towards her. "... Only because it's you." He looked back forwards, eyes still trained on Nicole. "Since... since we're friends." He mentally cursed himself at his weakness. Not even a day in an he'd already failed at never calling anybody a friend. "It's Nicole, though," he reasoned with himself. "I can make an exception for her, right? And I already kind of slipped and almost said her name in front of Elias, and Sally's already aware of it, so... so a single exception won't hurt, will it?" He sighed. "Why am I even bothering?"

Nicole's eyes widened just the barest amount, and her ears perked up slightly. "I'm very glad to hear you say that, Sorun," she said. "Is talking with you like this helping?"

"... It's helping," he honestly answered, feeling better when he saw another, more genuine smile begin to grow on Nicole's face. "I wonder what my mom is doing right now?" Sorun wondered.

The smile faltered for a bit, but Nicole managed to maintain well enough as she paused in thought. "I'm unsure. You've never talked about your mother before. I'm sure if she saw you now that she would be proud her son is putting so much effort in to try and free the planet."

An amused scoff escaped from Sorun. "You kidding? She'd flip out if she found out I was almost getting killed on a weekly basis here. She'd drag me all the way back to Earth if she could." He laughed a bit at the mental image of the sight, the last laugh exiting as a sigh. "Man. I really hope me disappearing like that didn't crush her too much," he murmured. "I mean, it probably did, but... she's never even going to know what happened to me. We didn't have any other family, either. I was literally all she had." He felt his shoulders slump. "I really hope she gets better eventually. That she moves on with her own life. It hurts knowing me up and vanishing like that is probably tearing her apart so much." He felt his body slump forwards. "I really am a terrible son."

"Don't say that. It isn't your fault." Nicole reached over and put a reassuring hand on Sorun's back. "I imagine any mother would be devastated to lose her child, but she will move on. If she is anything like you, I am sure of it." She began to slowly rub at Sorun's back in an effort to comfort him. "You had friends, too, did you not?"

"Yeah, but I wasn't nearly as close with them as my own mother. They'll get over me leaving. Probably won't even take a month for them to move on," he said. "Dave might take longer, he was my best friend, but he'll get over me, too. They all will. It's for the best, really, since I can never go back anyways."

Nicole tilted her head to the side with a small frown. "I'm not so sure you could call people like that friends if they would move on so quickly from your memory."

"Ah, don't hold it against them. We were all kind of cynical and pragmatic over there." The soothing rubbing on Sorun's back caused a bout of drowsiness to hit him, causing the teen to make a long, drawn-out yawn. "Thank you, Nicole. For staying with me for a bit." He gently removed her hand from his back and stood up from the couch. "But listen, it's, it's been a long day for me, and I think it's pretty late out anyways. I'm going back to Sonic's house to go to sleep." He looked the holographic lynx in the eyes. "But really, thank you. I... I needed this."

He wasn't back at a hundred percent, that was a foregone conclusion the moment he decided to go through with absorbing all the Emeralds, but it still helped him feel better. Having someone there to talk about at least some of his issues and to get some of this thoughts off his chest. And if it had to be with anyone, he was glad it was with Nicole. She was the only one he'd willingly admit to being friends with around others, even if it did make his resolve to distance himself from everybody else crumble that much faster. He didn't care. He needed at least one friend for his sanity's sake at this point.

But he was sure he made the right choice in at least allowing himself one friend. He did feel better. Enough that he felt confident that just maybe things would go back to normal starting tomorrow. It was just the refresher he needed before going back into this life, and he'd always be thankful to her for helping him. Enough that he was actually able to tell her how grateful he was despite how embarrassing it was to admit it.

And, strangely enough, even though he was too tired to now he wanted to keep talking about other things. Some of his doubts, about things left on Earth he never saw again, just... anything on his mind to help him further. It was hard for him to acknowledge, but he needed this. He wasn't sure how much further he could go without it at the moment.

Nicole herself, meanwhile, had pulled her hand back while shyly smiling in Sorun's direction. "It's no issue at all, Sorun. I'm just happy to be of help. I trust you'll be fine now?"

"Yeah, I'll be alright." The teen dipped his head down slightly to hide some of his face behind his hair. "But I mean, you know, I wouldn't mind doing this with you again. Maybe play a few more games when I'm feeling up to it. Just to... help with the therapeutic process. You get what I mean."

"Of course I do," she assured him with a nod. "I don't think that will be an issue at all." She glanced back to the handheld computer. "You're leaving right now, then?"

"I was planning on that," Sorun slowly answered as he followed her gaze to the computer. "Should I carry you back to Sally, or...?"

"No, do not worry about it. She's busying herself with royal affairs at the castle; she doesn't need the distraction at the moment," Nicole informed him with a shake of her head. "I'll simply remain here for the time being until she comes back to collect me tomorrow."

Sorun frowned at the answer. "You just wanna stay here all by yourself?"

"It's not a problem, Sorun. I'm used-"

"Nah, I'm not accepting that." He walked over and picked up the handheld computer, much to Nicole's surprise. "Look, I'll just take you back to Sonic's house with me and I'll bring you back later, alright? We can, eh... make it a sleepover or something, I dunno. It's gotta be better staying the night in this lonely place."

"I would hardly call this place lonely. But if you insist, I'll agree to it." After finishing, Nicole's body started to dissolve into a cloud of dark pixels right before Sorun's eyes. He could have sworn he saw a thankful smile grow over her features right before her head disappeared, but it had happened too quick for him to know for sure. Seconds after her body completely disappeared the green screen on the small computer lit up. "Shall we depart now?" she asked, her words appearing on the screen.

Sorun nodded. "Yeah. Lemme just grab Virgil real quick. Oh, Virgil's my new Chao by the way." He reached to the side of the couch and picked up the sleeping Chao's form, cradling his body in the crook of his elbow.

"You decided to take a pet?" Nicole asked him as he began walking towards the HQ's steps.

"Well, uh, yeah." He looked down at the sleeping Chao in one arm, the computer in his other hand, and then felt a smile grow on his face as he began ascending the steps. "I rescued him and he started following me around, so I thought why not, y'know? It's a long story, actually. See, after I left..."

Chapter 26

Recursion Error

Episode 26- It slices, it dices, it cuts through everything

Everybody had a different morning routine. Some people went to go get breakfast first thing after waking up. Others exercised, took care of their hygiene, did miscellaneous chores, or went to go get the morning newspaper. Just something relaxing to help that somebody prepare them for the rest of the day.

Sorun had been bunking in the same house as the Hedgehog family long enough that by now Sonic had been able to roughly pin down Sorun's own morning routine. That routine was for him to wake up, go back to sleep, wake up a second time, and by that point it was a fifty-fifty split of him finally getting up or going back down for a third nap. And then after finally getting up at some point he'd go to the bathroom, and then go to the kitchen, and would then carry on with the rest of his day. This was a routine Sorun rarely deviated from. If there was one thing Sonic could safely say he knew about Sorun, it's that the human liked peaceful routines.

That's why he was so confused when he'd woken up that morning to see that Sorun, who'd fallen asleep in the other bed in the room the night prior, wasn't there. The fact he'd even gotten up before Sonic had was shocking enough to the hedgehog, but when he looked outside of the window he was even more shocked. Sorun was out in the house's small backyard, swinging that katana of his around. Like he was attempting to practice with it.

After all the complaining Sorun always did about training, him practicing something on his own was the last thing Sonic ever expected. But there he was. Doing practice swings with the sword.

He didn't know how long he was watching Sorun, but he was only roused from it when he heard a knock on his room's door. "It's open!" he called, prompting the door to slowly open. He felt some amount of relief go through him when he saw that it was just Tails after the fox had poked his head into the room.

"Hey, Sonic." The door opened further as Tails stepped inside. "Do you know where Sorun is? Sally is wondering where Nicole is and he was the last one with her."

"Nicole? She's over there," Sonic said, pointing his thumb out to a nightstand near Sorun's bed where the small, handheld computer was set down. "He brought her here with him last night."

As he finished speaking, dark pixels began forming and coalescing into the vague shape of a body, until finally they condensed and recolored. Seconds later the cloud of pixels had transformed into Nicole's body, the lynx having chosen to form in a sitting position on Sorun's bed while facing Tails. "He did not want to leave me alone in Freedom HQ, so he took me back to Sonic's home," she informed him.

Tails' eyes widened in surprise. "Oh! That was nice of him."

"Yes, it was," Nicole agreed, the corners of her mouth turning upwards. "Was there something Sally needed that required my attention?"

"No, she was just wondering where you were," Tails said with a shake of his head. "Where is Sorun, anyways?"

Sonic nodded towards the room's window. "Out there. Take a look."

All three of them shuffled towards the window so they could get a better look at the human in the backyard. He was still swinging that sword around, though what he was actually trying to practice, Sonic had no clue. He personally had little to no knowledge about actual swordsmanship, nothing about stances, styles, special techniques or anything like that. He'd seen Antoine handle a sword, though, so he had a vague idea of what handling a sword was supposed to look like. And his assumption was that, since Sorun's katana was so similar to a saber, he would swing it at least somewhat similar to how Antoine swung his sword.

Sorun was in no way swinging that sword in any way Sonic had seen before.

They weren't random swings, at least. He could see that much as the human was repeating very specific-looking swings. It was the actual manner he was holding the weapon and swinging it that was throwing Sonic for a loop. He almost always held the sword's sheath in his left hand, for one thing. He didn't tie it around his waist using the blue cord already tied to the scabbard- he continually just held it with his hand. His right hand, of course, held the katana itself. He'd do various repeated one-handed swings with the sword, and oddly he'd sometimes sheath the sword only to quickly draw the blade out in a large slash.

It... wasn't very smooth. Even Sonic could see that. The swings were slow and unimpressive-looking, and a lot of the times when Sorun tried to sheath the sword he'd completely miss slotting the blade into the sheath. His movements were completely amateurish, which, considering Sonic didn't imagine Sorun ever actually tried swinging a real sword in his life on Earth, he could understand. He kept wondering where Sorun had seen the sword swings he was attempting to practice, though.

He wondered even more about that sword itself.

"So Sorun's trying to practice with the sword?" Tails wondered aloud, his twin tails slowly swishing behind him. "I don't really get why the Chaos Emerald gave him that sword. Can't he already make a bunch of swords with that first power he got? Why does he need one more?" His eyes narrowed in an inquisitive manner. "And it's not all... blue and ghostly-looking like his other two powers are. It looks like a real sword," he noted. "Why do you think it's like that?"

"I couldn't tell ya, bud," Sonic muttered in response. "I'll tell you one thing, though. That sword... something's really off with it. Thing gives me the creeps."

Both Tails and Nicole turned towards him with questioning looks. "You looked really off-put by the sword back in the HQ, too," Tails said with some concern. "It looks normal enough to me. What's so weird about it?"

"You mean other than the fact I got the willies just by being near it?" Sonic mumbled out. "... It feels wrong. Call it a side effect of me being Chaos-sensitive, I don't know, but there's something really wrong with that sword. The amount of Chaos energy it gives off, the way the energy feels... geez, I think I can feel it from here."

He knew for a fact that there were a precious few people in the world that had been exposed to even nearly as much Chaos energy as he ever had. He could only count Shadow and Knuckles off the top of his head for people that even closely compared, and past them he doubted there were many others. He'd handled Chaos Emeralds all the way from back when he was five years old, back when they'd numbered in the thousands before they'd all been combined into the seven. He'd even handled the seven themselves. Past that he'd handled Power Rings, he'd interacted and fought with people with Chaos powers of their own... he knew what Chaos energy felt like.

Chaos energy had an unmistakable feeling. Sonic had always felt it the clearest whenever he'd gone into his Super form. It felt like he was standing next to the sun in a way. Not nearly as hot, of course, though there was an intense, warm feeling that would come over him. The raw power was there, though. A deep sensation within him, an instinct informing him of the limitless energy running through him, and a tingling, static feeling constantly tickling his body. They were comforting feelings to him. The warmth. The power. The tingling.

That sword. Yamato, Sorun had called it. It didn't feel anything like that.

It was so strange, too, because Sonic often felt Sorun's other powers. The Summoned Swords and Bringer Claws. He always felt the comforting sensation of Chaos energy faintly radiate from them whenever Sorun summoned them, and knowing they came from the Chaos Emeralds, Sonic had never paid them any mind. But when he felt out the Yamato... it was completely different. The power was certainly there. Almost too much- Chaos Emeralds were conduits for channeling an infinite amount of Chaos energy, but at least all of that energy was contained in the Emeralds. Sorun's katana radiated even more energy than an Emerald, but that wasn't the problem. Sonic's own body had channeled infinite amounts of Chaos energy without a sweat; the amount of energy the sword gave off was nothing to him, even if it was massive. It was how it felt .

There was no warmth to be felt in the power constantly wafting off of that sword. Just the opposite, actually: it felt cold. Not cold as in frigid, but cold as in... deep. Something raw and instinctual. Even the static energy he felt from the blade felt more intense and sharp than it ought to have been. The sword as a whole just felt wrong to Sonic. Something that felt darker than it needed to. Something that exhumed a cold presence that promised death.

How could something that looked so ordinary feel so off ?

"I don't know, Sonic," Tails voiced, stroking his chin with his hand. "I don't think I've ever seen a sword designed like that, but it really does just look like a normal sword. And I never felt anything off about it."

"I agree with Tails," Nicole said. "It is merely a construct of Chaos energy given shape by Sorun's will, as with the rest of his powers. I see no cause for alarm if Sorun himself feels at ease around it. He has, after all, shown a stunning amount of competency when it comes to the abilities granted to him by the Chaos Emeralds. There is no reason not to trust him."

"... A sword shaped from Sorun's will, huh?" Sonic echoed as he gazed towards the sword grasped in Sorun's hand. "I wonder what's going on in his head that made him make something like that..."

Because what if Nicole was right on the money and the aura that sword gave off was just a reflection of Sorun? There was so much staggering power inside of that sword, and all of it was subdued in such a deceptively simple-looking blade. The only thing Sonic could think of as a comparison was a calm dragon, coiled in a resting pose but with its eyes open and just ready to attack at a moment's notice. It did remind Sonic somewhat of Sorun now that he thought on it- like the time he'd come back from that mission with Sally and Rouge, completely calm and at ease. The way he'd snapped from being that to the enraged state he'd been in when he'd slammed Knuckles into that wall with his new power. Even all the way back on the first day Sorun had arrived here Sonic had noticed it. How Sorun had been completely furious over what had happened and then calmed down to a normal level at an almost stunning pace over the course of the day. Sonic himself understood anger just as well as anybody else, but the way Sorun could just snap from one emotion to the next and back again in the most extreme manner left him speechless.

But what about how the sword felt? That deathly, cold dread that seemed to hang around in the air just centimetres above the actual katana's blade? Was that how Sorun felt? Sonic could certainly see it, but at the same time he had a hard time comprehending it. He knew loss, of course. Everybody did. He'd lost his parents and uncle, and even though he'd gotten them back, he'd still felt that loss. There were friends of his who had died, and when he thought back to all those times, the emotions he'd felt... he was shocked to find that they were eerily similar to the cold feeling he felt off the sword, minus the frankly uncomfortable amount of power mixed in with it.

And Sorun... Sorun had lost more than Sonic had ever lost. He'd lost everything . His whole zone, and the life he'd had within it. A loss on that scale was something Sonic just couldn't comprehend, because he simply had just never lost anything on a sheer scale Sorun had. Of course the human felt terrible about it, Sonic would be more worried if he didn't, but what was that feeling even supposed to be?

The same sadness and dread Sonic had felt when a friend died, multiplied hundreds of times over? What did that even feel like? Was it close to the feeling Sonic had felt from that sword? The endless, deep cold?

"Sorun, buddy..." Sonic sadly thought as he looked out the window at Sorun. "How bad does your heart have to be hurting that your subconscious made that thing you're swinging around? An awful-feeling thing like that?"

Well, Sonic couldn't give him back what he'd lost, but there was no way he was going to leave Sorun to drown in all of those negative feelings. As much as Sorun always claimed to never be friends with them, Sonic just never believed him, especially with how unconvincing he'd sounded last night. And he absolutely refused to leave a friend hurting like that.

"Do you guys think he's doing fine?" Sonic asked the other two as he turned towards them. "I know he's just now accepting he lost everything so he can move past it, but he's gotta be hurting." His green eyes glanced back out the window. "He looks fine on the outside, but I'm really worried about what's going on with him on the inside."

When he looked back to Tails and Nicole, he saw that both of their faces had turned into sad frowns. "It's really hard to tell with him, Sonic," Tails said after a long moment. "He's acting fine, but there's no way he's actually fine, right...?"

"No, Tails. I really don't think so," Sonic said with a shake of his head. "Nobody's gonna be fine after going through what Sorun's gone through. Honestly, I'm... I'm really amazed that after everything that's happened to him he came back because he actually wants to help save the world, even though we're the ones that did this to him." A sad smiled formed on his face as he ran a hand through his quills. "He's a real cool guy. I just wish we could help him more so he didn't have to go through so much."

"I think we are doing all we can for him," Nicole told them as she looked out the window towards Sorun. "Sorun had finally made the conscious effort to come forwards with at least some of his feelings. Matters of the heart are still a new concept for me, but from my understanding, extrapolating feelings onto trusted friends who will listen and be there for you is the most effective method for healing emotional injuries like the ones Sorun has sustained. He made a joke and referenced it as therapy, and I think he said this because he is aware of this fact."

Sonic eyed the lynx standing next to him in surprise. Since when had Sorun gotten so deep with anybody? "Yeah, well, it'd be way easier if he actually acknowledged us as friends so he could do that."

"He does. He acknowledges me as a friend," Nicole corrected him. "He told me so himself."

"Ah-hu- wait, wait what!?" Sonic did a double-take on Nicole, and even Tails looked to her in complete shock at the statement. Nicole herself just looked confused at the looks. "What the- he said he wasn't ready to be friends with anybody! What's different about you!?"

"I... spent a large amount of time with him," Nicole hesitantly answered. "Playing those games. They are a relaxing pastime for him and we formed a bond over time. That is why he calls me a friend."

"Are you serious...?" Sonic muttered as he ran a hand along his face. "Gah, if I woulda known that video games were the way to getting through to him I would have practiced more. Unreal..." He wasn't even that surprised. Sorun was so weird at times it just fit with him.

"But this is a good thing, right?" Tails asked, eyes lighting up as his tails began to excitedly swish in the air around him. "If he has at least one person to go to with all his feelings, then he can get better, right?"

The hand on Sonic's face dropped away as his head perked up. "Hey, yeah, you're right!" He looked back to Nicole with renewed vigor in his eyes. "He's gotta have opened up to you at least a little, right?"

Nicole looked a bit uncomfortable at the question, but she did give a nod, which made the other two brighten up even further. "He confided certain things to me, yes. And he expressed a desire to talk further at later dates." She looked back out the window. "I truly do think that talking helps him," she continued, "and I simply desire to help my friend the same way he helped me. If simply talking with him will help him recover from his tragedy, I am more than willing. You do not have to worry about him weathering this alone." A small smile made its way onto her face. "I've found myself looking forwards to talking with him regardless."

"... Really, huh?" Before anything further could be said, Nicole's form began flickering and disappearing bit by bit, causing Sonic and Tails' eyes to widen in panic. "Whoa, Nicole, are you alright!?"

"I'm just fine, Sonic. The Power Ring from last night is merely running out of energy is all," she informed the pair as her body began to disintegrate more and more. "I'm afraid we will have to leave it here for now. Tails, would you be so kind as to bring me back to Sally? And Sonic, if you could tell Sorun where I went so he doesn't worry when he sees me gone?"

"Yeah, sure thing," Tails said as he began walking towards the nightstand.

"Totally, no problem," Sonic said with a nod right as Nicole's body disappeared entirely. He watched Tails pick up the small computer, and then hopped off his own bed. "I think I'm gonna hit some breakfast and get going. You good to bring her back on your own?" he asked Tails as he began stretching his legs.

The fox nodded at him. "I'll be fine. See you later, then?"

"'Course you will." Sonic found himself glancing back at the window. He frowned slightly, though it turned into a hopeful grin when he eyed the computer held in Tails' hand.

"Ow! Dammit..."

"Chao!"

"Geh! S-sorry, Virgil. It slipped out." Sorun sent the Chao sitting on a nearby rock an apologetic look, and then shook his left hand to sooth the burning sensation left when he'd accidentally cut the hand with the Yamato. "This is way harder than it looked..."

As great as it was being able to summon the Yamato at will, the fact of the matter was that Sorun just didn't know how to properly utilize a sword. He'd never even picked up a real sword, and he wasn't sure the Summoned Swords counted. The closest thing he could think of was when he had a plastic katana as part of a Halloween costume years and years ago. He didn't have any formal training. He didn't even have any experience to lean off of.

What he did have was an intimate knowledge of Vergil's moveset. He had to of after playing as him so much on the highest of difficulties. Succeeding at the highest difficulties 'Devil May Cry' offered meant analyzing and memorizing every single, intricate movement the character models made, as a fair number of moves required frame-perfect timing on the player's part.

So when it came time to play as Vergil, like Sorun did with any game and the characters, he studied him. Every single movement, every single attack and combo, and every single little detail was memorized by the pale human. It was completely necessary just to live through those difficulties, but Vergil for Sorun was different since he liked him so much. So those memories of studying his moves and attacks stayed with him. Practically imprinted on him. So, he'd figured, if he had the sword, then why not copy the moves, too? It wasn't like he had anything better to emulate.

But there were problems with this method that became readily apparent when Sorun tried it. He knew how to make the movements themselves. He knew from examining Vergil's animations how to hold the sword, where his feet should be when initiating the moves, and how to actually swing it. That wasn't the problem. The problem was that Vergil wasn't fully human, and a video game character to boot, so a lot of his attacks and movements got away with the sheer power and speed of his sword moves because of that.

Sorun was human.

He didn't have the superior strength and agility needed perform powerful attacks barely perceptible to the naked eye. He didn't have the inhuman reflexes and precision needed to sheath and unsheath the sword dozens of times in the blink of an eye- he'd gotten his hand cut for just trying. He didn't have the supernatural hand-eye coordination needed to swing the sword fluidly and gracefully like Vergil could.

He knew the moves perfectly. His body just couldn't perform them.

"This isn't working," Sorun decided with a tired huff. He sheathed Yamato and walked over to the rock his Chao was sitting on, groaning softly as he sat down besides him. "I got no clue what I'm doing," he admitted, more to himself than to the Chao. "I gotta learn how to use this thing, but trying to copy a guy who can casually block bullets out of the air ain't gonna cut it. Strength isn't a problem, not with its ability. The problem is speed. This thing's useless if I can't actually connect with the attacks." He hummed in thought as he rolled the sword in his hands. "I need... some legitimate technique here to maximize my swing speed and accuracy. From there it's just a matter or practical experience fighting Badniks. But if I don't have a good base to launch off of, a foundation, I'm not gonna get anywhere..."

"Chao-chao?"

Sorun tore his gaze from the sword to Virgil. "What?"

"Chao."

The teen tilted his head, trying to parse together the swinging motion the Chao was making with his arms. "You're... swinging a sword...?"

Virgil paused, and then shook his head in impatience. He swung again, and then did a little hop to reverse his position while making the swinging motion again.

"Copying... oh, learn from somebody who does have experience?" he guessed. Virgil dropped his hands and then nodded at Sorun with a smile on his face. "That makes sense, I guess. But who? Who in the Freedom Fighters do I know that uses a sword?"

Sorun dipped his head downwards, eyebrows furrowed as he went deep into thought. This continued on for a solid thirty seconds until, finally, he shot straight upwards so fast that he startled the Chao next to him. "I got it!" he cried out. "Espio!"

"... Chao...?" Virgil questioned, head tilted to the side in confusion.

"Well, I mean, I've never seen him use a sword, but the guy's a ninja! He's gotta at least know how to use one, right? Ninjas are Japanese, katanas are Japanese, it-it fits!" It was flawless enough logic to him. At the very least it was sound enough that he felt it had a good chance at working. And it wouldn't hurt to ask, even if by some slim margin he was wrong. Which he didn't think he was. "Alright," Sorun muttered, Yamato disappearing from his hands as he began scratching the side of his head. "So where would Espio be hanging around at this time of day...? Freedom HQ?" He shrugged. "Eh, better lead than anywhere else."

When he'd gone all the way to Freedom HQ in his search for the chameleon, by some stroke of luck, he'd found him. Specifically, on the couch and right next to Vector. The two were talking about something, though what it was Sorun didn't have a clue. Nor did he care, as he was here with a purpose.

"Never thought it'd get to this point. Hope he can actually help me out," Sorun thought to himself as he approached the back side of the couch. "How do I even start this? Eh, I'll just go for it. That's what I'm supposed to do when I wanna talk with someone, right?"

Taking a deep breath to calm himself, Sorun stopped behind the couch, grabbed onto the top of it, and then hopped over so that he sat between the two Mobians.

"Espio, my man." The two seemed incredibly startled by Sorun's sudden intrusion into their conversation, though they soon calmed down when they saw that it was just Sorun. "My dude. My homie. My-"

"What do you want, Sorun?" Espio interrupted, eye ridges quirked upwards in confusion at the human's manner of speech.

"Right into it, huh?" Sorun muttered, voice slightly dejected. He shook it off quickly and held his empty left hand out. "So look. The last Chaos Emerald I got gave me a sword, and I don't have any idea how I'm supposed to use it." He gripped his left hand, and in a flash of blue particles the Yamato materialized in his grip. "I figured, y'know, it's a katana and you're a ninja, so you'd probably know how to use one of these."

The reactions of the two Mobians besides him wildly varied. Vector, for whatever reason, started blinking in worry at the sight of the sword. Espio started to narrow his eyes almost in contempt at it. Both reactions caused Sorun great confusion, causing him to look back and forth between the two.

"Oh, you've done it now," Vector mumbled, bringing his hand to his face as a low groan left him. "You don't know what you just did."

"... Huh?" Sorun gave the crocodile a questioning look as he blinked his eyes. "I-I don't- what do you mean?"

"A katana ?"

Sorun didn't know if he'd ever heard a word spoken with so much venom dripping off of it. And it had come from Espio of all people, who as far as Sorun knew was one of the more chill Mobians around. It was why he was so surprised, and even further surprised when he looked towards Espio to see him actually glaring at the sword in anger.

"... Yeah...?" Sorun hesitantly answered, unconsciously holding the sword closer to his chest. "Did I do something wrong?" he asked as he turned back to Vector.

Vector shook his head while lowered his hand from his face. "No, it's just- he's got this thing with katanas, I don't know what it is," he answered.

"It's not a thing ," Espio denied, going as far as to step up off the couch while turning to Sorun. "It's a principle. Katanas are the weapon of the samurai. A group of honor-bound fool warriors who care more about titles than actually succeeding." The chameleon glanced his yellow eyes down at Yamato, and he actually looked offended by the sight. "I'm a ninja, not a samurai. I absolutely refuse to use their weapons."

The pale teen blinked once, looked down at the sword, and then blinked again when he looked back up at Espio. "I'm... I'm pretty sure ninjas use katanas too, dude." He wasn't an expert on the subject, but in all the games and movies he'd ever interacted with ninjas had katanas. Carrying around a slim melee weapon like a katana seemed practical enough for ninja use. These were all assumptions, sure, but he figured they were reasonable ones. Now he didn't know how to feel seeing Espio react to the sword with so much hostility.

"Well, I don't." Espio huffed, crossed his arms, and turned his head away from the object whose mere presence was evidently an offense to him. "Why on Mobius did your new power have to be a katana, Sorun?"

"... 'Cause this katana's special and cool?" Sorun tried in a small voice.

"Well, you're wrong. There's absolutely nothing 'cool' about that weapon."

And now Sorun was beginning to grow offended. "Hey. Espio. Don't diss Yamato."

Even Vector seemed mildly disturbed by Espio's attitude towards the sword. "Yeah, man, chill out. It's just a sword. And you know Sorun can't control what powers those things give him."

Espio glanced back at the two, though only for a moment, and then allowed his shoulders to relax as a sigh left him. "I apologize, Sorun. I didn't mean to belittle you or your weapon. I just... do not have a very good relationship with katanas is all," he explained as he fully turned back to the human, who began to visibly calm. "I'm honored that you would come to me for help for sword lessons, but I'm afraid I can be of no help in this regard."

Sorun's eyes narrowed in suspicion. "You don't even know how to use one, do you?"

"... My training was more oriented towards stealth tactics and throwing weapons," Espio quietly admitted as he turned his head away slightly.

"Ugh, I get it. Thanks anyways," Sorun mumbled as he leaned further into the couch. "I don't know what I'm supposed to do, guys. I gotta learn how to properly use this thing somehow, and it's not like Yamato came with an instruction booklet with it. Woulda been amazing if it did."

"I think you're on the right track seeking others for advice," Espio told him while flipping one of his palms up at the ceiling. "Why not try asking somebody else for help?"

"That's probably what I'm gonna have to do," Sorun admitted. "But who, though?"

Silence soon settled over the group of three for different reasons. Sorun had stopped talking as he took on a thinking pose, his face deep in concentration as he thought on his answer. Vector and Espio looked to each other in confusion, and then slowly turned back to Sorun.

"Er... you don't know anybody else in the Freedom Fighters who uses a melee weapon like yours?" Vector asked. "Anybody at all?"

"I'm pretty sure Amy's more into hammers than swords."

Espio actually twitched in irritation at the response, as if he was upset Sorun was missing such an obvious answer. "I think perhaps that Vector is referring to somebody who uses a weapon similar to yours," he slowly supplied. "Somebody who has been trained in and has a large amount of experience, specifically, using a sword." Espio's eyes practically began to shake at the clueless look on Sorun's face, and he clapped his hands together while pointing the fingers at the human teen. "A swordsman, so to speak. In the Freedom Fighters."

"... You think Sally knows how to use a sword?"

Both Espio and Vector gasped out in exasperation, the former slapping a hand right under his horn. "Sorun, you know who I'm talking about."

"Yeah, but I don't really wanna consider him as an option."

"Well, beggars can't be choosers," Espio mumbled out. "Go bother Antoine with this."

"Oh, come on. The Frenchie ?" Sorun threw his head back to the ceiling with a loud groan. "Dude, I don't wanna go to him for this."

"Why not?" Espio asked. "I thought that you two had become rather close after that mission with the train."

"I mean... yeah..." He'd never say it aloud, but him and Bunnie were among some of the first people that came to mind when he thought about who in the Freedom Fighters were his friends. Nicole was still dead-first. What could he say? Their accents grew on him and he genuinely enjoyed their company. "It's not that I don't like him or anything, it's just... it's kind of embarrassing asking him of all people for help, you know?"

Espio didn't look convinced with Sorun's answer at all. "I realize his personality can be a bit strange, but despite appearances he's an accomplished Freedom Fighter and an incredibly competent swordsman. He has the experience you're seeking. There should be no issue."

"Yeah, but I was hoping for advice on using Iaido style or something similar, but he uses that saber, so I don't even know if he-"

"Iaido, Sorun, really?" The chameleon shook his head with disgust. "It's such a uselessly flashy style with no practical-"

"Espio, I do not need your weird anti-weeb position on katanas right now. I need solutions," Sorun interrupted with an exasperated breath.

An embarrassed cough came from the chameleon as he rubbed at the back of his head. "Right. Of course," he said with a small nod. "Well, regardless of how you feel, I doubt there is anybody else you can turn to that would be of more help to you in this matter than Antoine."

A deep sigh escaped Sorun. "Yeah, you're right." He wasn't the teen's first choice- not by a long shot- but he was strapped for alternatives. And on the bright side if there was anybody, literally anybody in all of Knothole Sorun was comfortable talking with that knew a lot about swords, it was Antoine. How that conversation would go, though, Sorun hadn't a clue. But he knew it was going to be really uncomfortable for him.

Well, as usual, he didn't have that much of a choice it seemed. Because there was no way he was going to get caught with his pants down fighting robots without knowing how to swing the sword. He wasn't gonna risk dying or, even worse, someone getting hurt over something stupid like that. So he'd swallow his pride and go to the coyote for help. Even if he really didn't want to. Really, really didn't want to.

"Alright. I'll go to him later," Sorun said as he stood up off the couch. "I better get something out of this, though, because if I actually go through with this all for nothing I swear..."

"I'm sure it will turn out alright, Sorun," Espio assured him. "Just trust in his ability and try to pay attention."

"Yeah, that guy knows his stuff when it comes to swords," Vector added. "You don't gotta worry about a thing."

"Mm." Sorun nodded at both of them. "Thanks, guys. I gotta go. Seeya around." He gave them each parting waves, which they reciprocated with waves of their own, and stepped around the couch in a move to leave. He only made it a few steps when he noticed a red form approaching from one of the doors leading into one of the HQ's rooms. "Oh, hey, Knuckles," Sorun greeted with another wave.

Knuckles waved back at him. "Hey, Sorun! I heard you came back. You doing alright?"

"Yeah, fine. Thanks." Sorun began walking again and passed the echidna. "Great talkin' with ya."

The human teen had walked so briskly past Knuckles that he'd missed the echidna freeze completely in his steps. It was when Sorun passed him, the Yamato still clutched in his left hand. The sword had been close enough to Knuckles that it had almost touched him as Sorun walked past. And in those few moments he was close to the sword, Knuckles found himself freezing completely and his fur standing up on end from what he felt from that sword.

He watched as the human walked up the steps leading out of the HQ, and then, while taking a steadying breath, turned towards Espio and Vector. "Hey, guys, what... what was that sword Sorun was carrying back there?" he asked.

Vector shrugged. "He said it was his new power or somethin'. Why?"

"... No reason," Knuckles said as he glanced back at the stairs. "Thing just... kinda felt weird is all."

Epsio made a hum of agreement. "I'm not too surprised considering it was a katana."

"You really gotta get over this thing with katanas, Espio..." Vector muttered into his hand.

So as it went, Sorun needed a lot of time to mentally prepare himself and steel his nerves for what was was probably the biggest ask he would ever ask in his life. Not due to the gravity of said ask, because it really was something he doubted Antoine wouldn't agree to. If anything, he would probably be thrilled. He did go as far as to offer to help teach him about swords one time. Sorun wasn't worried about a refusal. No, Sorun just didn't know if he could emotionally handle such a thing. He would, of course, since necessity demanded it, but boy was he not looking forward to this.

Because of his hesitancy, the teen had been rather slow in preparing himself. In other words, he'd been stalling. A lot. Spent most of the day just relaxing and not doing much of anything productive after the morning's failed training session, actually. And all this stalling had taken him into the night just after sundown, and by then he practically needed to force himself to approach Antoine because, if he didn't do it now, he doubted he'd ever find the resolve needed to do it again. So after eating a quick meal and leaving Virgil with Sonic and his parents, he set out in search of the Mobian swordsman.

After asking around a little bit, he'd found the house-slash-hut that Antoine and Bunnie shared. It looked almost the same as the rest of the homes everybody lived in, but there was at least a mail slot on the front door with the last name of the owner printed on it. Sorun almost burst out in laughter when he saw the name etched on the slot.

"His last name is seriously D'Coolette? Pfft." This time Sorun did laugh, and then did his best to stifle it into his closed fist. "Tch-ha-ha... ahh, who am I kidding? It's better than my last name."

Calming down, Sorun approached the front door to the home, rose his hand up, and reached forwards to knock on the door. He stopped with his fist inches away from the door's surface, and then quickly pulled his hand back as second thoughts began to hit him.

"I seriously wanna do this? Yeah, there's no doubt Antoine can help me with this, but... ah, man, I'll never be able to live this down with myself accepting help from this goober." He grimaced, took in a deep breath, and put his balled fist back up towards the door. "Suck it up, Sorun, you need this. You don't even have any dignity left anyways, so what do you have to lose?"

Sucking in mouthful of air through his teeth, Sorun closed his eyes and, very steadily and evenly, knocked loudly on the door. He exhaled the breath he was holding knowing he was now at the point of no return, and tried to make his expression even as possible as he leaned on the door frame in front of the door.

"What do I even say to him?" Sorun silently wondered, breathing becoming a bit more rapid when he heard footsteps approach from the other side of the door. "Shit, I shoulda rehearsed this or something before coming here. Too late now." His nerves skyrocketed when the door's handle began turning. "Alright, man, calm down. What's the worse that can happen? We're good. We're fine. I'm just coming to ask a completely reasonable request."

The door opened, causing Sorun's body to freeze completely. The absolute first thing Sorun noticed was a lot of yellow and a bit of pink in his vision, and when he focused closer he saw it was just Bunnie. She looked just about as frozen as Sorun was, though it was less because of nervousness and more because of shock based on how her green eyes had gone so wide. They spent a good five seconds just staring at each others' faces before Sorun finally chose to speak up.

"... Hi," he shyly greeted. "Antoine in? I need to talk to him."

"Er... yeah..." She hesitantly answered, nodding her head just a small amount. "Did-did somethin' happen?"

Sorun shook his head just slightly. "No, no I just... need something from him. Specifically from him. I figured this was his house, so he'd... he'd probably be here." He nervously coughed to the side. "Could you please go get him for me?"

Bunnie slowly nodded. "Sho' thing. Wait here."

She darted off back into the house. Sorun stared off after her, and then quietly sighed as he waited for her return while his eyes traveled downwards. A few seconds later he heard a pair of footsteps approach, and then stop at the door's opening. He sighed again, and then looked up. Antoine was standing there, looking just about as bewildered as Bunnie was, who was closely standing behind him.

"Hey, Antoine," Sorun greeted in a stiff voice. "I need a favor."

"A... favor?" Antoine repeated in an unsure voice. "Can I be asking what eet iz?"

"Yeah, I, uh... I need... so there's this... umm..." Sorun clicked his teeth, and then clutched his left hand. The Yamato materialized in his grip, causing the two Mobians to flinch back in surprise. "So I have this magic sword," he began. "The problem... is that I don't know how to use a sword. You know how to use a sword." He slowly inhaled and looked into Antoine's eyes. "Can you please teach me how to use a sword?"

There, he'd said it. The relief he felt at finally having gotten it out was overshadowed by the anxiety of the coming reaction, however, and Sorun watched the coyote's features intently with bated breath for a reaction. There wasn't much of one on the Mobian's face at first. Just surprise at Sorun's request. Slowly, though, it started to morph into something else. His eyes began to grow wider, and to the detriment of Sorun's anxiety a large smile was rapidly etching itself onto his face. It was just as Sorun feared: he looked completely ecstatic at the request.

"I'm starting to regret every choice I've ever made."

"Oh! Why did you not say zo earlier!?" He was beyond ecstatic, actually. Antoine was practically jumping up and down on his feet at the mere prospect of teaching Sorun about swords, and it took all the human had in him to not turn around and walk away right there. "Of course I will help you with ze swordsmanship, mon ami!" He turned around and began speed walking into the house, though he still kept talking as if he expected Sorun to follow him. He didn't. "We cannot be having you go off to battle swinging zat thing around willy-nilly, non? I am already seeing now what what we can do in..."

The coyote's volume trailed off as he went deeper into the house. Both Sorun and Bunnie stared off after him, looks of mild amusement of both of their faces. They turned back to each other just as a cold gust of wind blew past the doorway into the house. Bunnie shivered a bit, pulling the short brown jacket over her pink top closer. "Ya mind comin' in and closin' the door, Sorun? It's a might bit cold outside."

"Is it? I didn't notice," Sorun said with a shrug as he entered through the doorway while closing the door behind him. "I saw the name on the mail slot. How's it feel swapping your last name out with Antoine's since you're both together?"

A small blush came to Bunnie's cheeks. "Ah, well, technically speakin' we're still jus' engaged. 'Til the actual marriage ah'm just Bunnie Rabbot."

"Oh, okay." A beat passed, after which Sorun did a double-take. "Wait, your last name's Rabbot?"

"Yup."

Sorun blinked, and then stared down at Bunnie's artificial arm and legs. "... That is a very unfortunate and coincidental last name for you to have."

"... Yup."

An awkward silence passed between the pair. "So, Bunnie. About a couple days ago-"

"Naw, I don't want to hear it. Don't even worry 'bout it," Bunnie said as she held up her palms to stop him. "Ya've been through 'nuff without me lecturin' ya."

Sorun looked back at her in surprise, and then gave her a thankful smile as he rubbed the back of his head. He'd never be able to express how grateful he was for these people being so understanding so he didn't have to have all these awkward, apology-ridden conversations. "Thanks, Bunnie," he mumbled out.

"Don't mention it. Ya farin' well?"

"Eh, surviving. For now, at least," he quietly muttered. "But boy, Antoine looked really happy, huh? I didn't think me asking for sword lessons would make him so excited."

"Aw, well, to tell ya the truth, Sorun, mah darlin' Antoine ain't the most... confident of people sometimes," Bunnie told him. "Ah think it's 'cause he's always been fightin' around people like Sonic with powers and whatnot or people like Tails n' Rotor with their brains almost his whole life. Ah mean, shoot, even ah got mah cybernetics, an' all he's got is his sword. Don't get me wrong, he's amazin' in his own right, but he needs a li'l reminder every now and then." She gestured to Sorun with her robotic limb. "Ya get what ah mean, right? No offense or nothin', but back when ya first came here you were, well..."

"Total dead weight?" Sorun finished for her with a flat face.

Bunnie winced. "Ah wasn't sayin'... ya just weren't all that much compared t' how ya are now, know what ah mean?"

"Yeah, I'm know. Just havin' a bit of fun," Sorun said with a grin, causing Bunnie to roll her eyes. "But you're not wrong. I was pretty useless back then." He let out a disbelieving chuckle as he held Yamato up. "Then the powers happened, and I think it's safe to say at this point I got a marginal amount of experience to work with. I can barely believe it myself sometimes."

"So yer new power's really another sword? Can I see it?" Bunnie asked. Sorun shrugged, and tossed the sword her way. She caught it with her robotic limb, looked down at it, and then made a "huh" sound as an unimpressed expression made its way onto her face. "'Fraid to say it don't look like much to me, Sugah," she admitted as she tossed the sword back to Sorun.

"Yeah, I'm getting that reaction a lot," he muttered as he caught the sword. "Antoine not being very confident, though?" He looked down the hall where the coyote had disappeared to. "I don't really see it," Sorun said. "Sure, the guy's kinda wimpy, but all of that disappears when it matters. Practically didn't even recognize him during that fight with robot Sonic."

"Mm, kinda like someone else I know," Bunnie said while giving Sorun a knowing look. His response to the look was to give her a confused glance, causing her to shake her head and look up at the ceiling. "Anyways, don't tell Antoine ah told ya this, but ah think he's a bit jealous ya got so strong so quick. Not to say he don't like ya," she assured Sorun as she looked back down at him, "he really likes ya a lot since ya both got so much in common-"

"I have absolutely nothing in common with him," Sorun interrupted with a shake of his head.

Bunnie chuckled again, much to Sorun's confusion once more. "It just makes him happy, you askin' fer his help with the sword trainin'. Makes him feel useful, so thanks fer that," she said with a grateful smile. "Just, er, try tah be a bit patient with him, alright? My darlin' 'Twain can be a bit... eccentric when it comes to the sword stuff."

The hairs on the back of Sorun's neck stood up straight when he heard Bunnie utter that word. "Me and the word 'eccentric' don't really have a good track history, Bunnie," he muttered in a low voice. "How 'eccentric' are we talking here?"

She waved her hands in a dismissal manner. "Oh, nothin' ya can't manage, Sugah. If ya can survive a bout with a buncha Badniks then ya can survive an afternoon trainin' with Antoine. Ya got through a whole day trainin' with all of us, didn't ya?"

"Pfft. Barely," Sorun begrudgingly agreed. "But I'll put up with him. Just 'cause you asked nicely."

"That's all ah'm askin'."

The sound of footsteps began to approach them, causing them to turn their heads towards the source. Antoine had gone back to the pair, approaching with his sheathed saber clutched in one hand. His eyes were practically shining with excitement when he stopped in front of Sorun.

Sorun glanced down at the sword, and then back up at Antoine. "Uh-

"Zo, what should we be starting with first?" he asked, still happily grinning. "I am thinking on seeing how your footwork is being before we-"

"Whoa, dude, slow down," Sorun told him as he backed up a step. "It's, like, eight at night right now. I kinda wanted to do this tomorrow."

"... Oh, right." Shyly, Antoine moved the saber behind his back as he rubbed the back of his neck while avoiding Sorun's gaze. "Of course, how silly of moi. For sure we will be doing zis tomorrow. Ze afternoon will be a better time for us, non?"

"Noon?" Sorun thought the time over in his head for a bit, and then gave the coyote a nod. "Yeah, that works. Sure. Noon."

The wide grin returned to Antoine's face. "Fantastique! It's decided, zen!" He made a move to turn around, but then stopped and refocused on Sorun. "Oh, and Sorun, me and Bunnie were just getting finished weeth dinner. Zere was zome leftovers if you were wanting to-"

"Nah, thanks, but I already ate," Sorun declined, giving Antoine a polite yet forced smile as he backed up towards the door.

"It's carrot cake," Antoine said, and from the side Bunnie started giving Antoine a pointed glare. This did not go unnoticed by Antoine, whose smile began to grow nervous as he sent Sorun a pleading look. "We 'ave more zan enough for ze two of us. I insist."

The glare Bunnie was sending him intensified. "Ya seem awful eager to be gettin' rid of all that carrot cake I very painstakingly made fer dessert, darlin' ."

Antoine's irises shrunk down a slight a mount. "N-non, non, I am not ze one to be belittling your culinary skills, mon amour. I am quite happy you have been taking after me in ze cooking arts even if you are very... limited in dishes outside of those including carrots." He was practically sweating at this point from Bunnie's intense stare, causing the pleading look he was giving Sorun to turn frantic. "I am only wishing to offer a sharing of your work weeth our very good friend Sorun." His teeth began chattering when he saw the teen grip the front door's handle. "Will you be taking zome home, Sorun?"

The pale human looked at Antoine, glanced at Bunnie and her intensely narrowed eyes, and shook his head. "Maybe some other time," he said as he opened the door.

"A-are you sure?"

"Super sure." As quick as he could, Sorun slipped out of the front door while closing it behind him. Not even five seconds later he heard loud arguing going on inside of the home he'd just exited. A majority of it, he realized with a grimace, had a Southern accent to it. "Poor bastard," he thought as he peeled himself off of the door. "Well, that went well. Noon tomorrow, huh? Yeah, I can work with that."

That was the hard part done. Now all he had to do was actually show up and commit to the training, and he didn't see that being harder than mustering up the courage to walk up and ask for the help to begin with. "Eccentric", a word that still haunted Sorun's dreams, aside, Antoine was one of the nicest people he knew. He was sure it was going to go great.

The next day

"I'm gonna smother this fucking coyote in his sleep."

One new fact Sorun learned about Antoine: he was apparently the most overbearing teacher in existence. It was such a shock to him, too; the Mobians personality took a complete turnaround as soon as the sword lessons started in the backyard of Antoine's home.

Of the hour Sorun had been learning from Antoine, he'd enjoyed only around the first five minutes. The other fifty-five were insufferable. He was one more minute away from jamming Yamato down Antoine's throat.

"Non, non, non!" Antoine cried out, reaching forwards to adjust Sorun's stance. A stance the human was fairly confident was not a stance associated with katanas. "Your arm is out too far, and-"

"Antoine, for the last time, this is not how you hold a katana ...!" Sorun hissed through grit teeth. The pose he was holding currently had his feet out wide, his left arm splayed out to the side- Antoine wouldn't let him hold the sheath, either, which Sorun took great objection to- and had his right arm, holding Yamato, pointed outwards with his arm outstretched.

He looked ridiculous. Worse, this wasn't how one held a katana. A saber, maybe, but not a katana. The issue was that, while Antoine was practically an expert with the saber, he knew shit-all about katanas. Didn't stop him from trying to treat Yamato like a saber, though.

"Sorun, I am telling you, just because your sword is not exactedly shaped like le sabre-"

"No, Antoine, listen to me." Sorun dropped the stance and turned towards the coyote, breathing outwards to try and steady himself. "They are two completely different-" He paused. "Say 'saber' again."

"Sabre."

Sorun cocked and eyebrow and tilted his head to the side. "Y-you're putting this weird inflection in at the end-" He shook his head. "Look, a katana isn't the same as a saber, alright?" He held the Yamato up for Antoine to see. "This style you're trying to teach me? This fencing style? It's not gonna work for it."

It was some kind of fencing style Antoine was trying to impart on him, he could see that much. A lot of one-handed swishing and parrying. Light, short swings that just didn't feel good to perform with the Yamato due to its design. Antoine had even gone as far as to have Sorun try to attempt to copy his own movements with his saber.

He understood perfectly and was grateful for Antoine trying to help. But this wasn't the help he needed. And Sorun was beginning to have trouble containing his impatience with the coyote.

"I am failing to understand what eez so difficult about zis, Sorun," Antoine told him as he sheathed his own saber. "If a kanana-"

"Katana," Sorun corrected.

"Ka-ta-na, oui. I am sorry, Sorun, but I 'ave nevair even seen zis type of sword before in my life," Antoine said. "What style iz it suppos-ed to be if not one similar to mine?"

"It's... lemme try showin' ya." Sorun sheathed the Yamato and bent down a bit. "I got a rough idea of what this is supposed to look like, but just that: what it looks like . Performing it is evidently a way different thing." He wrapped his right fingers over the sword's handle. "Truth is there's a lot of styles that go with katanas, but the one I know that I'm trying to emulate involves basically quickly drawing the sword from the sheath, making big, quick slashes, and then putting it back in the sheath."

Realistically he couldn't pull the moves he wanted to pull off, Vergil's moves, with any real effect, but he could do them extremely slowly as a demonstration. He slowly drew the blade and, even more slowly, slashed it outwards in front of him in a wide arc. He slowly swung more and more, just briefly making the sheath disappear with some swings so he could grip the handle with two hands for more powerful, demonstrated swings, only to have the sheath reappear so he could slip the sword back inside of it.

These swings were the ones that felt right to Sorun. Like they fit naturally with the sword, even if he couldn't perform them on a level that was actually usable for combat. None of that fencing that Antoine had tried to impart on him. That style, Antoine's style, focused on dueling an enemy fairly. On a endless series of blocks and parries and quick footwork. Taking time to examine and study the opponent for possible openings. Something that respected the opponent to give them a fair fight.

The style Sorun was trying and failing to emulate, the style Vergil had used, Dark Slayer style, was the exact opposite. It wasn't about respecting the opponent. It was tailored towards cutting the opponent down with overwhelming power, speed, and precision. It was designed around ruthless efficiency as to defeat the enemy as quickly as possible.

But, Sorun didn't blame Antoine in trying to teach Sorun his own style. He could understand the coyote not knowing much outside his preferred weapon, but beyond that, there was something... inherently Mobian about how honest and respectful that style he used was. And Sorun himself could respect that, but he wasn't in the game for honesty and fairness. He was in it to win.

It was a rather... un-Mobian-like method, he would admit. More human-like. Sorun couldn't care less, and if anything he preferred the human way if it meant getting him closer to killing Eggman before he died from the Emeralds.

After sheathing the sword, Sorun turned back towards Antoine. The other male had been giving Sorun's sword swings a critical look the entire time, scrutinizing the movements with focused eyes. At the end he had sighed helplessly while shrugging his shoulders. "I am admitting zat I am, how you say... unfamiliar with zis style you are trying," Antoine told him. "If I am being truthful weeth you, Sorun, I myself learn-ed very little on swordsmanship in a formal manner. When I was but a young tyke my fathair had taught me az much az he could, but weeth me being separated from him because of Robotneek and joining ze Freedom Fighters, my skills left... very much to be desired."

"I mean, you were still a kid, right?" Sorun asked as he slung Yamato over his neck. "You couldn't have had much by then besides the basics."

"Oui. Ze basics were about all I had. Over time I had merely... refined what little my fathair had taught me through fighting Robotneek's Badniks over ze years and years of fighting." Antoine gave Sorun an apologetic look. "I am sorry if I am not ze good teacher, Sorun. I 'ave nevair done zis type of thing before, zo I had tried doing what my fathair had done for me. But you are right. Your kitty-na-" Sorun's hands shook at his pronunciation in barely-subdued rage, "- eez not a sabre. And eet iz very clear ze style you are demonstrating to me eez not one I can help you with."

Sorun eyed Antoine for a few seconds, and then let out an understanding sigh. "Yeah, I know," he agreed with a small nod. "I'm not blaming you for trying. I... seriously appreciate you taking the time to help me out with this," he said, causing Antoine's features to brighten up a bit, "but there's a very specific style I want to use with Yamato, and your techniques just don't mesh with it. You have any recommendations on what I should do?"

Antoine hummed in contemplation. "You zeem to already know zis style of yours at least somewhat. Be believing it or not, but back zen, I was in ze same place you are in," he said. "I would say you will have to do ze same thing I did. Do not worry about styles or stances- just get to knowing ze basics. After zat? Practice on your own a little. Fight zome Badniks az best you can and slowly grow your style from zat. And if nothing else, well..." he chuckled a bit, "Badniks often do not use a sword. Zometimes just swinging ze sword to cut ze robot in half eez good enough."

He got him there, and he wasn't going to argue with the "keep it simple, keep it stupid" philosophy he so enjoyed. Styles on their own didn't really mean all that much when "just cut it" was also a viable option. That was, in essence, a glorified summation of the Dark Slayer style Sorun was trying to copy: just cut it- the style.

Antoine had a point, though. Sorun couldn't learn Dark Slayer from anybody, as, technically speaking, he himself was the premier expert on the style on all of Mobius. And even if he couldn't physically perform the moves due to them being physically impossible for his body to perform them, he still knew them. He could make his own bastardized variation using normal, human strength and speed. And it wasn't like he didn't know how to grab and swing a sword period. And considering Yamato's abilities, it didn't really matter how on-point his sword skills were as long as he actually connected with the blade. That was the essence of Dark Slayer: overwhelming offense using Yamato and its abilities. He just needed to hit and he was good from there.

Well, Sorun could roughly do that much at least. It was just like Antoine said: he needed practice. Real-world experience fighting Badniks so he could grow his own style derived from Dark Slayer. Or at the very least just get good at swinging the thing in a decent fashion. Again, it didn't matter how bad it looked as long as Sorun was efficient with the thing and struck true with the sword against anything he was fighting. But he still needed help with the very crucial thing needed to make the dream come true. He needed help with the basics.

Good thing Antoine knew that much.

"Alright, well, can you at least help me learn the standard, universal stuff so I can go on from there on my own?" he asked Antoine. "You know a lot about that stuff and I really need it. Help me out?"

At the request, Antoine's face broke out in a large smile. "I would be more than proud to help you with zat much, mon ami."

From there, the lessons proceeded much more smoothly and tolerable, and unlike previously, Sorun found himself listening intently on Antoine's advice to the point that he somewhat enjoyed the experience. As expected, it was about as basic as basic could be. Instruction on how Sorun should properly plant his feet on the ground and evenly disperse his weight, keeping low with his legs slightly bent, being aware of his center of gravity, that sort of thing. Things that, over time, Sorun probably could have inferred on his own, but he was happy Antoine was teaching him it now so he could get a head start with the more advanced stuff on his own later on. The sooner he got that out of the way so he could jump onto developing his style so he could grow competent with using Yamato, the better.

Eventually, when Antoine deemed Sorun had a solid enough grasp on the basics, he offered to go as far as to have a sword fight with the human. Nothing too serious, just a little sparring match, but Sorun had readily accepted anyways if only to get in as much practice with the katana as possible before facing life-or-death circumstances with it.

What had he learned? A couple things. One was that, quite understandably, Sorun wasn't too good. Seeing as he was a beginner it made sense, but it really shined when he fought with Antoine. The other thing he learned, though, was that Antoine was scary good with his saber.

Five times. That was the number of times Sorun had been tossed onto the ground, only for the point of Antoine's sword to be pointed at his throat before he could get up, which would end that round in Antoine's favor. Five out of five times Antoine had won, with the longest match probably going on for, Sorun guessed, around twenty seconds. Between both Antoine's freakish Mobian strength and his overwhelming skill with the sword that eclipsed Sorun's own, the human frankly never stood a chance. He wasn't too upset over it; he was growing, after all. Painfully slowly, but the growth was there. He could feel it. The way Yamato's handle felt more and more comfortable in his hand the longer he went. The way he was stringing his swings together faster and responding more quickly with swings that were increasing in speed and accuracy.

They were all minor, incremental increases that barely amounted to anything, and Antoine still dominated him like nothing every single time, but progress was progress. Sorun would take it.

With a loud grunt, Sorun was sent sprawling onto his back yet again as Yamato skidded away from him. When he opened his eyes, Antoine's saber was, once again, pointed right at his throat. A large, teasing grin had settled its way onto the coyote's face. The guy was actually having fun with this, much to Sorun's bemused chagrin. "Zat eez ze score being left as six to zero, non? Are you ready to be giving up yet?"

"Yeah, dude, I gave up a while ago." He made it longer this time, though- thirty seconds, roughly. The increase was minimal, but tangible. He was getting better. "There isn't some kind of hidden Mobian decree that says I'm your slave for life or whatever now for admitting you beat me in a sword fight, is there? I'll go for it if there is, but I want weekends off."

"Ah-ha. Maybe zere iz. You would not know, would you?" Antoine said with a smirk, sheathing his saber while bending down to help Sorun to his feet. "Ze house could use a good cleaning from time to time, I admit. All of zat dust, mon dieu, no matter how much I clean it always comes back..."

"Sounds awful," Sorun dryly stated, taking the offered hand and grunting again when he was pulled up to his feet. "I'm not wearing a maid outfit to fulfill any weird fantasies you have, though. You got Bunnie for that."

Very clearly, and much to Sorun's delight, Antoine became flustered at the human's words. "Zat-zat iz not... I zink zat perhaps we should be getting back on track, n-non?"

"Ha-ha. Gottem," Sorun thought with a mischievous grin, feeling immense enjoyment at Antoine's expense. Satisfied with the outcome, Sorun clenched his left hand and caused the Yamato to vanish from the ground and reappear in his grip. "Anyways, thanks for helping me out with this," Sorun said as he turned back to Antoine. "I think I'll be fine on my own from here."

"Ahh, eet iz no problem at all, mon ami. I am happy to help," Antoine told him with a nod. "If I were to be giving you advice, perhaps, maybe, focus a bit more on ze blocking? You are tending to dodge more zan block."

"Why would I block the damage when I can just avoid it entirely? Besides, blocking with Yamato's kinda useless since everything's stronger than me already. Plus, uh... its ability kinda negates the need to block as it is." He opened his left hand and let the Yamato disappear. "But that's not really important," the teen said as he looked up at the sun, its position suggesting a few hours past noon. "Anyways, Antoine, I gotta go. Promised to talk to Shadow about something important, and there's some more experimentation I gotta do with my powers." Sorun pointed at Antoine. "I'll catch ya later, though. Been fun."

"Oui, Sorun, of course. Ze pleasure was mine." Antoine waved the human off as he began to retreat away from his backyard. "Feel free to be dropping by anytime to visit! We could even be practicing with ze swords again if you so want!"

"Sure, man." Sorun turned his back to Antoine, giving him a wave back as he began walking away. "I might do that."

A deep, contemplative hum slowly left the teen's throat as he looked at the pile of crates in front of him, all cut to pieces. Shadow had taken his advice on calling this conversation they'd planned "training", so he'd wanted to have it in Shadow's usual haunt: the field of wooden crates he and sometimes Sorun used for training. However, Shadow wasn't scheduled to be here yet, so Sorun had been using some of the extra time to train with the Yamato. Not with holding and swinging it, but with its abilities. He'd decided to bring Virgil along just for the company meanwhile, the small Chao having clapped happily whenever Sorun had cut apart a box.

Through his experimentation, he'd come to a few conclusions. The thing about this Yamato was that, as he expected, it wasn't the exact same sword from the games it had originated from. It wasn't a Devil Sword carved from one-third of the Legendary Dark Knight Sparda's soul. It wasn't the key to sealing and unsealing portals to the demonic realm, though Sorun had yet to rule out if portals of any kind were a possibility or not for his Yamato's capabilities. This wasn't the same exact sword used by Vergil. No, that was impossible. Because that sword was pure fiction.

This sword he had, this Yamato, was a facsimile of the true Yamato. A true copy, but at the same time not a true copy as a majority of the games' Yamato's abilities were often... left to interpretation, due to on one hand the story clearly defining Yamato's limits while on the other hand the sword performing differently gameplay-wise for gameplay's sake. Making a copy from a non-tangential item with sometimes nebulous limits just wasn't possible.

But nothing was impossible for Chaos Emeralds and Chaos energy, apparently. So the workaround was the same for when they had copied the Summoned Swords and Bringer Claws abilities- they'd taken what knowledge he did have and made it reality in the form of the powers. "Power shaped by the heart", in Aurora's words. The Yamato was the same. It looked like the true Yamato, but as for its abilities? They went as far as Sorun knew about the true Yamato's powers which, to be fair, was about as well as possible seeing as he was an expert on the lore of those games as well as an expert in actually playing them. And despite the story of 'Devil May Cry' being a bit wishy-washy about Yamato's abilities here and there, a majority of them were clearly defined enough for the teen to have a solid understanding of the sword and its powers. So when the Chaos Emerald had created the sword and used his knowledge, it seemed to have automatically given abilities based on what Sorun thought it had, which, while extremely close to the original's abilities, differed in that the Chaos Emerald was rather loose with Sorun's own personal interpretation of the true Yamato's abilities.

So what did all of that boil down to in the end with Sorun's Yamato? It meant that it only had one ability.

Separate. Everything.

The kicker was the "everything" bit. The games' Yamato hosted a wide array of abilities, mainly cutting through everything (unless it didn't because of plot or gameplay reasons made by the games), opening and closing portals, cutting space itself, cutting apart vague concepts such as cutting "man from devil" if the fifth game was to be trusted, and "unlocking true potential" if the fourth was to be trusted. He honestly didn't know why that last one was even possible, but again, the details of the games' Yamato's powers were vague in that regard due to the story not being the series' largest focus.

Sorun's, he assumed, had the same abilities, but the problem was that one Emerald could only grant one power. That was the established rule. Yamato, however, had multiple abilities even though it was technically only one "power". The Emerald's solution was to file all of these abilities under the main ability for the Yamato to "separate". Because of this, the limits of what Yamato could and couldn't separate ended at the word "separation". There was no defining limit for Yamato's power of separation, which meant quite literally anything could be separated by Yamato. Absolutely anything.

The implications for this were staggering to Sorun. If his Yamato truly differed in that, unlike the games' Yamato, this Chaos-created Yamato truly had no limit to what it could separate, then this went beyond just granting him all of the games' Yamato's abilities. To what extent, though, he hadn't a clue. Because try as he might, he just couldn't figure out how the damned thing worked.

"Am I wrong?" Sorun thought to himself as he ran his hand along the katana's handle. His thumb briefly hovered over a spot on the hilt where there was a small relief of a golden dragon attached to the blue hilt, nearly completely concealed by the white wrappings. "Maybe separating anything by touching it is all it can do, because that's as far as I've gotten. I can't figure out how to do the long- distance Judgement Cuts Vergil could do. I can't make portals with it. Am I just doing it wrong? Absolute separation means it can separate anything, but what does that mean?

"But... no, that can't be right. It HAS to be able to do Judgement Cuts and open portals and all that stuff, right? It's the Yamato. It has to have its abilities- all the other powers were the same as the games' powers. I know it does. I can feel it." The only reason he even knew of Yamato's ability of absolute separation was because he just instinctively knew, as was the same with his other powers. That same feeling, like a wordless, incomprehensible whisper in the back of his mind, told him that, yes, Yamato could perform its other abilities due to its absolute separation. But at this point Sorun didn't know if that was just him lying to himself or if it was true, but he couldn't figure it out. Because if they were possible, they weren't the main function of Yamato. That was its separation. Everything else was a secondary derivative of its primary function, which, unlike the primary functions of his powers, weren't as clear for him to comprehend.

In short: the Yamato could separate anything. Through absolute separation, it may also be able to perform the abilities of the original it was based off of. Sorun wasn't sure if it could, and if it truly was capable of performing those secondary functions, he didn't know how to use them.

"Well... then again, 'absolute' might be giving it too much credit." Sorun held up the Yamato, and then deeply sighed when he looked at his left shoulder. It was covered by his shirt now, but the small puncture mark on his shoulder still remained. It at least had stopped bleeding by now. "It couldn't cut the Emeralds out of me, after all."

Of course when he'd learned of Yamato's absolute separation the first thing he'd tried to do was stab the sword into himself to see if the Yamato could separate the Emeralds from his body. It didn't work. He'd felt the Yamato try, though. Felt its power of separation run through him as it tried to obey his will. The Emeralds wouldn't budge, though. It's why he was doubting that, despite Yamato's ability to separate, it could perform long-distance cuts like Vergil had done or open portals or anything like that. But they were established powers made possible through separation, and until he saw definitive proof that said otherwise, Sorun would keep attempting to perform these techniques.

It also reaffirmed Sorun's belief that the Chaos Emeralds were permanently stuck inside of him. Because if Yamato couldn't remove them, then nothing could.

"I dunno, Virgil," Sorun finally muttered out as he lowered the sword. "Thing's complicated. I don't do complicated too well."

"Chao."

"Mm." He had no idea what that meant, but he still gave the Chao an appreciative pat.

His ears perked up when he heard a single set of footsteps stepping on the soft ground and approaching him. He turned his head towards the source, his expression remaining neutral for the most part when he saw it was Shadow. It was around time for him to show up, Sorun supposed.

"Greetings." The dark hedgehog's eyes shifted from the human sitting on a crate to the pile of cut crates in front of him. "May I ask what the meaning of all these sliced apart crates is?"

"Testing out the Yamato's powers," Sorun answered as he held the katana up for Shadow to see. "I've been having some struggles with it."

"Struggles?" Shadow echoed as he walked closer to Sorun. He stopped just next to Sorun, eyeing the sword in his grasp with curiosity. Curiosity and, Sorun noted with little interest, apprehension. "I don't doubt the sword has some ability tied to it outside of it being a stabbing implement, but forgive me for not seeing what it is." His eyes shifted up to Sorun. "What exactly is your Yamato supposed to do?"

Sorun didn't answer him. Instead, he wordlessly reached down to pick up a rock that had been resting next to him with one hand. He held Yamato out from his body, edge of the blade facing upwards, and Shadow's eyes widened in some interest when he could barely see and feel faint wisps of blue, ethereal energy waft over the length of the sword's blade. Sorun held the rock over the blade, and then dropped it.

The rock had fallen cleanly through the blade. There was no moment where it was stopped by the sword, nor where it even lost momentum once making contact. The rock was simply and cleanly sliced right through the middle merely by falling on the katana's edge, the two halves dropping to either side of the blade.

"That's what it does," Sorun answered a bewildered Shadow as he put the sword back in its sheath. "It separates everything."

Shadow blinked down at the rock, and then refocused on Sorun. "Everything?" he repeated, some disbelief in his voice. "Define 'everything' for me."

Sorun shrugged. "Doesn't really have a definition. It is what it is: the Yamato can separate everything. Matter, energy, space, time, dimensions... maybe concepts? Not sure."

The striped Mobian followed along with Sorun's explanation, his frame growing more and more tense the further he went and ending with him looking at the sword with narrowed eyes. "If this sword originated from anything other than a Chaos Emerald, I'd call you mad. But I know better than most the potential of those gems." He looked into Sorun's eyes, and much to the human's surprise Shadow looked extremely serious. "Listen to me very closely, human," he said in a low voice. "If that sword does indeed possess that ability, then I strongly recommend you refrain from carelessly cutting apart the fabric of space-time with it. There can be certain consequences for such a thing. I know firsthand how destructive the power of even a single Chaos Emerald is."

Sorun listened with a half-interested expression, and then lazily waved his hand. "Relax, Shadow. I'm not about to go cut apart the fabric of reality with Yamato. I don't even know if it can do that," he said, causing Shadow's form to relax somewhat. "So far all I can do is slice objects apart with the blade if I run Chaos energy through it. It's supposed to be able to do stuff like cut at long distances and open portals and... something about helping unlock true potential? Which I guess this sword interprets as separating the user from their personal limits if that's something it can do? It's not really clear."

"'It's not really'- where are you basing this information off of?" Shadow asked him, shaking his head at Sorun's explanation. "Time and time again you've displayed an unnerving amount of intuitive insight into your abilities. I had previously assumed you were just naturally inclined towards these abilities, but I'm beginning to question this assumption." He gestured towards the sheathed Yamato as Sorun impassively watched on. "You named the sword 'Yamato' the second you saw it. You reacted towards it with familiarity. Now you're claiming it has abilities you think it has but can't demonstrate."

"That actually does sound really suspicious when you put it like that," Sorun agreed in an even voice, his lack of a reaction to Shadow's deduction seemingly making the hedgehog more annoyed.

Shadow's eyes had narrowed considerably at the human's indifferent reaction. "Then perhaps you could confirm for me if my suspicions are correct?"

"They suuuure are, Shadow." The Mobian looked about ready to shout now, but before he could Sorun lifted up a finger to stop him. "Listen, Shadow, I'm gonna tell you what the true deal with my powers is. The big skinny. And I am only going to tell you." He turned his body so that he was sitting while facing a standing Shadow now.

"I only wanna tell you because you're one of the only guys here I completely trust. So don't tell anyone else, okay?"

The statement from Sorun proved to be surprising enough that Shadow went completely still. His mouth even dropped open a bit, and Sorun saw the sharp fangs of his teeth poke slightly past his lips. He wanted to continue talking, but he found the sight of a stupefied Shadow so funny that he held his tongue and kept silently staring at him in great amusement.

Unfortunately, Shadow decided to end Sorun's fun by shaking the surprise out from his features before refocusing back on Sorun, eyes still wide. "Why would you choose to confide this with me and nobody else?" he asked him, his tone genuinely confused. "You've grown a friendlier repertoire with literally everybody else. Why place so much trust in me?"

"Why indeed, my man?" He'd decided a while ago he needed to tell somebody this. Partly to get a secret off his chest and partly so somebody could maybe help him in some way with them. Shadow was an expert on this Chaos nonsense, so he was the greatest candidate he could think of. But even all of that wouldn't be enough if he didn't trust Shadow. Fortunately enough he did, though he decided to explain why at Shadow's confusion. "Well... you told me you didn't vote to bring me here using the coordinates on the tablet. That you were the only one. That's all," he answered with a shrug. "Out of all the Freedom Fighters, you were the only one that didn't have a part in ruining my life."

"And you are honestly telling me that's enough to earn your trust?" Shadow breathed out in disbelief.

"Don't get me wrong, everybody else is great, but... that's still there for me," Sorun muttered. "It's really screwed up considering our relationship, but you're the only person in the Freedom Fighters I can completely tolerate without thinking of that." He paused. "Well, you and Nicole," he corrected himself.

"I understand me, but why does Nicole get special privileges?"

Sorun grinned and turned his head to the side. "She's my gamer pal, man. I gotta make an exception for my gamer pal." He looked back to Shadow. "I know I told Sonic I wasn't ready to be friends with everybody because I'm not totally over it yet, but I'm willing to make exceptions. You and Nicole are exceptions," he said. "But I know if I did something like ask you to be my friend you'd go and pull a me and say 'let's just keep it professional for the sake of the mission' or something like that, so can I just please ask you to keep all this to yourself?" He leaned back on the crate he was sitting on and waved his arm in a random direction. "If you wanted to we could go so far as to call it a quid pro quo arrangement. If you ever wanted to talk to me about something without it getting out to anybody else, I'd be willing to."

Shadow just continued to stare silently at Sorun. He blinked, and then scoffed while crossing his arms. "Why not bug Nicole with this since you value her as a friend?"

"I don't really wanna weigh her down with all this heavy stuff."

"You have absolutely no guarantee I won't tell the others what you trusted to confide in me," he said.

The teen scoffed. "Dude, c'mon. You're not gonna betray my trust just to screw with me. We both know it'd just be a waste of time for you with no gain, and you have better things to do than that," Sorun said with a roll of his eyes.

"And you suddenly know me so well?"

"Believe it or not, but I actually do pay attention to people. I just pretend not to." The human teen propped his arm up and rested his head against his closed fist. "You never have to talk to me about private stuff if you don't want to. Option's just on the table. I'm only asking you keep what I'm about to tell you to yourself this one time. Fair enough?"

The hedgehog turned his head to the side, closing his eyes as he silently mulled over Sorun's words. He was worried based on the hedgehog's initial reaction he'd refuse, and began wondering what he would do in response. But eventually, Shadow deeply sighed, nodded his head, and turned back to Sorun while opening his crimson eyes. "Alright, human," he said. "I'll keep whatever is said between us private. Just don't ever expect me to actually approach you with such matters."

"Sure," Sorun said with a nod. "The powers I get aren't random. I stole them all from a video game."

Complete and utter silence followed the confession. Sorun expectantly looked towards Shadow, who looked down slightly to process the information he had just received. His face went through a range of emotions from disbelief to exhaustion, and eventually he settled on plain confusion as he looked back up at Sorun. "Excuse me?"

"Yeah, none of it's original," the pale teen elaborated. "The Summoned Swords. The Bringer Claws. Yamato. Not even any of the Summoned Swords formations I use are original. The Spiral Swords and Blistering Swords and all that. I stole literally all of it from a series of video games." He straightened his head up and crossed one leg over the other. "It's the truth. I'm nothin' but a filthy ganker through and through."

"... 'Gank'..?"

"It means 'steal'," Sorun explained. "... That seriously your reaction to this?"

Shadow roughly shook his head. "No, I just- you- Sorun, why ?" He didn't sound completely outraged, though there was a hint of it there. He actually just sounded more lost than anything else. "You can't actually be serious. Why in the name of anything you hold dear would you choose powers-"

"Whoa, hold up. I didn't choose jack," Sorun said while raising a hand up to stop Shadow mid-sentence. "I wasn't lying when I said all my powers are chosen subconsciously. You really think if I had a choice I'd choose these powers? If I actually had a choice I would have just asked for a Death Note so I could kill Robotnik and Snively in a minute flat since apparently item summoning is in the list of possible powers," he said as he shook Yamato. "It is subconscious. My subconscious just... decided to nick all the powers out from a video game series called 'Devil May Cry'."

"And what was the significance of this particular video game to you?" Shadow asked, his demeanor calming down significantly and eyes growing to be more curious than anything else.

Sorun breathed out a large breath, looking up in thought. "Where to even begin with that?" he wondered aloud. "Video games were my life, Shadow. I didn't have much else to do. They were my escape from it all. I had fun playing them. 'Devil May Cry' was special to me for a lot of reasons. The first game in the series was the first video game I ever played. My mom bought it for me as a birthday present 'cause, you know, cool guy in a red coat on the cover, ha ha." He trailed off in his laughs, and looked to the side. "No matter how many video games I beat, I always came back to that series. I liked the story. I liked the characters. I liked the challenge the games gave me, because as I got older and played more and more games they just all became too easy for me and I started to blow through them all like nothing. It was fun, for sure I had a blast playing them all, but I was going through them all way too fast for the enjoyment to last past the stories they provided.

"But the 'Devil May Cry' series was a real test of skill by design." Sorun leaned forwards and focused in on Shadow. "I mastered those games, Shadow. All of them. Beat all the missions with S-ranks on all the highest difficulties and everything. Did deathless runs, hitless runs, there was even a difficulty where your player character got one-shotted while all the enemies and bosses were juiced up on the highest difficulty parameters. I beat all of them with S-ranks, the highest possible score. Doing this required in-depth knowledge of every single mechanic that game offered, of knowing perfectly every single enemy's attack animation and their hitboxes, having absolute frame-perfect timing in every single move you made..." Sorun ran out of breath, and sucked in a huge gulp of air before continuing. "I never in my life encountered a challenge as good as mastering the 'Devil May Cry' series. Helped that the music was amazing and that the story and characters were really likable.

"As for the powers..." Sorun lifted up Yamato. "With the exception of the Bringer Claws, all of the powers came from one specific character: Vergil. Bringer Claws came from his son Nero, dunno why I got those."

Shadow, who had been listening intently to Sorun's explanation while nodding along to it, paused. "Vergil?" he repeated. "Isn't that the name you gave your Chao?"

"Huh?" Sorun glanced back at Virgil, who waved happily at him. "Nah, man, this is Virgil spelled with an 'i'. The one I'm talking about is Vergil spelled with an 'e'," he said as he turned back to Shadow. "Completely different names."

"... Okay," Shadow conceded, not sounding entirely convinced. "What was so special about this Vergil character?"

"Vergil was a complicated guy. Had a real angsty personality that resulted in a endless lust for power that only really ended when he got some outside perspective on his choices and after his son suplexed some sense into him," Sorun began. "I liked him the best, however, because of two things. One was the color. I like blue, sue me," he said with a shrug. "More importantly, though, was his moveset." A low laugh left Sorun as he shook his head. "Shadow, Vergil was busted . He was only playable in Three and Four, and I had to get a mod trainer to play him in Five, but man in all of those games he absolutely slayed. He did insane damage with his attacks, his power kit meshed well with his combos, he couldn't even be touched if you played him right..." He trailed off when a wave of happy nostalgia hit him, though he quickly brushed it off for Shadow's sake. "Point is, out of all the characters in the games I played, Vergil was the easiest one to get all those high-level S-ranks with just because he was the strongest if you played him right. OP to the max. So I studied him hard. Harder than the rest of the characters. All his moves and animations, all his powers, all the high-level advanced combo tech you could perform with him, and every single aspect there was to learn about playing Vergil. So if you wanna know why I'm so good with something like the Summoned Swords, that's why." He held up a finger and manifested a spinning Summoned Sword to float over it. "I've technically used and mastered these powers before in the past. It was just on the other side of a screen. I've seen how they perform and how they can be used. I just... applied it to real life, you could say." The sword shattered as the teen put his hand back into a resting position on his thigh. "I've been trying to use Vergil as a benchmark to kinda try and guess what powers I'll get from the other Emeralds since they all seem to revolve around him. Well, except the Bringer Claws, but two out of three is still pretty telling. Might get stuff from his twin brother, too, but they had almost all the same abilities anyways, so... yeah, I don't know."

"That... makes sense, I suppose," Shadow hesitantly agreed. "Sorun, try and help me understand how a mere video game could possibly have this much depth to it. I've experienced them for myself, and I'm struggling to comprehend how you could have attained so much from a collection of moving pixels on a screen."

"It was multiple games, Shadow. Weren't ya listening?"

"Sorun."

"Alright, alright." The teen let out a single chuckle at the Mobian's irritated tone. "Video games in my zone were a lot more advanced than the ones I've seen here. Byproduct of the world's cultural progress getting reset by aliens and then stagnated by a crazy egg guy I guess. Just trust me here."

Breathing in a heavy inhale, Shadow slowly nodded his head. "I'm attempting my best here," he told the human. "So... you unwillingly copied this character's abilities because of a subconscious mental bias towards his power which, from what I'm getting at listening to your words, you deeply respected. I suppose, seeing the trend in your abilities thus far, inferring back to this character to try and predict future abilities to prepare beforehand would be a reasonable course of action." He hummed, and then began rubbing at his chin. "What other abilities did he have?"

Sorun hummed, and then looked down to begin counting off his fingers. "Ah, man, him and his brother had quite a few. Enhanced physical abilities, regeneration- insane regeneration, guy got cut in half and regenerated completely before the sword left the other side of his body-, teleporting, though in the games they referred to it as Tricking, his brother Dante had a time stop ability in one game... stuff like that," he said, listing off each power with an extended finger.

Shadow followed along with the human's list, eyes furrowed in concentration as he considered his words. Afterwards, his eyes widened slightly as a realization hit him. "Sorun... these abilities are remarkably similar to the Chaos Control abilities I myself possess. Time stop, teleportation, regeneration and enhanced strength..." Shadow looked down at his hand, and very briefly a few arcs of greenish power arced over his fingers. "Even your Summoned Swords are similar to my Chaos Spears. They seem too similar to each other to be a coincidence."

"... That is kinda weird, huh?" Sorun agreed, his eyebrows rising in surprise. "Who knows? Maybe that's why I'm getting these powers. They're so close to regular Chaos Control abilities that the Emeralds are trying to recreate them using my knowledge of something similar enough that it just makes them instead. But we're just guessing at that point." He sighed, and held up Yamato. "Doesn't really explain this, though."

"It could just be unique to you," Shadow suggested. "The only limit to the capabilities of Chaos energy are limits placed on those manipulating it. Chaos Control is merely the art of manipulating that energy to suit the user's purpose." A scowl formed on his face. "But, that said, there are precious few besides me who even have the capability of practicing the technique. The echidna, Knuckles, had... some form of experience in the past from what I've heard, though now he's nowhere near my level. More of his kind may know, they made a concerted effort on studying Chaos energy, though things up on Angel Island are severely strained at the moment. The Faker has some limited experience with the Emeralds and Chaos Control as well, though not nearly as much as me. Aside from them and that strange mammoth they keep locked up in Knothole's jail, I'm afraid I don't know of anybody else that can perform it."

"That so? Huh." Sounded to Sorun like this "Chaos Control" thing really was exceptionally rare even among Mobians. The comment about the mammoth had Sorun slightly curious, but not enough that he desired to ask any further about it. "Well... either way, it still leaves one burning question in my mind." And, with that sentence said, Sorun reared back and threw the katana forwards with as much force as he could. "IF THEY CAN MAKE ITEMS THEN WHY DIDN'T I GET EBONY AND IVORY!?"

The sudden outburst was unexpected enough that Shadow had stepped back in surprise. He turned his head to follow the katana as it bounced to a halt on the ground nearby, and then he turned back to Sorun to see the teen heavily panting, an indignant look in his eyes as he straightened out his posture in a huff. Shadow thought about what response to form next, and then cleared his throat to gain Sorun's attention.

"Ebony and Ivory?" he asked.

"They're guns," Sorun clarified, inhaling deeply to calm himself. "Twin .45 handguns that may or may not have unlimited ammo, I dunno, the lore got real weird with them." He held his hands up. "I mean, I wanted guns at the beginning of this, but instead I got Summoned Swords." He frowned, and then let his hands drop. "You know what it is? The games classified Summoned Swords as 'guns' since they're technically a ranged attack, so that's probably what happened." He scoffed and rolled his eyes. "And yeah, I guess the swords are better since guns are pretty much useless against Badniks, so it's actually a good thing that I got them instead of Ebony and Ivory... but still, man."

Shadow, for his part, didn't see why the human was sulking so much over having not gotten a potentially useless power, though he kept his tongue in check in an effort to focus on more important matters. "Are there any other potential abilities you can reasonably expect to gain from the Emeralds?" he pressed. "Knowing beforehand could be beneficial."

Sorun sighed, and then shrugged his shoulders. "A few, yeah. There's Royal Guard." He breathed heavily through his nose as a breathy chuckle left him. "Man, if I actually got Royal Guard I could end the whole war. I could just walk right into New Megaopolis and end Eggman right there." When he noticed Shadow's questioning glare, he opened his mouth again to explain. "It's a blocking ability that completely negates enemy attack damage while at the same time builds up a meter for an attack called Royal Release that does big damage. You needed frame-perfect timing to actually pull the style off right, but man, if you got it down you were basically invincible and melting enemies away with Royal Release. Which I did." He sighed and shook his head. "Somehow I don't think the universe will be nice enough to give me a power that'd make me functionally invincible. It's a nice thought, though."

"Anything else?"

"Mm. There's one more thing I can think of off the top of my head. It's actually a power I'm really hoping I'll get," Sorun admitted to Shadow as he sat forwards on the crate he was sitting on. "Devil Trigger."

"How scary," Shadow commented in a deadpan voice.

Sorun rolled his eyes again. "Yeah, real ominous-sounding. It's a... transformation of sorts that multiplies the user's base physical abilities. I mainly just want it so I can keep up with you guys since you're all so strong and agile, but... ah, I don't know. There's no telling what these Emeralds will give me." Finishing with a sigh, Sorun leaned back on the crate while interlacing his fingers behind his head. "What do you think?"

Humming in thought, Shadow looked down. He crossed his arms and began tapping his elbows with his fingers, whole seconds passing as Sorun patiently awaited the hedgehog to vocalize his thoughts. "I think..." he finally said, picking his head up, "that your subconscious is making this much more difficult than it needs to be." The statement made Sorun's face fall, making Shadow continue in a slightly lighter tone. "Don't get me wrong. I'm not blaming you. It'd just be easier for everybody if the way your powers manifested didn't rely on such an unpredictable system."

"Hah. Yeah. Tell me about it," Sorun mumbled in agreement. "So no advice, then?"

Shadow shook his head. "Based on everything you said, I think it would just be easier to gain your powers and then work from there. If it's true that some of the abilities you gain are similar to my own Chaos Control abilities, then perhaps I could help you learn to control them. Otherwise, there's little we can do until such a time arrives."

"... So just keep doing what I've been doing?" Sorun summarized.

"Essentially."

"Ah." With a sigh, Sorun hung his head. "Man, this has been a huge waste of time."

"I wouldn't say that," Shadow denied, causing Sorun's head to pick back up. "We have a somewhat vague understanding of what abilities you could gain and how to proceed forwards. And... I do appreciate you confiding with me the origin of your abilities, as ridiculous as it is. It certainly does answer some of the questions I have." He breathed out in an exhausted manner. "But, as ridiculous as the origin of your powers is, I cannot deny the results. And besides, it's not as if copying useful and pragmatic abilities from those whose strength you respect is wrong in any way. It's simply learning and adapting to better yourself. There's no shame in that."

"Mm-hm, is this going back to how you stole Sonic's Spin Dash?"

The dark hedgehog's features scowled at that remark. "I already told you I was the one to pioneer that ability. I was first."

"Sure you were," Sorun replied, making Shadow's scowl deepen. "Guess you got a point, though. Nobody can judge me for copying powers from a video game if it works so well. Not like I got a choice in the powers anyways."

"I'm glad you see it that way," Shadow said, features relaxing a bit. "... Earlier you said something about killing Eggman and Snively if you could," he suddenly said, making Sorun's head tilt to the side in curiosity. "Do you honestly intend on killing those two?"

The question caused Sorun's brows to furrow in confusion. "... Yeah?" he answered, voice becoming unsure when he saw Shadow's eye ridges raise in surprise. "W-why are you looking at me like that? I thought the whole goal here was to take Robotnik down and kill him so he never hurts anybody ever again?" It was even in the name. "Freedom Fighters". Implying they were all fighting to free the planet from the man oppressing it. Which also inherently implied they would make sure he would never be in a position to oppress it again afterwards. Considering all of the suffering that man had caused Sorun assumed "kill him" was an objective so obviously clear it didn't even need to be discussed.

So why was Shadow looking at him like that?

"Forgive my surprise, Sorun," Shadow apologized, his features returning to a neutral expression, "I just... didn't assume you would be willing to go that far."

An uneasy feeling began to grow in Sorun's stomach. He recalled so long ago, during the night of the first Emerald when he'd met Snively. About him saying that Freedom Fighters didn't kill. He'd put that statement off in the back of his mind, but with the way Shadow was acting, he was suddenly being reminded of it. And he did not like the implications. "Isn't the plan to kill Eggman by the end of all this?" Sorun slowly asked, voice going a bit lower.

Shadow's eyes narrowed a bit, and with a scoff he turned to the side. "The Freedom Fighters would rather just lock him away forever than do something as that. Killing isn't a very heroic thing to do, after all, and they pride themselves on being a symbol for peace and hope for the planet."

"Oh, come on," Sorun tiredly exclaimed while slapping his palm against his forehead. "No, man, no. Come on, no. I know Mobians are generally nice to a fault, but you can't stand there and tell me they're gonna let that maniac live just 'cause 'killing is wrong'."

"That is indeed what they plan," Shadow confirmed.

"Oh, for the love of- don't tell me you agree with that," Sorun said, voice growing a little more heated as he stared straight into Shadow's eyes. "Do not tell me you are actually okay with that."

To the human's relief, Shadow shook his head. "Of course I'm not. I think it's a moronic decision on their part," he informed Sorun. "Half the reason I chose to stick with G.U.N. before Eggman's takeover as opposed to allying with them was because unlike the Freedom Fighter, G.U.N. actually realizes that sometimes there is no 'clean' solution to every problem."

With a groan, Sorun rubbed at his head again. "Yeah, I'm not surprised in the least. But seriously? Just lock Eggman away?" he said, voice irritated and incredulous. "Listen, I understand life is precious and priceless and unique and all that and killing is wrong. I get that, really, I do. But this is Eggman we're talking about. The guy that's borderline ruined the planet, committed... I don't even know what to call it, robot slavery against living people, responsible for who knows how many deaths, all that stuff and more, and the Freedom Fighters' grand plan is to beat him and lock him away." Sorun snapped his fingers. "Just like that. Instead of, you know... takin' the easy way and murking the guy."

"The Freedom Fighters consider themselves morally obligated to take the high ground in matters such as these," Shadow told him. "It doesn't help that their leader, Sally, is the princess of the kingdom and is technically a representative for them as a result. Any actions taken by any Freedom Fighter reflects on her, and by extension the Kingdom of Acorn." He let out an almost frustrated breath and shook his head. "That said, the idea of not killing is so ingrained within them that they don't even consider these ramifications. Mobian culture in general frowns on killing as I've learned. It seems that the only thing that ever shook them of this belief were legitimate wars."

"But we are in a war! Possibly the biggest war there ever was!" Sorun argued. "They... what do you mean you learned Mobian culture? Ain't you a Mobian already?"

Shadow's eyes widened a small amount. "It's a long story. It's not important," he said. "I understand your frustrations, but it's their belief to not kill. It's all about not stooping to Eggman's level for them."

"'Not stooping to Eggman's'- man, this isn't about what moral standing you're left on once this is over."

"Then what is it about?"

"It's about definitively making sure he never does this again!" Sorun argued. "I mean Snively, sure, guy kinda gave off a low threat vibe, so who cares? Whatever. But Robotnik? The guy's a psychotic super genius, Shadow! I'm not saying I doubt they'd take every single precaution necessary to contain him if they finally captured him. I'm not saying that at all. I'm just questioning why anybody would ever take the risk of containing him for the rest of his life and risk him escaping just so he could start this all over again when, instead, we could be a hundred percent sure he never does it again by killing him. And would people even think twice about it? Really? Seeing as it's Eggman we're talking about? After everything he did?" Rather tiredly, he began to rub at his eyes as frustration continued to ebb through him. "Jesus, it's the fucking Batman not killing the Joker argument all over again. 'Cept this is real. What the fuck..."

No, he wasn't playing that game. If he was gonna die saving this planet, he was making damn sure he was leaving it in a state where this didn't happen again. That meant Eggman had to go. Not be locked in a super jail cell at the bottom of the ocean or whatever they had planned for him. He needed to be gone . Because Sorun wasn't so sure he was comfortable dying saving the planet if there was even a one percent chance of Eggman someday and somehow restarting this cycle of suffering and make all of his friends fight for freedom again just because they didn't take the practical approach and kill him.

It wasn't the good thing to do, he knew that. He didn't want to kill anybody. He didn't even want to fight. It was, however, the smart thing to do, and when it came to the lives of however many men, women, and children of all species on this planet compared to the life of one man who was crazy enough to be dead-set on ruining those lives for him own hedonism? Oh, that wasn't even a hard choice for Sorun to make. Man had to die. Simple as that. Sorun didn't care it was the wrong thing to do, and he didn't care if the Freedom Fighters disagreed with him. He was gonna die anyways, and it was all for their sake.

"I agree with you." Sorun's head picked up in absolute shock at Shadow's words. The dark hedgehog's eyes looked sincere, and Sorun thought he was crazy for thinking so, but his tone almost sounded actually appreciative of Sorun's words and viewpoint. "Doctor Eggman has caused this world too much suffering and is too dangerous to let live. A threat that severe shouldn't be contained. It should be destroyed for the good of the planet and all its inhabitants." His head tilted up towards the sky. "What is the point of protecting the planet if I cannot keep it safe, after all? I'm relieved to hear at least one other person here be like-minded with me on this matter."

Sorun released a disbelieving scoff. "Oh, you gotta be kidding me. Even Rouge disagrees with killing him?"

"She's indifferent on the subject," Shadow said with a shrug as he looked back down on Sorun. "Though, honestly, I never knew you felt this way," he added, and for probably the first time since meeting him Sorun saw a ghost of a smirk play out of Shadow's face. "You sound like you belong more with G.U.N. than the Freedom Fighters talking like that, you know."

The human teen was honestly too shocked from seeing the smirk to respond properly at first. Eventually, he managed a bemused snort as he reversed the positions his legs were crossed in. "That's the human and Overlander defensive government across the ocean Eggman took over, right? Makes sense, I guess, seeing as I'm a human, too. But... I can see from the Mobians' point of view why most of them absolutely refuse to kill," Sorun admitted. "They're so nice and accepting of life that I'm not even surprised killing is so against their nature. But if even they make an exception to that in times of war, then there's not even a question, Shadow. Eggman's gotta die."

"I know," he agreed, "but the other Freedom Fighters would never allow it if we ever manage to defeat him. An argument could be made that, as an Overlander, Eggman would rightfully have to be extradited over to G.U.N. where I would assure you he'd be executed without question. As an agent of G.U.N. myself it's within my jurisdiction to make that call." A withering sigh left him. "But, as it stands, his tyranny affects the entire planet, and admittedly the Mobians have suffered more under him than the humans and Overlanders. His evil has stretched so far to so many different people and cultures that it's almost impossible to properly judge him for his actions. Because of this, if the Freedom Fighters were to be the ones to defeat him, the Kingdom of Acorn would automatically be responsible for administering his judgement. And we both know that just means they'll imprison him."

"... They can't judge him if he dies first," Sorun claimed, a sly smile forming on his face. "I mean, you know... if we had a cool, climactic final battle and everything and he's lying defeated on his knees and, I dunno, a Summoned Sword just happened to suddenly fly through his face..."

Shadow shook his head. "Sally wouldn't let you," he said. "Sonic would likely actively take steps to stop you."

"They can't do anything if you or I get to him first."

At that, Shadow lowly chuckled. "You honestly think you can beat the blue hedgehog of all people in a race against Eggman?"

"I can if I cheat," Sorun said, causing Shadow to chuckle even further. "Whaddya say, Shadow? You want to protect this planet as much as I do. Wanna conspire to kill the fat man?"

"I'm not so sure that would go too well with the Freedom Fighters."

"Eh, you let me worry about that."

The hedgehog hummed in interest. "At the moment, we have no way to actually get to him," Shadow reminded him. "There's nothing we can actually plan for. At best, when Eggman is at the cusp of defeat, we can work together and improvise a plan on the spot to get to him and kill him before any of the other Freedom Fighters have a chance to detain him. That is the best we could ever hope to do, and that alone is an incredibly small window with too many possible variables to account for."

"Wait for the opportune moment and make it up as we go from there, huh? Yeah, it's a pretty dicey plan, but I'll take a plan with a low chance of success over doing nothing for a zero percent chance of success," Sorun said. He leaned forwards on the crate and held his right bare hand out towards Shadow. "So is it a deal? If the moment ever arrives we work together to cheat our way to Eggman before the others get to him?"

Shadow stared down at the hand, eye ridges furrowed in contemplation as he considered the human's offer. Eventually, he rose up his own gloved hand and and firmly grasped the one being offered to him. "We're in agreement," he said, squeezing the hand and giving it a shake. "If the chance to end his life is ever revealed to us, we take it. Regardless of what the others say."

"Alright, cool." That was a small load off Sorun's shoulders. He at least had one ally in his completely sensible quest to kill Eggman. And as frustrating as it was, he understood the reason of why the Freedom Fighters wouldn't go as far as to kill him. But just because he understood and respected their decision didn't mean he had to adhere to it, Freedom Fighter himself or no.

Besides. By then he'd be too dead to care anyways. The planet and the people's wellbeing mattered more.

"Welp, Shadow, good talk, but I think we gotta cut it here. It's getting late." With a grunt, Sorun hopped off of the crate, briefly wincing after reaching towards his shoulder. He rolled it, and then bent backwards to pick Virgil up in his right hand while making Yamato appear in his left. "I got a date with some delish pancakes, and you... I don't really know what you do with your free time, but I'm sure you got stuff to do. Seeya later."

"... So long, Sorun." Shadow gave the retreating human a two-finger wave, which he reciprocated with his own. He watched as Sorun, carrying his Chao and sword, walked further and further away, and it was only until he was out of eyesight did Shadow allow himself a small laugh. "Powers from a video game... why am I not even surprised?" he grumbled, shaking his head in disbelief. "Only Sorun could make something so absurd a reality. Still... I suppose he's not so bad after all."

He allowed himself a small smile for a brief moment before it disappeared just as soon as it arrived. Afterwards, he closed his eyes and began to intensely focus. Greenish-yellow energy crackled around him, the arcs of energy coalescing into two points around his body. The two points eventually transformed into two Chaos Spears floating in front of and behind Shadow, each pointing outwards. They began to slowly rotate around Shadow's body, though, to the hedgehog's disgruntlement, he lost his concentration when he opened his eyes, causing the two Chaos Spears to vanish along with the energy crackling around him.

Chapter 27

Recursion Error

Episode 27- Tea with the king

"Yep. This is... this is the life. Hoo boy..."

Some days were just slow. It was a fact of living. But today wasn't just a slow day- it was a particularly slow day. A day in which absolutely nothing was happening. No missions, no life-endangering conflicts to resolve, and no mindless training to get to. And Sorun figured that he should have been happy with this change of events. And he was until he realized nobody else had an abundance of free time like he did, which meant that he had nobody to hang out with.

What was a man to do when overcome with such overwhelming boredom? Sorun found his answer plugging away at Solitaire in the Freedom HQ's lab's computer, just like most other people bored out of their minds with little better to do back on Earth did.

Some things apparently never changed no matter what zone one went to.

Leaning back in the chair he was sitting on with his eyes practically dead, Sorun languidly clicked away at the cards being displayed on the screen in front of him. He'd gone through eight rounds of this game already, and through it all he realized a very important fact: he hated Solitaire. And yet he had nothing better to do than continually match up a bunch of virtual rectangles. Truly a meaningless existence.

"Are you sure you can't hop out for, like, five minutes to get in a quick round of games with me?" Sorun asked aloud, tone practically begging as he matched up another card. "Whatever you're working on can wait five minutes, can't it?"

On the lower right side of the screen, a small icon in the form of Nicole's head blipped into existence. "No, Sorun, I can assure you that this project I am working on requires my utmost attention at the moment," Nicole informed him through the computer's speaker.

Sorun scoffed. "Your super secret project you won't tell anybody about? Even me?"

"Yes. That one."

"Can't be that important if you can split your focus doing that while talking with me here," the teen muttered in response as he finished the Solitaire game. "Yay, congrats to me. Let's do it again..." And, with a heavy sigh, he reset the game and began matching up cards once again.

He'd actually take Eggman randomly attacking the town right now if it meant he could finally tear himself away from Solitaire.

"You do realize there are more entertainment programs installed onto the computer's hard drive aside from Solitaire, correct?" Nicole asked a vapid-looking Sorun.

The human scoffed. "No way am I playing Minesweeper. Nobody understands how that game works, Nicole. It's impossible." Greater minds than him had tried to decipher the inner workings of that game. And while they may have actually succeeded, Sorun never endeavored to learn from them how Minesweeper actually worked. He somewhat regretted that now.

"I was not referring to Minesweeper. I had a more engaging game in mind." An icon of a black chess piece popped into existence right next to Nicole's icon. "A game we could both play." Nicole's icon moved against the chess piece and nudged it up towards the center of the screen. Sorun watched the display with an unamused expression. "A very thought-provoking game that I happen to very much enjoy." The icon was pushed up further. "Perhaps it could even jumpstart a conversation between us so you could quit staring at the screen as if you were asleep with your eyes open."

The hint the AI was giving was not lost on Sorun as he watched Nicole's icon continually push the chess icon closer towards the center of the screen. Unfortunately, he was having none of it. "How about no," Sorun said as he dragged the mouse cursor towards the chess icon in an attempt to remove it from the screen.

Nicole's icon moved right between the cursor's point and the chess icon, making Sorun's eyes widen and his wrist freeze, halting the mouse's movement. "Sorun, give chess another chance."

"You blasted me in eight moves the last time we played. I don't wanna." It wasn't his fault he was so bad at strategy-type games. Or that Nicole was a super genius AI who could probably beat out the world's greatest chess grandmasters without even breaking a sweat. With both of those aspects combined, what possible hope did Sorun have of even standing his ground against Nicole in chess?

Answer: none. So he wasn't going to try playing chess against Nicole again.

He maneuvered the mouse cursor so that it swung around Nicole's icon and towards the chess icon. However, Nicole's icon moved at an even greater speed, intercepting the clicker's path yet again. Sorun furrowed his brows as he continually swerved and dragged the mouse in all sorts of different directions at various speeds in order to try and elude Nicole. She was keeping up well with him, though, her face icon blocking him at every single turn whenever he even got close to the chess icon.

Changing strategy, Sorun made bigger drags backwards using strokes that slowly increased in size. It was right when he should have pulled the mouse back far enough that it would have touched the border of the screen did Sorun act. He'd moved the mouse a quarter of the way in order to bait Nicole into moving into his predicted position and, right when she moved, he let out a loud "ah-ha!" as he reversed movement, the mouse pointer practically flying towards the chess icon.

The teen's eyes nearly bugged out of his head when the cursor froze right before its tip managed to touch the icon. When he looked towards the mouse cursor's rear, he was shocked to see a black icon suspiciously shaped like Nicole's hand holding the cursor back.

"Come on. Come on, really?" Sorun tried moving the actual mouse around to try and break the cursor free of the AI's grasp, but while the cursor wiggled around due to his efforts, it remained locked in Nicole's grasp. "You're really gonna play a guy like this?"

"You put up an admirable effort in evading me," Nicole praised, and he could hear the smugness in her voice, "but I'm afraid it's futile. I refuse to watch you waste any more time playing Solitaire."

"This really is some next-level cyber bullying you're laying down on me," Sorun complained, though a smirk began to play across his lips as his finger hovered towards the right mouse button. "Too bad I don't play that way!"

A bit harder than he ought to have, he pressed down on the right mouse button. Immediately after, a white window full of shortcut keys appeared next to the mouse cursor. The sudden appearance of the window smacked away the hand that had been holding the cursor, causing Nicole to gasp out loud. Her head icon and a second hand icon attempted to zoom forwards to try and stop the cursor, but it was too late. Sorun's mouse cursor was just too close to the chess icon.

"And that's jackpot!" Sorun cried out victoriously as he successfully clicked on and dragged away the chess icon from the middle of the screen. He moved it over to the left side of the computer screen, hovering the mouse cursor and the chess icon dangerously close to the recycling bin icon located near the top of the left side.

He moved down slightly and safely deposited the chess icon in the empty space right below the recycling bin.

The two of them silently stared at the chess icon, with Nicole's head icon having moved right next to it while Sorun watched on. Afterwards, the two slowly broke out into mirthful laughter, and Sorun had to hold onto the sides of his chair just not to fall out from the laughter rocking his body. Eventually the laughter tapered off, Sorun in particularly shaking his head with a large smile still plastered on his face. "What did that even look like from your perspective?" he playfully asked as he brushed some of his dark hair out from his face.

"Like a giant, floating arrow flailing about," Nicole said, sounding just as joyful as Sorun looked. "I suppose I must concede this thrilling round of cursor combat to you."

"Inventing a new game and being the first one to win it all in the same hour? This day's goin' up for me," Sorun said to Nicole as he hovered his cursor back to the Solitaire board. The AI laughed again, making Sorun chuckle along with her. "But man, do I miss the internet," he added as he began matching cards again, the smile on his face lowering slightly. "Nobody could get bored on the internet. I don't even wanna think about how much time I spent on it."

"You've mentioned this 'internet' to me quite a few times in the past," Nicole noted, a tick mark having appeared over her icon's forehead when she saw the mouse cursor go right back to Solitaire. "Tell me about it."

Sorun hummed in thought. "It was, uh... it was a computer network, basically, but on a global scale," he explained as he continued to match cards. "Back in my world there wasn't an apocalypse that reset the whole world, so society was going pretty strong. All the world's governments were functioning, eh, relatively well and communication, transportation, and travel was good everywhere. And at the point where I left practically everybody had a computer or some other device to connect them to the internet. It was a commonplace thing."

"But what exact purpose did this computer network serve that made it such a prevalent aspect of your zone's society?" Nicole questioned him.

"Oh, Nicole, everything was on that network," Sorun said while slowly exhaling. "The sum total of all human knowledge was collected and put in that thing. There were server banks all over the world dedicated to storing all that data and maintaining the internet. I'm talking petabytes upon petabytes of data here." The eyes on Nicole's icon widened. "Yeah, a lot, right? History, technical knowledge, scientific articles..." His eyes darted away from the screen as Sorun's cheeks went red. "... Other things."

"Such as?"

"A-ack, ahem!" Coughing, Sorun quickly shook his head to get rid of the blush before refocusing on the the computer. "Ah, you know, things like... the ability to talk to people from around the world through various message boards and websites. A website where people could create content in video format and post literally whatever they wanted for entertainment and educational purposes for the whole world to see. Games, oh man, the games, Nicole. Most of the games I ever played I just downloaded off the internet. You could download practically anything off the internet." A sigh left him as he leaned back in his chair. "Sorry, but I don't think I can accurately describe just how big the internet was with words alone. That's how significant it was. Of all of the creations humanity ever conceived, I don't think anything ever surpassed the internet. Its ability to just... connect the whole human race like that, you know? The world just got so much better with it." He glanced off to the side. "I mean, antibiotics were pretty important, too, but you get what I mean."

There was just so much he missed from the internet at home. Steam and all its games. YouTube. All those pirate and torrent sites where he would get his music, comics, manga, and anime from. The chat boards. The ability to look up whatever information he ever needed on the fly. Having been cut off from it for so long just left a void in Sorun's heart along with everything else he'd lost.

"There is no need to apologize, Sorun. I think I get the picture," Nicole assured him. "An entire world connected together through technology sounds rather wonderful. And with how you talk about it you make it sound as if its conception was a revolutionary turn for your world."

"That's 'cause it was," Sorun affirmed with a nod. "Technology alone is an amazing thing that makes everybody's lives so much better. You know, as long as it's used right." Because some people like Eggman just couldn't take the hint. He'd cut his head off for perverting technology to the point that the world was at the brink of ruination if it was the last thing Sorun did. Which it likely would be. "After all," Sorun continued as he leaned back forwards in his chair, "you only exist because of technology, right? And you're amazing."

Nicole's icon blinked owlishly, and then slowly began to slide downwards towards the bottom of the screen, almost in an effort to get away from Sorun's sight. Even so, he could clearly see how bashful the icon's face had become. "W-well, Sorun, with how great you've made the idea of an internet sound, perhaps Mobius would benefit from such a system. If nothing else, it sounds like a fun enough project."

"Build the internet from scratch, huh?" Sorun mused. "Sounds like kind of a long-term goal. Like way after Eggman's dealt with and the world becomes stable again, but after that... sure. Go for it. If anybody could do it, it's you." At the very least it was one more thing to help put him at ease once he died. Knowing he gave somebody the idea of jumpstarting the internet revolution for this world.

From behind him, he heard the door to the lab open. Sorun tried to ignore it, but he was forced to pay attention after he heard his name be called. "Sorun? There you are." He suppressed a sigh at hearing

Sally's voice, and then turned the chair around halfway so he could meet her eyes. "Is... is this seriously where you've been all day?"

"What time is it outside?" he asked her.

She blinked. "Around eleven in the afternoon, I think?"

"Then yeah," he confirmed with a nod. "Is this the part where you send me on some life-threatening mission because Eggman poisoned the water supply with nanobots or whatever?"

Sally shook her head. "No, nothing severe like that. Seriously, though, don't say that kind of stuff around people. You're just gonna scare them." The momentary, stern look in her features relaxed into an easy expression. "Actually my brother wanted to talk to you about something, so he asked me to go look for you."

The apprehension that had been growing inside of Sorun in dread at a coming mission collapsed instantly in place of a severe sense of unwant. "Ugh, your brother the king? What does he want?" Sorun asked.

"Apparently he just wants to hang out with you. As weird as it sounds."

The levels of unwant inside of Sorun grew. "Oh. Yeah, I don't wanna," he said as he turned his chair back towards the computer screen. "Tell him I'm busy with something else. Anything else."

He began matching cards up in his Solitaire game again, trying and failing to ignore the approaching footsteps from behind. He could just see Sally's face over his chair behind him from the reflection on the computer's monitor once she got close enough to him. She didn't look very convinced with Sorun's statement. "Busy, huh?" she deadpanned.

"Sally, I am not joking when I say the fate of the whole universe depends on the result of this game of Solitaire," Sorun replied in an equal deadpan.

There was a withering sigh from behind the chair. "You know, he told me about the talk you two had. I was honestly surprised you went to him of all people for support," she told him. "I guess I kinda got what you were thinking when he told me the reason, though. So you'll have to help me understand why you don't want to talk to Elias seeing as you're both on good footing already."

"Listen, it's not like I got anything against the guy, I just..." Sorun paused as he attempted to think of a good excuse. Unfortunately, he had none. "To be honest, I just really don't feel like it. That's all."

He could almost feel the dissatisfaction beginning to radiate off of Sally. "Of all the excuses I've ever heard from you, that one was probably the laziest."

"Oh-ho, oh, Sally, I could think of way worse than that," Sorun boldly claimed with a laugh. "I feel honored the king himself wants to blow an afternoon away with me, and admittedly I don't have anything better to do and have absolutely no reason to refuse, but I'm gonna refuse anyways."

An exasperated breath came from Sally. "Nicole? You still in the computer?"

"Yes," came Nicole's voice from the speakers, causing Sorun's eyes to widen and shoot towards said speakers.

"How long's he been at this?"

"Approximately two hours, seventeen minutes, and forty-five seconds," the AI happily informed Sally, much to Sorun's chagrin. "Based on my observations this activity has been insufficient in thoroughly stimulating Sorun's higher thought processes. It is my assertion that he is wasting his time on this thoughtless game and should therefor do something more engaging so that his mental ability does not atrophy."

"Et tu, Nicole...?" Sorun mumbled, his arm falling off of the mouse and table to limply hang off his side. Nicole's response was for the small icon of her face on the screen to flash him a playful grin.

From behind him, Sally crossed her arms as a satisfied smirk played across her lips. "Oh, really? Well, I can't have a Freedom Fighter's brain go and melt on me because they decided to waste all day playing a mindless card game." She nodded her head towards the lab's door. "You heard her, Sorun. Go play with my brother."

With a loud groan, Sorun slowly started to remove himself from the chair. "Arigato Mrs. Roboto," he sarcastically muttered to the computer. He stood up fully, and then turned to Sally. "And do you really gotta say it like that? I'm not eight."

"No, but you act eight sometimes," Sally said with a shake of her head. "Like right now, for instance. Now are you gonna go or am I gonna have to pull rank here?"

He rolled his eyes in response, but otherwise said nothing as he turned around and made his way towards the lab's door. He heard stifled laughter from both Sally and Nicole from behind him, and then began to angrily mutter under his breath as he all but slammed the lab's door behind him.

"Sorun! I'm so happy you could make it!"

"Yeah, I can't say the same." That's what Sorun wanted to say to the young king standing in front of him. What he actually said was, "Mm-hm, yeah."

He may as well have just greeted Elias in the same jubilant manner he'd greeted Sorun, as that's how the Mobian acted with his wide, grinning face as he spun around while gesturing towards the castle. "Follow me, if you would. I already have our venue picked out."

"... Right." With a barely-audible, resigned sigh, Sorun began dragging his feet forwards as he followed the squirrel into the castle. He began to mentally tune himself out when Elias began leading him around the labyrinth-like corridors inside of the castle, so he instead turned his focus into his inner thoughts. "Weird feeling, seeing somebody I barely know so happy to see me. Feels kinda nice, actually. But what the hell does Elias want with me so bad that I had to drag myself all the way to the castle?" He'd even been waiting for the human out at the castle's entrance. Sorun didn't know what to make of that. "Guess I just gotta wait 'til he tells me what's up. Doesn't mean I can't have some fun with him in the meantime."

It was Sorun's time that was being spent here, after all, as useless as it was at the moment. He had a right to a little bit of teasing if only to milk as much amusement from this experience as possible.

With that decided, the human sped up to Elias' side as the pair rounded a corner. "You know I was serious when I said I was joking about the marriage thing, right?" Sorun asked. "You didn't have to bring me all the way out here for a date."

"Huh?" Elias turned his head to meet Sorun's gaze, and then immediately grew a flustered look when Sorun's words finally caught up with him. "T-this isn't anything like...!" He cut himself off when he saw Sorun silently snicker besides him, causing him to huff and turned his head to the side. "Was this type of humor commonplace in your world...?" he almost whined out.

Sorun scoffed at that. "Oh, no. It was way worse. You have no idea how much I've been holding back since Mobian ears are so pure." He was honestly surprised at himself that he'd been able to avoid swearing in front of people he liked for the most part; he was sure he would have crumbled and given up at this point. But it was nice living with a bunch of people who acted like curse words weren't even in their vocabulary, a stark contrast of his life on Earth, so he'd endeavor to keep that going for as long as he could. Self-censoring was a small price to pay for the peace it provided him.

A good thing he could vent once in a while against people he didn't like, though, because otherwise he probably would have exploded by now. But nobody in Knothole deserved to hear any of that, so he'd keep a lid on it.

"Well, I suppose I should thank you for being mindful of your words," Elias told him, though he sounded unsure of himself as he said this. Sorun couldn't rightly blame him. "Ah, here we are. Right past this door."

As Elias said, the two exited through a small pair of doors. Where they ended up was, surprisingly, back outside. In from of them was a small, cobblestone patio fenced in by short shrubs with a view of a large, open courtyard in the background. In the middle of the patio was, simply enough, a single table with two chairs. There was a small box on the top of the table, too, though this went ignored by Sorun as he turned towards Elias.

"... I know you said this wasn't a date, and I was kidding around when I said that, but in all seriousness this is looking really suspect," Sorun said in a slow and even voice.

With a roll of his eyes, Elias walked forwards towards the table while gesturing for Sorun to follow. Rather reluctantly, the human did. "Sorun, I assure you this is nothing more than a strictly platonic meeting of the minds. Was simply spending an afternoon with friends not an occurrence in your world?" he asked with some concern as he turned back to Sorun.

"Well, no, it's just that this... this kind of formality really just died out after a while," Sorun answered.

"Oh. Shame," Elias said, shoulders lowering slightly. He brightened up a bit, though, and even went as far as to pull out Sorun's chair for him. He couldn't help but raise his eyebrows at the sheer politeness. "Well, things at the castle were going particularly slow today." Sorun suppressed a scoff at that. "I had some free time, and there was something I wanted to discuss with you. So I thought we would get together, enjoy the afternoon and chat, maybe have some tea. We promised that we would if you remember."

"... Oh yeah, that did happen. Man, that was a long time ago," the teen realized with a small nod. "Geez, I don't think I've ever even had tea," Sorun muttered out as he sat down in his chair.

"Truly?" Elias remarked as he sat down in the chair across from him. "What did you have, then?"

"Too many brands of energy drinks to count," Sorun embarrassingly muttered.

Elias's brows furrowed at the answer. "I was lead to assume that consumption of such beverages at such a regular scale was unhealthy."

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, man, it's totally fine. I'm still alive, aren't I?" Despite his claim, he wasn't willing to admit how many caffeinated beverages and sodas he'd used to binge just to make it through all those overnight gaming sessions. With how much he drank that Chao-Cola from the HQ's fridge he'd worry Elias would assume he'd have a caffeine addiction and send him to a rehab center or something.

But wow, could he go for a Chao-Cola right about now. The light tenseness of the situation was giving him a craving.

"Anyways, what's with the box?" Sorun asked as he pointed at the aforementioned box laying between them.

"This? Oh, it's just a game I thought we could play while we talked. After all..." Elias reached forwards and removed the top of the box. Sorun had to resist strangling the king with his Bringer Claws when he saw the contents. "Nothing stimulates the mind quite like the game of kings, eh? Eh? Eh-heh."

It was chess. The box was the box to a goddamned game of chess.

"Son of a bitch, I can't escape this game no matter how hard I try," Sorun silently lamented as he watched Elias set up the board and pieces. "I won't lie to you, Elias. I'm not the best at these strategery-type games," Sorun warned him.

Elias paused. "... Strategery...?" he quietly mumbled to himself as he continued setting the pieces up. "I'm sure you aren't as bad as you say, Sorun. Maybe we can turn this into a learning experience for you as well!"

"Ah-ha, yeah, don't count on it," Sorun mumbled in response, forlornly looking down at the black pieces set in front of him. "Alright, dude, you got me all the way out here playing chess with the king. What do you actually want?" he asked, greatly desiring to get to the truth of the matter of why he was bothering with all this.

The squirrel paused, and then softly sighed as his shoulders slumped down a bit. "In truth, Sorun, I wanted to talk to you for a chance at gaining some outside perspective."

Sorun blinked in surprise, and then reached forwards to move one of the black pawn pieces forwards. "Okay...?" He responded, not really sure what to say at such vague reasoning. "Perspective on what?"

"Being the king is a... trying position. Especially to someone like me who is so young and so... inexperienced," Elias replied as he moved a white pawn forwards. "My mother and father, and even my sister, are practically leagues ahead of me on the subject. They try their best to help me, bless their hearts, but it doesn't change the fact that I'm not so skilled at this. That is why I wanted your assistance on a certain subject."

The pale teen hummed in response. "I'm unsure as to how helpful I will be to you, my dear compatriot, at advising you on the inner workings of socioeconomic matters necessary towards successfully steering a thriving kingdom in times of war when I myself am woefully inexperienced in such matters." He moved a black piece forwards, and then completely froze when he heard the words leave his mouth.

Elias reached forwards to move a white piece, but then stopped and looked at Sorun with widened eyes, almost looking as surprised as Sorun himself did. "... Sorun, just how... extensive is your vocabulary?" he asked him as he grasped and moved his white piece. "I admit, your way of speaking greatly confuses me sometimes. I always assumed it due to being your zone just having a different vernacular to ours, but Sally sometimes mentions that you'll say something uncharacteristically, well, pardon me if this sounds offensive... complex."

Sorun shrugged. "You might find this hard to believe, but I'm well-versed in verbiage due to my voracious consumption of volumes of literature," he said, causing Elias to smile in amusement. "Yeah, I read a lot before becoming a gamer. Actually, I tried my best to get some reading in every now and then even after my transition to gamer status. So I... talked really weird and fancy back when I was a kid. Then a bunch of other kids decided they didn't like me talking like that so they dragged me to the back of the school and beat me up."

The smile on Elias' face immediately fell away and was replaced by grief. "That's horrible!"

"Yeah, and guess what, it's real hard to fight back when everybody is literally twice as tall as you." Sorun moved a black piece. "I... started to talk like everybody else after a while of that happening. Practiced by listening and emulating the dialogue in a lot of shows and games. Heh." He let out a sad sigh. "Looking back I really was a nerd."

"You shouldn't say that about yourself," Elias admonished. He looked down at the board, and then hummed briefly in thought before moving a white bishop forwards. "Nobody would think twice here if you were to slip back into your old speaking habits. Nobody would certainly... assault you just for speaking," he added, looking like he was concerned over the fact he even had to speak that sentence.

"I know they wouldn't. But my speech right now is kinda permanently ingrained in me at this point." He picked up his rook and began rolling it between his fingers. "But even still, the fancy stuff kinda slips out randomly, especially when I'm focusing on something serious. Or when I'm playing old-timey games like chess that kinda have this weird vintage feel to them." He placed the rook down on the board.

Elias didn't reach for a new piece, and instead looked towards Sorun with a sad look in his blue eyes. "Are humans really so cruel that they would do something unthinkable to one of their own...?"

Sorun paused, and then slowly looked up at Elias. He did not like this train of thought, and he was shutting it down right now before it became something bad. "You shouldn't judge a whole species based on the actions of a few of its members," he told Elias. "I ran into this crazy jackal guy out there when I ran away. Just 'cause I meant one bad Mobian doesn't mean I think your whole species is bad. You're all pretty great, actually."

"But even still-"

"Look, Elias, they were just a bunch of kids. And kids can be cruel. That's just how it is," Sorun said. "Kids in general are just... they're idiots because they're kids and don't know any better. And then sometimes you get people that act like that but never grow up even after becoming adults. It's a real bad combo."

"Indeed," Elias morosely agreed as he moved a white piece. "My father often tells stories of how... unusually cruel the Overlanders were during the Great War. He doesn't favor them in a very good light."

"... Yeah, that doesn't make me nervous or anything," Sorun commented while looking over his shoulder. "He ain't around, is he?"

At that, Elias laughed a bit. "Settle down, Sorun. My father is a fair man." The smile died a bit. "That said, the war did... color his views a bit, we'll say, so if you two do happen to meet you'll have to forgive him if he seems a bit... course with you."

"Fair enough," Sorun sighed as he sat back down. "So why the sudden concern over Overlanders?" he asked, looking over the board to think over his next move.

"The war with Eggman won't exactly last forever," Elias began, propping an elbow up on the table as he looked out into the courtyard. "I'm expected to bring the kingdom back to the state it was in previously and maintain it until the next ruler takes over. That kind of position involves maintaining relations with other governmental powers across the world in order to keep the peace. Including..."

"The Overlanders," Sorun finished for him, still staring down at the board. He reached for a piece, but then shook his head and brought his hand back. "Yeah, sounds scary," he agreed. "Is this why you wanted to talk to me? Because I am very possibly the only human you have access to who's actually friendly with Mobians? Someone that you can comfortably talk to so you can get a good idea of what talking with a human is like?"

Elias laughed at Sorun's deduction. "You caught me," he admitted. "That among other things. Forgive me if this sounds crass, but you're a rather unique source of information given your background and character. I just simply wanted to speak to you of such matters."

It made enough sense from Sorun's perspective. Rookie king was trying to gather as much information as possible to make things easier on himself. He couldn't blame him; Sorun would probably try doing the same if he were in his shoes. He was curious as to what actually Elias wanted to ask of him, though.

"If I move the knight here... ah, screw it," he thought as he moved the black piece. "'Among other things', huh? Like what?"

The human teen mentally cursed when Elias' white rook took his black knight. "You spoke of a government in your world when we first spoke. France, I believe it was called? Could you, perhaps, tell me more of your world's governments?"

Sorun slowly nodded in understanding. That's what Elias wanted. No wonder he wanted to speak with him so badly seeing as Sorun was quite literally the only human in the world with a rudimentary understanding of the various governments and their systems in a world exclusively ruled by humans. "So that's the perspective you want," Sorun realized. "You want me to tell you about Earth's governments so you'll have at least some idea of what you'll be dealing with when it comes to the Overlanders since they'd likely be somewhat similar."

"Essentially, yes," Elias confirmed with a nod. "I realize you likely weren't the most studious of history scholars in your world-"

"- Boy was I not," Sorun agreed with a nod.

Elias breathed out a single chuckle before continued. "Nevertheless, I would still like to hear of your world, if only to be as prepared as possible to help protect mine." He moved a white piece. "Check."

"I can respect that," Sorun said in an honest tone. "Alright, Elias. My head might not exactly be the wealth of information you're looking for, but, ah... I'll try my best. I'm not exactly well versed on all of human history, but I know a good bit about Earth. I'll tell you what I can," he vowed as he moved a black piece. "Just don't expect a lot out of me."

In response, Elias flashed him a thankful smile. "I'm in your debt, Sorun." He moved a white piece. "That's checkmate, by the way."

Sorun's head snapped down to the board, and then looked back up to see Elias playfully tossing his black king up and down. "How the...? Man, reset the board."

Never before in Sorun's life did he imagine that he would adopt the role of a teacher. Teaching Nicole tricks with video games was one thing. Going full-on historian was another, especially considering that Sorun was the furthest possible thing from a historian.

But Elias had paid rapt attention to him as Sorun tried his best to outline what he could about human governments. It was kind of funny in a way, seeing him beam that curious look of his towards Sorun the more he spoke. It gave him a strange sense of importance he didn't often get, so it helped spur him into going further.

As to the actual content of his lecture: it wasn't much. He wasn't going for anything especially detailed or specific. Just basic governmental systems and how well they generally operated. He'd also gone over some light history on some of the major countries just for context, and while he'd been all but forced to mention the wars, he made sure to gloss over a large portion of the details just for Elias' sake. Times like these made him wish he actually had paid more attention in history, but he thought that he had a basic enough understanding to give Elias a good picture.

"- Yeah, like I said, royalty ruling countries pretty much fell on the wayside. Like the country I grew up in, for instance. America was really weird in that it was this confusing mess of a government system due to evolving into this weird democratic-republic fusion over the decades," Sorun explained as he leaned back in his chair, only paying half of his attention to the chess board. Elias had forgotten it entirely and was leaning forwards on the table as he intently listened to Sorun talk about the actual governmental system of his home country. "Small stuff was generally voted on by the populace, which made it a democracy, while big stuff while handled by democratically-appointed officials, which made it a republic."

"It still boggles me that your world's governments did away with monarchies," Elias said as he stared wide-eyed at Sorun. "Was it really considered that outdated a system?"

"I guess you could say outdated. Pretty much, yeah," Sorun confirmed. "I mean there are were places like Britain that kinda still has a monarchy, but they had an elected head of government that ran the country alongside the queen as an example of how, I dunno, diluted the monarchy system got over time to places that still used it. I guess people started to realize that letting a royal bloodline handle political affairs wasn't really that great an idea if there were others more suited to the job but could never do anything about it. Plus when you give that much power to so few people, and those few people don't listen to the general population, they start to realize real quick that an angry mob of people with pitchforks can be just as deadly as an invading army. Monarchies, autocrats, dictatorships and the like got dissolved or heavily reformatted pretty quickly in all the major countries once people started figuring that out. Governments should be a lot more afraid of their own people than the other way around." Sorun leaned back forwards and began poking at the black chess pieces. "Wasn't really surprising how few revolutionary wars there were when people got a say in how the government was ran, but I suppose the advancement of civilization played a part in that, too. Fact is, though, pretty much every stable country back on Earth ran on some form of democracy or republic. America, Canada, the European nations, Russia, Japan just to name a few... none of them were perfect, sure, but they worked for the most part."

"But if they didn't work perfectly-" Elias argued, but stopped talking when Sorun held a hand up.

"Elias, I'm gonna tell you probably the most important piece of advice you'll ever hear: no country or governmental system, absolutely none, is perfect." The squirrel seemed almost shocked by the claim, but Sorun continued unabated despite the wide-eyed stare he was given. "Governments are just... they're just too big and too complicated for it all to fit together nice and perfectly. People- humans, Mobians, whatever, just people in general- are all inherently flawed in their own ways. There are so many idiots that'll screw things up and so many variables that just come with life that a perfect system just ain't gonna happen. It's not about making it perfect. It's about making it good enough that it works. The trick," Sorun said as he pointed towards Elias, "is choosing the flaws of the country or kingdom or what have you. That way you can focus on the all the good stuff while you live with tolerable flaws." Sorun shook his head. "'Cause trust me, man. You're gonna end up doing a lot more harm than good if you try making everything perfect."

"And how would you go about choosing flaws?" Elias asked.

Sorun shrugged. "I dunno. That's your problem."

Elias sighed as he upper torso flopped onto the table, rattling some of the discarded chess pieces. "Sorun, after hearing all that you've said about your world, I must say... I have to question your people's sanity." He groaned and began rubbing at the sides of his forehead. "Just... so many different governments and systems, all the complexity... and the wars," he gasped out as he looked up at Sorun. "Why did your people have to have so many wars?"

"... Look, man, humanity ain't perfect," Sorun admitted after a long beat of silence. "Are we more prone to taking the violent route as opposed to Mobians because it's simpler and easier? Yeah, we are. Was there way more violence than necessary? Can't really dispute that, yes, there was. We were a relatively young species still learning. But there was a bunch of good stuff that came out of all that, too! Mainly the advancement of civilization and culture in general, but it was really great! It's just... really hard running that much stuff, you know? So of course stuff goes wrong. Accidents happen. Wars happen, but they happened a lot less the more time went on and the more advanced humanity got. Do I think that, given time, wars and conflict as a whole would be wiped out? Nah, I'm not that naive, but they'd get real close, though. And sometimes close enough is good enough." Sorun leaned back in his chair. "I don't know what's different with you Mobians. Maybe it's just because you all had a different history, or you're all just... naturally nicer than humans and don't have such a propensity for violence generally speaking. Whatever the case, you all share a world with humansslash-Overlanders. So it's probably a good idea you came to me with help on the subject." He looked at his right hand and began rubbing his fingers together. "Peace with them is within the realm of possibility. You guys got along with the humans that live in Station Square after all, right? Humans would like nothing more than peace with everybody, too, and I imagine Overlanders are the same. It's just that sometimes an idiot like Eggman comes along and screws it all up for everybody."

"But I just don't know how I'm going to deal with them," Elias said as he sat up in his chair. "From how you put it, there's no telling how their government leaders would act towards me. How am I supposed to prepare for something like that?"

"Yeah, welcome to dealing with people," Sorun deadpanned. "Mobians ain't exactly rocking cookie-cutter personalities, either." He blew a lock of dark hair out of his face and looked to the side. "Just be amicable and don't provoke them. If you're lucky you'll get to deal with a bunch of fair Overlander leaders in the future when you're piecing international relations back together once the war is over. If you get people that aren't so agreeable, well, bear with it, but don't give them any pull, either. You gotta stand your ground and stay confident. You're the king. Besides that?" With a shake of his head, Sorun shrugged as he turned back to Elias. "I don't know, man. I don't deal with politics. Never had an interest. I just cut up robots."

"Ha-ha. I can understand that." Elias ran a hand through his red hair as he straightened his posture up. "I can't say you've given me definitive answers to my problems, but if nothing else, you've certainly shown me the way forwards towards finding my own answers. And at least given me somewhat of an idea on what I'll be dealing with in the far future." He flashed Sorun a smile. "I really can't thank you enough for everything you said, my friend."

Sorun started in his seat and felt an urge to rebuke the friend claim made by Elias. He even went as far as to open his mouth to do so, but when he saw that thankful look on the king's face, he couldn't bring himself to do it. So he simply breathed out through his nose while crossing his arms. "Don't mention it," he murmured under his breath.

Out of the corner of his eyes he saw a Mobian dressed in a maid's outfit approach the table the two were sitting at, holding a tray in her hands. She and Elias exchanged quick pleasantries while Sorun watched on, only really becoming engaged when a cup full of brown liquid was placed in front of him. The maid turned to walk away while Elias had bid her farewell, while Sorun continued to look at the cup.

"Oh, Sorun, you said you never had tea before, correct?" Elias asked as he picked up his own cup. "Try it. I assure you it's quite relaxing."

The human watched as Elias sipped at his own cup of tea, and then looked down at the cup in front of him. He wasn't sure how he felt about warm drinks, especially seeing as he could practically feel its heat radiate onto his hand as he picked up the cup. He gave it a quick whiff, tilting his head to the side at the sweet and earthy aroma it gave off. "Doesn't... seem all that horrible," he thought as he slowly brought the cup to his lips.

He had to set the cup back down on the table after the first sip.

"People actually drink this shit!?" His thoughts screamed as he stared down at the cup in alarm. There was no describing the smooth yet bitter taste that assaulted his senses the moment he tried taking a drink from the cup. Not bad, per se, but it was far from being tolerable to his non-existent pallet. "Shoulda just brought a soda or somethin' with me, geez..."

Elias seemed to notice Sorun's distress at the drink, and then put down his own cup. "Is it not to your liking?" he asked with some worry to his voice. "The maid put some sugar aside for us."

Blue eyes followed Elias' hand as he gestured to a small pyramid of sugar cubes stacked near the end of the table, resting on a plate. "Oh, that's the problem. Didn't come with sugar," Sorun thought as he took a few cubes and a small, wooden stirring stick. "Thanks," he muttered as he dropped the cubes in and began stirring. "So are we done with politics? My brain can't really take much more of that talk."

"I suppose we can end that discussion there," Elias said with a small laugh. "Would you like another game of chess?"

Sorun glared down at the board with a flat stare as he dropped more sugar cubes in his drink. "How many times have we played this game?" he asked as he continued to absentmindedly stir.

"Oh... six times, I believe. And I won all six." The subdued yet cheeky grin was not lost on Sorun, whose only response was to put more sugar cubes in his drink. "E-er, Sorun, I think that's quite enough," Elias advised with a hint of nervousness to his voice.

Sorun briefly stopped, looked up at Elias, and then looked down again as he tipped the plate in order to dump all the sugar cubes into his tea.

Elias sighed at the sight. "I was actually hoping to have one..." His eyes widened in surprise when a single sugar cube bounced off his forehead and plopped into his drink. He looked down at the quickly-dissolving cube, and then looked at Sorun who was blankly staring at him as he stirred his own tea. "You really can be a child sometimes," Elias mumbled as he took another drink.

"You know, your sister said the same thing. I think you both just don't know how to have fun," Sorun claimed. "How'd you get into the king game so young, anyways? You said something about being taken away and brought here to take the crown up or something like that. What's the story with that?"

"That's quite the tale you're asking for," Elias said as he put down his cup. "I suppose it's only fair you know it since I already know the story of how you wound up here, and we've plenty of time. I'm willing to tell you if you truly desire it."

Did he desire it? Sorun wasn't really too sure. He was a bit interested in the Mobian's history, he'd be lying if he said he wasn't, and it wasn't like they had anything better to talk about at the moment. Sorun sure couldn't think of any topics that would probably interest the person sitting across from him. And he'd be damned if he'd get suckered into another game of chess.

"Sure, man. Go for it," Sorun said.

"Right. Ahem." Elias removed his hand from the cup and clasped his hands together on the table as he began. "When I was young, My mother and I were separated from the rest of our family. It was during the Great War, and our transport vessel had been shot down by Overlanders." He paused to gauge Sorun's reaction, though when it didn't budge an inch, he continued. "My mother was rendered comatose in the accident, though some... acquiescent echidna helped us after the crash. They put her in a type of stasis in order to stabilize her."

"She fine now?" Sorun asked.

Elias nodded. "Yes, she's quite alright. Thank you for asking. It was me and two older Mobians that were left, excluding my mother. Due to the war and us being, for lack of a better term, stranded, we... decided to start a life there," he explained. "I, ha... spent the majority of my youth as an adventurer exploring the island. That all came to a crashing halt when a detachment of kingdom's Secret Service happened upon me when the situation with Eggman had temporarily died down and my father, who had assumed the worst had happened to us, grew curious enough over our fate to send them. I'd helped them when situations arose, and it was decided I was to return to Knothole with them. The two Mobians who had been looking after me all that time, royal retainers who had survived the crash along with me and my mother, chose to stay behind while me and my then-comatose mother returned here." He exhaled and looked towards the courtyard. "My father turned his crown over to me, and... well, you know the rest. I left, came back with a family, and have been struggling to run this kingdom in the months since against Eggman's tyranny." He looked back towards Sorun. "Be truthful with me, Sorun... do you really think I'm doing an adequate job here? Because even after all this time I still have doubts."

Sorun hummed in response. "I can tell you right now that if I were in your shoes I woulda already ran this place into the ground. So you got that going for you."

At that, Elias made a humorless chuckle. "Forgive my bluntness, but I do not think that is a very high standard to surpass."

"I'll give you that one," Sorun agreed as he looked down into his tea. By now its consistency was the same as syrup with how much sugar he'd put into it, though when he drank from it he felt a happy feeling bloom in his chest. "Ohhhh, that's the good stuff..." he blissfully though as he licked the sweetness off from his teeth. "Do you even want to be king?" Sorun asked Elias as he set his cup down. "Because it kinda just sounds like you sorta, well... fell into the position."

"More like I was born into it, but... you're not entirely wrong." The squirrel shifted in his seat and leaned over across the table. "Sometimes I wonder what life would be like if I just stayed up on the island, or if I'd just stayed in that village where I met my Megan. I'm grateful for coming back here, having met my family, and healing my mother, and I can never repay the love and support they've all given me, but... oh, I don't know." He started to trace the lip of his teacup with his hand. "My father says I've a knack for the position- 'in the blood' he keeps claiming-, and I've managed to keep the kingdom afloat so far, but that does little to assuage my doubts."

"Why not just give Sally the crown?" Sorun asked. "You don't want it, she'd probably take it, and Elias, I'm telling you, Sally is really cut out for this leader thing. I've been working under her long enough to see it. She's got this kind of 'take charge, no-nonsense' attitude when she gets serious, you know? It's a stark contrast to how she acts usually." He made a "tsk" sound. "'Stark contrast'- Jesus, there I go again. Stupid tea makin' me talk weird."

Elias laughed a little. "I think I quite like your verbose side better than the norm. But you're correct. Beneath my sister's sweet exterior is a rather... fierce ruler."

Sorun nodded in agreement. "I'll be real. I'm too terrified of what she'd do to me if I ever disobeyed an order from her to ever defy her. Not that I would, she's super great, but there's no way I'm poking that dragon." There would be not telling what would happen if he did. He didn't even know what she'd do; just that he would regret it. It's why he'd been so apprehensive returning after he'd ran and how he was still counting his lucky stars he'd made it out without so much as a lecture. Or worse.

Not knowing what "worse" could possibly entail but knowing it was a distinct possibility made it so that Sorun decided to never, under any circumstances, make Sally upset. His backup plan in case that failed was to run behind Nicole in hopes that the AI could calm her down since they were rather close. He was confident in saying he was done for if all that failed.

"I can see that," Elias said with a nod and a small smile. "To be completely honest with you, she probably would be better in this position than me. But she's busy leading you and all the other Freedom Fighters, and beyond that, I'm the older sibling and a male. The crown defaults to me whether we like it or not."

"Oh, it's one of those deals, huh?" Old-timey monarchy rules, then. He should have figured when Elias looked so surprised when he told him of Earth's abandonment of the system, and while he knew it still operated here, he didn't know the monarchy rules ran that deep. "Do you happen to have another long-lost older brother that could take it for you?"

Elias scoffed. "If only," he said with a roll of his eyes. "It would be a different story if Sally officially married. Then I could hand the crown down to her so she could become queen and her husband king. But I fear I don't see that happening anytime soon with everything being the way it is."

"I hear that." Sorun picked up his teacup, thoughtfully rolled around its contents, and then downed the entire cup down in one swig. Elias watched him with raised eyes, flinching slightly when Sorun softly slammed the cup on the table. "Alright, fine, you convinced me. I'll marry Sally."

There was a moment of silence that passed where Elias processed his words. He sputtered out in complete shock right after, causing Sorun to snicker in amusement as he reached for his tea in order to calm himself. "So you've given up your pursuit for me and set your sights on my sister now? Is that how it is?" Elias sarcastically remarked as he set the cup down.

"Anything for that royal dosh, my dude," Sorun replied, a wide grin on his face.

The squirrel shook his head, half in amusement and half in exhaustion. "Well, then, congratulations to you and my sister. My sincerest thanks for relieving me of this position in order to take up the crown yourself despite your earlier claims of you having no skill in being a king. You truly are a kind soul for taking such a burden on yourself for my sake."

The grin on Sorun's face slowly began lowering. "... Oh yeah, that'd make me king, huh?" he realized. "Changed my mind, don't wanna marry Sally."

"Probably for the best," Elias said with a nod. "Honestly, I wouldn't think anything of it, but if father found out she married a human, and that human became king... I'm not sure his heart could take it. I severely doubt he'd even allow it."

"You know if I was actually serious about this I wouldn't let that stop me, right?" The grin fell away altogether as Sorun's form slumped. Elias had shaken his head meanwhile. "Real talk though, I'm... not really looking for a serious relationship or anything like that with anybody."

"Really?" Elias tilted his head in curiosity at the statement. "Why ever not?"

"Because I'm gonna die before I'd ever get anything meaningful off the ground," Sorun sadly thought, with those thoughts making his features turn a bit gloomy. He saw Elias's features twitch as a reaction to this, though, so he decided to make up an excuse. "Don't get me wrong, I think Mobians are great, it's just... I don't know if that's something I'm willing to do."

At Sorun's explanation, Elias froze and slowly started to narrow his eyes. "Why would somebody being a Mobian be a deciding factor for you...?" he slowly asked Sorun in an even tone.

The sudden shift in Elias' demeanor caused Sorun's back to go straight, and his eyes to dart back and forth as he thought up something else to try and diffuse any negative thoughts Elias was probably having. "Elias, I lived almost my whole life in a world exclusively inhabited by humans. I didn't even know what a Mobian was until a month ago. Cut me some slack here," Sorun said, breathing out in relief when he saw Elias relax slightly. "I'm not... totally against the idea," Sorun added as he began to nervously tap on the table, "but that-that's a big adjustment for me. And I'm still too busy dealing with everything else inside of my head to even start to try and mess around with that idea."

It wasn't technically a lie, though it was exaggerated a bit. He was more hesitant than willing to even consider such a thing, but, seeing as he'd die before he'd ever have to even consider relationships, he wasn't worried too much about it. He needed some excuse to get people off his back if they ever asked, though, if only so he could continually distance himself from the topic. The one he'd just invented seemed satisfactory enough for Elias, though, as the squirrel's form had relaxed completely.

"Fair enough, I suppose," Elias said, giving Sorun an understanding nod. "I have to wonder what people would say if you did do such a thing, though. To my knowledge there's never been a romantic relationship of any kind between a Mobian and an Overlander- er, human, excuse me."

"Gee, wonder why?" Sorun sarcastically remarked.

"Quite." Elias blinked and leaned forwards in his seat. "If you're open to the idea, though-"

"Implied, I implied I'm open to it," Sorun quickly interrupted. "I didn't say I definitely was. Hinted at best."

Elias waved a hand at Sorun's words. "As you say, as you say. I'm sorry if this is a bit forwards of me, Sorun, but at least hear me out. I realize you've certain reservations over the matter, and your other duties with the other Freedom Fighters may keep you preoccupied, but you know fully well that there are those in the Freedom Fighters that manage to balance their work and a fully functioning relationship."

Sorun sighed and went slack in his seat. "Elias, come on-"

"Just hear me out, please," Elias repeated. "I know your heartache over the loss of your home is great, but take it from somebody who found a significant other of their own when I say that having somebody at your side can help a great deal. It could maybe perhaps even help to clear your head so you could focus more on fighting."

"Nah, you ain't gonna get me by appealing to my pragmatic side. Good try, though, Kingy," Sorun thought with a shake of his head. "I get what you're saying, and you're not wrong, but... well, it's not not an option, I guess..."

The king sitting across from him seemed to pick up on Sorun's hesitancy, and then perked up in surprise. "You sound like you've already given this some thought," he noted.

"You don't know that for a fact," Sorun denied.

"Of course not," Elias replied in a knowing tone. "You've been here for long enough now and have gotten to know a number of people. It wouldn't be surprising at all to hear there was at least one person you've at least considered." A beat passed as he turned his head in thought. "It's obvious you were joking earlier, but... you haven't actually considered asking my sister-"

Sorun burst out in short laughter hearing that, interrupting Elias. "Me and Sally? Pffft. No way, man." He shook his head as the laughter died off his lips. "She's a wonderful person and all, but I'm not a brave enough boy for that. Godspeed to whoever does end up with her though, if anybody. They'll need it." He slowly exhaled as he leaned back in the chair. "But no, I haven't thought that way about anybody. Well, maybe... nah, nah." He shook his head. "I can't, man. I talked about the same thing with Antoine, so I'll tell you what I told him: I just want to focus on the war and fighting robots. After all that is done and over with?" His eyes became half-lidded as his shoulders slumped. "I'll, uh... I'll worry about everything else later. Alright?"

Elias didn't look so convinced, and for a moment Sorun was worried he'd press the argument. The Mobian sighed in resignation, however, and slowly nodded his head, which put Sorun at ease for the moment. "Very well," he sighed out. "It seems as though your mind is made up on the matter. I won't argue it with you any further. And I'll respect that you think that you need to wait until you're ready, but you should know I truly think you're fit as it is."

"So he says." He was probably right in all honesty, but Sorun just didn't know. It didn't change the fact he practically had a death counter over his head, though, and that killed pretty much any notion he had about any relationship period. He was already stretching it with the bonds he was making as-is. So whether Sorun was truly ready or something like that didn't matter. He plainly refused to go down that route due to it not mattering in the end.

"Oh, what's this?" The black-haired teen saw Elias sit up in his seat, and at the same time Sorun heard a few sets of footsteps began to approach from behind his position. He saw a warm smile bloom across Elias' face at the same time as he sat back down in his seat. "It seems we have some visitors."

"Really?" Sorun drawled out as he crossed his arms. "Who?"

"The rest of the family," Elias answered. "It seems my father is with them as well." He turned his head to Sorun with a bit of a strained smile. "He's a fair man, Sorun, but... can you please try to be patient with him if he says anything unintentionally untoward?"

"Mm. No promises." The answer didn't seem to satisfy Elias all that much, but he hung his head in silent resignation all the same. Sorun didn't care enough to be cordial towards somebody he was just about to meet if they had a problem with him. Maybe on a good day he would, if he was in the right mood. And while the day itself had been rather pleasant he just plainly wasn't in the mood.

In fact, he wasn't even in the mood to meet the rest of the Acorn family at all. He wondered if he could just leave right now and save himself from all of that.

"Should I just go, actually?" Sorun asked as he made a move to get up from his chair. "I can just leave if-"

"Nonsense, sit back down." Internally, Sorun was heavily cursing as Elias gestured for him to sit back down. Begrudgingly, Sorun did so. "I assure you they won't bite."

"Then what was with the warning about your dad?" Sorun wanted to ask, but the appearance of a brown squirrel Mobian in his peripheral vision caused him to keep his mouth shut. A female Mobian in a dress, cradling an infant in her arms. When he saw Elias smile warmly at the new woman, Sorun found himself shyly looking away from the couple while shuffling further into his seat.

"I didn't think I'd find you all the way out here," the woman fondly stated after stepping to Elias' side. "Is this your new friend that you've been talking about?"

Something inside of Sorun got tickled upon realizing there were people telling others they were friends with him, but this feeling fell to the wayside when he saw Elias nod at her. "Yes, it most certainly is." He turned his head to the teen attempting to shy away form them in his seat. "Sorun, this is my loving wife Megan and our daughter Alexis. Meg, this is Sorun, the human that joined the Freedom Fighters and has been a big help to everybody."

"I wouldn't say I've been that big a help," Sorun quietly mumbled as he shuffled around in his seat. "I punched and stabbed a couple robots. That practically nothing compared to what everybody else has done."

"Oh, don't be so modest." When Sorun looked back upon hearing that statement, he almost had to look away again when he saw Megan beaming a large smile at him. "I'm always overhearing Sally tell Eli about how glad she is you became a part of the team."

It sounded to Sorun like he was being given too much credit, but he'd take any positives about himself he could get at this point. He saw that the child wrapped in a bundle of clothing was beginning to stir in Megan's grasp, and then he saw the brown-furred head of the squirrel infant lift up and turn towards Sorun. The human locked eyes with Alexis, the two being completely still for whole seconds as they silently stared at each other.

And then Alexis started crying.

Sorun's eyes widened in surprise when the infant started crying just at the sight of him, and he found himself shuffling further into his seat with an uncomfortable look on his face. Megan, still holding Alexis, was trying her best to sooth the child. Elias had even gone far enough to get up out of his own chair to try to assist his wife in calming their child while Sorun watched on.

"Why do kids always gotta ruin everything?" Sorun thought. He saw a third Mobian figure rush forwards to try an assist the couple with the child, and from a brief glance he saw a number of features on her that were similar to enough to Sally that he had a pretty good assumption on who she was. That assumption was all but confirmed when he heard her speak to Elias.

"Are you sure you don't need help with her, dear?" Came the worrying tone from the older woman.

"Mother, I'm telling you we're fine," Elias claimed, though the distressed tone to his voice implied otherwise.

Squeak.

There was something menacing about that metallic squeak Sorun heard right next to him. He wasn't sure what it was, just that, for whatever reason, he really didn't like it. He almost hesitated in turning his head towards the source just to see what it was, but he found his answer when he saw the wheels of a wheelchair out of the corner of his vision. He felt a bit better knowing it was just somebody in a wheelchair that stopped next to him, and the newfound courage allowed him to fully turn his head to the side.

All that courage immediately withered when he saw the Mobian sitting in that wheelchair and staring right at Sorun.

Sorun's first and likely correct assumption was that he was Elias' father, the former king. The teen remembered all too late of Elias telling him he was bound to a wheelchair these days. He was a squirrel like him, albeit much older-looking, especially with the white hair. He also gave off a very stern aura that seem to be directed right at Sorun, and the piercing gaze he was giving the human wasn't helping matters all that much. But, despite that, Sorun managed to muster up some newfound resolve within him and managed to turn his body just slightly to address the former king.

"Kids, huh?" Sorun asked, referencing to the crying child near them while nodding his head at the other.

"Yes. Kids," The aged Mobian replied as he turned his head towards Alexis. "It's quite strange. I live in the castle alongside my son and his step-daughter, and I can tell you from experience that the child rarely ever cries, especially with her parents present. I find it a bit odd how she became so distressed at the mere sight of you."

Sorun frowned. The undertone to his voice wasn't lost on him, and though Elias had warned him of such, and Sorun didn't even blame him, he at least wanted to try getting on good footing with the man. "I would like to point out that I am from a completely different zone where Mobians don't exist and have been nothing but help to everybody within Knothole upon my arrival here," Sorun carefully said. "But maybe I'm getting ahead of myself. My name is Sorun."

"... Maximillian Acorn. Of the Royal House of Acorn." The Mobian turned his head back towards Sorun, and to somewhat the human's relief his features softened just the tiniest amount. "You'll have to forgive me. Your circumstances were made clear to me and I've been made aware you have been putting considerable effort towards the sake of the kingdom. For that you have my sincerest thanks. If I seem a bit off by your presence you'll have to realize that I have had little, if any, positive brushes with your kind."

"The war, yeah, I know," Sorun responded with a nod. "To be fair it's technically not my kind 'cause, again, different zone, but I get what you mean. Don't worry about it." To be honest, a single thanks for his efforts was a lot more than he had been expecting out of the man. He was expecting complete animosity towards him as a worst-case scenario, and while Maximillian didn't exactly seem overjoyed to be in Sorun's presence, he seemed to at least be willing to be fair with Sorun and give him a chance. He'd take that much alone without any hesitation.

Besides. They didn't exactly have to like each other in order to get along. Maximillian seemed to understand this sentiment as well as Sorun did based on the looks they gave one another, which caused the aged squirrel to scoff and turn back forwards.

"Right, how contentious of me," Maximillian said. "My apologies if I seem a bit overbearing towards you."

"Hey, man, as long as I don't get any grief for no good reason we're square."

Maximillian hummed. "Of course. I'm glad we understand each other." His eyes glanced towards the table, lingering on the tea cups and chess board, followed by him glancing back at Sorun. "You truly came all the way out here just to have an afternoon with my son?"

"Technically he was the one that invited me, but yeah," Sorun answered with a shrug. "I actually am friends with some Mobians, you know, your son included. I wouldn't be fighting for my life here if I actually didn't want to help save you all."

"I'm duly aware of this fact."

He didn't sound like he was, but he at least seemed genuine enough. That would have been good enough for Sorun, Though he was suddenly reminded of an important question he wanted to ask. Since they were on speaking terms at the moment and Sorun doubted he'd ever actively seek the former king to talk to him again or vice versa, he decided to ask now before he forgot again.

"... Hey, Maximillian, sir." The "sir" part almost made Sorun cringe, but he wanted to be as respectful as possible as to not cause any undue ire from Maximillain. It seemed to do the trick, as the squirrel turned his head towards Sorun to give him his attention. "You know that wooden tablet? You know, the one with the coordinates that brought me here? The one passed down in your royal family?" Sorun asked. "Tails told me they had to burn it because the tablet had instructions on it that said I couldn't see it. That honestly sounds really weird to me, but ignoring that for now... what was actually the deal with that tablet? It was in your family and you're the oldest one, so you'd know most, right?"

That tablet had been nothing but a constant hole being burned into the back of Sorun's mind, because that wood slab had been the sole reason his life had been ruined by being dragged here in the first place. There were so many questions he had about it that nobody seemed to have the answers to. Like who made it and why it seemed to be able to predict the future. Why it had coordinates pointing to a grocery store in Detroit in a whole other universe. Why Sorun couldn't have been allowed to see it.

The last one in particular really had him interested, but he doubted he'd ever get an answer to that, especially considering it was gone now. But maybe Maximillian, being the current elder of the Acorn family, would have at least some answers for Sorun. It wasn't like there was anybody else more likely than him.

Maximillian slowly nodded at Sorun's question, and then looked up in thought. "All things considered, you have a right to know. I'll tell you what I can." He looked back towards Sorun. "That wood tablet had been in the care of the Acorn family since the time of its founder, my ancestor Alexander. As the story goes, the Kingdom of Acorn, still in its budding youth, had mysteriously come under assault by a band of strange creatures. It's said that the kingdom's defenses were powerless in overcoming these creatures, though before any serious casualties occurred a mysterious stranger foreign to the kingdom, wielding what was described as a strange sword, vanquished the creatures."

Sorun, had been listening intently to the story, tilted his head with a questioning look on his face. "A mysterious stranger just came in and took care of the problem? Just like that?" He snapped his fingers for emphasis. "Who were they?"

The former king shook his head. "That, I cannot say, as the details were lost to history. This story comes from when my own father passed down the tablet to me when it was my turn to overlook it. He told me that, when my ancestor King Alexander went to thank this mysterious stranger for helping rid the kingdom of this menace, the stranger had presented to him the tablet with the single request to keep it protected by the royal family and to not have it read by anybody else other than the current king of the Kingdom of Acorn at a specific date during a time of great duress." He paused to take in a breath as Sorun absorbed his words. "The date arrived, and my son, the current king, read it along with the Freedom Fighters in the midst of the conflict with Eggman. Due to its seemingly prophetic writings they chose to follow its instructions. That is all I know, I'm afraid."

"So... the tablet was given to the Kingdom of Acorn. To the current king at the time no less," Sorun thought. "A mysterious stranger. And a specific time to read the tablet. A tablet with specific coordinates."

To the mysterious stranger, Sorun hadn't a clue; it was too vague for him to draw any conclusions. But it almost sounded like that not only was that portal meant to open at that grocery store, but that it was supposed to be opened at that specific time. And he just happened to be the only living soul even around at the time it opened. Not even that store employee he'd run into minutes prior had been there.

Was it just sheer coincidence that he happened to be there? Was it meant for somebody else, and the Freedom Fighters had just opened it an hour or two too early or late? The way Aurora and Athair described it implied any human from Earth could gain powers from absorbing Chaos Emeralds since nobody from Sorun's zone had a natural bond to the Chaos Force due to its nonexistence there. By that logic any human should have done.

So why was there a specific date tied to the contingency of not reading the tablet until a great conflict arose that necessitated its use? It had illustrations according to the other Freedom Fighters that suggested it predicted that conflict to be Eggman. But Eggman had been a problem for over a decade now with the world. So why now? Because this was at its worst?

And why the fuck did it predict Sorun liking orange juice back when Tails brought him that glass way back when?

"... I don't like how any of this sounds." Too many implications, too little information or proof to confirm or deny any of Sorun's suspicions. And much to his frustration, nobody had the answers he sought. Anything that even might have held a clue was nothing but ashes now. "It was just random chance I was the one that got pulled through the portal, right? Was it? I just don't know." With a sigh, he stood up off his chair. "Well, whatever. No use worrying over things I can't control. What's done is done."

"Thanks, Maximillian," Sorun muttered, stretching his stiff arms behind his back from having sat down for so long.

"The least I could do," the aged Mobian replied. "Did I answer any questions you had?"

"No, you just gave me a million more. But thanks anyways." He began stepping away from the wheelchair-bound Mobian towards the trio in front of him dealing with the child. Fortunately Alexis had calmed down by now as evidenced by the lack of crying sounds, and from what Sorun saw there were relieved faces all around that the child had finally calmed.

Well, at least some people were at ease. Sorun couldn't say he was in that group after his talk with Maximillian.

"Oh, Sorun!" The first to notice his approach was Elias, who then moved a couple of steps forwards to greet the approaching human. "Is everything well?"

"... Yeah." He glanced back at the Mobian sitting in the wheelchair behind him, and then looked back at Elias. "That your mom?" he asked, nodding his head to the older Mobian woman standing behind Elias.

"Hm? Oh, yes." Elias turned and gestured a hand out to her. "My mother, Alicia."

The older woman smiled at Sorun and waved in his direction. He met her gaze briefly to wave back, and then turned back to Elias. "Listen, man, it was great coming out here to spend and afternoon with you and meeting the family and all that, but I gotta get going. I got things to do."

By that he really meant that he was too unsettled by what Maximillian had told him to focus on anything else for the rest of the day, but fortunately Elias didn't look too far into Sorun's words and simply nodded in understanding. "Alright. I trust you'll be able to find your way back?"

"Yeah, I'll just go around the castle. Don't worry about it." Because there was no way he was taking the short way back through the castle. He'd get lost within the minute and never get out. He couldn't understand why they had to make the interior layout of castles so confusing.

"In that case, I'll bid you farewell," Elias said. "I'd say we should do this again sometime, but attaining free time to myself is a rare occurrence these days, and I'm sure that being a Freedom Fighter is an equally time-consuming position, so..."

"I get it. Don't worry about it." Sorun began walking backwards, waving a goodbye to Elias and the other members of his family standing behind him. "It was fun, Kingy. Have a good one."

Elias and the rest waved back to Sorun as he continued to walk away. He turned around when he got enough of the happy looks they were sending his way, his eyes briefly crossing Maximillian as he stepped away. The aged Mobian found it in himself to give Sorun a silent nod, which the human responded to by nodding in turn. He also chose to walk even faster in order to get away from them all as quickly as possible.

"I guess Elias is a pretty nice guy. Kinda rough how he got blindsided by this king position he's holding, but it looks like he's doing well enough now. Not surprising seeing how he's got such a great family. Good for him. Don't think his dad likes me too much, but eh, I can see why he'd be so salty over humans. 'Least he gave me a fair chance, which is honestly more than I could have asked for from the guy. All that stuff with the tablet, though... man, I really wish they didn't burn that thing. I woulda liked to have a look at it." He hummed in thought. "That thing must have been old, too,

There was no use thinking about it now, but it would have been nice to at least get some hint towards why things were the way they were. It would have been far from closure, but it would have been something for Sorun. At the very least it could have helped some of the questions he had.

But it was fine. His path was the same whether he knew the reason behind it all or not. He just would have liked to know why things were the way they were at the very least before he died. But he supposed it didn't matter much either way.

He needed a nap.

Chapter 28

Recursion Error

Episode 28- Defend that other kingdom

Technology on Mobius was always a strange subject to Sorun. In most areas of tech it was lightyears ahead of anything Earth had ever produced, but yet, at the same time, there were times all this advanced technology didn't look advanced. Eggman's machines, for instance. There had been a time he'd been bored enough and curious enough to ask about them and Tails had gone as far as to show him a half-disassembled Egg Pawn he had just hung up in his workshop. The internal components and circuitry were so unbelievably advanced that Sorun got lost pretty much immediately in trying to figure out the mass of metal and electronics under that shell.

None of that changed the fact that there was something... childish about their design. They were all threatening, for sure, but at the same time they weren't what Sorun pictured when envisioning and advanced, streamlined design. It was the same with computers, too, like the one in the HQ's labs. Nicole had shown him the specs when he'd asked out of curiosity, and he was surprised to find that thing was pumping out more processing power and speed than any computer he'd ever heard of on Earth. It made sense to him why they had to keep that lab so cold if it was performing that hard. But again, nothing about that computer screamed "incredibly advanced" at a first glance. It looked below average, if anything. Even the user interface looked like something out of the nineties.

And then there were things like the vehicle he was riding in right now. A straight-up flying saucer. Admittedly it only hovered a few feet off the ground, but it was still a saucer-shaped vehicle that floated. That counted as far as he was concerned. He didn't even know where that fell on the spectrum of performance versus external design.

Currently he was laying down on his back, fingers interlaced behind his head with one leg slung over the other as he stared up at the daytime sky and the clouds rapidly passing by his vision due to the speeding vehicle he was in. He had been napping for the first few hours of the trip, but he'd eventually woken up and couldn't go back to sleep. This lead him to staring up at the sky while deep in thought, though even that grew dull after a while.

With a soft groan, he sat up in the saucer and turned around. The only other two occupants of the saucer with him was the golden-furred squirrel driving it and the black and red armadillo sitting on the edge of the saucer and watching the forest and trees pass by them. Sorun yawned, rubbed at his eyes, and then slowly made his way towards the edge of the saucer before sitting down on the edge next to the Mobian.

"Hey," Sorun muttered in greeting. Mighty flicked his eyes in Sorun's direction to acknowledge his new presence, and then stared back forwards at the trees. Sorun did same. "So what's the deal with this Mercia place we're heading towards? I've heard of it, but I've never really looked that deep into it."

"It's a small kingdom of Mobians. Not nearly as big as the Kingdom of Acorn, but they get by. Had a bunch of rough patches with Robotnik back in the day, but they recovered well enough up until he got his hands on the seven Chaos Emeralds," Mighty airily replied. "The people there kept getting into skirmishes with his forces after that, though they've managed to scrape by with help our help from time to time. But I guess something major happened for them to send that messenger to Knothole."

"Yeah, about that, who uses an actual mail carrier to deliver messages anymore?" Sorun asked with a quirked eyebrow. "There's a whole communications network back at the HQ. They couldn't have just used that and saved the poor guy a whole trip across the continent to hand Sally a letter?"

The guy had even been a pigeon Mobian of all things. Dressed in a green leotard. He just knew it had to be outside of the norm when even other Mobians had been giving him an odd look right before he collapsed on the ground from exhaustion after handing Sally that letter that was written on parchment. Not paper like everybody else he'd seen in Knothole use. Actual old-school parchment. Apparently there was an issue in the Kingdom of Mercia, and since the Kingdom of Acorn were allies with them, it was decided that a detachment of Freedom Fighters were to be sent.

Sorun was lucky enough to be a part of that team.

Mighty shrugged at the human's question. "Mercia isn't really all that advanced technologically speaking. They're kinda old-fashioned like that."

"Yeah, but still, parchment ...?"

"Don't know what to tell ya. They just have a different way of doing things over here."

Sorun tilted his head in Mighty's direction. The armadillo seemed a lot more sullen than what he was usually accustomed to seeing. Every time Sorun saw him his demeanor had been relaxed and overall happy. But right now it almost seemed like he was despondent from the way he was blankly staring ahead at the trees passing them by. He even noticed that Ray would tear his attention away from driving to look at him sometimes, like he was attempting to check to make sure he was alright.

"Usually I'm the quiet, sulky guy. What's his problem?" Sorun tapped Mighty's shoulder to gain his attention, earning a sideways glance from the armadillo. "Something the matter? You seem a bit more quiet than normal," Sorun noted, his concern completely masked by his otherwise impassive expression and tone.

"Mercia doesn't really hold that many fond memories for me," Mighty answered.

"Hmm. Okay."

"..." Mighty's ears perked up, and he turned his head further towards Sorun. "You're not gonna ask anything else? Not why I'm not really excited to go there or anything like that?"

To the armadillo's surprise, Sorun shook his head. "I'm not really in the business of prying into people's backstories unless they ask or offer to tell me. Past is the past. I'd rather just focus on the future. Plus it's kinda rude to just pry like that outta nowhere." Not to mention he had better things to worry about than whatever was plaguing Mighty. Besides, he was tough. Sorun was sure he would be fine.

An inquisitive look overcame Mighty's features. "Most people would see trying to pry into people's past as a way of trying to figure out what's making them upset so they can help. I wouldn't see it as you being rude if you asked."

Sorun rose an eyebrow. "Do you want me to ask? Or even talk about it to begin with?"

Mighty's ears fell flat. "Well, no, not really..."

"Then why are we having this conversation?"

"... Heh. You got me there," Mighty admitted with a sigh. "Thanks for lookin' out for me, but I'll be fine. Don't worry."

"Never said I was." With that said, Sorun scooted away from the saucer's edge and back into its circular interior. He cast one final glance back at Mighty, and then shifted his view towards Ray.

The brightly-colored squirrel had mainly focused his efforts on flying the saucer they were riding in forwards at this point. Feeling a bit mischievous, Sorun slowly crept up to the Mobian's back, taking care to keep a low stance as to not be easily seen. He slowly leaned in towards the back of Ray's head while holding his breath, and then, when he was close enough, said, "Yo, Ray!" in a bit louder than necessary voice.

Hearing his name be called so suddenly caused Ray's hands to fumble on the controls, making the saucer wobble slightly. He scrambled to take back the controls and reorient the saucer, all the while having to listen to Sorun's snickering from behind him. He glanced back towards the human with a none-too-pleased look, with Mighty at the rear looking even more irritated due to almost having fallen off the saucer. Sorun was just grinning.

"C-can you please try not to d-do that?" Ray asked as he turned his head back forwards. "I'm trying to drive."

"Sure, sure." Sorun nodded in agreement and stepped a bit forwards, lowered himself in a crouch besides Ray. "I know we're going to Mercia, but is there a specific destination we had in mind or what?"

"M-most of the inhabitants of Mercia live in a s-settlement inside of the Deerwood Forest. It's-it's where we're going," Ray informed him as he steered past a dense thicket of trees. "Actually, I think... yeah, that's it up there."

With that, Ray pulled the wheel back in order to bring the floating saucer's speed down. Soon enough it came to a complete halt, prompting the trio to step over and hop out of the saucer. Sorun, once his boots hit the ground, took the moment to step forwards a bit to observe the surroundings in front of him.

It was definitely a Mobian settlement as far as he could see. Lots of colorful Mobians were running around doing whatever. What surprised him was the actual structure of the settlement itself: it didn't lie in a large clearing of trees to make room for a lot of homes and structures like he was normally accustomed to seeing, but rather from what he saw a majority of homes were up in the trees. Dozens upon dozens of wood structures were suspended high in the treetops, with a complex system of bridges and ladders connecting everything together. There were some structures on the ground, as well, but from what Sorun observed those were few and far in-between compared to everything up above. In fact, there were more giant piles of logs strewn about on the ground than actual houses.

"Well, this is certainly different." Sorun slowly began traversing into the settlement, Mighty and Ray following closely behind. He couldn't help but note the looks that were being sent their way, though he was somewhat put at ease at seeing they were all mostly curious looks, even if a majority were aimed at him. "Antoine said his family's from here, didn't he? Am I gonna have to deal with a bunch of French-speaking people I can barely even understand? Agh, why'd she choose to send me along and not him?"

"Good morrow there, sir!"

"... Eh?" His ears perking up from the voice, Sorun tilted his head up just in time to see a Mobian figure drop down from one of the bridges above and land right in front of Sorun. He about had a stroke when he took a look at the newcomer's features. "Oh dear god, not another one..."

He almost mistook him from Sonic at first glance, as the hedgehog he was looking at looked about the same. The fur color was off, though. More of a teal color than the solid blue he recognized as Sonic having. He was pretty sure Sonic never wore a brown hood and carried around a bow and some arrows, but aside from that and the brown boots in place of the usual red sneakers, the guy was a dead ringer for Sonic.

Sure didn't talk like him, though, which Sorun rapidly began to discover once the hedgehog began speaking again.

"Good tidings, stranger!" the hedgehog greeted in an accent that already began grating on Sorun's nerves. "Prithee, may I ask where thou hails from and what thou's intentions are?"

"Fuck me, he's speaking in some old school English. I know Mighty said these guys were kinda backwards, but damn, he didn't tell me the half of it..." It wasn't exactly a dialect he was fond of, but he'd put all that aside for the pressing business. "We're from Knothole," Sorun slowly said in a strained voice, the muscles in his face struggling to resist from grimacing. "You asked for help."

The teal hedgehog blinked at Sorun in surprise, and then leaned a bit to the side to get a better look behind him. His eyes lit up in recognition when he saw the other two Mobians standing behind Sorun, and then proceeded to look back towards the human's face. "Ah, so it is! I recognize friend Ray and friend Mighty, but I do believe we have never met, good sir."

"I'm Sorun," the teen greeted. "Sorun the Freedom Fighter, a horribly ironic title given my current circumstances. But that's neither here nor there." He gestured to the hedgehog. "Who're you?"

"My name, good sir, is Rob O' the Hedge, king of the Kingdom of Mercia." He even went as far as to do a highly-sophisticated bow right in front of Sorun, which had him feeling more uncomfortable than honored from how low the hedgehog had bowed down. That along with the accent forced him to take a step backwards. "'Tis unfortunate, but I fear any further formalities must be halted o'er the foul evil approaching our good lands," Rob continued as he straightened back up. "'Twas the reason I sent for the Knothole Freedom Fighters. My sincerest thanks for having arrived here post-haste, my friends."

Sorun slowly nodded along, and then held up his index finger to stop Rob from speaking. "... Hold that thought." He backed up away from the hooded hedgehog, and then turned around to his two companions. He leaned in close to Mighty in particular, holding a hand up to his mouth to try and conceal his words. "Mighty, I don't wanna deal with this guy. Can you talk to him?" he asked in a hushed whisper.

The armadillo cocked his head back, a questioning look creasing his features. "Uh, Sorun, I don't-"

"Dude, come on, I can barely understand half of what this guy is saying," Sorun desperately whispered to him. "You got more experience with them anyways. I'll wash your socks or whatever as thanks, just do me this solid!"

It was more that he just didn't want to deal with that accent Rob was speaking in more than anything else. That added to the fact he looked like Sonic was setting off a lot of warning flags in Sorun's annoyance indicator. It was perhaps a bit biased of Sorun, and now that he thought it over he realized he may be acting a tad bit unfair here, but these days his tolerance for bullshit was astronomically low. He just wanted to help these people as soon as possible so they could all leave.

At first Mighty looked like he wanted to decline, which had Sorun worried, but after glaring at the human's pleading face for a few moments the armadillo sighed and nodded his head. "Alright, fine. I'll go to Rob and assess the situation. You two do whatever until I get back with you."

"That sounds like a great plan, Mighty." Sorun clapped the red-shelled Mobian on the back and stepped aside. Mighty rolled his eyes in response, but otherwise chose to walk forwards towards Rob, who had been watching the exchange with some curiosity.

Watching as the two Mobians began conversing and walking away from him and Ray, Sorun allowed himself a small breath of victory. That was one item of potential stress eliminated for the time being. The actual source of his stress, the mission they were on, was still a prevalent force hanging over him, but that would be dealt with in due time once Mighty got back to tell them what they were actually doing here. That left him and Ray plenty of time to do... something.

"... So, uh... what, what should we do?" Sorun found himself asking as he turned towards Ray. "Should we, like, help out or something?"

"I don't know. Everything l-looks fine to me," Ray noted as he took a look around the settlement. Sorun did so as well, looking up at the homes in the trees and the Mobians walking around on the ground and on the bridges above. Everybody had gone back to their own devices for the most part, though there was a certain tenseness hanging in the air that was not lost on the two Freedom Fighters. "Everybody s-seems a bit nervous, though."

"Probably because of whatever's going down that needed us to come all the way out to another continent," Sorun reasoned as both he and the yellow squirrel began walking in a random direction. "But, it'll be fine. We'll fix whatever's going on then head back home. Hope Virgil's doin' okay. I left him with Jules to feed him, but the li'l guy gets real antsy whenever I leave for a mission."

"But what if we can't fix what's going on?" By now Sorun had interlaced his hands behind his head as the pair continued walking, though Sorun had tilted his head to the shorter male in response to Ray's question. "I-it's just the three of us, and I-I know you and Mighty are real strong but-"

"Ray." Sorun's calm and even tone snapped the squirrel out of whatever trance he had been, making him look up to Sorun. "I don't care what the problem here is. Whatever it is, we're gonna fix it." He looked back ahead as his features creased slightly. "We came here to save people, so we're not gonna do a half-baked job and leave these people to whatever messed-up scheme Eggman's made up. We're saving everybody here."

What was the point of him giving up his life for the planet if he didn't go all-in? Maximum effort wasn't exactly the norm for him, but seeing as this was it , he didn't see a reason not to. And it wasn't like he wasn't going to try and save as many people with his powers as he could anyways before finally dying. It'd leave a bad taste in his mouth and reflect poorly on the Freedom Fighters, and they all didn't deserve that. So maximum effort it was, if only it meant he got to vent more of his rage out on the robots.

When he looked back towards Ray, he saw the yellow Mobian looking up at him with shaking eyes. He shyly smiled and began pulling on his short, blue jacket as a small laugh left him. "You sound just as brave as Mighty is," he said. "I think it suits you."

At that, Sorun scoffed. "It ain't bravery, Ray. It's consummate professionalism. It's me wanting to spite Eggman as much as possible by wrecking his plans." A few seconds passed, and a small breath left his mouth. "And... I don't really like seein' people suffer, so... yeah. We're gonna help everybody here not matter what." He looked up at the tree canopies, hands still clasped behind his head. "Besides, you know how disappointed everybody would be if we messed up and let everybody here down? We got a title to uphold here, man."

"Ha-ha! Yeah. Yeah, you're right." Ray's smile turned a bit more confident, and he cast a thankful look towards Sorun. "Thanks, Sorun. I really needed that."

Sorun hummed and looked back down at the squirrel. "Er, that wasn't me being motivational, that was just me thinking aloud- you know what, I'll take it. Sure, no problem." The pair stopped after walking a fair distance in what was... actually just another part of the settlement seeing as nothing about the surroundings changed. "Mighty's probably gonna take a bit to get back to us with the situation," Sorun muttered as he moved his hands to the pockets of his sleeveless hoodie.

"Yeah," Ray agreed with a nod. "Do you think we should maybe split up to see if we can help around? Like you said."

An apprehensive sound left Sorun's throat. "I was kinda more just talking about the mission as a whole, but, ah... sure, if you wanna grind out a few side quests before that, go for it." He turned towards a nearby log and began walking towards it. "You've been here before, right?"

"On a mission a couple months ago, yeah," Ray confirmed with a nod.

"Then you know the layout and people a lot better than I do," Sorun said as he sat down on the log. "I'm gonna sit here and contemplate life and all the decisions that've lead me to this point." He held up his left hand, the sheathed Yamato appearing in his grasp. "If something bad happens, you know where me and Mighty are."

"Okay, got it." Ray nodded towards the human, and then turned around and began walking off. Sorun watched him go for a few moments before sighing and leaning back on the log, Yamato resting in his lap.

"Good guy, Ray. Bit shy, but his heart's in the right place along with the rest of the Freedom Fighters. Not really that surprising, I guess. They're all great people." Sorun felt his eyes close as he began thinking. "Hope Mighty's doing alright. Guy seems kinda angsty about Mercia, so I feel a bit bad leaving him with the king of the place. Rob seemed like a nice enough guy, though. But that accent... egh..." He had to stick his tongue out at the mere thought. "I was expecting French, not something out of a medieval play. Makes sense, I guess. From the map I saw this place used to be a part of Europe."

Yet again he was left wondering how the dialect, or any dialect, really, managed to survive the world getting reset by the gene bombs. He'd quit questioning these things a while ago and had just chosen to quietly accept it, as there were a lot of oddities on Mobius that he chalked up to the logic being a bit screwy here due to it being an alternate universe. It's the only explanation he found that made even a modicum sense.

Well, regardless of how strange he found the people's way of speaking here, and how he frankly he wasn't a fan of it, they all still seemed like good people. A bit backwards like Mighty had said, sure, but good nonetheless. And people were people. He'd already promised himself that he'd save the whole planet no matter what.

"Is this seat taken?"

Sorun had heard the new voice, a smooth male's voice, but he chose not to open his eyes and instead merely shrugged. "It's a free log, man. Go for it."

"Many thanks."

The pale teen felt a new presence sit down on the log next to him in silence. He would have liked for it to have ended there so he could have kept thinking to himself, but he could innately feel the eyes of whoever had just sat down become attached to Sorun. He quietly sighed and leaned forwards into a normal sitting position, and then opened his eyes so he could look at the newcomer.

From a single glance, he saw it was a deer Mobian, with antlers and everything. Somebody dressed in brown robes who had exceedingly kind eyes. Kind eyes that were aimed straight at Sorun, which put the teen a bit off as he chose to scoot back a few inches away. Nice or not, he didn't know how to feel about a complete stranger looking at him like that.

"If you wanna talk then just say so. It's really creepy when I open my eyes and the first thing I see is some stranger staring so intently at me," Sorun said.

The deer chuckled lightly. "My apologies. I was just considering how to best proceed with starting a conversation. You looked a bit lost."

"I'm not lost. I'm contemplating my life and the decisions I've made that have taken me here."

"Ah, the art of inner reflection, I see. And what have your findings told you?"

"That I'm an utter fool."

The deer laughed a bit more loudly when he heard that. Sorun allowed himself a small smile, too, though it was quickly wiped off when he looked to the side. Eventually the deer calmed down and refocused on Sorun.

"Forgive my outburst, but it's not often I find that many people so blunt."

"I don't have the patience for anything but blunt," Sorun replied. "That a thing you do often? Talk to people about their inner turmoils? What're you, a priest?"

"More of a friar, really," the deer answered, "which, coincidentally, happens to be my name."

Sorun tilted his head. "Friar the Deer?"

"Friar Buck."

"'Course," Sorun sighed as he brought his right hand up to rub at his eyes. "I'm Sorun. You seriously just come here to observe my mental state, or did you just wanna come look at the human Freedom Fighter?"

"I try not to let such insignificant things cloud my judgement, which, I'm happy to say, is the same for most people in Mercia." Friar's eyes traveled down to the katana in Sorun's hand. "I must admit, though, your weapon is strange to my eyes."

"You hang around me long enough and everything starts being strange." The teen held the sword up higher for the Mobian to see. "It's meaning would be pretty appropriate to somebody like you. Yamato. The Dark Slayer. A sword whose purpose is to divide and wipe out the darkness." He scoffed and put the sword back in his lap. "Well, that's how the saying goes, anyways. It's actually just a magic sword that separates everything. Makes fighting robots real easy."

Friar hummed in contemplation, his eyes traveling up from the sword to the teen's face. "Truly a noble cause for a sword," he said, "but what of its wielder?"

A sardonic laugh left Sorun at hearing the question. "Oh, there ain't nothing noble about that guy," he claimed as he turned his head to the deer. "Friar, I'm possibly the angriest and saddest teenager on the face of the planet. And that's really messed up when you consider how much everybody else in the world has suffered because of Eggman."

"Hence you calling yourself a fool?" Friar questioned. "Pardon my asking, but how is it that a human wound up joining the Knothole Freedom Fighters to begin with? As I understand it your people are on the other side of the world from them."

"Are you asking for real or is this just idle chat?"

"I ask because I believe it is my purpose to help sooth the minds of others," the Mobian calmly answered. "The fact this sometimes means I must join my friends in combating the evil that plagues the land is an unfortunate side effect, though I tend to leave the fighting to them."

Sorun rose an eyebrow in surprise. "Oh, so you're part of the Mercian Freedom Fighters, then." He wasn't even surprised. Freedom Fighters seemed to be drawn to Sorun like a magnet. He never expected a friar of all things to be one, though. In fact he never expected to meet a friar to begin with.

The offer was tempting. Talking to a priest was something Sorun had never, ever partaken in during the duration of his life due to his complete detachment of any sort of religion, and while this was a total stranger, he'd grown somewhat overly trustful of Mobians. And this person seemed sincere, and the fact he was a friar and a Freedom Fighter did nothing but add credibility to Sorun's perspective of him.

But was he really going to bother him with his mental problems, though? He didn't think he should, but on the other hand... well, maybe there were things he could tell him that he wouldn't dare talk to some of the others back in Knothole about. Maybe to help put him at ease. If nothing else, it'd be a good way to kill time. It wasn't like he had anything better to do.

"Everything I say will be confidential, right?" Sorun hesitantly asked as he bit at his lower lip.

The deer nodded. "You needn't worry about a thing. My only interest is in aiding a troubled soul who needs help."

"... Fuck it. I could use some spiritual guidance." He rolled his eyes at that statement, but otherwise nodded in acceptance. "I'll give you the condensed version, so buckle up, Buck." The teen took in a deep breath and began speaking. "I'm from a different universe entirely. Got pulled in through a portal to this zone by the Freedom Fighters because prophetic shenanigans. Can never go back to my home again because of further shenanigans. Joined the Freedom Fighters since I'm stuck on Mobius forever."

Sorun himself was almost shocked that he'd been able to summarize most of his plight, minus some important details such as his inevitable death. Amazing how living the life he just described put everything in such a small perspective. Friar seemed much more taken back by the explanation, though to his credit he seemed to recover from it fairly quickly after clearing his throat.

"Ahem. Well, that is... certainly more baggage for the soul than I'm used to seeing," he admitted with a shy laugh. "I imagine you must feel great conflict over all that."

The pale teen fixed the deer with a blank look. "All that world-shattering stuff I just said just washed off you like water, huh?" he dryly stated.

A wry grin came to Friar's mouth. "Such is the consequence of a holy man, I suppose."

"Why am I not surprised?" Sorun muttered with a shake of his head. "It's not that I'm mad at them anymore. I saw where they were coming from, and yeah, losing my zone sucks, but I'm slowly getting past that. None of that's the issue anymore. I just... never told anybody the full truth of things. It doesn't really matter in the end, but I just keep wondering how everybody's gonna react when it happens."

"Is there a reason you never confided these truths to anybody?"

Sorun scoffed. "There was a time I wanted to tell people, but there were... things holding me back from doing so, no matter how hard I tried." His free hand briefly reached up and rubbed at his neck, and then brushed past his chest as it lowered back to his side. "Now it's the opposite. I don't want to tell them since it would inhibit my abilities as a Freedom Fighter, but at the end it'll... I'm just worried about how it'll affect them. And it's frustrating, because there's nobody I can talk about this to. Because how am I supposed to tell people there's a terrible secret I'm keeping and ask for help with it when I don't want them to know what it is?"

How would they react to his death? That, he wasn't so sure of. There'd likely be grieving, especially due to the fact he'd ingratiated himself so far into them despite his moderate efforts. And he was confident they'd quickly manage to pull themselves back together. They were all accustomed to loss, after all. At the end he'd just be another casualty, albeit one that had tipped the scaled in their favor if he played his cards right. He liked to think he'd at least be remembered, though, which was a slightly comforting fact.

Did absolutely nothing about the knowledge he was gonna die, but it helped a little.

"There's me," Friar reminded him. "Is this not the reason we are talking? This seems to be troubling you a great deal."

"Yeah, you're not wrong." It's not like he could even tell Friar- he plainly couldn't-, but maybe he could try being vague about it. Just vague enough that he would get the idea without Sorun actually revealing anything. "I'm keeping some health issues away from all my friends. Congenital heart defect. I'm worried that the more I fight, the more my symptoms will be aggravated."

Congenital heart defect. A total lie to cover his shortening life, and one he was surprised that the curse let him get away with. Maybe it was being lenient with him since he was talking to a friar vowed to silence, or maybe the lie was just vague and removed enough to not count. He almost wished he'd thought of this lie sooner, maybe all the way back to the first Emerald, but Sorun soon realized the Freedom Fighters probably would have taken him to a doctor to check him out and dispute the lie afterwards. Well, regardless, he was happy to get this off his chest and talk about it to somebody.

Friar's eyes widened a bit, and then softened as a solemn look overcame him. "You're worried you may possibly lose your life over this?"

"..." Sorun didn't respond at first, instead choosing to think over his words very carefully as to not proc the curse and have his heart stop. "Well, I mean, death's always a risk fighting Eggman, right?" he mumbled. "But... who knows? This illness might kill me. And that... that really scares me," he admitted in a small voice. "I don't want to die."

"Then why fight at all?" the deer softly asked him. "Surely there are others that could take your place if this really is so life-threatening for you."

In response, the teen spawned four Summoned Swords at his sides. Friar jumped back a bit in shock, while Sorun continued watching on. Both the swords and the Yamato disappeared, the Mobian quickly calming down while Sorun let out a long, drawn-out breath.

"Because I have powers that nobody else has, and I have it on some good authority that if I don't help out things'll go pretty bad. Part of the whole prophetic thing I said earlier," he answered. "And I'm not good at anything else. It was either use my powers to help fight or do nothing as I watched the world around me die." He looked down at the ground and shuffled his feet. "What a choice, huh?"

"And you chose to use your powers because of a feeling of responsibility and obligations towards helping others?"

To the deer's surprised, Sorun laughed at that. He laughed and shook his head, and yet despite the fact the human's lips were upturned, he didn't seem at all happy. "I'm not a good enough person to say that I value their lives over mine. I don't," he said, though he noted with some interest Friar didn't react much to this. "It's not a numbers thing, either. Not a 'me versus everybody else' type deal. Life just doesn't work with numbers like that. It's too precious." He turned his head fully at the deer. "There was a proverb where I'm from, about a train and some tracks. It goes that there's five people tied to a track a train is about to run over, and if you want, you can pull a lever to divert a train to a second track. But there's one person tied to that track that'll end up dying as a result.

"Of course if it were me as I am now, I'd just use Yamato to cut the ropes and save everyone, but this is assuming the person in charge of the lever is a normal person that can't do anything else. So what do you do? Do you try to save as many people as possible at the expense of the few? Do you pull the lever because you're 'morally obligated' to save people since you're in a position to do so? Because it's the right thing to do? How's killing somebody the right thing to do?" Sorun shook his head. "I wouldn't pull the lever. I'd let the five die. If they die, then it's not my fault. It's the fault of whoever tied them to that track. I pull that lever, though, and I'm actively murdering somebody. And that just doesn't jive with me." Sorun's face scowled a bit. "Everybody's life is just as unique as the next person's. Nobody's life should be more important over somebody else's. One random person shouldn't die just so five others can live. I don't care if people say I'm wrong. It's what I believe in."

To his further surprise, the deer nodded in understanding to Sorun's words. "An understandable position. There truly is no winners in such a scenario. But tell me, if you're not fighting because you think it's the right thing to do, then why are you fighting at the risk of your own life?"

"Because I can." Out of everything Sorun said, that one, simple answer seemed to be the thing that shook the Friar most from the way his ears went straight up and his eyes to widen. "Not because I think they deserve to live more than I do. Not because the lives of the many are more important than my own. I'm doing it just because I want to." He looked up at the canopy's of the trees, and for the first time since he started talking with the friar a genuine, albeit small, smile formed on Sorun's face. "Everybody in Knothole is so great. They're all just... these really wonderful people that are nicer than anybody else I've met in my life, and I can't stand to think about what they've gone through in this war. What they will go through if they lose. What everybody else in the world will go through. I don't want that future to pass, so even if it kills me, I'll make sure it doesn't happen. Because I don't want to see my friends suffer." He looked back down to Friar. "Is it a superficial reason? Maybe. Does it make me a bad person? Probably. I don't really care as long as they get their future. So if you're asking why I fight... I fight so I can protect what's important to me."

The large, wide-eyed stare on the deer settled back into his normal expression. Friar nodded to Sorun explanation while looking to the side in thought. "You said that you don't value their lives over your own. And yet, by that logic, it almost seems like you do."

Sorun shook his head in denial. "I don't value them over me because that's the right thing to do. I value them over me because I choose to. There's a difference," he said.

"So you... do , in fact, value them over you?"

"... Quit pokin' holes in my philosophy, man."

Both quit talking in order to stare quietly at one another, and then broke out into soft laughter which quickly died out due to the mood. "Honestly, though..." Sorun continued, "I'd rather just go home to my world and forget about all this. Does that make me a bad person? Knowing that, if the opportunity was available, I'd abandon everything and go back home?"

"I wouldn't go that far." It was Sorun's turn to look surprised as he listened to the robed Mobian's words. "There's nothing wrong with wanting to stop risking your life to return home, and to say you are obligated to help others with your powers would be rather hypocritical coming from a Freedom Fighter. In matters such as these it's less about what is right and wrong, and rather what you perceive is right and whether or not you can live with the choices you made and say you did the right thing." He leaned forwards a bit and glared into Sorun's eyes, using those kind-looking eyes that seemed to look so deep within him. "If the opportunity did present itself for you to leave, and you did knowing everything you left behind and the possible repercussions, could you truly live with that decision?"

He didn't answer at first. Sorun stared silently back at the deer, and then sighed out as he leaned forwards while hanging his head towards the ground. "I don't even know, man," he answered. "Does it really matter? I can't go back anyways."

"True enough," Friar agreed with a nod. "We all go through our own periods of darkness, Sorun, even me. In the end it's less important on what we think but on the actions we take towards others, though how we perceive those actions still plays a vital role in keeping yourself in balance. Is living a life where you can't hang your head high in satisfaction at the decisions you've made worth living?"

Again, Sorun sighed. "No..." He got what he was saying. He was only doing this to begin with because he freely chose to do so, even if his alternatives weren't at all appealing. But he couldn't lie to himself and say he'd be completely satisfied with himself if he did turn and run after making the decision to save everybody. Whether he would actually do it at this point or not was something he wasn't even sure of, but he knew he'd probably never get over it if he did. He'd just gotten too attached to everybody over time.

And it wasn't as if he'd get to live that much longer anyways, what with his life being dramatically short due to getting thirty-six years cut off so far from the Emeralds. It wasn't exactly the point of no return, but it was still all the more reason not to go back on his decision at this point. And as short as it would be, he didn't want to live it feeling guilty about all the people he would have hypothetically left behind in this scenario.

"... There's still my life here, Friar," Sorun quietly muttered. "I'm fine with fighting to save everybody. I can learn to live with never seeing my zone again. Dying isn't... it wouldn't be a wasted life, but I still would have liked to live it with all these people I'm dying to save." His back straightened up as Sorun looked forwards. "Everybody's gonna be so upset, too. Is it weird I'm just as worried over that as actually dying?"

"You speak as if dying is an inevitability for you," Friar noted in a curious tone of voice. "I realize that fighting jeopardizes your health, but your heart defect certainly can't be that severe, can it?"

"There's certain things I can't say. Let's leave it at that."

"... I see." The Mobian besides Sorun took a deep breath and looked forwards in the same direction with Sorun as he folded his hands over his lap. "Perhaps you are worrying too much. Nothing is set in stone, Sorun, and from what I hear the medical techniques of those within Knothole are top-notch. And I'm sure if you ever got to a point where your life was seriously threatened due to your help, your friends in the Freedom Fighters wouldn't let you fight anymore at the risk of death. You shouldn't sign off your life being forfeit already so casually, especially on matters as insignificant as 'maybes' or 'mights'. Life is too short to live thinking such things."

"Mm." Sorun hummed in agreement, but otherwise remained silent as he listened to Friar continue to talk. Honestly he wanted to laugh right in his face, as he did know for a fact he would die. But he didn't want to risk going that far with him. If anything, he was actually a bit upset this was the conclusion Friar had come to with his lie with the heart defect. It did little to comfort him, if anything.

And it wasn't like he was dwelling over his imminent death. He tried his hardest not to think about it so he could enjoy what little life he had left, just as the Friar said. But something like his death was a hard thing to ignore for him, no matter how hard he tried. He would still try, though, right up until the very end. If not for his sake, then at least for the others so they wouldn't bee too concerned over his mental well being.

"But, for whatever comfort it brings you... I truly do think you are making the right decision here," Friar continued. "For one as young as you to fight for a world that isn't even yours after losing your home is truly unfair, but it doesn't matter what I or anybody else has to say. At the end, you're the only one who can decide if what you are doing is right." He leaned in closer to Sorun's view. "Do you think you're making the right decision?"

After deliberating with himself internally, Sorun gave the deer a nod. "Yeah. I do. I wouldn't be here talking with you if I didn't," he answered. He reached up to brush a few locks of dark hair away from his face, remorsefully chuckling to himself all the while. "Thanks for this, Friar. I... needed somebody to help me order my thoughts. I'm fine now."

The deer smiled widely and nodded his head at Sorun. "I'm just happy to be of service to you. 'Tis my calling, after all. So what is next for you?"

"Eh, I got some time to kill doing something productive until we gotta go do whatever it is we came here to do. Mighty's sorting it out. Don't really know what to do, though."

"Well, I think I can make a suggestion." Friar raised his arm up to point at something in the distance. Sorun followed to where he was pointing, and across the way and past some trees he saw that there was a small group of around twenty children meandering about. "The troubles we've been having with the oppressing forces across the way have had the children's parents absent for some time with preparations." He lowered his arm and looked to Sorun. "Helping is good for the soul, and I often find that there's something about the innocence of children that soothes the mind. Perhaps they could help you as much as you could help them."

"... I dunno, man, that seems like kind of a stretch," Sorun said in uncertainty as he turned back towards Friar. "Are you sure that- the f- what!?"

He wasn't there anymore. Where Friar had been sitting down on the log was now nothing but empty space. Sorun blinked in surprise, and then looked around for any sight of the robed deer. He even went as far as to check behind the log and some of the nearby trees, but there was nothing around.

"Why do the spiritual guys always gotta act so spooky?" Giving up on his search of the Mobian, Sorun huffed out and turned back to the far-off group of kids. To his surprise, in doing so he finally found where the Friar had vanished off to. The children were gone, and in their place was the deer. As for where the kids went, they were suddenly all in front of Sorun and staring up at him.

Sorun started in surprise, and then looked up from the group of children at the deer in the distance as light panic and confusion began racing through him. All the deer did in response to Sorun's shocked expression was to smile and wave at him, and then walk off only to disappear behind the tree lines.

"... Alright, deer dude, you haven't steered me wrong yet." Setting aside his momentary irritation at Friar, Sorun took in a deep breath and looked down at all the children. He didn't have a terribly good record with kids, but they were already here in front of him. And maybe there was something to what Friar said. So he took in a deep breath and addressed the odd-twenty children in front of him.

"How do you do, kiddos?" Sorun asked, voice a bit stilted in nervousness at all these colorful animal children looking up at him. He couldn't even place the looks they were sending his way. It was a lot of interest in place of raw curiosity, so he figured that was probably a good thing. On the other hand he knew fully well how unpredictable kids could be, and he found his forehead began to throb as he took a unconscious step back. "So, uh... F-Friar send you guys?" he asked when nobody responded to his question.

Several nods all around, but still no words. Sorun didn't know whether to be concerned or just plain creeped out.

"Okay, uh... so your parents are all busy doing something or some such...?" Sorun tried in an effort to glean some response from someone.

To his immense relief, one of the kids, a bird-looking Mobian, spoke up. "All the adults are all worried because they said there's a bunch of mean robots, so they're all doing something and told us all to leave them alone," she said. "Are you a Overlander?"

"Nah, I'm a human. We're closely related, though," Sorun said with a shake of his head. "I-I'm Sorun. I came here with the Freedom Fighters to help out."

Another Mobian child in the back rose his hand. "Are humans mean like Overlanders are? My da an' ma said that Overlanders were mean."

Some of the other kids around tensed up at the one child's words, and some of them even began giving Sorun cautious looks. Acting quick, Sorun quickly shook his head again to try and ease their doubts.

"It's nothing like that. Humans are alright. Overlanders, too, just not all of them, you know?" Sorun explained.

The one child who had spoken against Overlanders nodded his head. "Ohh, okay. Are you nice?"

"... I'm pretty sure?" Sorun gave a half-hearted shrug. "I mean, they let me in the Freedom Fighters. They don't do that with mean people."

All the children nodded in understanding at that. One child in particular, a child that was a deer or some other such mammal, raised her hand. "So you're really a Freedom Fighter?" she asked. "What's it like?"

Quickly exhaling, Sorun placed a hand on the back of his neck and rolled back and forth on his feet in thought. "Uh, you know, it's... pretty dangerous, fighting robots all the time. The people I work with are nice enough, though, and, uh... helping out feels good, so... yeah." He saw their eyes were quickly becoming disinterested, so he tried a new approach. "Wanna hear a story about it?"

That caused all their eyes to eagerly light up, with one child in particular raising their hand up to gain his attention. "Ooh! Ooh! If you're a Freedom Fighter does that mean you know Sonic!?"

At that, Sorun frowned. His frown only deepened when he saw a lot of the other kids grow even more excited at the mere mention of the hedgehog's name. It was utterly amazing to him how Sonic's name was so synonymous with the Freedom Fighters all around the world. He understood he saved the whole world on multiple occasions, but still, the sheer fame the guy had was staggering to Sorun. "Yeah, yeah I know him. I arguably know too much about him. I know his stupid sock size because he's always leaving those things around the room. I'm gonna soak his cereal bowl in one of his used socks one of these days I'm getting so sick of it. That's a good idea, gotta make a note of that ." Sorun whispered to himself before clearing his throat and looking back to the children, who had grown confused at his antics. "As for a story, um..."

What did he have? The story of how they met? He didn't exactly want to turn the children all depressed with his origin story. A story about a mission with Sonic? Usually they went the way of "Sonic smashed all the robots and said a bunch of one-liners while everybody else on the team watched on" and that was the end of it. Stories about being roommates with him? Those caused Sorun nothing but ire. He really was serious about poisoning the hedgehog's cereal with his socks. He did enough harmless pranks against Sorun to justify the retaliation.

But why did he have to tell a story about Sonic? The guy was famous enough, and sure, Sorun had a ton of stories about being a Freedom Fighter, but he had other stories, too. He could probably get by just telling them a children's story from Earth or someth-

Sorun's head shot straight up. Stories from Earth. He knew too many to count, and they were all good. And there was no way any of these kids ever heard any of them since they were from a whole other universe entirely. And since he was the only person in this whole universe that knew them, he had to keep them all alive somehow. After all, it wasn't like he'd be alive forever to remember them. The least he could do was spread some Earth culture to these children for the sake of entertainment. But which one to pick? A relatively short story he could bang out in a hour or two would be ideal. One that embodied all the morals of hope and friendship all these Mobians kept trying to preach. Something cool.

A smile slowly began to spread across the teen's face. He knew just the story. One of his favorites.

"Alright, kids, you wanna hear a story? I'll tell you a story. Not a Freedom Fighter story, though. This is way better." Some of the kids looked disappointed about him not telling a Freedom Fighter story, though they perked up when he mentioned this story being better. "This story," Sorun continued as he sat down on the log as the children gathered closer, "is one from my childhood. A really famous story that I guarantee none of you have ever heard. By the time I'm done none of you are even gonna remember Sonic's name.

"This is the story of a man who has yet to realize his destiny..."

Up above in the trees, the door to one of the huts hanging up above the ground opened. From that doorway stepped out Mighty, who had to rub a tired hand across his facing after hearing what he had just heard. He stepped out towards the beginning of one of the bridges connecting to the other huts, where he proceeded to lean his body over the rope railing. He heard Rob's footsteps trail behind him as the door was shut, though he paid it no mind as he looked down at the people below.

"Yeah, that is pretty bad," he said at last, eyes still trained on the ground below. "I'll get what you told me back to the others, but... agh, I don't know. We'll figure something out," he promised as he turned around to face the teal hedgehog, body still resting against the rope railing. "You guys have been shoring up the defenses in the meantime, right?"

Rob nodded. "I would be remiss as the king if I neglected proper preparation. I only fear it will be all for naught," he said, a remorseful frown gracing his features.

"Don't say that," Mighty said with a shake of his head. "It looks bad, I know, but we've all faced worse, right? Just let me gather my friends up and we'll talk it over."

Well, that's what he said, at least. On the inside he still had some doubts, especially after hearing the situation straight from Rob O'. He'd faced plenty of Badnik hordes, but what he was describing? Mighty wasn't sure he was willing to bank on them getting out of a fight like that alright with so few numbers. It wasn't like they could call for backup, either. Not when everybody else in Knothole were busy with their own missions. They were all on their own out here.

That didn't mean they wouldn't try their best to save everybody. Not trying was something he absolutely refused to do, and he was sure the others would be in agreement. Even Sorun with how he'd been acting these days. He just wasn't so confident in their odds, and he didn't like that so much.

"Speaking of which, friend Mighty, if I can impose a question to thee," Rob began, waving his hand to gain the armadillo's attention.

Mighty nodded. "Go ahead."

"This new Freedom Fighter you have all recruited, Sorun... dareth I ask your impression of him?"

It took a few seconds for Mighty to register the question, after which he had to take a deep breath and grip the rope railings he was leaning against. He didn't want to assume to know what Rob was implying, so he attempted to try and stay calm at the question. "Sorun? He's been awesome," Mighty said. "Really been supportive over the cause. Kinda rough in some areas, and he's all over the place with his personality sometimes, but he's a cool friend. I trust him to help us with this. Ray feels the same."

"I'll trusteth your word for him," Rob said, an apprehensive look still fixed on his face, "however, I must admit I feel some... reluctant hesitancy. I'm sure he is the sporting sort, but his kind-"

"I'm gonna stop this right here." The calmness was beginning to melt away as Mighty pushed off the ropes, stepping closer to Rob as he flinched back. "First of all, it was the Overlanders that went to war with everybody, not the humans, and Sorun's a human. And second of all, he's one of us." He stopped right in front of Rob, the hot breath blowing from his nose ghosting across the hedgehog's own nose as he glared right into his eyes. "He's been through way too much for you to bring this kind of thing up, and he's risked his life a ton just for our sake. I trust him with my life. He's a Freedom Fighter, same as us. So drop it, okay?"

For a moment, he felt that he may have gone a bit far with the hostility he was radiating, though with how he was feeling it was hard to care. Sorun just mattered too much to him to let this pass without saying something, even if the human himself wasn't present to hear it. He calmed down a bit when he saw Rob back up a bit while nodding his head in understanding, though strangely his face looked more understanding than anything else.

"I sincerely apologize, my friend. I doth seemed to ha'e failed to make my observations proper. I t'was merely inquiring as to his actual fighting ability. Friend Sorun's kind are not known for being robust in the art of combat as we Mobians are" Rob clarified. "You know it is not my place to judge others based on appearance, same all other fair citizens in Mercia."

Mighty blinked in surprise, and then sighed out as all the anger inside of him instantly vented out. "I know it isn't. My bad," he apologized, internally berating himself for having made such an assumption when he'd tried so hard not to. "No, you don't have to worry about Sorun. He's... heh, he may not look it, but he's packing some real power."

"T'is nary a worry, then!" Rob beamed a large smile towards Mighty, though it quickly began to die down when he saw that a frown was still present on Mighty's face. "If... if thou wishes to speak of-"

Mighty held a hand up to stop him. Now wasn't a time to delve into things. "What happened happened, alright? It's in the past." He sighed and looked behind him and back towards the ground. "Really, I'm more worried about this place than anything else with what's coming. And a bit over Sorun."

"He did seem the troubled sort, did he not?" Rob O' noted as he stepped to Mighty's side. "Pray tell, what misfortunes did turn their head in Sorun's direction?"

"... He's lost a lot," Mighty admitted, not feeling very willing to divulge all of Sorun's past to the hedgehog out of respect for his privacy.

"More than I have, even. And honestly, seeing him still going despite everything that's happened... it really is inspiring. I got a ton of respect for him." He wryly grinned. "But man, does he not make it easy sometimes with all that sarcasm of his, but I guess I can't put it past him looking at the big picture." With that, he stepped past the rope railing and towards a rope ladder at the side leading towards the ground. "I'm gonna go look for him and Ray to fill them in."

"Right then," he heard Rob say as he began descending the ladder. "I'll remain at the front and do what I can. We'll reconvene on the morrow and formulate a plan of attack then."

"Yeah, we'll, we'll do that," Mighty called back up right before letting go of the ladder halfway. He dropped down to the ground and landed with a small grunt, standing up tall and dusting himself off afterwards. He set off immediately, muttering to himself, "Now where did those two go?"

From how the sun looked, he estimated his conversation with Rob had taken just under two hours. The evening sky was clear even under the canopy of trees above him, and by now the citizens were beginning to return to their homes in the trees to turn in. There were still some out, though, and it was to them Mighty had turned to in order to ask for help as to where his two comrades were.

Apparently Ray had been floating around the settlement to help with small tasks here and there, so there was no telling where he was at the moment. Sorun, much to Mighty's surprise, was reported as to have been... entertaining children, of all things. Knowing Sorun, it was something Mighty absolutely refused to believe, but the people he'd asked had been kind enough to give him directions and were adamant it was the truth. They even seemed thankful he was helping to preoccupy the children from everything going on.

"Sorun entertaining a bunch of kids? I'll believe it when I see it," the armadillo thought to himself as he stepped in the direction he'd been pointed to. "He doesn't really have the kind of personality that kids find all that approachable. It doesn't even sound like something he'd want to do. There's no way he... he... what on Mobius...?"

He'd seen it. He saw it once he walked past a small grouping of trees, though he almost couldn't believe his eyes when he saw it. There was Sorun, alright, sitting on a log with a bunch of children around him. Some were all sitting on the ground while looking up to him with sparkling eyes. Others were hanging off of his Bringer Claws or sitting in the hands' palms as the spectral appendages moved around, almost like he was giving them small rides.

The most shocking thing, though, wasn't the kids around Sorun. It was Sorun himself. The human actually had a wide grin on his face, and to Mighty's further bafflement, he seemed actually happy of all things as he continued speaking while making exaggerated movements with his arms all around.

"And oh, man, it got really crazy after that. It was literally two mechs as big as the universe itself duking it out. The Anti-Spirals were grabbing whole galaxies left and right and throwing them like frisbees." Two Summoned Swords appeared up in the air, spinning around in circles and causing all the children to cry out in awe. "It wasn't happening, though, because with the souls of all those behind him Simon rose up his drill and-!"

It was when he saw Mighty that Sorun stopped dead, his body and even the swords and Bringer Claws freezing in place. The armadillo had chosen to lean against a tree, arms crossed, eyes half-lidded, and smile large and he looked at the human retelling a story to a bunch of Mobian children.

Oh, to think of how much enjoyment he was gonna get out of this. He always knew Sorun's grumpy exterior was just an act. He had all the proof he ever needed now, and he was gonna tease Sorun relentlessly for it.

Sorun, for his part, seemed to become incredibly flustered as he was sent into a coughing fit. His Bringer Claws set the children down and then disappeared along with the Summoned Swords, after which he straightened up to his feet to address Mighty. To much the armadillo's amusement, his eyes were wide with embarrassment and his cheeks were burning a deep red color. "M-Mighty," he stuttered out, "look, man, I can explain-"

"Oh, there's no need for that," Mighty said, his teasing voice causing the human to grit his teeth. "I can't believe you managed to hide this side of yourself from us for so long, you big softie you."

The glare Sorun sent his way only made Mighty's grin spread wider. "That is not ... I..." He actually growled out in irritation and whipped his head to the side in an attempt to hide his face away with his hair. "Did. You get. The situation. Report ?" the teen ground out.

"Sure did, Sorun." Mighty pushed off the tree and walked towards him, big smile still plastered on his face. He only received more joy when Sorun grew increasingly flustered as he drew closer. "Wanna help me find Ray? We can set up for the night and go over what needs doing."

"Sounds like a wonderful plan..." Sorun sarcastically remarked, stepping past the crowd of kids. "Sorry, guys. Business beckons."

The response among the group was unanimous, as all the children that had gathered around let out a collective "aww" of disappointment. "But what happens at the end, Sorun!?" one of the children cried out.

"Oh, uh, they beat the Anti-Spirals and... Simon and Nia and everybody else got to live happily ever after. The end." The human flinched back when all the children behind him cheered, though a ghost of a smile still managed to make its way onto his face. "Alright, alright. Go home, everybody. It's getting late." He walked past Mighty, his expression turning serious. "Let's go."

The pale human kept walking without another word. Mighty stared after him, looked to the side at the children waving at Sorun's back, and then briefly waved back to them before nodding and catching up to Sorun's side.

He didn't speak at first after they'd walked away from the children, though Mighty put that in part due to embarrassment due to the fact that his cheeks were still tinged red which, due to his complexion, was easily noticeable. But even so, Mighty couldn't resist lightly punching the human's shoulder as a grin played across his face. "I knew that whole gruff, aloof thing you've been pulling this whole time was an act," he said.

"... Was it really that obvious?" Sorun mumbled, refusing to meet Mighty's gaze.

The armadillo rolled his eyes. "Dude, nobody back home buys it." His actions just never backed up his distant personality, after all. Mighty didn't even need to see him happily interacting with kids to know it. He and everybody else had seen him slip up enough times in small incidents to get the idea. It was a whole different thing to see it in person, though. He was still reeling from seeing that happy a Sorun.

Sorun slowly blew out from his mouth. "Well, it's not like I was trying so hard to hide it," he said. "Don't tell the kids, but I flubbed the ending to that story I told them. I didn't have the heart to say Simon turns into a weird homeless dude."

Mighty nodded in understanding, despite not knowing the context of what he was talking about. "Ah, I see. What was that story, anyways?"

"A real man's story," Sorun immediately answered with zero hesitation. "And if you tell anybody what you saw you're dead."

"Right, suuure," Mighty replied, looking entirely unconvinced with the smile he held. "No deal. I'm tellin' everybody."

To that, Sorun didn't have a response. Instead he just groaned and shook his head, asking, "Can we just back to the main topic?"

"I wanna set up for tonight before anything," Mighty said with a shake of his head. "Rob said he'd give us a tent. Help me find Ray so we can get settled in, then I'll explain everything to both of you. We'll figure out what we're doing and get to work tomorrow morning."

With a short hum, Sorun gave a nod. "Sounds like a plan," he said.

By the time night had fallen, the Freedom Fighters from Knothole had set themselves up inside of a tent resting at the outskirts of the Deerwood Forest settlement. Inside there were currently only two of them: Mighty was standing at the head of a makeshift table situated in the center of the tent, looking down at a rough drawing of a map of the forest with several red circles drawn over it. Ray was sitting on one of the three sleeping bags in the corner, his blue eyes looking up at the armadillo in concern.

The tent's entrance rustled as a third person pushed their way in through the flap. This was revealed to be Sorun, who had an annoyed look on his face as he fully entered the tent before closing the flap behind him in a huff. "I swear I have to listen to that buff bird guy sing one more limerick I'm taking that lute and.. oh, hey guys," he greeted, his disgruntled visage turning a tad embarrassed as he waved at the two Mobians. "I miss anything?"

Ray covered his face with his hand, whereas Mighty looked up towards the tent's ceiling and shook his head. "No, you're just in time," the latter commented as he gestured towards the table. "Gather around so I can explain what's happening."

Wordlessly, the human and squirrel gather towards either side of the table. Mighty waited until they stopped and fixed their eyes on him to give him their attention, and then took in a deep breath before leaning leaning down to point at the map.

"There was a big commotion a while back, so Rob O' sent a bunch of his scouts to check it out. Apparently Eggman's getting serious about wiping out the Mercian kingdom. He's got a whole army of Badniks that're clear-cutting the forest one section at a time. Eventually the whole forest will be gone, and if that happens all the Mercians will be left wide in the open. And if that happens..."

"They'll be vulnerable to pretty much anything Eggman throws at them," Sorun finished with a grim look on his face. "It's super slow and methodical, but eventually it'll work." He looked up from the map to Mighty. "Seems kinda... inefficient, though, doesn't it? For him? Couldn't he just bomb the whole forest with his fleet and be done with it? Or set it on fire?"

Mighty rose his head up and gave Sorun a flat look. "This is Eggman we're talking about," he reminded him.

"... Right, nutcase," Sorun agreed with a nod. "How close is this army of Badniks from the settlement?"

"A day out."

"Ooh." Sorun grit his teeth and looked down at the map. "So we'll have 'til, what, sometime tomorrow to put something together before they hit?" When he saw Mighty nod, Sorun asked, "How many Badniks are we talking about here?"

Mighty pursed his lips and lowered his head. "Five-hundred," he answered in a low voice. "Five-hundred and five clear-cutting machines from what Rob reported. That's what we have to deal with."

The reactions between the other two Freedom Fighters varied. Sorun's eyes widened the slightest amount, though otherwise he just frowned deeply as he began scratching at his face in thought. Ray's reaction was much more severe, as the squirrel began wringing his hands together nervously as he looked up to Mighty.

"F-f-five hundred Badniks?" he repeated. "I don't... what are we... we can't beat that many!"

"Not all at once, no. Not even with the Mercians' help," Mighty agreed with a stiff nod. "If we kept doing hit-and-run attacks to whittle down their numbers, then eventually, yeah, we'd get them. The problem is we don't have enough time to do something like that before they hit the Deerwood settlement, and if everybody here loses their homes..." Mighty bit his lip and looked back towards the tent's flap. "Rob's thinking over some evacuation strategies just in case, but even he's pretty troubled at the prospect of moving a whole kingdom to another part of the woods and leaving everybody homeless."

It wasn't a very favorable prospect at all. It was clearly understood enough by Mighty and Ray, who could do nothing but grimly stare down at that map. There was no telling how disastrous a mass exodus of the entire kingdom would be on the people, but any way it was cut, it wouldn't be good. And no matter what, neither of them could think of a way to avoid such a catastrophe.

"I mean... five-hundred is... that's... that's a doable number."

Sorun seemed to have a different view of the situation from the way he was looking down at the map. Ray and Mighty looked to the human in surprise, with Mighty asking, "What do you mean?"

"... Mighty, you think you could take, I dunno, a hundred of them on your own?" Sorun questioned as he looked towards the armadillo.

"That's..." The question seemed sudden, but Mighty looked down in thought. "It'd be a bit hard, but... yeah? What's your point?"

"My point is that it's just a buncha jobber Badniks, right? And those things are easy to take down," Sorun said as he pointed at the red circles on the map. "You're right, five-hundred's too much for any of us. We'd get swarmed. Hitting and running is viable, but you're right, it's too slow since they're all so densely packed together. So what if we split them up?" He began tracing his fingers away from the circles to the wooded areas around them. "I mean, shoot, I can take a hundred, you can take a hundred, Ray can take a hund-"

"Ray can't take a hundred Badniks," Mighty denied with a shake of his head.

"... Okay, so, like, fifty-?" Another shake of his head from Mighty. "Twenty?" Mighty hesitated, and then shook his head again, causing Sorun to groan. "Dude, come on, you gotta give me something to work with." The human turned to the squirrel. "Ray, how about ten? Can you do ten at once?"

Ray regarded Sorun with a nervous nod. "I-I think so, yeah," he answered.

"Okay, we'll just put you in the reserves for any stragglers that make it past, how 'bout that?" With a sigh, Sorun looked back to the map. "Look, what I'm saying is we divide and conquer. Which is... I'm pretty sure it's a legitimate strategy."

It was his go-to strategy in a lot his video games back home, after all. Sometimes in some games going into a group of a dozen or so enemies was tantamount to suicide. Drawing the enemies one by one using items to methodically wipe them out individually was easy, though. It served him well in all sorts of situations, and looking at the drawn map in front of him, he couldn't help but be brought back to that. Five-hundred enemies? Sorun couldn't do something like that.

He could do a hundred easy, though. Especially with his powers and the Yamato.

"Okay..." Mighty slowly said, nodding along to Sorun's plan, "and what about the other three-hundred Badniks? And the clear-cutters?"

Sorun opened his mouth to answer, closed it in thought, and then opened it again with a sigh. "Really wish Sally showed up here with us. Planning's always been her shtick," he quietly complained as he rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "Ugh, okay, uh... I'm not really good at this..." His head suddenly perked up as an idea came to him. "What about all those logs?"

"... The logs?" Mighty repeated.

"Yeah, I remember seeing a bunch of those giant, tree-sized logs piled up all around the village," Sorun explained. "What if we used those?"

Both the Mobians glanced at each other with questioning looks, followed by Ray raising a hand to gain the human's attention. "Why logs?" he asked in a curious tone.

"I seem to remember Badniks don't deal with getting crushed by large, heavy objects all that well." From the side, Sorun saw Mighty lean his head back in understanding. It wasn't hard to see why; that incident with the crane way back was still fresh in Sorun's memory, too. "What if we set up a bunch of traps? We drop logs on the clear-cutters and smash 'em up. Then we drop them on the crowd of robots too to split them up. We already know where they are and where they're headed, right? It's just a matter of setting up a bunch of log traps in their way. We set it up so that an odd-hundred will be drawn in one direction, where I'll be waiting, another odd-hundred will be diverted to Mighty, as for the rest, well, optimistically speaking we nail somewhere from fifty to a hundred with the traps alone, and with the remainder we can just split them up into smaller and smaller groups that can be ambushed by a bunch of groups of Mercians waiting in the tree lines. They're all over the place and they gotta have experience with climbing trees," Sorun said as he gestured his arm out behind him. "If any stragglers get through to the settlement, we can have Ray and a bunch of others here to defend the place." He paused and started waving his hand from side-to-side. "Is... is it a decent plan?" he asked as he looked up. "If Sally were here she'd just instantly slap together a way better plan, but this could work, right?"

When he looked up to see if the other two had his approval, he was surprised to see both of them were looking at Sorun in absolute shock. Ray's jaw was practically hanging down towards the ground, and Mighty looked so bewildered that Sorun was almost worried he'd fall over onto his shell. The armadillo shook his head, though, and regarded Sorun with an expression that just screamed him being impressed.

"Wow, that... kinda makes a lot of sense," Mighty breathed out. "Do you think something like that would really work?"

Sorun shrugged. "Worked in 'Star Wars'. That's pretty much where I'm basing this whole plan off of."

And like that, the impressed look Mighty had melted right into exasperation. "Do not tell me that's another video game where you're from."

"... Movie, actually. 'Return of the Jedi'. And I got the diversion idea back from my gamer days."

A loud slap was heard as Mighty palmed his face. "You know, for a second there I really thought all those strategy lessons Sally keeps giving you were finally starting to get through, but then you pull something like this." He started grinning as he lowered the hand off his face. "I honestly don't know what else I was expecting."

"Yeah, I'll be real, all those lessons she's giving me are going in one ear and out the other," Sorun admitted with a wry grin. "Seriously, though, is the plan alright with you guys?"

"I don't have any better ideas," Mighty admitted with a shrug. "How about you, Ray? You fine with it?"

The golden-furred squirrel looked down in thought, held the pose for a few seconds, and then looked up to Mighty with a nod. "I'm fine with it if you are," he said. "I-if you really think it could work, I th-think we should give it a shot."

"Okay." Nodding back to the squirrel with a smile, Mighty turned to Sorun. "We only got until midday tomorrow until they arrive here, so we'll have to set up all those traps beforehand. Any idea how we're gonna get all those logs into position?"

In answer to Mighty's question, Sorun's Bringer Claws appeared folded over his shoulders. "You have super strength. I have the Bringer Claws," he answered. "We're gonna have to hustle, but if anybody can get those logs into position in time, it's us. Some of the Mercians are gonna have to be the one to tie the traps together, though. I can't tie a knot for jack."

"Not a problem, then," Mighty said. "You really think you can do it, though? Take on a hundred Badniks? I know you've gotten way stronger since we've met because of the Emeralds, Sorun, but are you sure that's a number you can handle?"

Was it indeed a feasible number for him? With a frown, Sorun looked down at his right hand. It was a lot, but he'd beaten them before. He'd done nothing but grow since then, especially with the addition of the Yamato. Even if he was still physically weak, the powers more than made up for it. All he had to do was play it smart and he was sure he could dispense an odd hundred-man army of robots.

The whole point of him gathering strength was to protect others. If he couldn't do this, then he was already a failure. He wasn't gonna let every person here lose their homes. He wasn't going to watch those children suffer. He had power now. He just needed to use it right.

"... Yeah. Don't worry about it," Sorun affirmed. "I'll get it done. Trust me."

"Alright. That's all I needed to hear." And with that, Mighty pushed himself away from the table and made his way towards the tent's flap. "I'm gonna go run the plan by Rob, but I already got a feeling he'll go for it. Hopefully by sunup we'll be out there setting everything up." He reached the flap, made it halfway, and then turned back to the other two with a wide grin on his face. "It's a good plan. As long as we see it through, we'll get it done." He gave them both a thumbs-up. "You should rest up now while we got the chance. I'll join you once I get back, and then we'll get started."

And with those words, he left. Sorun and Ray glanced at each other, and then wasted no time in getting settled into their sleeping bags to catch as much rest as possible.

Tomorrow would be a big day.

Apparently the plan had been an extremely well-received one. Whether it was because it was an actually good plan, or because nobody had any better ideas, was unknown to Sorun, nor did he endeavor to find an answer. What was important was that Rob, according to Mighty, had immediately gone for Sorun's plan the instant he heard it. Which of course meant that, come morning, he and Mighty had been hauling giant logs off into the forest like nobody's business.

He started to regret his plan pretty early on with all the logs they had him and his Bringer Claws carrying around.

Exhausting manual labor aside, it had actually been Rob O' of all people who had chosen all the sites where the traps would be laid for Sorun's diversion plan. Where the teen was right now was heavily panting against the trunk of a tree, looking upwards as he saw a group of Mobians use bundles of rope to tie together one of the many traps they had all devised. So far it was looking good. Once that trap was set, they'd be good to go. All that would be left was for everybody to get into their positions and wait for the enemy.

"Ho there, friend Sorun!" The teen could barely repress the sigh that threatened to escape him when he heard his name be called out in such a manner. When he looked up towards the source of the voice, he saw a teal, hooded hedgehog swinging on a rope above him. He let go of the rope, falling down on the ground right in front of Sorun. He enthusiastically hopped up to his feet, brushed himself off, and grinned towards Sorun's direction. "Once yonder log is set our final trap will be ready to be sprung. I trust you've met thine own preparations?"

"If by 'prepare' you mean 'made peace with myself in case I die', then yeah." Sorun looked upwards. Past the tree canopies he could just faintly see dark stacks of smoke in the distance, slowly growing closer to their position. If he strained his ears he could even hear the sound of large thumps and the sawing sounds of trees being cut down. They were getting close.

The experience as whole was leaving Sorun apprehensive. He had faith in the plan, but now that the time to actually enact it was getting closer, he was losing faith in himself. Saying he'd go ahead and defeat a hundred robots compared to actually getting ready to do it in a few minutes was a wholly different feeling entirely. He'd still endeavor to do it, of course, as was the plan everybody was depending on. He just couldn't help his quickly-fading optimism.

"Not to worry, dear fellow!" Whether it was in response to Sorun's earlier statement or the hedgehog just happened to catch the downcast look on Sorun's face, Rob managed to step into Sorun's view while giving him an encouraging smile. "'Tis high spirits that gets one through dismal times such as these, my friend."

"Yeah, I'll keep that in mind," Sorun muttered, not wholly convinced by the hedgehog's words. "Your people are all set up, right?" he asked.

"Indubitably. I'll be joining one such group shortly to aid in thinning the numbers," Rob said. "With my trusty bow and their guile, I trust we will make it through this."

"Ah-huh, ah... huh?" Sorun's head slowly swiveled towards Rob. "Your what?" He eyed the bow and quiver of arrows strapped to the hedgehog's back. "You can't... you're not seriously planning on fighting the Badniks with a bow and arrow, are you?"

"Of course. 'Tis my weapon of choice," Rob confirmed with a nod, much to the human's visible bafflement. "What is the matter?"

"... Nothin', man, you know what? You do you." There were a lot of points Sorun wanted to argue on why that was such a terrible idea, the robots all having a titanium chassis chief among them. But he was fairly certain that any argument he made would fall on deaf ears, so instead he just slowly exhaled from his nose and began walking off. "I'm gonna go get in position," he informed the hedgehog, moving more out of a desire to just get away from Rob more than anything else.

The hedgehog, seemingly not sensing such a desire, instead chose to believe in Sorun's words as he waved at the human's back. "Fare thee well, friend Sorun! May we meet again after the battle!"

"If this day doesn't end with me stabbing that guy it's gonna be a miracle. A bow and arrow, sheesh..." With a groan, Sorun rubbed at his hair. "Hope he knows what he's doing. He's gotta have experience fighting Badniks, so he has to, right? But a bow? I don't know." He looked up at the black smoke stacks in the distance and sighed. "Eh, we're all fuckin' doomed."

As it was, the number of Badniks that had been reported to be cutting through the forest had been accurate. Five large, tractor-like machines with giant saw blades in place of shovels were all lines up in a line, slowly cutting through and clearing out a large swath of forest as smoke billowed from their mechanical bodies. Alongside all of those clear-cutters were five hundred Egg Pawns. Some were the standard red-colored variants, carrying their lances in hand as they guarded the machines cutting through the forest. Others were Egg Pawns painted in a red and black plaid pattern carrying various cutting implements from axes to chainsaws, whose single purpose was to aid in the clearing of the forest.

For the most part the nigh-unstoppable force of metal made its way through the forest without impunity, leaving behind a barren land filled with fallen trees in their wake. This was until the line of clear-cutters reached a section of forest where, right above them and hidden among the tree branches, were multiple logs strung up with rope and Mobians ready and waiting.

With watchful eyes, the Mobians watched down below as the clear-cutter machines came closer and closer to their positions. When they deemed the distance suitable, they all silently signaled to each other with hand gestures, followed by them all nodding in understanding. Wordlessly, the Mobians all brandished short daggers and began cutting through the ropes that suspended the logs up. In short order all the ropes had been cut through, followed by all the Mobians leaping back into the tree branches as the traps were sprung.

Given the large, bulky nature of the tractor-like machines cutting through the forest coupled with the Badniks being caught completely unawares, there was no avoiding it when two logs, held up by ropes, came swinging down from the tree tops to either side of one of the tractors. The ends of the two logs smashed into either side of the clear-cutter, its metal chassis crumpling completely under the crushing force before the vehicle as a whole promptly and mildly exploded in a burst of black smoke leaking out from its interior. The other four clear-cutters met similar fates as more and more logs swung down from the trees, and in short order all five were swiftly disposed of.

The Egg Pawns on the ground, having seen the display, could do nothing but look around wildly up towards the top of the trees in an attempt to glean what was attacking them. They all began scrambling away when more logs began dropping on them from up high, though some were too slow and ended up being crushed completely under the logs.

From there, the Egg Pawns began scattering away as more and more logs began dropping down onto them. One group of around a hundred Egg Pawns were driven away from logs not only falling on them, but falling in a way that cut them off from the main group while pushing them back into a deeper section of the forest. A similar group of a hundred on the other side met the same fate as they, too, were driven away from the main pack. The rest of the Badniks could do nothing but scatter and run in any direction they saw fit as more of their brethren were crushed completely.

"And here we go..."

Sorun had found a nice little perch in the way of a rather tall stump, and chose to wait there until the Badniks he was expecting arrive came. He sat there right now, left hand clenching the sheath of Yamato while the sword itself was gripped in his right hand. Nervously, he began to bounce the blunt end of the blade off his shoulders as he stared straight ahead into the forest.

Sure enough, they came. He heard them before he saw them: a thundering of heavy, robotic feet trampling through the forest and going towards where he was sitting. Next he saw the circular, blue lights that were their eyes as they emerged from the forest and into the small, circular clearing Sorun was sitting at the end of. He couldn't tell what their reactions were upon entering the clearing and seeing Sorun, given their fixed smiling expressions, but he did see that they stopped. All of the Badniks, in fact, had collectively stopped upon seeing him, with only a few dozen having made it into the clearing while the rest remained back in the woods behind them.

"So all the lights I see in the woods are enemies, huh?" Sorun slid off of the stump he sat on. He landed on his feet, straightened his form up, and held the Yamato out to his side. "Works for me."

He saw all the Badniks at the head of the pack ready the weapons they held in their hands. By the time Sorun had walked to the center of the clearing, one of the red Egg Pawns holding a lance had charged towards him. Sorun saw the incoming Badnik, and then breathed out slowly as he quickly sheathed Yamato while keeping a hold on it with both hands. Before the tip of the lance reached his body, Sorun's left Bringer Claw flashed into existence, clenched the tip of the lance, and wrenched it out of the way of Sorun's body while leaving the Egg Pawn in front of him completely exposed.

"Focus..." Sorun's eyes narrowed, and with clenched hands he swiftly unsheathed the Yamato in a swinging motion. The silver blade cleaved cleanly and effortlessly right through the Egg Pawn's midsection, exiting through the other side with practically no resistance on Sorun's part. The teen willed the Bringer Claw to let go of the lance it held, and then he stood back to observe the robot. It stood completely frozen to the spot, with the only indicator of damage being the thin line completely bisecting its midsection. Soon enough electric sparks began to fly out from the body-long slit, the lights in the robot's eyes and mouth winking out as its upper half slid off the lower part and fell lifelessly to the ground. The lower part fell after it soon after.

Looking down at the fallen Egg Pawn with a mixture of surprise and satisfaction, Sorun looked up to the rest of the Badniks staring him down. Without another word he brandished the katana to the side as his Bringer Claws appeared folded over his shoulders and four Summoned Swords spawned at his sides. Without so much as another sign, Sorun began running towards the Egg Pawns as the Badniks met his sprint and ran towards him with weapons aimed at the ready.

One after another, the Egg Pawns that opposed him fell again and again under his mighty blows. It didn't matter how many of them tried to take him on, as his strength proved to be just too much for them to handle.

After feeling the sensation of something sharp glancing harmlessly off his shell, Mighty reached around and grabbed the arm of the Egg Pawn holding the lance that had tried to spear him from behind. He pulled the robot in front of him, and the began to spin the robot around his body with a single arm. With a smirk he threw the Badnik at a nearby crowd, toppling them all and causing them to collapse in a smoking heap.

All around the armadillo laid the bodies of around fifty of the Egg Pawns already. And while the Mobian himself was lightly panting from exertion, his eyes were still wide and energized as he gestured for the remaining robots to come forwards. "Come on," he called out, "I can do this all day!"

His provocation was met in the form of another wave of Egg Pawns rushing forwards. He punched and tore apart any that tried challenging him with ease.

Were they in larger groups, the surviving Badniks that hadn't been destroyed by the log traps and hadn't been separated from the main group would have been able to fend off any resistance against them with some success. As it was, the remaining Egg Pawns had been so split up and divided from the falling traps that the largest groups were only able to maintain a size of about four or five.

These were numbers that proved easy for the Mobians waiting above to ambush and overwhelm them. Whether it was by dropping heavy rocks on the robots from above or rushing them head on with large groups of people wielding various makeshift weapons, it proved too much for the Badniks to handle. They were just too spread out to enact any form of defense, and were all but helpless under the relentless assault. Numbers that were in the hundreds dwindled by the dozens in a matter of minutes as each pocket of robots were systematically eliminated one after another before their attackers would move on to a new group no worse for wear.

Some Egg Pawns, of course, had tried running. Due to the enemies surrounding them on all sides, their only possible route of escape was, ironically, the very settlement within Deerwood Forest that was to be destroyed by them as per the objectives programmed within the robots. But, unfortunately, emerging from the trees and into the settlement was only met with an even greater force of Mobians, all lead by a short, gold-furred squirrel leading the pack.

Suffice it to say, those Egg Pawns that had made a break for it into the settlement hadn't a chance, as their numbers didn't even reach a full ten robots. One had been dismantled immediately by a well-placed shot from a slingshot held by the golden squirrel. The projectile fired found its way into an opening in one of the Egg Pawn's plates. There was a whirring sound from the device that had been shot inside of it, and soon enough the robot fizzled out in a burst of electricity and fell lifelessly to the ground.

The rest, of course, were merely rushed and overwhelmed by the rest of the Mobians and promptly decommissioned.

"I don't... recall this being so difficult..."

Perhaps he'd overestimated himself just a tad bit. Sorun couldn't understand why; by all counts he should have had this in the bag. And to be fair, he did. Between the ranged support of his Summoned Swords, the brute strength offered by his Bringer Claws, and the ultimate cutting ability provided by the Yamato, Sorun should have been more than equipped enough to deal with a bunch of ordinary Badniks.

And, to be fair, at first it had been going well. The first twenty or so robots had all fallen to him without so much as a sweat. It was around fifty did he realize that this was beginning to become incredibly exhausting for him. Mentally he'd felt the control he had over his powers slipping. Physically he was just becoming more and more tired. Whether it was from the strain of fighting for his life against a veritable army of robots, or because these powers were so straining to his body, Sorun hadn't a clue. What he did know was that his endurance, evidently, wasn't at a level that it should have, and had, been at.

That was very concerning.

He pressed on, though, past all the exhaustion and pains wracking his body. The knowledge he was fighting to save a whole kingdom and the faces flashing through his mind were a sufficient motivator for him. The knowledge that's he'd be killed if he fell down in the middle of fighting was an even stronger one, and as it was, adrenaline was very good at keeping Sorun on his feet.

All of this was bound to eventually fail, though. To Sorun's credit, he'd managed to get most of them. In fact there was only one single Badnik left standing: one of the plaid-painted ones holding a metal woodcutter's axe. All around Sorun were the cut-apart and brutalized bodies of all the rest of the Badniks. A testament to how hard he'd been fighting in the form of a miniature scrap yard.

Sorun himself, unfortunately, was kneeling down on one knee and panting heavily as he looked up at the single remaining Egg Pawn, his katana stabbed into the ground and being used as a crutch to keep him kneeling. Despite the fact he'd never been wounded once, blood was streaming profusely out from his nose. Any Summoned Swords he tried creating merely shattered and disappeared upon forming. His Bringer Claws only managed to flash into existence for mere moments before flickering and disappearing.

Even Yamato wasn't able to hold up from the strain his body was going through. Right before his eyes he could see cracks forming along the entire length of the sword's blade, with chips of metal continually flaking off and disappearing. His body was simply too exhausted to maintain any of his abilities. And as it was, he couldn't even summon the energy necessary to stand.

"Is this... seriously my limit...?" Sorun thought to himself as he glared up at the Badnik as it began approaching him. "You gotta be kidding me..."

The Egg Pawn stopped right in front of him, the large, permanent smile etched into its face almost mocking as it rose its axe up into the air. All Sorun could do was stare on helplessly, too worn out to even think any further.

But then, right before the axe was swung down onto his head, the unthinkable happened. An arrow, a completely normal, wooden arrow with a metal arrowhead, flew out of nowhere and managed to pierce the Badnik's right eye lens. Just barely, Sorun was able to stare in complete shock as sparks fell out from the pierced eye before all of the robot's lights went dark. Its arms went limp, and the axe slipped from its grasp and fell harmlessly onto the ground. And then, the Egg Pawn painted to look like a lumberjack tipped over entirely only to end up lying still on the ground.

Not believing his eyes, Sorun slowly, and with great effort, turned towards the direction where the arrow had been fired from to get a look at his savior. He couldn't say he was so surprised to see Rob O' the Hedge standing up on a nearby tree branch, bow held in his hands as he smiled victoriously down at Sorun.

An exhausted, barely audible chuckle left Sorun right as the Yamato finished disintegrating entirely in a cloud of black and blue ash. "I can't believe he actually made a bow work," he thought as he collapsed onto his back. "Mobians... are such bullshit..."

The last thing he saw before falling unconscious was a clear, blue sky free of smoke.

The attack and subsequent defense of the Kingdom of Mercia, by the end, had only ran the course of roughly under an hour. And, short as it was, it had ended as a huge success. A large swath of the forest may have been cleared out now due to the efforts of Eggman's Badnik's, but the entire force had been successfully held back and dismantled. Even better, it had been reported that there hadn't been so much as a single casualty from the Mobian's side due to the plan thought up by the Freedom Fighters and enacted by the king of Mercia.

And even better, while that section of the forest may be barren for generations until the trees grew back, the kingdom had plenty of firewood to last.

So, of course, the next step after repelling the invasion was celebration. Mobians moved about through the whole kingdom, laughing and celebrating amongst themselves. Indeed, it was a time of great happiness for everybody. For everybody except a single, irate human who was currently talking to a group of Mobians.

"- Yeah, Honey, she does good work on my clothes. I don't really recommend traveling all the way down there these days, but if you ever do happen to stop by Knothole, you should visit her shop. She honestly makes good stuff," Sorun explained as he gestured to his clothing. "And can you do me a favor and spread the word? Advertising's hard enough when it's just me doing it."

The Mobians who had approached him as to inquire about his clothes nodded at his request, and then scampered off to their own devices. He watched them go with a small sigh, shaking his head as he ran a hand through his hair. "She better appreciate the hustle I'm doling out for her here," he internally grumbled to himself.

Feeling like he'd sold his soul away aside, Sorun thought it was nice to look around and see all the celebrating Mobians around him. It had been a couple hours since the attack ended. He'd been carried to an infirmary tent and had woken up to see Ray, Mighty, and surprisingly a bunch of the children from before standing over him, but after about a half hour's worth of fussing, he was able to finally convince them he was fine. Which, mild exhaustion aside, he was.

Otherwise, though, he felt great. Great at having actually helped repel an invasion of robots and save a kingdom. From an idea he'd had, no less. One he'd stolen from a movie, maybe, but as far as he was concerned it still counted. Random Mobians who had heard about what he did had even went up to him and thanked him profusely for all the help he provided. Sorun, ever bashful at all the attention, had tried downplaying his role as much as possible while doing his best to shy away from the crowds.

But yeah. They'd done it. They successfully managed to defend the Kingdom of Mercia. Go team.

"Oof!" A sudden weight suddenly found itself on Sorun, causing him to become slightly off-balance as he looked down at whatever it was that attached itself to him. He relaxed immediately when he saw it was just Ray, though he did pry the squirrel off of him before he grew too uncomfortable. "Yeah, Ray, I get it. You're happy I'm okay." He huffed, looked away, and shoved his hands into his pockets. "Thanks for the concern."

"You could stand to b-be a bit happier, y'know," the squirrel reminded him with an easygoing smile. "We managed to save everybody!"

"I said we would, didn't I?" Sorun asked. "Geez, no faith." He turned around in another huff, though his tone had been just sarcastic enough that Ray had just laughed at the statement.

From the corner of Sorun's vision, he saw two figures approach. "Ah, come on, Sorun, Ray's right. You could stand to loosen up a bit," Mighty said as he stopped right in front of the pair, with Rob trailing closely behind him. "Seriously though," he continued with some concern, "are you sure you're alright? Your nose was bleeding really hard-"

"I just took a bad hit. I'm fine now," Sorun lied off with a wave of his hand. "I just... gotta pace myself a bit better next time, I guess. You good?"

"Me? Totally," Mighty confirmed with a nod. "A hundred bots were nothin' to me."

Sorun frowned a bit, and then quickly dropped it for a neutral expression as he turned towards Rob. "Thanks for the save, by the way."

"Think nothing of it, friend Sorun. The thanks should lie with me for your services in aiding the kingdom." With that said, Rob bowed down deeply before the three Freedom Fighters, which made Sorun in particular feel awkward from the motion. "It seems, once again, I am in the Kingdom of Acorn's debt."

It was still such a weird feeling for Sorun, to be thanked so profusely for his actions. He was growing used to it, though, and even more he was starting to actually enjoy it. Enough that he actually found himself in a joking mood. "In that case, do you guys have any Power Rings stashed around? Because I wanna cash in some-"

He was interrupted when Mighty playfully elbowed Sorun in the side, though for Mighty, a "playful" elbow jab was still enough to send him reeling. "You're not extorting the kingdom for Power Rings just so you can play more video games with Nicole," he said as a bemused smile spread across his face.

"Ah, come on, man, I was joking," Sorun muttered as he rubbed at his sore side. "Mostly." He softly hissed as he removed his hand, and then turned back to Rob. "So I guess we're done here? You guys are good for us to leave?"

"Most definitely, friend Sorun," Rob confirmed with a nod. "We will have to take some time to clean out Robotnik's minions from the forest, but afterwards I dare say the kingdom will be in top form." A grin formed on his face as he looked at the Mobians far behind him. "Ah, though it seems nobody had the patience necessary to wait to celebrate beforehand, though I cannot say I blame them." He looked back to the three Freedom Fighters. "Will you be staying to partake in the merriment? I hear they are already preparing the ballads to be sung-"

"Would you look at the time!" Sorun interrupted, voice laced in mock regret as he began pulling on Ray's and Mighty's shoulders. "Ah, man, we'd love to but we gotta head back, right, guys?"

"H-huh?" Ray stuttered as he was pulled away. "But aren't we staying for a bit?"

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, we gotta go back. Sally said to come back as soon as we were done here to get ready for the next mission." He sent a pleading look towards Mighty. " Right , Mighty?"

The armadillo looked ready to argue the point, but stopped himself when he saw the look Sorun was giving him. He paused to think for a second, and then shrugged his shoulders with a small grin. "Ah, yeah, now I remember," he said as he shrugged Sorun's hand off. "I guess you earned a break after today, Sorun, so we'll head back."

The human sent Mighty a thankful nod, and then released Ray's shoulder. The squirrel, for a moment, seemed a bit saddened by the prospect of leaving so soon, but then brightened up at the prospect of heading back to Knothole. "Well, i-if we're going b-back, should I pull the saucer out?" he asked, turning towards Sorun.

Looking down at Ray, Sorun hummed in thought and then looked up towards the settlement. Rob had already gone back to his people to enjoy in the celebrations with them, a female red echida holding an infant having joined his side. He even saw a bunch of the children from before running around in circles around each in some sort of game of tag. From the distance he could have sworn he caught glimpse of a deer wearing robes that was smiling in his direction, only for him to disappear when somebody walked past him.

No. There was no reason to stay. Their part here was done, and they had other people to save.

"Yeah," Sorun absentmindedly mumbled, his eyes still staring ahead at the Mobians as he bent down to rub the top of Ray's head. "Let's go back home."

Episode 29- Killer concert

It'd been pointed out to Sorun at one point that there was a library somewhere in Knothole. Usually this wouldn't be of much consequence to him as his time was usually spent on other things, but in a world where the internet was nonexistent sometimes you just had to dig your nose into the books to find out what you wanted to know. In this case, it was Chao. Specifically what he was supposed to be doing in order to actually take care of the one in his possession.

He'd asked around, but, much to his surprise, there wasn't all that much the Freedom Fighters knew about raising and caring for Chao. Sonic, Tails, and Knuckles apparently had limited experience with them, but nothing outside of that. Everybody else knew even less. And so far, for as long as Sorun had kept Virgil, things had been okay. The little guy seemed happy, and he ate the fruit Sorun kept feeding him. And as far as Sorun could tell, he seemed healthy. So as it stood, by all appearances, he was doing well enough with caring for the Chao. But one could never be too careful, and with how backwards this world was for all he knew these were all actually warning signs, so he'd endeavored to seek out some source of information on the strange species just so he could have a better idea on what he was doing.

To that end, his search had lead him to the library.

The affair of going the library itself had been boring. Getting a library card was apparently a free and very easy process. The woman who ran the place, a light-furred dog Mobian, had been nice enough in helping Sorun out and had even directed him to a zoology section in the library when he'd asked for assistance. And in that section, he'd been lucky enough to happen upon a book about Chao. So he'd taken it, checked it out, and was now walking through the streets of Knothole with the book open and his eyes reading over the contents.

"'Everything you need to know about Chao', huh? It's pretty in-depth so far, actually. Huh..." He flipped through another few pages while humming to himself. "Chao are pretty weird. It says they're natural conductors for Chaos energy, though what that actually means is yet to be discovered. Diet... just nuts and fruit? Alright, so I'm good there. Evolution? What?" He flipped a few more pages. "'Chao, by nature, are impressionable creatures that pick up habits from any potential owners caring for them. Actions and even dispositions can often impact a Chao as it grows, and under certain conditions a Chao's evolution can be-' what the hell am I actually reading? They evolve?"

Flipping through the book some more didn't provide him many answers to what exactly evolution meant. There were a few pictures in the book printed of a few unique-looking Chao. Some Chao colored a white and blue color with halos and other Chao colored in black and purples with weird, sharp-toothed evil smirks. From what the book said, Chao went through periods of change and evolution in accordance with their naturally-short life cycles, and the condition of somebody caring for a Chao was often the catalyst for such a evolution. There wasn't much detail outside of that, though, as the book didn't go into specifics. He wasn't so overly concerned about it. He'd just gotten the book so he could know how to care for Virgil properly, though all this information on Chao development was interesting. Or at least as interesting as it was confusing.

"Chao can adopt the personalities of those caring for them as they mature? Geez, I hope this doesn't mean Virgil become a cynical bastard like I am down the line. I haven't noticed anything out of the normal from the way he acts." He closed the book, a frown marring his features as he stared down at the cover while continuing to walk forwards in the street. "I'm gonna have to find somebody to take care of Virgil after I die. Sonic'd probably do it for me. Hell, anybody probably would. I don't know, maybe Antoine and Bunnie will look after him. They're a couple. Couples like pets, right?"

"Look out, look out!"

So distracted was he by his readings that Sorun hadn't paid attention to anything in front of him. And when he looked up upon hearing a panicked voice call out to him, he saw someone speeding directly towards him from the opposite side of the street. Sorun had been too surprised to make a move, and whoever was speeding towards him was going too fast to make a proper stop.

Naturally the two collided right into each other as a result of this.

The resulting crash sent Sorun and the other person flat on their backs, both softly groaning from the impact. The sound of fluttering paper reached Sorun's ears, and when he cracked his eyes open the first thing he noted were dozens of sheets of paper fluttering around in the air above him and slowly falling to the ground.

"Oh no!" The panicked voice of who Sorun assumed was the other person he'd crashed into gained his attention, causing him to slowly sit up to looked towards them. The sight before him was a yellow-furred Mobian with long, purple hair jumping up and down in an effort to try and collect the pages that had been tossed up into the air, with an armful of the discarded papers already in her grasp.

"I accidentally made her drop all her stuff." With a groan, Sorun got up to his feet while rolling his sore shoulder. "Now I feel bad. Guess I'll help out."

Two spectral arms appeared behind Sorun and reached out towards the discarded papers. The yellow Mobian with the purple hair stepped back in shock at the sight, almost looking frightful, but she seemed to calm down when she saw the Bringer Claws rapidly snatching up the papers out from the air. Within seconds he'd successfully gathered all of the lost papers in a neat stack, after which the Bringer Claws disappeared.

"Sorry about that," Sorun said with an apologetic look on his face as he offered the Mobian the papers. "I wasn't looking where I was going."

The Mobian, still looking surprised, looked down at the papers held out to her. She only finally reacted when Sorun shook the papers out of impatience. "Oh, don't worry about it! Thank you so much!" The Mobian gleefully exclaimed as she accepted the papers from Sorun. The human grunted in response, and then stepped back to bend downwards. She watched him crouch down to pick up the book he'd dropped off the ground, and then tilted her head to the side. "Are you that human that joined the Freedom Fighters that everybody's been talking about?"

"People talk about me?" Sorun thought as he grasped at the book. "There ain't exactly any other humans living in Knothole," he said, standing back up to turn back towards the Mobian. "So yeah. I'm Sorun."

"Mm!" The purple-haired Mobian nodded her head at him. "I'm Mina. Mina Mongoose."

"Mongoose?" Sorun squinted his eyes a bit and leaned forwards to scrutinize her features. She just looked like a normal Mobian to him. Then again, he didn't even think he ever saw what a mongoose on Earth looked like before coming to Mobius, so he wouldn't even know what to look for. "... Sure." He looked down at her clothes, his eyes widening a bit. She had on an actual top and skirt in addition to the gloves and boots most Mobians wore, with all of her articles of clothing sporting various splashes of blacks, purples, and teals. She even had piercings in her ears. "Well she's dressed real funky. And more conservatively than half the people in this place."

From the corner of his eyes, Sorun noticed that there was a piece of paper he'd missed that had fallen on the ground. A briefly-formed Bringer Claw snatched it from the ground and deposited it in his hand, to which Sorun brought it up for him to read. To his mild surprise, it was a poster. The front half depicted a stage printed on it with an assortment of Mobians standing on it and playing various instruments. He could very clearly see Mina at the front of the group singing into a microphone.

Sorun lowered the poster a bit, looked up to Mina who was eyeing him nervously, looked back down at the poster, and finally looked back at Mina. "You're... in a band?" he asked, lightly shaking the poster in his grasp.

She gave him an affirmative nod at the question. "Yup!"

"Huh." He looked back down at the poster, and then gazed at the name at the top. "... The Knothole Knuts." He found himself deeply inhaling, and he could have sworn his brain began throbbing upon having to retain the memory of the name he just read. "Oy."

"Is something the matter?" Mina asked, a tinge of concern to her voice as she stepped closer.

"... Nah..." Lowering the poster so that he didn't have to see that name again, Sorun gave the mongoose a stiff nod. "I didn't know bands were a thing here. I'm just a bit surprised is all."

Mina made a small "oh" of understanding. "I guess that makes sense. Yeah, we started it up a while ago. Things in Knothole can just get a bit, well... sad, you know? With everything going on in the world because of Eggman." She shuddered a bit, a sad look overtaking her features. "People always look up to the Freedom Fighters for everything they do. They're a beacon of hope that keep people going. I saw the change they make in people, and I wanted to contribute to help out too."

"But you didn't want to fight?" Sorun guessed.

To his surprise, she shook her head. "No, I... tried helping them out, but it didn't really work out too good. But I always had a good signing voice, so... yeah. I started a band with a few others," she explained, her features brightening up. "We hold concerts when we can to sing to help raise the morale in Knothole. It always manages to brighten up the mood and make people happy so they can forget all the bad that's happening for a bit, you know?"

"No, yeah, I get it," Sorun assured her. "That's... really admirable of you. Nobody seems to appreciate the importance of a smile every now and then. I can respect it." He knew he would have mentally crumbled a long time ago if he didn't find something enjoyable to do whenever he had free time. Having something to relax to was just plain necessary in this life, and he supposed not much else brought widespread happiness to a whole city of people more than a band playing in a concert.

A wide smile spread across Mina's face at Sorun's words. "Exactly! I'm so glad you understand!" Mina clasped her hands together and stepped a bit closer towards Sorun. "We're holding another concert tonight. I actually came out here to post all these posters our manager printed up to get the word out. You should really come see it!"

Looking unsure, Sorun rubbed at the back of his head and looked to the side. "I dunno, concerts were never really my thing..."

"It'll be fun, I promise! And, well, seeing the Freedom Fighters attend the concert usually helps for the people's morale. I know the rest of the Freedom Fighters usually make time to come to the band's shows since they're really supportive over what we do."

"Hmm..." Sighing, Sorun took another look at the poster he had in his grasp, wincing slightly when when his eyes scanned past the band name. There was a paragraph of information at the bottom of the picture of the band, and his eyes locked on to a particular piece of information at the bottom. "Eight tonight, huh?" He hummed again in thought, and after a few more moments he looked back up at Mina.

"I don't have anything else planned for tonight. Guess I'll go since everybody else is going." Who knows, it might be fun. And now that he thought on it, he hadn't actually heard any music at all since coming to Mobius. Maybe spending a night at a concert would be a good change of pace for him.

Oh, how he wished his phone and all the music he'd stored on it hadn't been lost to him. He really missed relaxing to Earth music.

"That's great!" Mina flashed Sorun a thankful nod, and then stepped to the side before walking past Sorun. "Thanks for coming, Sorun! Keep the poster! I've got more to give out!" Her feet began spinning up, and before Sorun could even blink she began speeding down the street. "See you at the concert!"

Sorun stared after the mongoose speeding away, heavily blinking at the disappearing blur. "Wow, she's fast," he commented. "Not Sonic-fast, but still... not bad." If there was anything more surprising than the cheerful personality that girl had, it was how fast she could run. A rock star with super speed. Strange combo.

But she seemed like a great person from the impression Sorun got from her. A great singer too, apparently, if her concerts really were so popular. And anybody who did things to help other people out of the kindness of their hearts was a good enough person in his books, which, on second thought, described almost all of the Mobians he'd ever met. Probably went to explain why he was growing so fond of them.

Well, he'd already made the promise to her, and now he was genuinely curious over how well the band was. For sure he would go.

"Guess I know what I'm doing tonight," Sorun muttered to himself. He looked at the poster, groaned, and then rolled it up and shoved it into his pocket. "Knothole Knuts, sheesh..."

"Okay, this time..."

"How many times have you said that by now?"

"This is the one, I feel it..."

Training was hit and miss for Sorun. Some things stuck, and some things just didn't. Things like learning practical skills were slow-going but easy enough for him to get a handle on. Fighting was something he was having to learn on his own through practical experience since nobody could really help him with his style. Training his body was... beginning to become a waste of time due to his endurance slowly diminishing with his withering body. He'd had to stop taking runs with Sonic to improve his stamina for fear that the hedgehog would notice his endurance wasn't up to snuff compared to what it used to be. Finding excuses to avoid those runs were starting to become a challenge.

Agility was still important for him, though, if only because it gave him more mobility options and made handling Yamato easier. Amy usually helped him with that, and most of the time this was done in the field of wooden posts. The occurrences where they could spend some time together to do anything was rare due to conflicting schedules from missions and whatever Amy did in her personal life, as was a similar case with everybody else, but every once in a while they found a little time together for them to do this.

Overall? Sorun wasn't really sure he ever saw any tangible results with her. He still tried, though, if only because the simple idea of benefiting from this was enough to keep him going. But all the hope in the world didn't change the fact he still couldn't hop from one post to another without falling down, even after all this time.

As was the case now, when he leapt from one post to another only for his foot to miss it entirely.

At the very least, he got the hang of not falling completely on his face. A Summoned Sword appeared right below Sorun's feet, with the teen waving his arms out wildly to balance himself once landing on the sword. He stood up straight once finding solid purchase on the sword, and then looked up towards Amy, who was standing on one of the other posts.

"That was the one, huh?" she asked, arms crossed with a teasing smirk on her face.

With a roll of his eyes, Sorun dismissed the Summoned Sword and landed softly on the ground. "You know what, I don't need your sass," he retorted as he sat down and leaned his back against the nearest post. "I'm done with this for the day."

"If you say so." With a shrug, the pink hedgehog hopped down from her own post and sat down against the post right next to Sorun. "So how are you feeling?"

Tired. "Ah, you know. Fine," he answered. "Kinda hurts I still can't make a single post jump, but hey. I can always cheat with the swords."

"I'm not so sure that's how you're supposed to do it, but if it works I guess..." Amy trailed off and tilted her head in Sorun's direction. "Are you sure you're okay? It's just, well, lately you've been getting kind of exhausted. Like, a lot more than usual."

"It's just all these missions," Sorun played off while locking his fingers behind his head. "I swear, we've been sent all over the place nonstop. I had to go with Sally to bust up that patrol of Egg Pawns seen around this one village, the day before that I had to go with Rotor because some weird Badnik disguised as a log of all things was trying to sabotage the hydroelectric water wheel you guys have set up in the river, and that took forever to sort out... agh, it's just been a lot."

"Yeah, it's been pretty busy lately," Amy admitted with a nod of her head. "It's a good thing Sally called it a day today for missions with everything going on later tonight. We could really use the break."

Sorun quirked his brows in interest, and then rolled his head over to Amy's direction. "So what do you know about this concert going on, anyways?" he asked.

Amy's green eyes brightened up immediately at the question. "Oh, it's Mina's band that's playing tonight! I always look forwards to her music, her band's the best!"

"So they're really that good?"

"Mh-hm!" Amy enthusiastically nodded her head. "Sally likes to encourage us to go since seeing us around helps improve Knothole's morale, and it gives us a bit of stress relief." Her head stopped bobbing and she gave Sorun a questioning look. "You're going tonight, right?"

"Yeah, I'm goin'," he confirmed with a nod, which caused Amy to brighten up again. "Don't really see a reason not to. Plus it's been forever since I've actually heard any good music, so I figured why not? That being said I don't really have any plans besides just show up." He removed his left hand from the back of his head and began scratching at his hair. "How 'bout you?"

For some reason Amy deflated at the question, causing some confusion to appear on Sorun. "Oh, I tried asking Sonic out, you know, just as a small get-together, but he turned me down and said he just wanted to hang out with everybody as a group."

At hearing that, Sorun's ears perked up in interest. "You tried asking him out on a date?"

"No! No, I... yeah..." When Amy noticed Sorun staring intently, she huffed and crossed her arms in indignation. "So what if I wanted to ask him on a date? I'm allowed to try and pursue a relationship, aren't I!?"

Chuckling nervously, Sorun held up his hands to try and calm Amy down while also unconsciously scooting back a few inches. "C'mon, that's not what I meant. I just really didn't see you going for him. You seriously like him?" He supposed he could see it. The guy was world famous. And now that he thought about it, he was surprised more girls didn't chase after him. And even if there were he doubted they could chase someone like him.

But, Sorun had always assumed that all these missions he kept going on kept Sonic too busy for things like that. Or maybe not, as there were other people in the Freedom Fighters in romantic relationships already. Maybe he just plain wasn't interested in Amy, because for as long as he'd known him he never even talked about anything romantic, nor had he even heard anybody mention such a thing before this.

"Like him!? I'm in love with him!" The sheer amount of bubbliness exuding out from Amy was enough to make Sorun scoot back another few inches. "What's not to love about him!? Sonic's the bestest person to have ever existed!" The hedgehog clasped her hands together as her eyes became half-lidded to form a dreamy expression on her face. "His looks, his personality, the way he races around to save everybody he cares about... what's not to love about him?"

"Uh... sure..." When he'd first heard of Amy's crush not even two minutes ago Sorun had been indifferent about it and had even planned on teasing her a bit over it. Now he was just beginning to grow uncomfortable and slightly concerned. "He's a great guy and all, but, uh, but love? Really? Liking him I get, but you haven't even dated-"

"That may be true, but the heart knows what it wants." The way she said this made Amy sound so sure of herself, but Sorun was just more off-put by her words. "I remember all the way back when we would write letters back and forth to each other. And then I got to be a Freedom Fighter alongside him! We're even both hedgehogs! What else could it be if not a match made in heaven?"

"What the hell, he even gets fan mail!?" Sorun thought to himself, long since having tuned out Amy's words. "Oh, but man, this is way weirder than I thought it was. She almost sounds obsessed with the guy." He paused, and then slowly drifted his eyes towards Amy. "Obsessed girl who has a giant hammer... oh, that dude's fucked. She's gonna give Sonic the 'Misery' treatment or some shit." He paused, and then shook his head as a small smirk formed. "Nah, nah she'd never do that. Amy ain't that crazy. It's just a really weird crush, even if she's... wait, how old is she? I know Sonic's sixteen like me, but what about her?"

"What're you smirking at?" The grin that had formed from his own thoughts seemed to have gone noticed by Amy, who began squinting at the human. Sorun coughed to the side and then began rapidly scratch at the back of his head in response.

"Nothin', nothin'. Hey, Amy, how old are you?" Sorun asked in a desperate attempt to deflect the conversation.

It seemed to work, fortunately enough, as the question caused Amy to tilt her head in thought. The question she asked in turn, though, gave Sorun pause. "Physically or mentally?"

"..." The pale teen blinked at the question. That sounded like something he would ask whenever he felt like being unnecessarily cryptic just to mess with somebody, not something he'd hear coming out of Amy of all people. "What is that supposed to mean?"

"Oh, well... physically I'm about as old as Sonic," Amy answered, "but I used to be a lot younger. Sally and Sonic wouldn't let me into the Freedom Fighters since I was so young, so there was a special Power Ring that granted wishes I used to... age myself up. Just a bit." She looked to the side with a pout on her face. "Nobody ever agreed with me and said I did the right thing, but I've gotten really mature since then so I don't see what the problem is."

And there it was. The one abnormal bit of information Sorun was expecting to make this completely normal-sounding story sound completely insane, i.e. normal by Mobius standards. It made him a bit relieved to hear that this strangely strong crush Amy had on Sonic came from a childhood crush. And helped to explain why Amy's current attitude. The bit with the wish-granting ring had him curious enough to ask, though. "There's a Power Ring that grants wishes?"

Amy nodded. "Yeah, the Ring of Acorns. It lost all its power when I made that wish, though."

"Damn." So much for all those ideas he'd begun to form. Ah well, easy come easy go. "Well, Amy, I'm not one to judge people for who they like, so follow your heart I guess. But I'm telling you right now, in all the time I've lived with Sonic nothing has made me want to live with the guy on a permanent basis."

For a bit there Amy had begun to look pleased, almost as if she was happy that Sorun sounded semi-supportive of her pursuit of Sonic. Her demeanor soured almost instantly when she heard him speak that last sentence. "What's so bad about living with Sonic, Sorun?"

Seeing the shift in her demeanor, Sorun quietly hissed through his teeth as he carefully thought over his response. "Well... nothing overly bad..." he slowly stated, growing a bit nervous under Amy's glare. "Just, y'know... the normal struggles of two guys living in the same room. Bad jokes all the time, guy leaves his clothes lying around... oh, and his energy." Sorun rubbed a hand over his face as an exhausted look overtook him. "I don't know where he gets it. He's just so energetic all the time and I just cannot keep up with him. Ugh, the way he practically drags me to breakfast all the time while talking my ear off, I swear..."

He just couldn't become tired. Sorun didn't know if that was even true or not, but if it wasn't, he had yet to see any evidence to the contrary. Because as long as he'd known him Sonic was this boundless source of energy that somehow made Sorun more exhausted just by being near him. And Sorun had to live under the same roof as him. In the same room.

Sometimes Sorun was amazed he even had the energy to get out of bed.

Amy nodded in understanding to Sorun's explanation, her facial features softening to a more easy expression. "Oh, I get it. Just guy stuff," she said. "That's understandable. A guy living with a guy can't be anything like two people in love living with each other."

Sorun decided to just nod along to her words so he could steer the conversation somewhere else. "Yeah, exactly. So did you have anything special planned for the concert tonight?"

It seemed that the attempted diversion had worked, as Amy nodded enthusiastically to the human as a smile came to her face. "Yeah, I went to Honey and bought a new dress just for the occasion." Sorun visibly flinched upon hearing the cat's name be mentioned, but he remained silent and allowed Amy to continue. "Actually, I bought a ton of outfits from her a while back, and I think I remember her saying that she managed to get all of them finished along with the dress I picked out for the concert." Suddenly, she groaned out loud and held a hand to her forehead. "Ugh, there's gonna be so many bags ..." She froze, and her eyes opened wide while the irises drifted to Sorun's position. "Hey, Sorun..."

Sorun, seeing where Amy was going with this, immediately shook his head. "I'm not going to Honey's shop with you to carry a bunch of clothes back to your house," he said with a shake of his head. "And no way am I going near that hellcat for any longer than I have to."

"Oh, come on! Please?" Amy plead, turning her whole body towards Sorun while clasping her hands together again, this time in a pleading gesture. "You have your arms and your spooky blue arms! That's four extra sets of arms you have to help me with!"

"Yeah, and you're in the top ten for the physically strongest Freedom Fighter. You seriously need my help carrying a bunch of bags?"

Amy sheepishly grinned and turned away at the question. "I... I may have bought a lot..."

"Seriously, Amy...?" Sorun groaned into his palm, thinking over the request in his head. An idea came to him, making his hand slowly slide off his face as he turned to face Amy again. "I'll do it for a Power Ring," he offered.

One of Amy's eyes squinted in confusion. "A Power Ring? Why?"

"'Cause Sally found out I've been poaching the Lake of Rings for Power Rings and she ordered me not to do it anymore." An annoyed look settled on his face as he rose his hand up and began opening and closing it in imitation of a mouth. "'Everybody depends on those rings, Sorun. You can't just go and blow through a rare and precious resource playing video games with Nicole, blah blah blah...'" he complained in a mock falsetto. "I think Rouge ratted me out. She would."

"She's not wrong, you know," Amy pointed out.
